The Prince was not onely busied in maintaining the State in this prosperitie, but in augmenting it, when on a sodaine to all mens griefe, death preuented him. He died in the ninth moneth of his government: and therein perhaps more happie than all his predecessors: because, that besides a goodly race which he left behind him, himselfe hauing well deserued of Religion, Countrey, and Citizens, the Citie at his death was cleare from pestilence, and abounded in plentie. We may moreouer adde this to his good fortune, That vpon his death-bed an Ambassador came to him from Baizet sonne to Mahomet Emperour of Turks, and brought him rich presents. It is reported that drawing towards his end, he called for foure of his sonnes, whom after vertuous instructions which he gaue them, he exhorted to loue and honour the State, intreating them often to remember the honour it had done him, for raising him from a meane Citizen to the highest and soueraigne dignitie, the which ought to make them to render that pietie to their countrey which their father by reason of his short government could not performe. The whole Citie did infinitely bewaile his death. Euerie one did publicly speake of his meeknesse towards all men. For besides other pious examples towards the poore, he did at the beginning of his government, (feearing that by reason of multiplicitie of causes the poore should haue no free access to him) make a decree, That the names of those who were desirous to haue audience of him should from eight to eight daies be drawne by lot: and that their names who were first drawne, should be first dispatched. This holy Decree was cause that neither ambition, briberie, nor fauour could hinder poore mens suits, nor barre them from audience. Great numbers of people followed his funerals to the Church of the Twinnes. But his bodie lies buried in the Church of the Publike charitie.

The ceremonie at the Prince's funerals.

It shall not be impertinent to set downe briefly in this place, the ceremonie which is at this day vsed at the interment of the Venetian Dukes. After he is dead and bowelled, they embalme the bodie, and lay it vnder a Canopie of Gold, with his guilt sword and spurs reuerfed: he is publicly kept in the Pallace for three whole daies; then all the companies of the Citie which are as many as there bee Trades, doe with their banners, in solemne order, goe before the bodie; after them follow the Cleargie, next them the mourners who are many, in sad and sorrowfull manner: last of all come the Senate clothed in Scarlet and Purple, to demonstrate, That the Citie which is free, doth neuer in mourning habit follow the funerall of any Prince, how vertuous soeuer. In this manner and habite, so soone as the bodie is brought into the Church, they sit round about it, whilst the memorie of the deceased Prince (according to the ancient manner) is recommended to the people in a funerall Oration. From thence the Senators returning to the Pallace, doe publish the first assembly for the creation of a new Duke.

Augustino

AUGUSTINO BARBADICO, the 74. Duke of Venice.

*V*gustino Barbadico, brother to the deceased Prince, a man of singular wisdom and grauitie, and at that time Procurator of S. Marke, succeeded his brother. This election was by so much more pleasing to the Cittie, by how much every man thought, that they could not haue chosen a man more resembling the late Prince in all vertuous qualities, than this man. The next day after his creation he made a sweet and gentle Speech to the people, but his maiestie like and reuerend presence, with a long white beard hanging downe beneath his girdle, made him more venerable. After his election all things flourishing in peace as before, hee beganne his gouernement like to his brother, by repairing the Ducall pallace.

The next Winter, Antonio Ferrier, and within a while after Gionanni Baria were sent to Constantinople to the Turkish Emperour. Antonio Lauretano Ambassadour at Rome was called home, because the Senate supposed that hee had not faithfully discharged his place; hee was a very wise man and excellently learned: he was banished the Cittie for tenne yeeres. Sebastiano Badoerio and Bernardo Bembo were sent to Rome in his stead, where Antonio Vinciguerra the Secretarie after Lauretano's departure, had in the meane time by the Senates commaund treated with his Holinesse, whereupon at their arriuall, they made a league with him.

A league betwixt the Pope and Venetians.

At the same time almost that this league was published, Francisco Priuli was made Admirall of the Sea. Hee at the Spring receiuing the publike enignes in S. Marks Church from the Princes hand, departed from Venice. Certaine armed Gallies to secure the Sea-frontiers, were gone before, and some others followed them. So great care had the Senate at that time for the guard of the Seas, when an vnlooked for warre from Germanie assailed them, about contending for their bounds; the beginning and progression whereof was thus. Sigismond, brother to the Emperour Fredericke, was Lord and Soueraigne Prince of the Rhetike and Noricke Commonwealths, and other Countreies of Germanie neere adiacent: Hee was a mecke and courteous Prince, but inclining too much to flatterers: Hee had euer bene in league with the Venetians, in which regard, the Almanie Marchants his subiects had free traffike ouer all the Venetians territories, and the Venetian Marchants did the like in his; and especially at a famous Mart which is yearly held for a certaine time at Bolzan, a Citie vnder his obedience.

The originall of the Rhetike warre.

Now the Venetians comming to this Fayre after their vsuall manner, in the yeare 1487, were by Sigismunds commaundement (contrarie to the law of Nations) taken and imprisoned, and their goods seized to the Princes vs. His subjects had not long before driuen the Venetians from the siluer Mynes in the Alpes, bought by the Seigniorie, and because they were neere to them, they withheld them by force. When they were demanded why they did so, their excuse was; That Sigismunds subjects inhabiting vpon the Lake of La Garda, were dispossessed of their dwellings, making this a colour to shadow their malice: for the strife of those men being referred to arbitrement, was in friendly manner debated by Commissioners from both sides.

The Almaines
besiege Rouero.

And the better to manifest that their proiect was not new, after the imprisonment of the Venetian Marchants, they leuied forces from all parts, as well of their own, as Swisses & Grisons to the number of ten thousand men. Then at the Spring they came into the field vnder Gaudentius Amasani their Generall, and entred furiously vpon the Confinnes of Verona: and from thence running fiftene miles into the Country, along the Riuer Adice, they drew neere to Rouero, a Castle belonging to the Venetians, seated in a streight of the Alpes vpon that Riuer, which they being not able to take as they supposed to haue done, they wasted the Country round about, and then made Sturma their Rendezuous.

Pietro Diede, and Ieronimo Marcello Pro-uidators.

These incurfions being knowne at Venice, the Senate commaunded that their souldiers which were in the Treuisan, Friul, and Lombardie, should speedily meet at Verona, and that beside those, new leuies of souldiers should be made. Within a while after, Pietro Diede Gouvernour of Verona, and Ieronimo Marcello were made Prouidators, and the Signiorie committed vnto them the command of that warre. The Senate afterwards thought good to make Julio Cesare Varrano Count of Camerina Generall of their Armie, who presently came to Verona.

Rouero yielded to the Almaines
on composition.

The Almaines in the meane time being provided of all necessaries to besiege and take that place, approaching neere the walls, batted it with their ordnance, whereof they had great store: and the batterie continuing certayne dayes, they did beate downe a great part of the wall; the Captaine of the Castle, by reason of their great number, being hardly able to repulse them from the assault, howbeit notwithstanding all his resistance hee was at last enforced to yeelde it vpon composition. That which did most torment the besieged at the batterie and assault, was the enemies artillerie, which was charged with yron bullets, hollow within and filled with wild fire. These bullets striking on the walls, scattered the fire vp and downe, with such vehemencie, as it burnt whatsoever it met with, so as no man durst come vpon the walles to the assault.

The Venetians
intreat old San-seuerino to be their Generall.

The Senate, perceiuing that the warre would continue longer than they had imagined, and in some sort distrusting the speedie finishing of it by the valour and skill of one Generall, intreated Roberto Sanseuerino, (who after that Pope Innocent had cashiered him; retired to his owne house neere Padua) to accept the place of Generall of their Armie, together with Julius Cesar Varran, and to make all haste possible to the Alpes about Verona, with certaine troupes of horse, together with his sonnes, two braue young men. Sanseuerino entertained the offer, and speedily went thither; At his arriual the armie was filled with hope: he made certaine light skirmishes, whose euent was somewhat doubtfull, and made a bridge ouer the Riuer, that the souldiers might passe from one side to the other, and that by it, victualles might likewise be brought to the campe.

At the same time certaine companies of Almaines made incurfions on the Territories of Vincenza, Feltre, and Friul; the feare of their comming doing more hurt than their actions. For Ieronimo Sanseuerino issued from a noble and ancient family in Vdina, and a great friend to the Venetians, who had made him a Gentleman of Venice, so soone as he had notice of the Almaines incurfions, did speedily arme the greatest forces he could, and together with many Country people whom hee assembled, Sanseuerino defeats the Al-maines.

sembled, marching from the mountaine tops and bad waies which were not vsually passed, he came downe vnlooked for vpon the enemies, and assailing them on their backs, brake and defeated them, manie of whom perished in those deepe and fearefull precipices. The Senate in acknowledgement of this notable seruice, gaue him great thanks, and recompenced him with the commaund of three hundred foote men, which himselfe bestowed on his brother Giacomo, choosing rather to liue quietly at home, than to meddle any more in martiall matters.

The Almaines put vp with pride, after they had taken Rouero (as hath beene said) made many incurfions into the Venetians Country, who determined to surprisethem: which they by their spies hauing notice of, laid an ambush to entrap the Venetians, from which after a fierce fight, Roberto Sanseuerino by the valour and prowesse of his sonne Antonio Maria, hardly escaped: Not long after Julio Cesare Varrano Count of Camerina being afflicted with a feuer, went from the Campe to Verona.

The Venetians
are defeated.

The Almaines afterwards, wanting victuals and pay, were readie to mutinie, which the Captaines fearing, craued of Sanseuerino a suspension of Armes for a time, which hee refusing, they did about midnight set fire on the Castle, and with their Armes and bagage dislodged before day. The Venetians wondering in the morning that they heard no noise in the enemies Campe, could hardly beleue that they were wholly gone, but doubted some treacherie or ambuscado: but their spies assuring them that they were gone farre enough, they recovered the Castle.

Sanseuerino being assured of the enemies returne, and strengthened with new supplies from Rauenna, La Marca, and Vmbria, resolu'd boldly to passe on and besiege Trent, to let the Almaines know that the Venetians could and durst inuade them likewise in their owne Country. He imparted his desseigne to the Prouidators, whereupon Luca Pisani an ancient man whom the Senate had sent in Pietro Diede his place, who was gone home to Verona, answered; rejoynion.

Sanseuerino's

That hee did not thinke that this enterprize could any way profit the State, because first, it was not a thing likely to be true that the enemies, who of late were so many, and so gallantly armed, were so farre gone into Germany, but at their pleasures they may returne and reunite themselves, yea and confront vs ere long, so readie is that nation to take Armes: and by that meanes, wee shall be in danger of loosing this place, so commodious for barring Strangers forth of Italy: Secondly, if our men haue beene now strong enough to drine the enemies hence, wee will not say that they went away of themselves or unconstrained, but that they haue beene enforced so to doe: But admit it were so, wee are too weake to inuade them, and to enter into their Country, there to maintaine a siege, if neede were: For wee must perswade our selues, that all Germany, with forces infinite, would unite themselves and come into the field, rather then endure such disgrace: Lastly, if we should enter their Country and be there broken and put to rout, what place of retreat haue we, hauing the Alpes on one side and our enemies on the other? Besides, we are to feare the passages, which are so narrow, as in time of peace they are hardly passable. And therefore it is better for the State to protract the warre, rather then on hope of vncertaine victorie to tempt Fortune. Again, the Citie being much tyred with the Ferrarese warre, ought to make more account of peace without glorie, than of warre, though honourable, and of an assured good euent. This is mine opinion, which peraduenture, in regard of an error, common to those of many yeres, (feare) will intreat you, if you so please, to declare your aduise, that wee may follow that which is most expedient.

Luca Pisani his opinion on San-seuerino his designe.

Ieronimo Marcello replied in this manner. I would not doubt but that it were dangerous to enter into the enemies Country, and to besiege Trent, if that were true which my Colleague hath alledged, Because that the Province or Citie which we should take, might animate all Germany against vs. Yet according to his owne opinion the matter is farre otherwise, for the enemy is not gone away of his owne accord, but desperately enforced, as well through want of victuals as pay. Now he that cannot entertaine an Armie already leuied, with with victuals and money, which are the true sinewes of warre, hardly for want of these two will he raise a new. For it is much easier, to preserve things already made, than to renew those which are overtrowne and wasted. It is not credible that all Germanie, to assist Sigismund, would take Armes against the Venetians, who have ever beene their good friends and Confederates: For Sigismund, unknowne to all other Germane Princes, without being provoked, hath insolently begunne warre. The Emperour Frederick his brother, approves not what he hath done, he would neither aid him with money, men or ought else, but seemeth to be highly displeased with this warre. Who will then suppose that he which is forsaken of his owne friends and countrymen, should ever be relieved by strangers? And if any man shall say that all the Princes of Germanie will not stirre in Sigismunds behalf, but in their owne; fearing that the taking of Trent would open the Venetians a passage into their Countrey: and this alone might excite them to unite their forces to expulse vs: This objection is easily answered, for the Venetian Signorie hath many townes and Castles through which they may easily passe into Germanie. Feltrino is not farre off, nor Belluna likewise; and least of all Ciudadalla in Friuli: Besides these townes, it hath many strong Castles towards the East, as Buerna and Lodron on the Bressan, and the Fort of the lake Isea, together with the Topine valley in the Bergamasco, with all that Countrey which extends it selfe from the lake of Coma to the Grisons; And yet the Germane Princes have neuer attempted to drive the Venetians thence for feare of the passage. And though wee should take Trent, they would not stirre, but rather confesse and freely say, that Sigismund deserued it for vnjustly prouoking the Venetian Signorie their friend and confederate. As for the streight and narrow wayes we are to passe from hence to Trent, it is nothing; yet we must open them, and foote by foot selfe vpon what soeuer we shall find by the way doth belong to the Almaines, and leaue nothing at our backes which may proue our enemy: And whereas my fellow hath alledged that the State wanting money, by reason of the Ferrara se troubles, is wearie of warre, I say we neede not care for that. For if we take Trent, all the expence of this warre shall be well recompensed with profit and vsurie, and our wrongs iustly reuenged, to the honour of our Commonwealth, which shall extend her bounds further; The which our ancestors haue so highly esteemed, as they haue neuer cared for any expence, so that they might augment their State. A faire occasion is now offered to take Trent, as well because our valiant soldiers will enter it, the Citie being not well fortified, as also for that the townesmen fearing the sacke thereof, will yeeld vpon the first summons, and therefore our forces are sufficient to hazard the matter without expecting any further aide: If the enterprize prosper, my Lord Pisani will be the first that shall commend the Authour thereof. If the Citie shall resist, and we cannot take it, yet having first wasted the Countrey, burnt their Country houses and villages, and filled all places with feare and amazement, we shall bring backe our victorious Armie into these parts: And thus being reuenged, we may more easily treat of accord, than if we now retire without any further exploit. Wee must thinke that opportunitie doth not euer day offer it selfe, and therefore we are to take it when it is opportunely offered, and not let it slip, least the remembrance of not accepting it, together with repentance, torment those who haue so lost it. Marcello's speech ended, Pisani freely allowed his opinion: The Prouidator thought it fit that the Generall should execute that which he had propounded, who speedily caused all things to be made readie: But because that betwixt Rouero and Trent vpon the Riuier towards the left hand, there stands a Castle called Pietro, seated on a little hill, commanding the high way, the Generall determined to take it, from thence to bring victuals to the Campe, and because (according to Marcello's aduice) he would not leaue any enemy place behind him. This thus resolved, because that on Rouero's side they could not march to this Castle by reason of the difficult hanging of the mountaine, hee caused his Armie to crosse the Riuier at a bridge which he made at its arriuall: then he marched vp against the streame of the Riuier, and within an houre and an halfe march, came to Caillan a small towne within a mile of Castle Pietro, where on small boates making another bridge, he repassed the Riuier, and encamped in a plaine sixe hundred paces from it, betwixt the mountain taine and the riuier, and from thence sent his light horse to make discouerie, who were to aduertize him if they should chance to descie any of the enemies ensignes. These light horse forgetting the Generals commandement, rode vp and downe wasting and spoiling the countrey, onely intending to get bootie. Those of Trent in the meane time aduertized of the making of the bridge, & fearing their owne danger as much as their neighbours, their Armie being far off, and their Citie badly fortified and vnprovided of all necessaries, intreated George, Lord of Pietro Plana a Castle beyond Trent, to make speedie head against the Venetian Armie, with such forces as he had, and the greatest numbers of Boores he could leue, and with them to amuze the enemy, till Sigismund should come to their rescue. He presently did what they entreated, and from Besina and other places neere adioyning had in an instant aboute one thousand men readie to march: Then with many drummes and trumpets he began to come downe from the hilles: The light horse who romed vp and downe, descrying them, and being not able to view their exact number by reason of the hill top which shadowed them, and perceiving their file to be verie long in regard of the streight waies, supposed them to be farre more than they were, and seeing them to approach with such great rumours, turned their backs and fled, and meeting with their fellows which followed them, caused them likewise to runne away towards the Campe, the horse and foote being pell-mell together.

The Almaines being more encouraged by the Venetians flight than their owne valour, were presently at their heeles, and so terrified their enemies campe, as euery man fled and retired to the Generals troups, who hauing notice of his soldiers flight was comming to backe them, where he brauely resisting the enemy, and reprehending the balenefse of his owne troups, fought verie valiantly for a time: Many on both sides were slaine. And noble Sanseuerino perceiving the enemies Squadron to presse in vpon him, acted wonders with his sword, till at last being beaten to the verie brinke of the Riuier, still advancing one of his owne ensignes, and being oppressed with multitudes, wrapped himselfe in his colours, and so mortally wounded fell into the water where he died. The rest of the Armie terrified by their Generals death, fled euery man toward the bridge. Andrea de Burgo Colonell of the infanterie perceiving this disorder, and that no man had any care to resist the enemies, supposing that if the bridge were broken, the runnawaies would stand to it, and be enforced to fight, ranne presently to cut the ropes which held the boates: But it fell out otherwise than he imagined: For feare doth commonly entertaine no counsell, euen so those who fled, hoping to escape by crossing the riuier, when they saw the bridge broken, did headlong with their horse and Armes throw themselves into the riuier, where they all perished by the violence of the streame. Few or none escaped to the other side, so that of the Venetians, accounting as well those that were drowned, as they whom the Almaines slew, aboute a thousand men lay dead on the place. Onely Guido Maria de Rosiss with his troupe of horse, fighting valiantly, manifested the worth of carriage and magnanimite in warre, who being inuitoned by the victorious enemy, made way through the midst of them, and came off brauely. Other Captaines and Souldiers that could not crosse the riuier; some by vnknowne waies got vp to the tops of the mountaines, and others, but verie few, entered into boates and escaped to Rouero; among whom was De Rosiss and his companie. There died great numbers of the Almaines, who with a bloudie victory returned home.

The Venetians spent some time in renewing their Armie, which was almost disbanded. The Almaines in the meane time did not stirre, but were glad to doe the like, hauing receiued no lesse losse than their enemies. Neuerthelesse, there happened at the same time diuers skirmishes and encounters, with taking of townes vpon the Feltrine and Vincenzan territories, and along the lake of La Garda, with such troups as each side could raise, putting all to fire and sword. The Venetians, among others

Y y

The Venetians in arms.

The death of old Sanseuerino the noble Venetian General.

The Venetians are wholly put to rout.

A generous act of Guido Maria de Rosiss.

A bloudie victory to the Almaines.

The siege of Trent is resolved.

others tooke a Castle neere to the lake, called Arques, which by the Senates decree was burnt and ruined, because it had bene the principall moriue of the warre, and had caused the strife concerning their bounds, as also because that the Lords of that Castle were capitall enemies to the Venetians.

In the meane time Andrea de Burgo accused before the Councell of Ten, for that he had treacherously, and of malice, broken the bridge at Caillan, was committed to prison, but vpon report of Marco Beazana Chancellor of the Senate, who had bene in that encounter, he was enlarged, and restored to his place. Pope Innocent, being displeased with this warre, at that time dispatcht the Bishop of Ozima to Sigismund, to intreat him in his name to giue an end to that warre, and to tell him that the Turk being so neere a neighbour, it did not befit two such potent Christian nations to contend with one another, & that if it should please him to make his Holinesse vmpier of his controuersie with the Venetians, he would doe him all right. The Bishop made so nestay with Sigismund, till articles of peace were drawne, which he carried with him to Venice, who imparting them to the Senate, they were reiecte: In this manner without effecting his legation, he returned to Rome.

The Pope made the same motion of peace to the Venetians by Nicolas Franco Bishop of Treuifo his Nuncio, who earnestly entreated the Senate to embrace it, assuring them that his Holinesse would imploy his credit and authoritie to effect it. But all was in vaine, till Sigismund, tired with the heauie burthen and expence of warre, being no longer able to entertaine his Armie, did himselfe sue to the Venetians for peace, whereupon after fundrie messages from both sides, peace was concluded in November on these conditions: That the townes taken on either part, should be restored to the true owners: That the Venetian marchants taken at the Faire of Bolzana, should be set at libertie, and their losses recompenced. Other matters not here mentioned, were referred to the Pope.

Such was the end of the Rethicke warre. The Senate recompenced the Captaines and Souldiers according to their merits. Julius Cesar Varran was cashiered, because he had behaued himselfe negligently in his place. The two tonnes of noble Sanseuerino were still retained in the Signories pay, and each of them made Captaine of fixe hundred horse. Sebastiano Badoaria, and Bernardo Bembo were sent to the Pope to accomplish this Treatie. All matters thus concluded, the Senate made decrees concerning the expences of priuate families, womens garments, and generally against all superfluities, namely, dice and cards-play, sauing at weddings, Innes, and vnder the two Columns in S. Markes place, with this addition: That the summe which was paid for should not exceed the fifth part of an ounce of gold.

There was a rumour at the same time, That Batazet the Turkish Emperour made incursions on the Aegean Sea. The Senate hereupon commanded Francisco Priuli at that time General of the Gallies to be in readinesse to put to Sea. And because they supposed that the Turkes had an intent to invade Cyprus, he was commanded to saile thither. Priuli embarking his souldiers in April, went to Corfou, and from thence to Modon, accompanied by Cosmo Pascalis the Prouidator, where Nicolas Capello the other Prouidator met them, augmenting the number of their vessels; with which, being fixe and twentie Gallies, and tenne Brigandines they set saile, and the fifth day after arriued in Cyprus.

The report of this Turkish fleet consisting of many long vessels which had sailed by Cyprus through the Gulph of Aiazza, and then returned into the Hellespont without any exploit, bred a longing in the Senate to impatronize the Realme of Cyprus: As also because Ferdinand king of Naples went about to make it his, by means of a marriage which he secretly treated betwixt his sonne and Queene Katherine, borne in Venice, of the illustrious family of the Cornaries, giuen in marriage by her father Mares Cornari to James of Lusignan king of Cyprus, with a dowrie of a thousand pound of gold.

This Queene a little after her husbands death, being a widow, and with child by him, him, was by his last will and testament left coheire with the childe she should bring forth, and yet committed to the protection of the Venetian Senate, who at her marriage adopted her their daughter. After the kings death she was deliuered of a sonne, who died before the yeere was expired: Then did certaine Lords of the Island goe about to raise commotions, but the Senate sent forces thither vnder the command of a Prouidator together with the Queenes father, who were still to attend vpon her, so as these stirres were on a sodaine appeased.

The Realme then being at quiet, the Queene vnder the Senates protection had for the space of fifteene yeeres peaceably gouerned that kingdome; when Ferdinand vnderstand by two of his familiar friends practised the said marriage: Their names were, Riccio Alarini of Naples, an inward friend with the late king, and Triflan Cybelletto of Cyprus, who had a sister attending on the Queene: these two coming thither from Ferdinand, were apprehended by the General of the fleet, and presently sent to Venice: but Triflan died by the way, hauing swallowed a Diamond, and druncke Sea-water after it: for hee knew that if he came to Venice, the Senate would punish him according to his deserts, because after the kings death he had raised tumults in the Realme, and slaine Andrea Cornari the Queenes vnckle.

The Councell of Tenne, moued by these practizes, fearing Ferdinands policies, and the Turkish preparations, together with the king of Syriaes neere neighbourhood, commanded Georgio Cornari the Queenes brother, to goe into Cyprus to her, and perswade her to remit the gouernment of the kingdome to the Venetian Senate and her selfe to returne to Venice; where she might spend the remainder of her dayes merrily in her owne Country among her friends and kinsfolkes, and not trust her life and meanes among strangers, in a forraigne Realme.

Georgio Cornari imbarcked himselfe in a small vessell to make the more haste, and in the winter time in a short space arriued in Cyprus, where hee presently acquainted his sister with the cause of his coming. The Queene wondred at his demand (as one that had bene wont to liue royally, and knew the sparing and parcimonious life of the Citizens of Venice) and boldly refused it, saying: That shee would not for the world forsake so rich and goodly a Realme, and that the Senate ought to be satisfied with enioying it after her death. He, insisting on the contrarie, intreated her not to make more account of Cyprus, than of her owne Countrey; because that worldly affaires being variable and inconstant, it might in short space come to passe that shee might bee expelled her kingdome, it being so desired by many great and potent Lords, and her selfe envied by her owne subiects, who disdained to be gouerned by a woman. One onely meanes was left her whereby to prevent all these mischiefs, which was, seeing shee had no children to refferre the gouernment of the Realme to the Venetian State, now in her life time: That the Venetian Common-wealth had bene well pleased to suffer her to gouerne the Realme, so long as the time had bene quiet and voyd of suspitions: But now when all her neighbours wait for occasions, and lay snares to surprize it, the Senate hath thought this onely remedy most expedient: But if she feared not these dangers, he besought her to consider the perill she was like to haue fallen into the precedent Summer; had not the State of Venice reskewed her with their Gallies, the Turkish armie would haue taken her kingdome from her, and her selfe haue bene enforced to flee, or else in danger to haue bene carried as a rapine to Constantinople. It is good to foresee that which a small accident or some error may cause vs fall into, and to prevent it. Fortune is variable, sodaine and inconstant, and we cannot ener prevent the enemies designes, nor can our friends be alwayes ready to help vs when we please. There is a great distance by land, but farre greater by Sea betwixt the farthest part of the Adriaticke Gulph, and the Isle of Cyprus: This ought you (Madame) to remember and especially consider, that though nothing enforced you therunto, yet what greater honour, or more lasting praise can you leaue behind you, than to haue giuen so flourishing a kingdome to your Country? and to haue it written in the Annals, That the Venetian State was honored and augmented with the kingdome of Cyprus, by a Ladie her owne Citizen. You shall still be a Queene. And if the case were mine, I should be desirous, especially hauing liued so long in Cy-

The Castle of Arques taken and burnt.

The Venetians refuse the Articles of peace.

Peace concluded betwixt Sigismund and the Venetians.

The Venetians send a fleet to guard Cyprus.

What moued the Senate to desire the Realme of Cyprus.

The Senate send George Cornari into Cyprus.

The Queene refuses her brothers request.

Cornari his reply.

prais as you haue done, to beholde my native country and place of birth, there to shew my greatnesse and magnificence, there to embrace my brethren, sisters and kinsfolke. Neuer was the arrival of any Lord or Lady so welcome to Venice as yours will be: And if Venice were a base and abject village; yet in you it would be a pious duty to be willing to renew the place where you first drew breath, and whose you of a long time you haue not long seene. But it is certaine that Venice in all mens opinions, is preferred before all other cities vnder heaven, and accounted the goodliest of all Italy. What causest her is able to moue you after so long absence, especially your country requesting you to come home, to refuse it? You are to shunke the Senate, for being Queene, and for that you haue reigned so long in peace, but it seems you haue no desire to acknowledg it; if otherwise, you would not neglect and refuse their intreaty. In a word, I being your brother, and one who ought to haue some interest in you, if you deny me this request: all men will thinke that it is not you which haue refused to gratifie the State, but that I haue aduised you to the contrary, whereby I shall purchase my countries hatred, and blot my children with infamy. And therefore (Madame) I humbly beseech you to graunt the Senates request, and to respect me and mine. There is nothing more worthy commendation, than to know modestly how to entertaine Fortune when she smiles on vs, and not to desire to be still on the wheelers toppes. Almighty God doth sometime by aduersitie trie those whom he hath along time fauoured, to make them remember that they are mortall. To conclude, you can offer up to his diuine Maiessty no prayer more pleasing, nor sacrifice more acceptable, than to submit your selfe to his will, which you must be perswaded is, that you grant your Countries request.

Georgia more eloquent by Nature than Art, hauing thus discoursed with his sister, preuailed so farre with her as melting into teares, she made him this vniuersall answer. Brother, if this be your opinion, I will yeelde vnto it, and will strue to ouer-master my selfe. But our Country shall thanke you for my kingdom, and not me. Their departure concluded, and order taken for all things, the Generall and Prouidators commanded a solemne Masse to be celebrated in the Cathedrall Church of Farnagosta: then by the Queene commaunded them and in her presence, the Standard of the Venetian Common-wealth was erected in the Citties Market-place, and by this meanes was the kingdom of Cyprus reduced to a Prouince.

The Queene and her brother did afterward, embarque themselves, traine, and royall prouision in the Venetian Gallies, and in short space in the midst of winter arrived in the hauen of Venice. Shee was honourably receiued by Prince Augustino Barbadoico, and by all the Senate who met her at Saint Nicholas Church with infinite multitudes of people of all sorts, who entering into their Gondolas, did with great ioy accompany her. Herselfe in the Bucentauro sitting in the midst of the Senate and illustrious Ladies of the Citie, did in that magnificence enter Venice: The like honour was neuer done to any Venetian Ladie, and her arrival was most pleasing to the people. Not long after, the Councill of Tenne presented her with the Cattle of Azzola, seated on the Treuisan hilles, and appoynted fiftie pounds weight of gold for her yeerly expence, with many other rich presents which they gaue her.

Within a while after, the king of Tremisen in Affricke, did by his Ambassadors request the Senate to send some Venetian Gentleman to do iustice to the Venetians that liued in three of his Citties. The Senate to satisfie the king, created a new Magistrate to goe thither, who for his entertainment should haue the hundred part of all marchandize sold by the Venetians. Lodouico Pizamarone was the first that was appointed to this office. At the same time they builded a Fort vpon an hill neere to the Lake Ider not farre from Anfer a small Towne on the Bressian, which did greatly secure the country.

About the same time there arose some contention betwixt Mathias the valiant king of Hungarie and the Emperour Fredericke: Mathias leuid two armies to invade his enimie in two seuerall places; the one hee sent into Friull, and the other to the confines of Liburnia. The Senate being troubled with this neighbour warre, dispatched patched two Ambassadors, Antonio Boldo, to the Emperour, and Dominico Bellano to Mathias, who dealt so wisely with these two enimie Princes, as they appealed them, and procured truce for a certaine time.

Frederick in the meane time freed from warre, came to Trent, to knowe if the Senate would giue him leave to passe through that part of Italie, which stretcheth along the Alpes from the lake of La Garda, as farre as Aquileia. The Senate aduertized of his comming, sent foure Gentlemen in Ambassage to him, Ieronimo Barbaro, Dominico Grimani, who was afterwards Cardinall, Paulo Trevisano, and Ieronimo Leone, who meeting him neere to Rouero, did in the States name honourably salute and receiue him, and accompanied him so long as he remained on their territories, taking order that he should want nothing in his iourney. They bringing him as farre as Portonouo, which is not farre from his owne confines, tooke leaue of him: He sent three Ambassadors to Venice, to gratifie the Senate for the honor and courteous entertainment he had receiued in their Countrey, which hee tooke as a demonstration of their loue towards him: From thence he departed home to his owne kingdom.

Now, although the Citie was peaceable, they did not for all that cease to provide things necessarie for warre. Harquebuses were at that time much in vse, an engin which footmen vsed in warre, deuised at first by the Almains. The State vniuersall willing to be without such weapons, when need should be, did by a decree of the Councill of Tenne, send for the expertest workmen in that Arte, from all parts of Christendome, and for the skilfullest gunners to instruct and teach their youth. And because the Countrey people should not be ignorant therein, it was decreed that in euery village vnder their iurisdiction, two young men should be chosen to practice this exercise, and for recompence, should be freed from all subsidies and impositions: and that those young men at a certaine day in the yeere should meete at the next Cattle or Citie to shoot at a marke, where his village that should shoot best, was for one whole yeere freed from all tax and tribute.

The ensuing winter was so sharpe and cold by reason of snow which fell, as all the marshes round about the Citie was frozen ouer, the Country people comming thither on horsebacke with prouision, and the Magistrate of Mestre came in a wagon as farre as S. Secondo's in the midst of the lakes. And the horsemen for disport armed themselves, and ranne at Tilt vpon the great Chanell: so sharpe and vehement was the frost.

Not long after, Marco Barba Cardinall, and Patriarke of Aquileia died at Rome. Pope Innocent bestowed the Patriarke shippe on Hermolao Barbaro the Venetian Ambassador then at Rome. This being knowne at Venice, notwithstanding that Hermolao was a man of great desert, and had written to the Senate that the Pope had enforced him to forsake his order of Senator, and put on that of Patriarke, yet because there was an expresse law, forbidding all Venetian Gentlemen, being Ambassadors at Rome, to receiue any Ecclesiasticall benefice from the Pope, during the time of their Ambassage: the Senate tooke the audacious infringing of this law, in bad part. And though he were very rich, well allied, and had great friends, his father being one of the noblest men in the Citie, the onely loue and reuerence to law caused the Senate to write backe vnto him, that presently without delay he should redeliuer the Patriarke ship to the Pope, and for not so doing, they threatned to take from his Father the Procuratorship of S. Marke, and to confiscate all his goods. His father not being able to moderate the sentence given by the Councill of Tenne, fell sicke with griefe, and within a while after died: The sonne likewise, hauing published certaine excellent bookes of his owne composing, did before the yeeres end die of a Squinancie.

The same yeere Lorenzo de Medici died at Florence, a man of a rare and excellent iudgement, gouerning his Countrey in Peace: He left three children liuing, who were afterwards expulsed the gouernment and banished. The summer following answer.

The Queene

The reception of the Queene of Cyprus at Venice.

A new magistrate sent by the Senate into Africke.

Contention betwixt the Em-perour Fredericke and Mathias king of Hungarie.

The invention of Harquebuses.

A decree for the exercise of youth

An extreme frost at Venice.

A law carefully observed by the Venetians.

Great infliction of the Venetians.

The death of Lorenzo de Medici.

ing Pope Innocent died, in whose stead by gifts and briberie, Alexander Borgia a Spaniard, borne in Valentia, was chosen. This Pope made a league offensive and defensive for five and twentie yeeres with the Venetians and Galeas Sforza Lord of Milan, who was at that time very young and ruled by Lodovico his vncl.

By this league they were tyed to defend and maintaine one anothers territories, and to destroy their enemies: And because Zemes, brother to Baiazeth the Turkish Emperour, liued at that time in Rome, there was an addition made in the Treatie of the league, that if Baiazeth should make warre on the Venetians, the Pope should deliuer him vnto them that they by him might inuade his brother. This Zemes, being by his brother driuen forth of his kingdom, fled to Rhodes. The Rhodians vnwilling to draw warre to their owne Gates, sent him to the French King; he deliuered him to Pope Innocent who had earnestly craued him. Pope Alexander at his election found him at Rome, where hee was carefully guarded, lest he should renew warre against his brother, in recompence whereof Baiazeth sent yearly to Rome to the Pope 400. pounds of gold: Hercules de Este Duke of Ferrara did afterwards enter into this league.

The Venetian State thus peaceable, Charles the eight French King sent a Gentleman to Venice, who being brought before the Senate, told them, That his King being resolu'd to come into Italy with a mightie Armie to conquer the kingdom of Naples, which by hereditarie right belonged to him, did desire therein to know the Venetians loue towards him, and to be satisfisd whether they intended to keep and obseure the same league and friendship which of old had bene betwixt them. The Senate vpon this newes, which was likely to alter the State of Italy, assembled the great Councell, namely, to debate this businesse, being loth by their answer to prouoke the King against them.

After sundry opinions, the Councell answered the Ambassador, that the Signorie had euer preferred peace before warre, and did now desire it more than euer, therefore they could wish, that his King liuing at peace, would suffer other Princes of Italy to doe the like: yet if hee came thither with an intent to make warre, they would in no sort stirre, nor quit his league and friendship.

This Gentleman with their answer left Venice and went to Rome. After him, two others in lesse than two moneths came to Venice one after another from the same King for the same businesse, who receiued the selfe same answer as the first. But Lodovico Sforza was the onely motiue that prouoked this King to the enterprise of Naples. He after the death of his brother Galeas Sforza Duke of Millan, tooke vpon him the government of the State, and expelled his widow, who would haue managed it in the behalfe of her sonne John Galeas that was very young, when his father died. Then by little and little, he dismissed the ancient Officers, placing others in their rooms, and in this manner had commaunded the Dutchie about thirteene yeeres. And though in outward shew he seemed very careful of his Nephew, yet in his young yeeres he had so carelessly brought him vp, as it seemed that his onely ayme was to make him incapable and unfit for any honourable exercise, drawing him from all vertuous studies.

Alphonso, sonne to Ferdinand King of Naples, gaue his daughter Isabell in marriage to this young John Galeas: yet though he were married and had children by his wife, his vncl neuerthelesse still gouerned the State, meaning to leaue it to his owne children. Ferdinand and Alphonso taking his vrsurpation (for it was no better) in bad part, moued by the continuall & lamentable letters of their daughter, did louingly entreat Lodovick (according to equitie and reason) to surrender the government of the State of Milan to his nephew, sonne to his brother, vnto whom it belonged, who was of yeeres to gouerne, married, and had two children. They hauing often vsed these intreaties proceeded to sharpe and bitter termes, telling him, That they had made alliance with the Duke of Milan, who was his Nephew, whose State hee vsurped, and therefore he should doe well to detain it no longer.

Lodovico

Lodovico fearing their power and threatening, and hauing intelligence that the French Kings laid claime to the kingdom of Naples, sent an honourable Ambassade into France, vnder colour to salute king Charles, not acquainting Pope Alexander or the Venetians with it, with whom he was in league, and commanded his Ambassador, secretly to motion the matter, and to assure the king, that if he would attempt the recouerie of that Realme, he would assist him with all his forces and meanes; and that the conquest would be easie, so that he would onely passe the Alpes, and thence preuaile with the king to cause him to vndertake this journey, being besides incited thereunto from another place. Antonio Prince of Salern maligned by Ferdinand, and by that meanes enforced to forsake his country Italy, had retired himselfe into France. He in all his discourses with the king, spake of no other matter, telling him, That he should doe ill to let slip so faire an occasion, offered for the recouerie of his owne right: assuring him besides, that Ferdinand was generally hated for his avarice, crueltie, and treacherie; and therefore it would be an easie matter to dispossesse him, especially for a king of France, whose authoritie and credit in those countries was verie great. Besides all this, Pope Alexander was no friend to Ferdinand in regard of Virginio Vrsino that serued him, whose open enemy the Pope had declared himselfe in regard of the towne of Anguillare.

All these reasons were approued by the Lords of France that were in fauour with the king, who desired nothing more than this journey. For some of them hoped by the Popes meanes to obtaine Ecclesiasticall dignities, others expected some honourable command in the Armie, and to be gouernours of Cities and Townes which the king should conquer, and somelike were posselt with a desire of noueltie.

King Charles lending a willing eare to this Ambassade, and tasting the Prince of Salernes proposition, a rumour was prently spred, That the French were coming into Italy, to inuade the Realme of Naples. Vpon these newes king Ferdinand began to arme by sea and land, and to inuent meanes to draw Pope Alexander to his side. Lodovico foreseeing, that if they leagued themselves together, Ferdinand might ioine his Armie with that of the Pope, and send them both into Lombardie, before the kings arriual, and by the same meanes expulse him from Milan, intreated the Venetians to lend their horse and foot troupes to the river Oglio in the Breslian territorie, to diuert king Ferdinand from his designe, or else to let them crosse the tiar to defend his State. The Venetians answered, that it was needlesse: for his country was out of danger.

Lodovico perceiuing the French delaies, and fearing that it might breed his ruine, did againe send Ambassadors to Charles to hasten his journey, promising to assist him with men and money, and victuals, so soone as he should set foote in Italy. King Charles who had spent certaine moneths in the onely consultation of this buisnesse, and had not as yet made any certaine resolution, when this second Ambassade arriued, did by these continuall persuites and offers of Lodovico, presently resolute vpon it.

Now because he would not in any sort be hindred in his conquest, he renewed the ancient league with the kings of Castill, and surrendered to them the countie of Rossillon, engaged to king Lewis his father for three thousand crowns by John king of Arragon, father to Ferdinand, on condition that the said kings should in no sort aide the Arragonois against him in his conquest of the Realme of Naples. This league sworne to, the king made all things readie for his journey. Ferdinand had intelligence hereof one day as he came from hunting, whereupon he fell sicke, and within two daies after, died of an Apoplexie. Alphonso his eldest sonne was by his younger brother and all the Princes of the Realme saluted king. He intreated the Venetians by their Ambassador resident in his Court to perswade Lodovico to desist from soliciting the French king to come into Italy, and that hee would not be a

meanes

Lodovico Sforza sends Ambassadors into France to king Charles.

Antonio Prince of Salern incites king Charles to this journey.

What moued the French Lords to perswade the king to this journey.

Lodovico fears.

He sends another Ambassador into France.

The death of Ferdinand king of Naples.

Alphonso requiesceth to the Venetians.

Charles the eight French king, sends an Ambassador to Venice.

The Venetians answer.

The Senate
write to Lodowico in Alphonso behalf.

Philip de Comines, Ambassador for king Charles at Venice.

The Venetians
answer to Philip de Comines.

League betwixt
Pope Alexander and Alphonso
king of Naples.

The Venetians
fleet in Sclauo-nia.

meanes of his ruine, promising no more to taxe his vsurpation of the State of Milan, which he should enjoy so long as he pleased. The Senate by letters acquainted Lodowico with Alphonso's request, and intreated him not to draw the French into Italy: But perceiving that he made no direct answer they gaue ouer and solicited him no more.

King Charles hauing resolued vpon the enterprize, sent Philip de Comines Lord of Argenton his Ambassador to Venice, who in his kings name made a proposition to the Senate, That if they would ioyne with him in this warre of Naples, they should haue a great share in the kingdome, and if they would not accept that offer, to intreat them at least to perseuer in their ancient league and friendship with the king his Master: heereunto he added that his king had commanded him to remaine at Venice to acquaint them with all his designs and enterprises. The Senate replied, That the king was so potent and so well furnished with all warlike necessities that he needed not their aide in that warre, and therefore they determined, according to the example of their Ancestors, not to stirre, who neuer made warre but vpon constraint, and that they would craue no part in a kingdome whereunto they had no right. For the rest, they would neuer goe from that which they had promised to the kings Ambassadors; that they would euer make great account of his leage and friendship; that they had willingly heard him for his kings sake, and would still do so if he remained among them; that he might at his pleasure familiarly discourse with them about any matter that concerned his king, as well in regard of their loue towards his futher king Lewis, as to himselfe.

In the meane time Pope Alexander (who repented that he had incited the French king to this warre) and king Alphonso by the mediation of Virginio Yrsin, comming to Viconare, a Castle of his owne, to see one another, and to discourse together of their affaires, made a league on this condition: That the Pope should take Alphonso into the protection of the Romane Church, and with all his power defend him against his enemies: and in counterchange, Alphonso promised to pay him downe in readie money a thousand pounds of gold for the arreages of the tribute due to the Church of Rome for the Realme of Naples, and to pay him yearly afterwards, 30 foure hundred pounds of gold. And for greater assurance of this treatie, Alphonso promised to giue one of his daughters in marriage to Guisfredo sonne to Pope Alexander. This thus concluded, both of them made preparations for warre.

Alphonso had already armed thirtie Gallies, and eigheteene great vessels to scoure along the Riuer of Genoa, and to annoy the enemies fleet which was making readie in the Cities; and he was to make a leaue of horse and foot in Calabria to send them into Lombardie, when newes came that Bajazeth the Turkish Emperour made new preparations, whereupon the State of Venice determined likewise to arme.

Antonio Grimani made Generall of the Gallies, Commaunded all Gallies that were readie to be lanced, and with them sailed into Sclauonia, where commissioners from Scardona and Clissa came to him, who receiued their oath of allegiance for the Venetian Signorie: from thence hewent to Corfou.

Alphonso's fleet, whereof his brother Fredericke was Generall, entring the Riuer of Genoa, came to Portouenere, where Obieto de Pielca, a man highly esteemed among his countrey men, landed with certaine souldiers, but being repulsed by the enemy, he returned to his Gallies, and presently made towards Liguorne, and from thence held his course to Naples. Alphonso hauing lost all hope by Sea, sent his Armie vnitd with the Popes, into Romagna, hauing intelligence that part of the enemies forces had already crossed the Po.

Ferdinand, sonne to Alphonso, a young Prince of great hope, assisted by Nicolo Yrsin, Count Petilian, Virginio Yrsin, and John Iames Trunlice the Milanese, commaunded the Arragonoife armie, consisting of two thousand fise hundred horse, and eight thousand foote.

Whilst the Venetian fleet was at sea, Ambassadors from Florence came to Venice,

Venice, to craue the Senates aduise how they should answer king Charles, who had intreated them to giue his armie passage through their territories, and also how they should behaue themselves in those occurrences; for they referred themselves wholly to them, and determined directly to follow their Councill. The Senate knowing very well, that whatsoeuer they should say to the Florentines, would be reported to king Charles and Alphonso, answered; That in so difficult a businesse, subject to sundry accidents, they knew not what was best to be done; and though they loved the one better than the other, yet they durst not deliuer their opinion, because that Fortune is commonly Mistresse in warre, and that it usually comes to passe, that matters done by chance and aduenture, did oftentimes prosper better than those which are premeditated, and debated with long consultation: and therefore they ought to craue counsell of none but Almighty God, who onely knew what was best for men to embrace or auoid: and with this answer dismissed them.

Now the forces which king Charles and Lodowico had sent before, beeing come neere the enemies, neither the one or other durst come to stroakes, but marched close together, being still protected by some fort or riuer, which was euer betwixt them: yet they made sundrie light skirmishes to shew their valour. King Charles had sent the Duke of Orleans, Julian the Cardinall nephew to Pope Sixtus, and Antonio Prince of Salerne (of whom we haue heretofore spoken) to Genoa, with 20 braue troupes of foote, to man the Gallies which were ready rigged, with them to open a passage by Sea into the Realme of Naples, whilst himselfe did the like by Land.

The end of the third Booke of the fourth Decad.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE FOVRTH DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the fourth Decad.

- KING CHARLES departs from Vienna in Dauphine towards Italy. The King by reason of his sickness tarries at Ast. The death of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan, whereupon Lodovico his uncle usurps the Title and Armes of Duke of Milan. The French take Fiuizana and successe. Pietro de Medicis grants all King CHARLES demands, and for his labour is driven from Florence, and declared an enemy to the Common wealth. The King restoreth the Pisans libertie. The French take Bertinora. King CHARLES his victorious entry into Florence. The King makes an accord with Pope ALEXANDER, and kisseth his feet and cheek. ALPHONSO in love to his sonne FERDINAND depaereth himselfe from the Kingdome of Naples. FERDINAND retires into the Isle of Sicilia.
- KING CHARLES entereth Naples, and takes the Cities two Castles. A league made at Venice against the French betwixt the Pope, Emperour, King of Spaine, Venetians, and Duke of Milan. King CHARLES is crowned in Naples, and departs from thence to returne into France. The preparation of the League to stoppe King CHARLES his passage. The Duke of Orleance his incursions on the Leagues territories: he takes Nouara. The battell of Fornouo betwixt King CHARLES and the Confederates. And lastly, King CHARLES his arrivall at Ast.

- SOOONE after the departure of the Duke of Orleance and his troopes towards Genoa, King Charles leaving Vienna in Dauphine on the 23. of August 1493. journeyed toward Ast by the mount Geneva. Galeas of S. Seurine met him at Suza, and accompanied him to Ast: whither Lodovico Sforza came presently to him, with his wife and many faire and gallant Ladies of the Dutchy of Milan. Hercules Duke of Ferrara came thither likewise, where after consultation of sundry affaires, it was concluded that the Armie should presently march. Lodovico in the mean time retired to Num, a Castle on the Milanois a mile from Ast, whither those of the Councell went often to see him, whilst the King tarried at Ast sicke of the small pox, whereupon his Army was quartered in that towne and in other places neere adioyning: the number of it, beside the 200. Gentlemen of the Kings guard (accounting the Swisses that were gone before with the Bayly of Dijon to Genoa, and those troopes in Romagna vnder the command of Aubigny) amounted to 1600. men at Armes, 6000. Swisse, and 6000. French foot-men: And for the use of this Armie they had brought by sea to Genoa great store of Ordnance both for battene and the field, with munition, in such abundance, as the like before was neuer seene in Italy.

The King, during his aboad at Alf, had sent for the Duke of Orleans from Genoa, wishing him to attend him there. This towne belonged vnto him by his grandmother, vnto whom it was giuen in dowry by the Duke of Milan her father. Now so soone asking Charles had recovered his health, hee sent this Armie into the field, and himselfe went to Pavia, where being lodged in the Castle he went to visite John Galeas Duke of Milas, his cousingerman, the king and hee were sons to two sisters, daughters to Lewis the second Duke of Sauoy, who lay dangerously sicke in the same Castle. His talke to him was generall, by reason of Lodowico's presence: he told him that he was extremely grieved for his sicknesse; comforted him, and willed him to be of good cheere, and to vse all meanes for the recouerie of his health: But the hope thereof being small, the King and as many as beheld him did lament his estate, and perceived that this young Prince, through his vnles treacherie, would not liue long.

His compassion was augmented by the presence of Princeesse Isabell his wife, who languishing as well for her husbands sicknesse, feare of her young sonne, as for the daunger wherewith to her father and kinsfolke were exposed, fell downe at the kings feet, recommending vnto him with floods of teares the persecution of her father, and familie of Arragon, and though her youth and beautie moued, the king to pitie her, yet so great an enterprize could not be delayed vpon so weake a ground, whereupon he told her, that warre being now begunne, he was enforced to pursue and continue it.

From Pavia the king went to Placentia, where, whilst hee remained, hee received newes of John Galeas death; whereupon, Lodowico who had followed him, returned in post to Milan, where the chiefe of the Dukes Councell, suborned by him, provided in open Councell, that in regard of the States greatnesse and miserie of the time, it would be a dangerous matter, to haue Francisco, sonne to the late Duke Galeas, who was but five yeeres old, to succede his father: but that it behooued them to haue a Duke that was a man of wisdom and authoritie: and therefore they ought to dispench with Law, and for the generall good, enforce Lodowico to accept the Ducall dignitie. Vnder this colour, honour giuing way to ambition, he did the next morning (though he seemed to bee vnwilling) take vpon him the Title and Armes of Duke of Milan, hauing first solemnly protested that hee received the Dutchie as belonging vnto him by the inuerture of the king of Romans.

The King remaining certaine daies at Placentia, was in a manner willing to returne home into France, as well for want of money, as also because no Italian Potentate shewed himselfe on his partie, and besides, because this new Duke returned no more, though his departure he promised to come backe againe. Yet at last he determined to passe on.

The same day that the King went from Placentia Lorenzo and Giouan de Medich stole secretly from their Countrey houses whether the Florentine Magistrate had confined them at the pursute of Pietro de Medici their kinsman and mortall enemy. They came to his Maiestie, & earnestly entreated him to come neere Florence, and told him that he should be honourably entertained there, as well in regard of the peoples loue to the house of France, as for their hatred towards Pietro de Medici, who commanded there, and held the Arragonis partie, being by marriage allied to the familie of Medici.

Vpon this proposition the King changed his purpose, for though at his departure from France it was concluded in his Councell, that hee should rather passe through Romagna and La Marca, than through Tuscany and the territorie of Rome; yet, the Pope and Florentines being declared his enemies, his Councell thought thought it a matter vnworthy the greatnesse of such a King, if for feare of them he should refuse to passe through their territories: As also because it was dangerous to invade the Realme of Naples, and to leaue Tuscany and the Churches State behinde him as enemies. Therefore it was resolved, rather to passe the Appenines, by the hills of Parma, then by the direct way of Bologna, and to march without delay to Florence.

The vanguard conducted by Gaiberts of Burbon, Duke of Montpensier, a Prince of the blood, went on to Pontremas, a towne seated at the foot of the Appenine vpon the Riuer Magra, the King following with the rest of the army. From Pontremas the Duke went into the country of Lunigiana, where hee ioynd with the Swisses, who had defended Genoa, together with the ordnance which by sea was come to Specia, and drawing neere to Fiuizana belonging to the Florentines, which they tooke by force and sackt it, killing all the fouldiers, and many of the inhabitants, the which did merueilously amaze all Italy not accustomed to such small and bloody warres.

Serezana was not farre from thence, where the Florentines determined for to make their chiefe resistance, which they had strongly fortified, but not sufficiently to hold out so mighty an enemy, for it wanted a capitaine to command it, and men to defend it. Yet because some thought it would not be easily taken, especially the Cittadell, and least of all, Serezanella, a strong Castle on the hill aboue Serezana, they counselled the King to passe on and leaue them, but the King disdayned so to doe, and thought that vnlesse hee tooke the first towne that made resistance, it would much blemish his reputation, and that they would take example to do the like.

The Florentines hauing intelligence that the King resolved for to come to Florence, and that his army had already passed the Appenine, and then the cruelty which was vied at the taking of Fiuizana, did publiquely detest the rashnesse of Pietro de Medici, who of himselfe, without any necessity, had so inconsiderately drawne vpon them the army of so potent a King, assisted by the Duke of Milas, and this remour had like to haue raised a great tumult in the Citty.

Pietro terrified herewith, and with the daunger which hee had before rashly contemned, and perceiving the aide promised by the Pope and Alphons to be but a dreame, precipitately resolved, to goe seeke that safety amongst his enemies, which hee could not hope for with his friends. And therevpon, leauing Florence, and not farre on his way from the city, hee heard say, that the troups of horse and foot sent by the Florentines to enter Serezana were defeated by the French, and all of them either slaine or taken. This caused him to tarry at Pietra Sancta for a passe post from the King, whether the Bishop of Saint Malos, and other Lords of the Court went to him, to safe conduct him to the campe, comming thither the same day that the King, with the rest of his forces, ioynd with his vanguard, which beeing encamped before Serezanella, battered it with the ordnance. Presenting himselfe before the King hee was entertained with more ceremony then loue, and perceiving that the King did not much affect him, by reason of his enemies reports, hee resolved by all meanes to appeale and laste him.

The next day being brought before him, hee granted all the kings demands, which were excessive; viz. that the castles and castles of Pietra Sancta, Serezana and Serezanella, which were the keyes of the Florentine State, and the forts of Rifa, and of the haven of Lipora should be delivered to the king, who by a promise signed with his own hand, obliged himselfe so to surrender them so soone as he should haue conquered the Realme of Naples: Thus Pietro should cause the Florentines to lend the king 200000. ducats, and that then hee should receive them into his protection.

The King visits
John Galeas
Duke of Milan.

The Dutcheffe in teares falls down at the Kings feete.

His answer to the Dutcheffe.

The death of John Galeas
Duke of Milan.

Lodowico usurps
the title and Armes of Duke of Milan.

Lorenzo and Giouan de Medici persuade the French King to go to Florence.

The first resolution changed.

The Kings
vanguard at Pontremas.

Fiuizana taken and sackt
by the French.

Serezana and Serezanella two strong places.

The Floren-
tines in al-larme.

The resolution of Pietro de Medici.

The Articles of agreement.

The consignment of the strong places was presently made: for the money, they wrote to Florence. Pietro de Medici did hereby much assure the State of Tuscany to the King, and remooued all impediments from him on Romagnias side. The Florentines aduertized of these Articles which Pietro de Medici had agreed to, the whole city was highly discontented with this reprochfull and dangerous wound giuen to their Commonwealt.

Pietro hauing notice of this rumor; the better to prouide for his affaires before any greater troubles did arise,ooke leaue of the King, vnder colour of going to accomplish that which hee had promised. But at his returne to Florence, hee found most of the Magistrates banded against him, and the mindes of his deereft friends greatly troubled, and the next day as hee would haue entered into the councell chamber he was put back.

Pietro de Medici fled from Florence.

The Medici are declared enemies to their country.

The King giues liberty to the Viscons.

Hee returned home to his owne house, destitute of courage and councell, and presently left Florence, being followed by the Cardinals John and Julian his bretheren, who after their departure were declared enemies to the Commonwealth, their houses rancked which were very rich in mouables, and their goods confiscate. Two of them, the eldest and the younger went to Venice, the second which was Cardinal John staid for a time at Bologna, and then retired himselfe to some of his kinsfolke.

The King went from Serezana to Luca, and from thence to Pisa, where the citizens both men and women falling at his feete, beganne to crie out liberty, liberty, infinitely complayning of the wrongs and iniuries done to them daily by the Florentines: The King at the perswasion of some of his Lords, not considering the importancie of the matter, did freely grant their request, whereupon, the people presently armed themselves, and throwing downe the Florentines armes, that were set vp in the publike places, recovered their so much desired liberty, repealing all those whom the Florentine Magistrates had banished.

In this confusion of all things the King departed from Pisa, hauing first deliuered the Citradell to the Pisans, keeping the new one of greater importance, for himselfe, and then went towards Florence. Being come to Signa, seuē miles from the city, hee staid there till the Florentines popular tumult were in some sort appeased, who had not yet laied downe armes, taken that day when Pietro de Medici was expelled; and also to giue Aubigni time to come and meet him, whom he had sent for.

Aubigni with his troups makes head against Ferdinand.

Bertinoro takes.

Aubigni was in Romagnia where hee had remained ever since his coming into Italy, making head against Ferdinand Duke of Calabria Alphonso sonne, where after sundry retreates on both sides, being re-enforced by the arriuall of certaine companies left behinde him, two hundred Launces, and one thousand Swisses, which the King had sent so soone as hee came to Ast, hee remained Master of the field and enforced Ferdinand to retire into the Cerca of Faenza, which is a place betwixt the walles of that City, and a great trench some mile behind it, inuironing them both, which doth make it strong. Aubigni then returned into the Country of Imola, where hee tooke certaine strong townes, filling all Romagnia with feare and amazement: so that hauing taken Faenza, after the enemies departure, hee marched directly to Bertinoro to passe the Appennine to ioyne with the Kings army: But Bertinoro refusing to giue him passage, hee assailed and tooke it by force, and in despite, sackt it.

Ferdinand perceiuing that hee could not by any meanes stoppe the French mens passage, and thinking it dangerous to remaine betwixt Imola and Forli, retired neere vnto the walles of Cesenna, and from thence went to Rome. The Venetians hauing intelligence that King Charles had crossed the Po with a mighty mighty army, the more to honor him, resolved to send him Ambassadors, whom they commanded to tarry still with him, and in the meane time armed at all aduentures. The Ambassadors were Dominico Trevisan, and Antonio Loredano, who finding the king at Florence, accompanied him wheresoeuer he went.

The Venetians send Ambassadors to the King.

Now after sundry commings too and fro, the king with his army marched towards Florence. There was great magnificence, vsed both by the Countiees and Citizens: The king entred the city like a conqueror, himselfe and horse armed at all points, with his Launce on his thigh. They beganne forthwith to treat of agreement, but notwithstanding great difficulties, the which at last ended by the valour of Pietro Caponi, one of the foure Commissioners appointed to treat with the king, they accorded, and the contract lawfully past, it was with great ceremony published in the Cathedral Church at diuine seruice, where the king in person, and the cities Magistrates, promised by sollemne oath vpon the high Altar, in presence of the Court and people of Florence, to obserue the contents thereof.

An accord sworn betwixt the King and Florentines.

Two daies after, the King departed from Florence, hauing tarried there tenne daies, and went to Sienna, where making short stay, hee left a Garrison, because hee suspected it to be at the Empires deuotion. Then hee journeyed towards Rome, where not long before Pope Alexander had giuen entrance to Virginio Vrsini, and Count Petillan, capitaines to King Alphonso and his sonne Ferdinand. So as it seemed he ment to haue anticipated the enemies, to fortifie the city, and to repulse them from it: But doubting King Charles intention, and fearing his forces, he had a wonderful conflict in his minde. For now hee determined to defend Rome, and to that end suffered Ferdinand and his capitaines whom he had introduced into the city, to fortifie the weake places; then supposing that hee should not be able to defend it, hee determined to leaue Rome; and thus floating betwixt hope and feare, the French in the meane time spoiled all the country on the hither side Tiber, taking now one towne, then another, no place being strong enough to hold them out, so that after diuers parlies, hee resolved, as it were by force, to grant all King Charles his demands, and to receiue him into Rome, from whence hee caused Ferdinand and his army to depart, who went to Tiouli, and from thence into the Realme of Naples, and whilest he went forth at Saint Sebastians Gate, the French King armed at all points, with his launce on thigh, entred with his army at the gate of Santa Maria del Popolo.

Ferdinand goes forth of Rome at one gate, and the French King enters at another.

The Pope many times determined to flie, but at last retired into Castle Saint Angelo, well provided of ordnance, munition and victuals. When the King and his army were entred, an accord was propounded by means of Cardinal Alcanio, on very rough conditions, which neuertheless were effected to the Kings content, who thereby made a league with the Pope saluted him, then kissed his feet in open Consistory, and afterwards his cheek: and at an other time was present when the Pope said masse, and fate downe next beneath the first Cardinal Bishop, and according to the ancient custome, when the Pope celebrated masse, serued him with water to wash his hands. This done, the Pope made the Bishop of Saint Malo, and the Bishop of Mans, descended from the house of Luxembourg, Cardinals.

An accord betwixt the Pope and French King.

Whilest the King remained at Rome, which was some month or thereabout, Alphonso despayring of his owne good fortune, sent for his sonne Ferdinand to Naples, and in presence of his brother Frederick renounced, and made ouer vnto him his Kingly title and Authority: hee did this peradventure for to lessen his subiects loue towards the French, because this young Prince was of great hope, had neuer offended any of his subiects, and was gracious with the people.

Alphonso in leaue to his son Ferdinand despayth himself.

Alphonso after this voluntary demission, hauing giuen his sonne a large instruction instruction to recommend himselfe to God, departed from Naples with foure light Gallies, laden with treasure and rich stuffe, and fled into a towne in Sicily called Mazare, where before the yeere was expired he died.

Ferdinand after his fathers departure, rode in royall habit vp and downe the city, attended by his vnckle Frederick and other great Lords of the Kingdome, setting open prisons, pardoning all offenders, promising to repeale those that had bene banished. Then mustering his army, hee gaue great gifts to his souldiers, and placed new Garrisons in his townes.

King Charles at the very instant of his departure from Rome receiued intelligence of Alphonso flight, hee went to Velitra, and with him Cesar Borgia Cardinall, the Popes sonne, as Legat Apostolicall, or rather pawne of his fathers promises. This Cardinall fled away secretly in the night, and to take away all suspicion that he did it not by his fathers consent, went not to Rome but to Spalleta. And at the same time those whom the King sent to the castles of Hostia, Ciuita-uecchia, and Terracina, to receiue them according to the accord made with the Pope, that they might keepe them so long as he remained in Italy, were repulled by the Popes souldiers. For the fort of Hostia which Fabrizio Colonna held, was recovered by Count Petilian, and re-delivered to the Pope.

From Velitra, the vanguard marched to Monte-fortino, a very strong towne, seated in the Churches territories, and subiect to Iacomo de Contis a Roman Gentleman, who held for the Arragonois, which being battered by the cannon was in short space taken by the French, notwithstanding the strength thereof. Ereremino, and Monte Sancto Giouanni, seated on the Kingdomes confines, had the like fortune, where after breach made, so furious an assault was giuen to it in the Kings presence, who was come thither from Verula, as all difficulties surmounted, it was taken the same day by force, and great slaughter committed there.

From thence the King sent one of his Gentlemen to the Pope, threatening him that if he did not performe the accord which hee had sworne to, hee would come backe and make warre vpon him. The Pope vpon receipt of the Kings letters presently commanded those places to be deliuered to the Kings officers.

In this manner, and without great resistance, did King Charles conquer that noble and magnificent Kingdome, when Ferdinand, by his fathers flight, taking vpon him the title and authority royall, assembled his forces, and marched to Saint Germans, where he encamped, thinking to keepe the enemies from passing on any farther, by reason of the fitnessse of the place, enuironed on the one side with high and steepy mountaines, and on the other with a fenny counny, and in front with the Riuer Garillan, wherevpon, that place is properly called one of the keyes of the kingdome of Naples. But his army, already terrified with the only name of the French, no more shewed any signes of valour, but all his souldiers wauering, in a manner, as much in loyalty as courage, and thinking how to saue themselves and goods, displaying of being able to defend the kingdome, so soone as they had intelligence of the taking of Mont Saint Giouanni, and that three hundred Lances, and two thousand foot approached, did basely abandon Saint Germans, and in such amazement retired to Capua, as by the way they left eight great peeces of ordnance behind them.

Ferdinand and his army were scarce come to Capua, when he receiued newes from the Queene, that since the losse of Saint Germans, the Neapolitans were risen, and that vnlesse he speedily came thither, some great tumult was likely to ensue vpon these newes, hee presently went thither with certaine troupes of horse, by his presence to prevent so great a danger, promising for to returne to Capua the next day following. The Neapolitans would not suffer him for to enter with his troupes, but only gaue entrance to himselfe and family, where vnderstanding their resolution, which was, not to endure a seerge,

The King comes to Velitra
Cardinal Borgia flies from the King by night.

Mont-fortino taken by the Kings army.

Ferdinand comes to Saint Germans.

Bajazeth of Ferdinands army.

Ferdinand desired entrance into Naples but with his own family.

seege, for feare least their city should be sackt, caused two of the three greater ships in the hauen to be buried; and gaue the third to Oberto de Fiesca, bestowing three hundred braue horse that hee had in his Stables vpon certaine citizens his friends and seruants; and having victualled the new castle and that called Del Ouo, he returned according to his promise to prouide for Capua.

But in his absence the city of Capua, thinking hee had forsaken it, Trulcio the cities Gouernor being gonne to treat with the French King, his owne souldiers, breaking open his house and ansking it, Virginio Vrsin and Count Petilian being likewise gonne, his whole army in a manner broken, hee was enforced to giue place to the Conqueror. Ferdinand being come within two miles of Capua was aduertized of what had past, by certaine Lords sent to tell him that he should come on no farther: wherevpon notwithstanding his intreaties, hee was enforced to returne to Naples, where hauing made some boodlesse speech to the Nobility, vnto whom the name of his grandfather and father were odious, he withdrew himselfe into the new castle, from whence within a while after hee departed, and embarking himselfe in the Gallies, which attended him in the hauen, with Frederick his vnckle, and the old Queene and her daughter Joane, sailed into the Isle of Ithia, thirty miles from Naples, where hee was enforced to make triall of his vertue and patience.

After his departure from Naples, all places yielded to the victors same, so as two hundred French horse comming to Nola, did without any resistance take Virginio Vrsin, and Count Petilian prisoners, who were come thither with foure hundred horse, they were carried to the fort of Montdragon. King Charles hauing intelligence of Ferdinands flight, drew neere Naples, and came to the city of Auerla, betwixt Capua and Naples, where the Neapolitan Ambassadors met him, and presented him with their cities keyes, vnto whom hee hauing freely granted sundry priuiledges and exemptions, the day following hee entred Naples, where with incredible ioy and contentment hee was receiued by the Nobility and people. Hee had sent his captaines before to restraine the insolency of his souldiers: Hee was accompanied to the Cathedrall Church by multitudes of people, and from thence (because Castelnouo held still for the enemies) he went to lodge in the Capuan castle, which was the antient abode of the Kings of Naples, hauing with an incredible course of happy fortune vanquished before he was seene.

The King, peaceable possessor of the city (though not of the castles) did by letters, and by their owne Ambassadors gratifie the Signory of Venice for that it had kept promise with him and continued his friend. The report of King Charles his arrival and successe in the Realme of Naples, was bruted so farre, as the very Turke feared him; because that the king had publicly vanted, that after the conquest of the kingdome of Naples, hee would turne his forces vpon him, so as all the inhabitants on the sea frontiers of Sclauonia, Albania, and Macedonia, presently forsooke their dwellings, and retired into the firme land, so as if the king had crossed ouer thither, hee might easily haue conquered those Prouinces. And to speake truth, so soone as Bajazeth vnderstood that hee was come to Florence, he beganne to trim his old vessels and to build new.

About the same time, threescore ships of warre, wherein were fixe thousand foote, and three hundred horse, arrived at Liouerne, sent by the kings of Spaine for the gard of Sicily, with Lorenzo Suarez, deputed by their Maiesties, for Ambassador to the Venetian Senate.

Hee told the Senate, that the cause of his arrival with those forces, was the king his Masters feare, least after the conquest of the Realme of Naples, King Charles would make an attempt vpon Sicily, which in former time had belonged vnto the French kings: That their Maiesties knowing the pride and great power of the French, did suppose that the Venetians, as Capua yielded to the French.

Ferdinand flies from Capua.

Virginio Vrsin and Count Petilian taken by the French.

King Charles receiued into Naples.

King Charles writes to the Venetians.

A small army comes from Spaine to Liouerne.

The Spanishe Ambassadors speake to the Venetians.

mooued with the reuerence of the danger to see so mighty a King in Italy, would be posselt with the like feare; and therefore had commanded him in their names to salute the Prince and Senate, and to assure them that if they desired ought of them, they were ready to beare a part in their fortune: for in regard of their wildome and loyalty there was no Prince or King whatsoeuer with whom they more desired to enter into league then with them: That Pope Alexander likewise would make one, who desired nothing more then to be acquainted with Spaine and Venice; and if any thing should happen otherwise then well, their forces thus ioyned together, they might easily preuent it.

This speech of Suarez did highly content the Senate, who being already jealous of King Charles his greatness and good fortune, began to look about them, and to seare other matters not yet thought of. Lodouico durst likewise of King Charles as well for that John James Triuile, whom he had drizen forth of Milan, receiued the Kings pay, as because he had commanded the Duke of Orleans to attend him at Asifor. Lodouico complained thereof to the Venetian Ambassador, and told him, that he would gladly leaue the French parte, and make a league with the Venetians. Beside all this, Maximilian Ambassadors (whose father the Emperor Frederick died that yeere) did not cease to fowle the Senate to league it selfe with them against the French.

In the meane time, Castelnouo and that Del Ouo two Cittadels in Naples, which yet held for Ferdinand and yielded to the French. For Castelnouo the abode of Kings, seated on the shoares, was after some small defence yielded to King Charles, by the cowardize and basenesse of five hundred Lanquequents that lay there in Garrison. And the castle Del Ouo built vpon a Rock in the sea, being continually battered with Ordnance, was content to yeeld, if it were not releued within eight daies. The fort likewise of Gayetta, notwithstanding that it was provided of all necessities did after some slight assaults, yeeld: so as in a very short space, the whole kingdome, in a manner, was with great facility reduced vnder the Kings obedience, the Isle of Ichia excepted, and certain townes in Puglia and Calabria which still held out for the Arragonois.

King Charles did now no more entertaine the Venetian Ambassadors with such cheerefull countenance as hee was wont; but oftentimes said, That those who were not pleased with his comming into Italy, for the conquest of the Realme of Naples, should repent it.

This being reported at Venice, caused them to hasten the conclusion of a new league, to which end, Lodouico had sent new Ambassadors. Lorenzo Suarez at his arriual, told them, that his Kings pleasure was to haue him in his name to enter into the league, on any conditions pleasing to the Senate. Pope Alexander likewise did daily expect a fit time to ioine himselfe with the Venetians and the rest, hauing openly said, that if the French returned to Rome, hee would goe to Venice, and no more behold them. At last, in the month of April, the Ambassadors of these Princes did in the City of Venice make confederacy, betwixt the Emperour, Kings of Spaine, Venetians, and Duke of Milan: it was onely published for the defense of one an others States, with reseruatiō of place for any else to enter into it that would. But all of them thinking it more then necessary, to draw the French King forth of the Realme of Naples, concluded, in their more secret capitulations, that the Spanish companies that were in Sicily should aide Ferdinand of Arragon to recouer his Kingdome, who much presuming of his peoples loue, made meanes to enter into Calabria.

In this confederacy it was concluded, that the Confederates should make account to entertaine an army of foure and thirty thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot, viz. That the Pope should furnish foure thousand horse, Maximilian 6000. the King of Spaine 8000. the Venetians the like number, and Lodouico

The two Cittadels of Naples yielded to King Charles.

The fort of Gayetta yielded to the King.

A league made by thirty great Princes against the French.

Lodouico as many. And if any of them by reason of the long distance of place, could not so soone as need were, leuy the number of soldiers hee was rated at, in sending to his associates six hundred pounds of gold, they should for him furnish such forces.

These were the conditions of the Confederacie, the which was so speedily and secretly concluded, as Philip de Comines, Lord of Argenton, Ambassador for King Charles at Venice, who went dayly to the Pallace, and conferred with the other Ambassadors, had neuer any inkling thereof: and being the next day after it was concluded, sent for into the Senate, and vnderstanding by the Prince and Senators what had bene done, hee was in a manner like a man bereft of his senses: and when the Prince told him, that they had not done it to make warre vpon any one, but onely to defend them selves; he recovered his spirits, and said, My King then shall not returne into France? The Prince answered, But hee shall, if hee will returne as our friend, and wee will willingly help him with whatsoeuer hee shall need. After this answer, hee went forth of the Senate so amazed, as being at the staires foot he turned towards the Chancellor, who accompanied him, and said to him, Good Sir, tell mee what the Prince said, for I haue forgot it, which hee did.

Beilde, the insolvency of the French, by reason of the facility of their victory was so encreased, as in respect of themselves they contemned all Italians: for which, the peoples loue towards them was already conuerted into mortall hatred: and on the contrary, their hatred towards the Arragonois into pity and compassion to Ferdinand. Wherevpon, Naples and all the rest of the kingdome, waited but for a fit occasion to repeale him.

King Charles had in a manner resolved, before the conclusion of the league, to returne presently into France, prouoked thereto by some occasion unknowne to mee, notwithstanding that diuerse important businesse were not ended in Naples, his victory being not fully perfected by reason that the Realme was not yet altogether conquered. But hauing intelligence that so many Princes were leagued against him, and that the Venetians had called home their Ambassadors, resident with him, his minde was much troubled, and hee consulted with his Lords what was best to be done in a matter of so great importance. His Councillers were of opinion to hasten his departure, fearing that by his longer stay, difficulties might increafe, and the Confederates haue time to make greater preparations. Therevpon, the King resolved to returne by land, maugre all the Confederates; seeing that hee wanted vessels to transport so great an Army by sea: for the fleet which hee had prepared at Genoa, was wrackt by tempest, vpon the shore of Plombino, the Admirall whereof, and Antonio Prince of Salerno, came to him by land.

In the meane time, King Charles perceiving that Lodouico as well as others had deceiued him, was desirous to take the City of Genoa from him, and to that end sent Pietro Fregosa Cardinall, thither, who had bene Duke thereof, and Obizzo de Fiesca, with eleven Gallies, the remainder of his whole fleet. Then desirous to prosecute his owne returne, he left Guilbert of Bourbon, Duke of Montpensier, Prince of the bloud, his Lieutenant Generall in the kingdome, with the moiety of the Suisse, and part of the French footmen, eight hundred French lances, and five hundred Italian men at armes, which were in his pay, part of them vnder the command of the Prouost of Rome, and the rest vnder Prospero, and Fabrizio Colonna, and Antonello Saucello, all three great Captaines, on whom hee had bestowed many benefits. This done, hee departed from Naples with the rest of his Armie, on the twentieth of May, and marched directly towards Rome. But before his departure hee would be crowned King of Naples, which was performed with great solemnity in the Cathedrall Church of Naples, where with great pompe hee receiued the honors and other which are usually made to new Kings. The King carried away with him eight hundred French Lances, the two hundred Gentle-

Philip de Comines King Charles his Ambassador at Venice, doted with the newes of the league.

The Prince answer to Comines.

King Charles his resolution.

Guilbert of Bourbon Vice-roy of Naples.

King Charles is crowned King of Naples.

Gentlemen of his gard, the Lord Triulcio with a hundred lances, three thousand Swiss, and two thousand French footmen: and appointed Camillo Vitelli and his bretheren to meete him in Tuscany with two hundred and fifty men at armes.

In this equipage did King Charles march towards Rome: Pope Alexander, although two dayes before he came thither had promised where to attend him, did neuertheless after hee had left a strong garrison in Castle Angelo, retire to Oruicta, accompanied by the whole Colledge of Cardinals, two hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and three thousand foote, leaving the Cardinall Santo Anaslao his Legat in Rome, to entertaine and honor the King. The Venetians not long before, had for his better safety sent him five hundred Albanese horse.

The King being come to Rome, refused to lye in the Pallace of the Vatican, which the Pope had appointed for him, and lodged in the suburbs: From thence, he sent a Gentleman to the Venetian Senate, to tell them from him, that his King had yet neuer intreated or sued to any; but now hee was onely desirous to know of them, whether their State were his friend or enemy. The Prince answered him. That wise and discreet men were wont sometime to referre themselves to the will and opinion of others, and in time of need to request their ayde: That hee spake this, onely to let him vnderstand, that it lay in his Kings power, to make the Venetians his friends or enemies. With this answer the Gentleman departed from Venice, together with Philip de Comines the Ambassador.

The Florentines likewise, so soone as they had intelligence of this new confederacie, and that King Charles was come from Naples, to returne home into France, began to leuy soldiers, and to fortifie their townes, to stoppe the Kings passage, if hee intended to passe thorow their City. The King departed from Rome, and though at his approach neere Viterbo, the Pope had againe promised to conferre with him in some fit place, yet hee went from Oruicta to Perousa, meaning if the King directed his course thither, to goe to Ancona. The King neuertheless, though hee were highly incensed against the Pope, did re-deliver the Castles of Ciutara-uechia and Terracina, referring that of Hostia to himselfe, and passed thorow the Churches country as a friend, Tuscanella excepted, where the inhabitants refusing to lodge his vanguard in their towne, it entred by force and sackt it, with great slaughter.

The Venetian Senate being aduertised that one of their chiefe Confederates territories had bene so spoiled by the French, thought that King Charles had begunne warre against them, fearing that comming vpon theirs, or on those of the Dutchie of Milan, hee would doe the like: Wherevpon they commanded their Generall Antonio Grimani, to saile with their Fleete into Puglia. The King afterwards arrived at Sienna, where hee remained sixe dayes, notwithstanding that every man aduised him to depart speedily: but there they treated concerning the restitution of the Florentines fortes, promised by the King at his departure towards Naples, wherevnto all his Councillors were induced for sundry reasons, but others crossed it: wherevpon the matter was referred to his comming to Ast.

The King leaving Florence on his right hand, tooke the high way of Pisa, and from thence went to Luca. The Pope perceiuing the King was past, sent backe the Venetians and Lodouicos forces which they had leat him, and returned to Rome.

In the meane time they in Lombardy began to stirre. For the Venetians and Lodouico Sforza made great preparations to hinder the Kings returne into France, or at least, to secure the Dutchie of Milan, thorough which hee was to passe, wherevpon each of them rayled forces, and as well in common as in particular, omitted nothing that might further their designe. And Lodouico being very desirous to performe that wherevnto hee was tyed by the Confede-

Confederacy, concerning the City of Ast, sent Galeas of Saint Seuerine to that enterprize with 700. men at armes and three thousand foot making no other accompt but to take it.

The Duke of Orleanes, who remained in it, vpon the first intelligence of the new League, had fortified Ast, and with great earnestnesse solicited new supplies from France to releuee the King. On a sodaine forces from all parts were assembled, who with great speed passed the Mounts, so that the Duke of Orleanes in a short space being backt with a mighty power, went forth into the field, and in the Marquise of Saluces tooke the towne and Castle of Valenieres, held by Antonio Maria of Saint Seuerin, wherevpon Galeas with his army retired into Annon, despairing to execute any notable matter.

The Duke returning to Ast, an occasion being offered to take Nouara, would not omit it, and hauing concluded with those that offered to giue him entrance he crossed the Po by night at the bridge of Straz, and with his forces, without any resistance, was received into the City by them: from thence he sent part of his Caualery to make incursions as farre as Vigeva. The Castle of Nouara still held out for Lodouico, but the Duke of Orleanes to assure his conquest, resolved to take it; wherevpon, on the fifth day after, it promised to yeeld (which it did) if it were not releueed within 24. houres.

The Venetians hauing intelligence that Lodouico was inuaded, and that the French made incursions into his Contrey, did freely giue their consent that he should call back some of those companies which he had sent into the Parmesan. And besides that, sent him foure hundred Stradiots. By these new forces neere to Nouara, the Duke of Orleanes his farther passage was stoppt, who retired with all his forces thither.

Now after some controuersie with the Florentines concerning the restitution of their Forts, the Kings vanguard led by the Marshall of Gie went to Pontremoli. In the meane time the Confederate Army was speedily assembled neere to Parma in number two thousand five hundred men at armes, 8000. foot and 2000. light horse called stradiots, most of whom were Albanes, and of the neighbor Prouinces to Grecia, brought by the Venetians into Italy. Francesco Gonzaga the young Marquis of Mantoa was Generall of the Venetian troopes, whose valour surmounted his yeares, and with him two principall Senators, Luca Pisani and Melchior Trevisan, as Prouidors The Count Gaiazza commanded Lodouicos troopes, Francisco Bernardino Viscount being ioyned in Commission with him.

All the Confederate Captaines consulted whether they should encampe at Fornouo, a small Village at the foot of the hill, and it was concluded because the place was very straight, and peradventure likewise to giue the enemy meanes to descend into the plaine, that they would lodge in the Abbey of Guaiaruola, three miles from Fornouo, whereby the French Vanguard came thither sooner then the rest of the army, which conducted the ordnance, vncasse to bee brought ouer that steepy Appenine hill.

The Marshall de Gie being come thus foreward, sent a trumpet to the Confederate Army, in his Kings name to craue passage, who without offence to any man, and taking victuals at a reasonable price, was desirous to passe on and returne into France. The Confederates consulting vpon an answer for the Marshalls trumpet, the Captaines opinions were different, in the end they concluded to send to Milan, where the Duke and Confederate Ambassadors lay, to know their pleasures. But the matter being delayed, the Captaines sent back the Trumpet without any certain resolution, determining to assaile and charge the French as they passed.

The King at last ioyning with his Vantgard, did with his whole army the next day following lodge at Fornouo. The French, who till then had marched with great

The Duke of Orleanes as taken the town and castle of Nouara.

The French take the town and castle of Nouara.

The number of the Confederate Army.

The King lodged at Fornouo.

great boldnesse and assurance, making no account of the Italians armes, so soone as at their going downe the hill they discovered the enemies army with infinite numbers of tents and pavilions, and considering their resolution to fight, began alittle to abate their former heate, and would haue beene well pleased, so that the Italians would haue suffered them to passe. The King enforced to embrace new Councell, commanded the Lord of Argenton to send trumpet to the Venetian Prouidators, to let them vnderstand that he desired to conferre with them for the publike good: They accepted the pailey in some fit place betwixt both Armies: but the King, altring his purpose, would not attend the issue of this parley.

The two armies were quartered within three miles of one another along the Turo, which is rather a torrent then a river, which running betwixt two little hills doth in a manner enuiron them. On one of those hills was the Confederate army lodged on the right hand towards the river banks, they had fortified themselves with Dikes and Rampiers well flanked with ordnance, and the French were of necessity to go that way to Asst, nothing but the river being betwixt the enemies and them.

All that night was very tedious to the French, both in regard of the Stradiots continuall alarmes, as for a suddaine shower of raine, entermingled with fearefull thunder and lightening, Vvhich they interpreted as a preface of some sinister fortune. In the morning by day breake, the French army began to crosse the river, the ordnance going first, followed by the Vantgard, wherein were three hundred and fifty Lances, John James Trivulzio with his company of an hundred Lances, and 3000. Suisses, to whom the King added three hundred archers and some crobowes on horse-back of his guards whom he caused to march on foot, for hee supposed that the enemy would turne his cheefe forces vpon it. The battaile followed the vantgard in midst whereof was the Kings person, armed at all points, mounted on a gallant courser, and the Lord Tremouille neere him with his authority and Councell to gouerne that part of the army. Next followed the rere-ward conducted by the Earle of Foix, and behind it the baggage.

So soone as the two armies began to moue, the light horse on both sides skirmished, the ordnance flew from both parts, and the Italians prepared for the battaile, extended their Squadrons on the river banks. The French marched on notwithstanding, so as their Vantgard was already led to the right side of the enemies Campe, when the Marquis of Mantua crossed the river at the back of the French rere-ward, with a Squadron of 600. men at armes, a great troope of Stradiots, and other light horse, and 5000. foot, hauing commanded Antonio of Montfeltere to be ready with his troopes when he should be sent for to refresh the first battailon, and the light Caualery to giue in in flanke vpon the enemies so soone as the fight should be begun, and the rest of the Stradiots to crosse the River and to fall vpon the French baggage which was left alone. The Count Gajazza on the other part crossed the Turo with 400. men at armes, to releue him when need should be, and for the guard of the Campe, two companies of men at armes and a thousand foot were left behind.

But the King perceiuing that contrary to his expectation the whole burthen lighted on the rere-ward, turned his back to the Vantgard, and drew neere to the Rere with the battaile, and came with such speed, one Squadron before another, as himselfe was at the front among those that fought brauest. And though the Marquis assault was braue and furious, the French did as brauely answer him, throwing themselves pell mell among the Squadrons. It is certaine that at first the Italians valour was very excellent, being encouraged by the Marquis, vvho attended by a gallant troope of braue young Gentlemen, omitted nothing belonging to a valliant Capitaine. The French did likewise valiantly repulse this first charge, charge, yet being pressed by multitudes, began to stagger, the King himselfe being in danger, who though hee had not many of his owne soldiers about him, did valiantly defend himselfe, the goodnesse and firecenesse of his horse dooing him better service then the ayde of his people, and then hee made a vow to Saint Denis and Saint Martin, that if hee might safely passe into Piedmont, he would at his returne into France, with great gifts goe and visit their Churches, the one being neere Paris, and the other in the City of Tours. These vowes made, hee began to fight with greater courage then before, till his soldiers that were next him, being incited by his danger, did all of them with their owne liues, runne to saue the Kings, and repulse the Italians, whither the battaile that stayed behinde, arriuing in time, and giuing in furiously vpon the enemies flanks, stayed their furie: in this charge Rodolfo Gonzaga, Vnckle to the Marquis of Mantua, a very famous Capitaine, hurt in the face with a sword as he lifted vp his Beuer, and falling from his horse, was miserably trode to death by the horse, and could not be rescued.

The battaile thus changing by sundry accidents, and no aduantage on eyther side appearing, made all men more and more to wonder vnto whom the victory would incline: The French were enflamed by the presence and danger of their King, and because they were in a place where they could hope for no safety but in victory. The Italians on the other side were incited by a couetous desire of rich booty: so that Fortunes power being, (as all men know) very great in humane actions, especially in affaires of warre, where the least error doth often times transport the victory to those that were almost vanquished, did at that time very clearly demonstrate it. For the Stradiots, sent to assaile the French baggage, began to spoile, and to drue away the Mules, and other wagons beyond the River. Their fellows appointed to charge the French in flanke, perceiuing that others returned loden with spoile, incited by the selfe same desire of gaine, fell vpon the baggage, and by their example, others both horse and foote left their files, and went from the battaile to doe the like. By this meanes the Italians wanting their look for fresh supplies, and the number of those that fought still decreasing, nothing did so much incourage them, as the valor of the Marquis, who fighting valiantly did still abide the enemies furie, incouraging his owne soldiers, who much weakened by the departure of their fellows that went to spoile, and their enemies on euery side pressing in vpon them, and no longer able to resist, were enforced to flye, and to attempt to repasse the river, which being swelled by the former nights raine, and by a great shower of hayle which fell during the fight, they could hardly doe. The French followed them very fiercely euen to the River, killing all those that fled, taking no prisoners at all.

Whilest they fought so valiantly on that side of the Army, the French Vantgard, against which Count Gajazza brought part of his Caualery, presented it selfe in battaile, with such furie, as the Italians, daunted, because they were not seconded, did of themselves fall into disorder, and fled to the body of their Army which was on the farther side of the river, wheré vpon the Marshall de Gié would not pursue them any farther, some afterwards, repuring it to wisdom and discretion, others to cowardize. The Marquis of Mantua passed the River in the best and closest order he could, where he found his troopes so disordered, as euery man with his booty thought on nothing but meanes how to escape; but his presence and authority, stayed that confusion.

The King with his troopes comming to his Vantgard, which had not stird, demanded his Captaines aduise, whether hee should sodainly crosse the River, and assaile the enemies in their Campe, but their opinions being various, and also the troopes which had fought, wearied, they resolved to take vp their lodging: and for that night, they lodged on the hill, in the village called Medezana, a mile from the place where they fought.

Such

Such was the end of the battaile betwixt the French and the Italians neere the River Taro, where of the French side dyed scarce two hundred, but of Italians more then three hundred men at armes, and as many others as amounted to three thousand men, in regard of which number of dead so disproportionable, the victory was attributed to the French, though the Venetians challenge to themselves the glory of the day, because that their campe and baggage remained whole and entire, whereas the French on the contrary, lost much of theirs, and among others, some of the Kings rich stuffe: Whereupon, by publick Decree, ouer all the territories vnder their obedience, and especially at Venice, beneficers and other signes of ioy were made. The day following, the King remained in the same village, and by means of the Lord of Argenton, who parled with the enemies, truce was granted till night.

*Sanseuerin
his officers.*

The small effect thereof.

The King arrives at Ait.

The next morning before day, the King with his Army dislodged, sounding neither drum nor trumpet, the better to conceale his departure; and all that day he was not pursued by the Confederate Army, by reason that the Taro was exceedingly swelled, and could not that day be forded. Sanseuerine whose selfe and soldiers had not fought in that battaile, made an offer to the Marquis and Prouidators, that if they would giue him a troope of light horse to cut off the tails of the Kings army, hee by his incursions would amuze the French, so long till their Army might ouer-take them. His demand granted, hee departed from the Campe with two thousand five hundred horse, and by reason of the swelling of the River, tooke a longer way, so as that day hee did not ouer-take the Kings troopes: but so soone as hee drew neere them, hee serued rather for a guide to conduct them to Ait, then a disturber of their iourney: so, as it seemed that his request to the Marquis and Prouidators, was onely to accompany and safe conduct the King. His intent was afterwards knowne to be such, by Lodouicos commandement, who when Bernardo Contare would haue giuen in vpon the Kings request, could not be suffered so to doe.

So soone as the waters were downe, the Marquis pursued the Kings Army, which hee not being able to ouer-take, sent sixe hundred horse after it, to cut off the taile and to keepe it in continuall alarum, who returned to him laden with booty: The French at last coming neere to Alexandria, tooke the higher way towards the mounts, where the River Tanate is most shallow, and in eight dayes march, without losse of men or other encómbances, came before the wals of Ait, where after the King was entred hee caused his Armie to be lodged in the field.

The Campe of the league which had followed him into the Tortonois, being no more able to annoy him, ioynd with Lodouicos Sforzas forces before Nouara. The Kings retreat being knowne at Venice, the Senate commanded generall Praecessions, and publick prayers to be made, to giue God thanks for that by his retreat the City was freed from the danger which threatened it.

The end of the fourth Booke of the fourth Decade.

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the fourth Decad.

The Venetians at Genoa arme by Sea against the French, and take Rapallain the Realme of Naples. Lodouico and the Confederates besiege Nouara. Peace concluded betwixt King Charles and the Confederates, the King returns into France. The Neapolitans reuolt from the French, & bring Ferdinand into Naples. A Generall rebellion ouer the whole kingdom against the French. The Pisans giue themselves to the Venetians. The Venetians ayde Ferdinand, hee giuing them three Citties in Puglia. The Venetians resolving to defend Pisa against the Florentines, send ayde thether. King Charles determineth to returne into Italy, and makes great preparation for it. The Duke of Montpensier, besieged in Attella, is through want of victuals enforced to Capitulate, and quit the Realme of Naples. The death of Duke Montpensier and other great Captaines. King Ferdinands death. The pursues of Lodouico and the other Confederates to haue Pisa restored to the Florentines. The death of Charles the eight French King. Lewis Duke of Orleans, French King. Coruin, sonne to the King of Hungarie, made a Gentleman of Venice. Caesar Borgia, sonne to Pope Alexander, quits his Cardinalls Hatte, and is made by King Lewis Duke of Valentinois. Lodouico procureth the Turkish flecte to inuade the Venetians. League betwixt Lewis the French King and the Venetians. The French King sends an Army into Italy, vnder the command of Iohn Iames Truulce. And lastly, the taking of Carnagio by the Venetians.

A a a

The

The fifth Booke of the fourth Decade,
of the History of Venice.

The Venetians
arme certaine vessels at Genova against the French.

The Venetian fleet takes Rapallo.

The French
small army is defeated.

The number of the Army before Nauara.

The King resolves to be-liege the peace.

THE Venetians, aduertised that King Charles at his departure from Naples, had sent diuerse vessels to make incursions into the riuer of Genoa (as hath bene said) sent one of their Cittizens to Genoa with money to tigge certaine great Argozies. Lodonico Sforza had likewise giuen order to arme a certaine number of Galleys, so as together they prepared a fleet, the which departing from Genoa, did by night land seauen hundred footmen, which without any difficulty tooke the towne and castle of Rapallo, seized on by the French at their arrivall. Then meeting at sea with the French fleet, it assailed and defeated it, the Admirall thereof being taken, and foure French Ensignes, which the Geneuois sent to Lodonico Sforza, who presently gaue two of them to the Venetian Ambassador, resident with him, saying that he did present them to the honor and merit of the Venetian commonwealth. The Marquis of Mantua in the meane time being at Classegia, following King Charles his Army, requested by Lodonico, and commanded by the Senates decree, sent two thousand foote in Garrison to Tortona and Alexandria. Then he intreated the Senate to send two Senators, who as Prouidators should manage the warre with him: wherevpon Luca Lemo, and Andrea Venier were appointed, who comming to the Army, went all together to the siege of Nouara, which Lodonico with a mighty Army did streightly besiege. The Venetians sent so great aide, as scarce any enterprize can be remembred, wherein they spent more money, so that in a short space, there were three thousand men at armes, three thousand Almaine horse, five thousand Italian foot, and ten thousand Lancequenets, in the confederate campe.

The Venetian Senate was not onely carefull to send forces to this siege, but the more to encourage their soldiers, had from Lieutenant of the Army made the Marquis of Mantua Capraine Generall thereof, the better to honor his courage and valour manifested at the battaile of Fornouo: and with a very gracious example, had not onely augmented their pay who had valiantly behaved them selves, but giuen pensions and sundry recompences to the children of those that were slaine in the battaile, and dowries to their daughters.

The siege still continuing before Nouara, those of the towne were in great want of victualls, by reason of the great number of soldiers and Contrey people that were in it, nor could the King, who lay at Ast, releue it, for want of men: and though the Duke of Orleans, when hee was made acquainted with the dearth, did put forth all vnprofitable earers, yet this remedy was to no purpose: The French made many attempts by night to victuall it, but being still discouered, they were enforced to retire without effecting it, and often times with great losse of their men.

The King then, out of hope to raise the siege in any time, and dayly importuned by the Duke of Orleans, who was in great want, determined to hearken vnto peace. But the difficulty to obtaine it was very great, in regard of the iaealozie and and distrust betwixt the King and Duke of Milan: yet it was motioned by an vnexpected meanes. For the Lady Marques of Mont-ferte being dead, the King wishing well to that State, sent the Lord of Argenton to Cassal, to consult with her subiects concerning the profit and commodity of a young sonne shee had left behind hir. The Marquis of Mantua Steward came thither likewise in his Masters name to bewaile her death. They two entred so farre into discourse of peace, as the Lord of Argenton, by the perswasion of this Steward, did write thereto the Venetian Prouidators, who inclining thereto, acquainted the Duke of Milans Caprains with it, who with one consent, sent to intreate the King which lay at Verceil, to appoint some of his officers to meete them in some fit place where they might conferre together. The King allowing it, the Commissioners on both sides met betwixt Borgare and Camarian, where after sundry difficulties alledged on both parts, peace at last was concluded and signed by the King, which was no sooner sworne to by the Duke of Milan, but the King made hault to returne into France. And in this manner about the end of October 1495. hee repassed the mounts.

The Venetians were displeased with Lodonico, for that without the aduise and consent of all the Confederates hee had made peace with King Charles, seeing that they hauing bene often intreated by the King, and him, to hearken thereto, had euer answered, that they would doe nothing but by the consent of all the Confederates: so that now they perceived it was a dangerous matter to trust him, and therefore they would no longer bee in league with so perfidious a man.

Lodonico was much troubled with these newes, and perceiving that the Venetians were no more his friends, gaue secret commandement to all his Garrisons, by which the Venetian Campe was to passe, to guard the passages, and especially the Riuer, and to shutte vp all the boates, to stay their departure against his will. This being knowne to the Prouidators, they were much amazed, in regard they were to passe many great riuers: and conferring herevpon with Bernardo Contarino, not knowing what to resolue on, hee offered to poinard Lodonico in open counsell, saying, That hee once dead, no man would stirre. The Councell of Ten at Venice, being acquainted with this proposition, wrote back, that by no meanes hee should doe so, for it would much blemish the Venetians reputations; but onely temporize with him till they were forth of his territories, which they did, whervpon, Nouara surrendered, they ledde their army which in a manner they called to Crema, and from thence went to Mantua, and so to Venice.

But to returne to that which was done at the same time in the Realme of Naples, where warre was managed as well as in Lombardy. So soone as Ferdinand had intelligence of King Charles his departure from Naples, (being then in Sicill) attended by the Spaniards who were come thither by Sea, he landed in Calabria, to whom many Contrey people presently ranne, and within a while after the City of Regium yielded to him, the Castle hauing still held out for him. At the same time likewise the Venetian fleet was descried not farre from the shore of Puglia, whereof Antonio Grimaldi, a man of great authority in the State, was Generall, who comming neere to Monopoli a City in Puglia, landed the Stradiots and certaine foot companies, then by land and sea, gaue an assault to the City, which was taken by force, wherevpon the Castle loone yielded: This fleet likewise tooke the City of Pulignana by composition.

Ferdinand in the meane time with many vessels, but few soldiers, leauing Sicily, hauing besides the loue and fauour of the people of the Realme of Naples, who longed for him, came to the flattes of Salerno: and on a sodaine, Salerno, Melphi and la Caua erected his banners. Afterwards hee howered two whole dayes before the City of Naples, expecting some popular commotion

A motion of peace made at Cassal.

The Venetians are displeased with Lodonico.

A bold enterprize of Bernardo Contarino.

The Venetians
take Monopoli.

in the City (which had been promised) but it was in vaine, for the French rooke good order there for that time, so that the third day after Ferdinand dispaying of any good successe, made to Sea, deterrmining to returne to Ischia.

The Citizens of Naples, who had resolved to deliuer the towne to Ferdinand, (their plot being halfe discouered), determined to make a vertue of necessity, and to win or loose all, according to this resolution secretly sent a small boate to call back Ferdinand, intreating him to land all, or part of his forces to giue encouragement to those that intended to rise in his behalfe. Vpon this aduertizement, Ferdinand returned againe before Naples, and then landed, a mile from the City; which the Duke Montpensier perceiuing fallied forth of Naples with all his forces to hinder his landing. The Neopolitans then taking hold on occasion, presently tooke armes, and at the first ringing of the Toxin or larum bell, made good the gates, and began euery where to cry Ferdinand, Ferdinand. The French amazed at this suddaine tumult, thinking it dangerous to abide betwixt the rebellious City and the enemies, determined to returne to Naples, but they were enforced to fetch a great compasse, to come to the Gate neere Castelnouo, for that through which they came forth was seized on by the Neopolitans. Ferdinand in the meane time entred the City on horseback, where, to the peoples incredible ioy, he rode vp and downe. The French entring at the Gate next the Castle, did their best to get into the heart of the City, but their attempts were vayne, for at euery streetes end they found resistance, and night approaching they retired into the Castle, to gether with the Duke of Montpensier, Tues of Alegre a famous Capitaine, Antonio Prince of Salerne, and many other French and Italian Capitaines of note. Those of Capua, Auerfa, the Fort Montdragon, and other townes neere adioyning, and the greatest part of the Kingdome did the like. Those of Gayetta going about to follow their example were with great slaughter preuented by the French Garrison, who in heate of blood sackt the City. The Venetian Senate hauing intelligence that Ferdinand had recovered the City of Naples, wrote to Antonio Grimani that he should no more assault any towne of the Kingdome in the Venetians name, but to remaine at Monopoli to know their farther pleasure. The Pope vnderstanding that the Venetian fleet was idle, intreated the Senate that it might faile to Naples to aid Ferdinand; this was granted, and Antonio Grimani leauing 100. light horse and two Gallies for the gard of Monopoli, went to Tarentum which held out against Ferdinand. But Grimani being there afflicted with a flux, sent twenty Gallies to Ferdinand, vnder the command of Contaren the Prouidator, and himselfe, with the rest of the fleet (for he had in the meane time received new supplies) directed his course to Corfou. At the same time, the Florentines being desirous by all meanes to recover Pisa, and the Pisans being to weak to resist, sent secret messengers to the Venetian Senate, to intreat them to receiue their City into their protection, and to hold it for a member of their state. At first the Senate found the matter to be of such importance, as they made no great hast either to refuse or accept it: yet at last some Senators beganne to tast this offer, and to harken vnto it, as they who with the deaignes and hopes embraced the entire Monarchie of Italy, for obtaining whereof, they supposed that the Signory of Pisa would greatly auaille them in regard that their ancient vnion with other Potentates was broken, and most of those who were wont to resist them, weakened: as also, because that City would giue them sure footing in Tuscany, and extend their bounds as farre as the lower sea: and therefore concluded to accept it as an offer sent from God. This opinion being approoued by the greatest part of the Senate, the businesse was consulted on by the councill of Tenne, that the resolution of it might be kept more secret, whose opinions being various, the matter was put off till some other time.

Lodouico likewise was greedy to impatronize this City, and therevpon seemed very very ready vnder-hand to aid the Pisans against the Florentines, whom he enter-tained with sundry practises.

The Pope moued by Ferdinands intreaties, wrote at the same time to the Venetians, to send part of their Army returned from the siege of Nouara, to aid Ferdinand to driue the French forth of the Realme of Naples, promising that Ferdinand should engage certaine sea townes to them, till they were satisfied for their expence in that warre. The Senate not fully resolved to send the Army to the King, commanded Bernardo Contaren to go before to Rauenna, with 600. light horse, to the end that if they should determine to send it, he might be so farre on wards on his way. This beeing vnderstood at Rome, the businesse was prolonged, for Cardinall Ascanio, brother to Lodouico, made a proposition that the Venetians should assist the King in that warre, and yet haue no townes engaged to them.

Ferdinands Ambassadors, that came to Venice to make an accord, following the Cardinalls aduice, demanded the army, but offered no pawne. The Senate knowing that this was Lodouicos practise, who enuied their greatnesse, did on a suddaine dismisse the Ambassadors, not suffering them to remain a moment in the City. The Ambassadors spent many dayes to pacifie the Senate, and notwithstanding that they promised that Ferdinand should deliuer three of his best Cities, with their territories, vnto them, namely Trani, Brundisium and Otranto, they would hardly agree to it, had not the Confederate Ambassadors, there present, interceded for them, wherevpon a new league was made, by which the Venetians, hauing first receiued the three townes, were obliged, speedily to send 600. men at armes and 3000. foot to Ferdinand; and the Treasorer to the State did deliuer to Ferdinands Ambassadors. 150. pounds of gold by way of loane, with diuers other conditions, which the Pope approoued and ratified, as one hauing interest in the Realme of Naples.

The League thus made, Commissioners were sent to Ferdinand to receiue the three townes, and messengers to the Marquis of Mantoua, to will him without delay to lead his troopes into the Realme of Naples. These things thus concluded and diuulged, caused diuers townes in the Kingdome, which the French held, presently to yeld to Ferdinand; the like did the two Castles in Naples. King Charles after his returne into France sent the Lord of Argenton to Venice to tell the Senate, that hee accounted their State to be comprehended in the accord made with Lodouico, because their Generals & Prouidators were present at it, in which regard, he intreated the Senate to surrender Monopoli to him which their Army had taken from his subiects, and that they would no more assist Ferdinand: The Venetians sent him back without satisfying his Kings demands. Charles raised a new army, determining to send it by Sea to the releefe of Caietta, vnder the Conduct of the Duke of Orleans, who craving to be excused from that journey, the army was dissolved, and the determination to releue those in the Kingdome of Naples, vanished into ayre.

Lodouico, hauing intelligence of what soeuer was done in France, and now no more fearing the French, was aduertised by letters from his friends of the Pisans request made to the Venetians, whervpon hee intreated the Senate to receiue him as an associate in the defense and protection of Pisa, because that the Florentines were leagued with King Charles, and him-selfe had taken their Ambassador in his owne Dominions which was going into France.

This businesse, sundry times debated in the Senate, it was at last concluded by the generall consent of the Ambassadors, that Pisa should bee defended at the common charge of the Pope, Venetians, and Duke of Milan, and that two thousand foot should bee leuyed at Genoa by the Venetians, to bee sent to Pisa,

The Neapolitans resolved in fauour of Ferdinand.

A Generall result made over the whole Kings dome.

The Pisans commit them-selues to the Venetians

The Venetians to be an ac-cord with Ferdinand's Ambassadors.

The Venetians send aid to Ferdinand.

King Charles sends an Ambassador to Venice.

The resolution for the defence of Pisa.

Hereupon the Florentines raised 6000. foot, and with the ordnance sent them to Pisa before the enemies forces were assembled, hoping to take the citie. But comming neere to the gates, those within the towne made a salley, and after a furious charge vpon the enemy, defeated and put them to route, and tooke their ordnance. Nor long after, Paulo Vitelli the Romane, a valiant and braue Captaine, forsooke the Pisans, and went to Florence, where beeing honorably entertained and made Generall of their Army, hee marched with 10000. foote against the Pisans, and at his arriual lodged in the Citties suburbs from whence the townsmen did beate and repulse him: but the Florentines winning them againe, were enforced to quit them, and to giue ouer the siege, to defend their owne confines 10 against Pietro de Medici, who was said to be comming with great forces against the city of Florence, accompanied by this kinsmen the Vrsini.

The Venetians
and Lodouico sent ayde to Pisa.

The Venetians in the meane time leued five hundred foote at Genoa, whom they sent to Pisa, the like did Lodouico: The Florentines hauing vsed all their cunning to take the Cittadell of Pisa, as well by means of the King, as money; the gouernour thereof, prouoked by his owne inclination to the French, that were in Pisa, or by secret Commissions from the Lord of Ligni, whose Lieutenant hee was, or else beeing enamored on a young maiden of Pisa (for it is not likely that money alone would haue preuailed with him, seeing hee might haue receiued a greater summe of the Florentines) was very loath to yeeld vp the Castle, but in the end beeing enforced by the Kings frequent commandements and threatenings, hee surrendered it to the Pisans, hauing first receiued twenty thousand Ducats of them, whereof twelve thousand fell to his owne share, and eight thousand for the soldiours that were in it.

The Pisans
raze their Cittadell.

The Pisans running in heapes to the Cittadell, razed it downe to the ground: But because they found themselves too weak to resist the Florentines, they sent to craue ayde at one time of the Pope, Emperour, Venetians, Duke of Milan, Geneuoi, Sienoi, and Lukeses: but they were most earnest with the Venetians and Duke of Milan, on whom they relied more then on any other, because hee had prouoked them to rebell, and had speedily releued them. But the Duke, 30 though hee extremely desired it, did neuertheless doubt whether hee should accept it or no, fearing least the other confederates should take it ill, by whose counsell the treaty of the State of Pisa had bin begun, as a matter common to them all, and standing in need of them, hee durst not openly declare himselfe vntill the King were wholly forth of Italy: But the Pisans then grew cold, hoping to be releued by the Venetians, who without sparing for any cost did bountifully supply them with all things: whereupon they betooke themselves to their protection, and were receiued by the Senate, after long contestation among the Senators.

And craue aid of sundry Princes.

The Venetians
promitt the Pisani.

The Venetians at the same time had taken Astor, Lord of Faenza into their pay, and accepted the protection of his state, which was very fit for to bridle the Florentines, Bologneses, and all the rest of Romagna. To these particular aides of the Venetians other supplies from the Confederates were ioyned, for the Pope, Venetians, and Duke of Milan sent certaine companies of men at armes, paid in common, to the ayde of Ferdinand. In the meane time Antonio Grimani beeing enforced by his indisposition of body to retire from Corfou to Venice, Melchior Treuissan was in his stead sent as Generall to the fleet, who going to Corfou with certaine Gallies, did presently saile into Puglia, and from thence into Calabria, where hee vnitied himselfe with the rest of the Venetian vessels, and with them enforced diuers towne to yeeld to Ferdinand. 40

Whilest the whole kingdom of Naples was filled with warre and troubles, King Charles hauing vnderstood the losse of the two Castles in Naples, through want of supplies, began a new to bend his thoughts on the affaires of Italy, and to determine to goe thither againe in person: This desire dayly increasing in him, where-wherevnto diuers great Lords both French and strangers prouoked him. Therefore his counsell concluded, that Triumficio, who not long before was come forth of Italy to his Court, should returne in post to Ast, as Lieutenant to the King, and with him eight hundred Launces, two thousand Swisses, and two thousand French foot; that the Duke of Orleans should ere long follow him with greater forces, and the King last of all with all prouisions: moreover, that thirty ships in the hauens of Prouence, where thirty Gallies & Gallions were to be armed, should saile through the Ocean with supplies of men, victuals, munition and money into the Realme of Naples, and that in the meane time, whilest the 10 fleet was making ready, certaine vessels well manned and victualled should bee sent thither.

Resolution of
the Kings counsell, for his journey into Italy.

The rumor of these preparations in France diuulged in Italy, did much trouble the Confederates, especially Lodouico Sforza, who was the first to be exposed to the enemies fury, but most of all when hee vnderstood that the King had dismissed his Agents with sharpe and bitter speeches. Helpent Ambassadors to the Emperour, to draw him into Italy, and others to Venice to request the Venetians to contribute towards this expence, to preuent this common danger, and to send 20 certaine troupes to Alexandria to make head against the French. The Venetians freely offered to send forces to Alexandria; but they were not so willing to giue their consent for the Emperours passage, who was no great friend to their State, yet fearing least Lodouico, whom they knew to be fearefull and timorous, should fully reconcile himselfe to the French King, they agreed to send Ambassadors to the Emperour to the same end. And standing in doubt of the Florentines, they sent word to Giovann Bentiuole to make warre vpon them with such forces as the Confederates should furnish him on the frontier towards the Bologneses, promising him that they should bee at the same time invaded by the Sienois, and Pisans; yet though Bentiuole promised so to doe, his meaning was cleane contrary. But the French affaires beeing prolonged by the Cardinal of Saint Malo, who, besides the superintendency of the treasure, managed all matters, did so delay the 30 execution of things, already resolved vpon, as one accident more happened, which had almost wholly diuerted them. For when euery man thought that the King would haue gone into Italy, he determined a journey to Paris (according to the custome of ancient Kings) before his departure forth of France to take his leaue of Saint Denis, and likewise of Saint Martin, passing by Tours, promising within a month to returne to Lyons to pursue his journey into Italy. The aduile of his Lord, nor vrgent intreaties and teares of the Italians, could not alter this determination. The Duke of Orleans, Cardinal of Saint Malo, and the whole counsell remained at Lyons to hasten the prouisions, and the King went to Tours, where the Queene lay.

Lodouico finds euery where to get force, to secure himselfe from the French.

The Venetians
ioyned with Lodouico.

The King intends to leave of the Saints, Denis and Martin.

The affaires of Naples were in the meane time brought to great extremity, where the fortune of the French began openly to decline, being at one time assailed with infinite difficulties, want of money, victuals, the peoples hatred, captains discord, and soldiours disobedience, many of whom forsooke the campe, some willingly, others on necessity. On the contrary, Ferdinands army, re-enforced with men, victuals and money, did still attend the French, and were continually at their backs. But that which did most ruine them, was the Lord D' Aubignis sickness, which caused diuers to forsake him, and to goe to the Duke Alensper his army: Calabria by that means being vnsupplied of men, so as Gonsalues 50 that was come thither, tooke diuers towne in that Prouince, and obtained a gallant victory there, whereby his forces beeing augmented, hee determined to ioine with Ferdinands campe before Arella, where Duke Alensper lay with diuers other Barons and great Lords, both French and Italians, which followed the French Kings party.

By Gonsalues comming to the campe, the beleeged were more streightly inclosed,

Ferdinand doubtfully
beleage Arella.

inclosed, the towne being wholly enuironed, both by the Arragonese, Venetians and Spaniards, so as no victuals could enter into it, especially in regard of the Stradiots and Venetians who scoured the country: neither could they goe forth to forrage as they were wont, so that being deprived of all commodities, they were brought to such extremity, as they could not get water from the Riuer, either for themselves or horse.

At this enforced to capitulate.

Being then oppressed with so many miseries, they craved a safe-conduct, which was granted them, whereupon, the Lord of Persi, Barthelmeo Aluiana and a Swisse capitaine were sent to capitulate with Ferdinand, with whom they thus agreed. That there should be truce for thirty daies: That in the meane time the said accord should be shewed to King Charles. That none of the besieged should goe forth of Atella, and that the Arragonois should daily giue them competent victuals. If they were not releued in that time, hee should leaue Atella, and whatsoeuer else was vnder his command in the Realme of Naples, together with all the ordnance. That the souldiers might depart with their liues and baggage, with permission to returne home into France either by sea or land. That the Vrsini and other Italian souldiers might with their companies depart forth of the Realme whither soeuer they pleased. The truce expired Duke Montpensier came forth, with all the French, Swisse, and the Vrsini, and was conducted by the Marquis of Mantua and his light horse in safety to Baja, where finding no vessels ready to imbarke themselves they quartered betwixt Baja, and Pozzuolo, where by reason of the bad aire and other discommodities, they grew sicke, and the Duke Montpensier and great numbers of his people died, so that of sixe thousand, siue hundred hardly returned into France.

Montpensier his death.

After the taking of Atella, Ferdinand diuided his army into sundry parts, for the recovery of the rest of the kingdome. Hee sent Don Frederico of Arragon his vnckle, and Prospero Colonna before Caietta: Fabrizio Colonna into Abruzzo, and himselfe went and encamped before Salerno, where he made an accord with the Princes of Besignano and Salerno. Gonsalues returned into Calabria, which for the most part was held by the French, where although the Lord Aubigni made some resistance, yet at last being coopt vp in Gropoli, hauing lost Manfredonia and certaine other townes, and depaying of all aide, he consented to leaue Calabria, and was suffered to returne by land into France.

Aubigni is enforced to leaue Calabria to returne into France.

Thus, no other townes holding out in the whole Kingdome but Tarentum and Caietta, it seemed that Ferdinand had attained the height of his desires, when coming to Somma a towne seated at the foote of Mount Vesuuus, to visit the Queene his wife, he fell grievously sicke, and was carried to Naples where within a while after he died: but before his death, he commanded the Bishop of Theanas head, whom he kept in prison, to be cut off, and fearing that they would not obey him by reason of his sicknesse, he caused the head to be brought into his Chamber and with beholding it was satisfied. His vnckle Frederick coming in hast from Caietta to Naples with Melchior Trenisan, was by the Princes of the Realme saluted King, his Nephew dying without children. This Prince beloued of all men for his meekenesse labored to reconcile to himselfe all those who in any sort had fauored the French, and freely restored their castles to them. In this manner winning the peoples hearts, the warre against the French in the Realme of Naples was almost ended, for the city of Tarentum, oppressed with famine, did with her castles yeeld to the Venetians, which besieged it by sea, who presently deliuered it to Frederick. Those of Caietta within a while after, did the like; and by this means the French lost the Realme of Naples. But this notwithstanding, warre was not ended in Italy by reason of Pisa, in which the Venetians had placed foure hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horse, and two thousand foot, against the Florentines. They went moreover with the Emperour Maximilian to beseege Liourne, where their enterprise succeeding succeeding badly, they were enforced to discampe, and from thence, the Emperour returned with speed into Germany, with small honour to the Imperiall dignity, whereupon he was contemned ouer all Italy.

A great desire of revenge.

Tarentum and Caietta yeeld to Frederick.

The Venetians hold Pisa.

King Charles likewise being dispirited with his losse and infamy, determined to assaile Genoa, presuming vpon Baptista Frego his party. The Pope on the other side, desirous to possesse the Vrsini States, the chiefe of that family being imprisoned at Naples, did in open consistory declare Virginio and the rest traitors, and confiscated their lands. This did no whit please the Venetians, who were very desirous to winne the loue of that family, and draw them to their service: yet not daring to contradict the Pope, they were vnwilling at that time to alienate him from them: for notwithstanding Lodouico flatteries, hee could not but with griefe endure to let Pisa, which hee had pursued with such labour, fall to their share; whereupon hee caused the Pope, and the Ambassadors to the Kings of Spaine (who were ieaious of the Venetians greatnesse) to propound the drawing of the Florentines into the league by restoring Pisa vnto them, seeing by other means they could not bee induced to it. The Venetian Ambassador with great earnestnesse oppugning this proposition, the motion was dashed, for feare of loosing the Venetians friendship.

King Charles is sollicit to assault Genoa.

Lodouico practices against the Venetians.

But the hope of King Charles his returne into Italy being wholly lost, and most of the Italians that held his party otherwise employed, Lodouico hereby encouraged, did daily more and more discouer his hatred towards the Venetians concerning Pisa, inciting the Pope, and Kings of Spaine with greater efficacy to reuieue the motion of the restitution thereof: Herevnto he drew the Florentines, who to that end sent their Ambassadors to Rome.

Lodouico practices against the Venetians.

This treaty was continued there many daies where the Pope and Ambassadors of the King of Spaine, Duke of Milan, and King of Naples, did openly vrge the Venetian Ambassador to this restitution, thereby to ioyne the Florentines to their party against the French, to the end that all seeds of discord being rooted out, no man might againe haue any cause to call the French into Italy.

But the Senate contradicting all this, and sufficiently perceiuing from whom this earnest motion proceeded, answered by the same Ambassador, that it was a very dangerous matter to deliuer that City to the Florentines, whose mindes were strictly vnited with the French, and that the surrendering of Pisa would not diuert their inclination: and also that thereby the fidelity of all the Confederates would be called in question, who had taken vpon them to protect the Pisans, especially the Venetians, who when others did shut their purses had freely opened theirs, and to defend them had spared for no cost or labour, whereupon it would bee great dishonour to them to leaue them then and to falsifie their promise. Now whilst this businesse was treated betwixt the Confederates, a sodaine accident happened in France, begetting sundry and different effects in mens mindes. It was the death of King Charles, who on the seventh day of Aprill died at Amboise, of an Apoplexie as hee stood looking on some of his Courtiers that played at tennis; and because hee died without children, the crowne of France descended to Lewis Duke of Orleans, the next Prince of the blood, as heire male. Italy by King Charles his death was somewhat freed from feare: for no man supposed that King Lewis the twelfth coming newly to the crowne, would at the beginning of his reigne make warre in Italy: But the same right to the Realme of Naples (hee being French King) belonged as well to him as to his Predecessor, and beside that, the Duchy of Milan which was his owne by succession from his Grandmother Valentine.

The Senates answer to this motion.

The death of Charles the right French King.

Lewis Duke of Orleans French King.

After his Coronation, hee desired nothing so much, as to conquer that Duchy: and though from his infancy hee had euer carried that minde, yet his success at Nouara had much inkindled him, together with his hatred to

Lodouico

Lodouico Sforza, by reason of his insolent carriage towards him when hee was at Ait. And for an introduction to his designe, he did not onely intitle himselfe King of France, Naples, Ierusalem, both the Sicilies, but likewise Duke of Milan: This was as a summons to Frederick and Lodouico. Hee wrote letters full of friendly congratulation to the Pope, Venetians and Florentines concerning his coming to the crowne.

These three seemed to bee highly pleased with those letters, being desirous to aduance and reuenge themselves: Lodouico neuertheless, though he knew that he had to doe with a rougher enemy, feeding himselfe with hope, as Frederick of Arragon likewise did, that the new King would not so intend the affaires of Italy, did still oppose himselfe against the Venetians concerning Pisa, his hatred to them making him forget his owne future danger.

The Venetians notwithstanding his opposition chose three Ambassadors to goe and congratulate the King for his coming to the crowne, and by way of excuse to tell him, that the onely iuspition (and not without cause) which they had of King Charles, least after the conquest of the Realme of Naples, he should haue attempted that of all Italy, had enforced them to take armes against him: The Pope for the same purpose sent a Nuncio into France, being desirous to inuelt his sonne Cesar, then Cardinall, with temporall greatness. The Florentines likewise, according vnto their antient custome to the crowne of France, sent Ambassadors thither: Wherevnto they were earnestly solicited by Lodouico, who by their meanes thought to frustrate the Venetians praizies for Pisa, and also to mediate some accord betwixt himselfe and the King.

The King did very leuingly entertaine all these Ambassadors, and gaue them audience, concluding nothing till hee had first secured the Realme of France by new leagues with the Princes his neighbours. The Florentines in the meane time still pursuing their designe against the Pisans, their forces which lay Pontadera, having intelligence that certaine troupes gone forth of Pisa, returned home-wards with great booty, went to intercept them, and meeting them, did put them to rout: but fifty men at armes of the Pisans coming on a sodaine to reskew their fellowes, the Florentines were put to flight, many of their footmen slaine, many captaines taken prisoners, with the greatest part of their caualry.

During these troubles in Tuscany, the Venetians reputation was euery where so augmented, as Coruin, sonne to Mathias King of Hungary, sent an Ambassadour to the Senate to certifie it that hee was very desirous to make a perpetuall league of friendship with them, and to bee receiued into the number of the Venetian Gentlemen: This, propounded to the great Councell, was freely granted.

Lodouico in the meane time fearing that the Venetians by reason of that defeat of the Florentines, would grow so great as it would bee an hard matter to repulse them forth of Tuscany, offered to releuee the Florentines: and to the same end was desirous to know what prouisions were necessary, not onely for defense, but to execute the enterprize of Pisa. For though at first hee did not determine openly for to releuee the Florentines, but onely to aide and succor them secretly with money; yet, being transported with choller and disdain, vsing insolent and threatening speeches against the Venetians; hee resolved openly for to declare himselfe their friend: And therefore hauing first denied passage to their people, which went to Pisa, and enforced them to goe through the Duke of Ferrara's country, hee caused the Emperour to declare himselfe their enemy, and procured the Pope to promise the Florentines to send them an hundred men at armes, and three Gallies, vnder the command of Captaine Villamarini, who should keepe all victualls from

The Venetians
send Ambassadors
to the
French King.

Encounter betwixt the Florentines and Pisans.

Lodouico openly declares himselfe for the Floren-
tines.

His praizies against the Venetians.

from entering into Pisa by sea, yet afterwards delaying to send them hee did at last openly refuse it, fearing by fauoring them, to offend the Venetians, with whom hee was desirous to ioyne.

Moreouer, Lodouico did draw Gianan Bentiuole with the State of Bologna to his part, and caused the Florentines to take his sonne Alessandro into their pay, together with Ottaviano de Riere Lord of Imola and Furl, with an hundred and fifty men at armes. Hee did in like manner cause the Lukeses to promise, neuer more to fauour the Pisans.

The Florentines hauing in vaine attempted to draw the Geneuois and Sienois to their side, went into the field vnder the command of Paulo Vitelli their General. The Pisans vnderstanding that the Florentines were abroad, raised their campe from before Ponte di Succo, and went to Cascina: where Vitelli placing an Ambuscado, assailed them, and slew many Stradiors, and tooke Franco their captaine prisoner with an hundred horse: In this manner did the Florentines annoy the city of Pisa, hauing taken diuers townes round about it, when they receiued some likely aduertizement from the Duke of Ferrara and others, that the Venetians would be content to harken vnto peace, provided that they would proceed in the treaty, not as with their equals, but superiors. They then sent Ambassadors to Venice, to sound their meaning. Guido Antonio Vespucio, and Bernardo Ruelli two of the honorablest Citizens went thither, who after kinde entertainment, being introduced to the Senate, after long disputation, concerning meanes to satisfie both parties, neither the Venetians nor Florentine Ambassadors would propound any, referring themselves to the Spanish Ambassador, who incited them to this accord: But the Venetians distasting his opinion, the Florentines returned back without any satisfaction.

This treaty broken, the Venetians on the one side, and Florentines on the other, beganne to strengthen their party with new leagues and treaties, the one with the Sienois, and the other with Pietro de Medicis and the Lord of Faenza, Lodouico still shewing himselfe very much affected to the Florentines.

The Venetians hope from Syenna and Peroua being by this meanes frustrate, did by the assistance of Pietro de Medicis attempt to releuee Pisa, on Romagnias side, but in vaine. In the meane time Paulo Vitelli, Generall to the Florentines, tooke the towne and castle of Librafatta: whereat the Venetians being incensed, sought againe to draw the Marquis of Mantua to their pay, whom not long before they had dismissed (he leauing them by meanes of Alutana) the Florentines army being turned from Pisa, but so, as the whole burthen of warre fell vpon the Venetians, who wisely procured meanes of agreement: For although the Florentine Ambassadors departed from Venice, hopelesse of any accord, yet at Ferrara a new treaty of composition was made, propounded by the Duke, at the Venetians intreaty.

During these troubles in Italy by reason of Pisa the new French King made preparations against the next yeere to inuade the Dutchy of Milan, where he hoped to haue the Venetians on his side, who mortally hating Lodouico, did particularly negotiate with him; so did the Pope, who sent his sonne (which had cast of his Cardinals hat) into France, in secular habit, to carry a dispensation to the King to repudiate his wife Joane, and to marry his Predecessors widow. Cesar Borgia came to the French Court in great pompe, where the King very honorably entertained him, giuing him a company of an hundred men at armes, a yeerely pension of 20000. French pounds, and made him Duke of Valence in Dauphine. Then desirous to pursue his journey into Italy, hee made peace with all Princes his neighbours, and especially with the Kings of Spaine, who presently called home not only all their Ambassadors from Italy (hee with the Pope excepted) but Gonsaluo with all his forces: The King likewise made an agreement with the Emperour, vnto whom, for his sonne the Archdukes sake hee promised on both sides.

New treaties

The Florentines take Librafatta.

Cesar Borgia
the Pope's son is made Duke in Valence by the French
King.

promised to surrender the townes in Artois. Hee did moreover confirme the peace made by his predecessor with the King of England.

Lodowick invites the Turke
against the
Venetians.

Whilest the Senate was busied in providing for the releefe of Pisa, newes came to Venice that the Turke prepared a great fleet, which caused them to send an Ambassador to him: for they were afraide that hee was offended with them because that toward the end of the precedent summer, Nicolo Priuli, Prouidour of their fleet had on the Ægean Sea sunk a great ship belonging to one of his Bashas which first assailed the Prouidour. Zancani, whom the Senate sent, being come to Constantinople, had notice of the great numbers of vessels which the Turke had caused to be armed: The great Lord courteously entertained him shewing no signe of discontent: He determined to assaile the Venetians whilest they should be busied in Lombardy with making head against Lodowicks forces, who had promised to invade them in those parts.

Zancani intreating him to renew the league with the Signory, hee the better to deceiue him, granted it, giuing him the Articles of the league written in Latin. Now their law faith, that they are not bound to performe any thing vnlesse it be written in their owne language. Zancani aduertized thereof by André Gritti, a Venetian Gentleman, skilfull in the Turkish lawes and customes, and for his bounty and other good parts beloued of that nation, hauing dwelt a long time at Constantinople, was by him in some sort put in hope to haue them written in the Turkish tongue, but not obtraying his desire, Zancani returned with the Articles in Latin, concealing what Gritti had told him, because his iourney should not be thought vaine.

League betwixt the French and
Venetians.

Capitulation of the league.

Now the French King so soone as he had made peace with his neighbour Princes, and in his absence secured his Realme, made a Confederacy with the Venetians (not mentioning Pisa as hee had done at the beginning) wherein it was concluded that at the same time as he with a mighty army should invade the Dutchy of Milan, they on the other side from their frontiers should doe the like, and the Dutchy being won, Cremona with the country of Gyrade should remaine to the Venetians, on this condition, that after this conquest they should be bound to defend the King for a certaine time, with certaine number of horse and foot, the King being bound to do the like for Cremona and whatsoeuer they possessed in Lombardy. This contract was so secretly made, as Lodowick, nor yet the Pope who was very inward with the King, could (but very late) haue any certaine knowledge thereof.

The King, not mentioning Pisa, did afterwards propound conditions to the Florentines farre different from the former; wherevpon they resolved to rely on the Duke of Milan, by whose assistance their affaires prospered in the Calen- terry, where they were Lords, their enemies hauing beene inforced to abandon the townes by reason of great difficulties.

Lodowick a-marred at the league, goes about to diuert
the Venetians
from it.

Lodowick who neuer imagined that the Venetians would haue leagued themselves with the French King, who was greater and more potent then they, and least of all change his neighbourhood for that of the French, was wonderfully danted when he vnderstood that the league betwixt the King and Venetians was resolved, hee not knowing the particularities thereof. Hee was then ready to send Francesco of Sanseuerino with great forces to aide the Florentines, but hee detained them, vpon intelligence that Triumlio leauied souldiers neere Ast. Hee likewise thought that if the accord betwixt the Venetians and Florentines should take effect, they would peraduenture moderate their indignation conceiued against him, and forsake the French King. Herein hee employed Hercules D'Este Duke of Ferrara his father in law, and by forcible reasons enforced the Florentines in some sort to condescend to the Venetians desire, sending them word that if they did not agree, he should be constrained for feare of the French King, to call home those forces he had sent to aide them.

Hercules

Hercules the better to effect it came in person to Venice, whither Lodowick sent his Agents, and from the Florentines Giouan Baptista Radeffi, and Pauo Antonio Soderini, two of the wisest and chiefeest Citizens came thither: all which, after long disputation concerning the meanes to be obserued in that accord, made an absolute compromise for eight daies, in the person of Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who hauing well considered the matter, did on the sixth of Aprill prouounce his sentence. But the Venetians, not satisfied therewith, in regard of the small consideration had of their expences in warre; nor yet the Pisans, who obtained nothing but a sterile kind of liberty, contrary to the intention of most of the Venetian nobility; nor the Florentines, who thought themselves ouer burthened, for that they were to repay part of their expences who had vniofly molested them, it tooke none effect, notwithstanding that the Venetians and Florentines had signed and ratified it, because that the Pisans determined to endure all extremity rather then to returne vnder the Florentines command; being therevnto secretly incited by the Genouois, Luqueses, and by Pandolfo Petrucci. And so soone as they vnderstood the tenure of the sentence, being wonderfully incensed against the Venetians, they tooke the gard of the Cities fortes, and gates, from their souldiers, and would no longer suffer them to lodge in the City. The Florentines, despayring by this accord to obtaine Pisa, resolved to win it by force. King Lewis in the meane time commanded his forces to march into Italy, his army consisted of 1600. Launces, 5000. Swisses, 4000. Calcons, and 4000. out of the other parts of France, whereof Giouan Iacomo Triumlio was made Generall: This army coming before the fort of Astazza, scared on the riuer Tanate, took it in a short space, notwithstanding that there were sene hundred footmen in it: from thence it went to Anon, a little towne betwixt Ast and Alexandria vpon the same Riuer, which being battered in foure seuerall places, was in two daies taken by force, notwithstanding that the Duke of Milan some few monthes before had well fortified it, and placed seven hundred men in Garrison there. The King came after as farre as Lyons, intending to passe the moun- tains, from whence hee sent an Ambassador to Venice, for to accompany the Venetian army whethersoeuer it marched; to which so soone as it was ready, Melchior Trevisan, and Marc Antonio Morosini were sent as Prouidours: And the Senate presented this French Ambassador, with a gallant horse richly caparisoned, a pauilion for the field, and two pounds of gold.

The Floren-
tines resolui-on concerning Pisa.

The French
King army comes into Italy vnder Triumlio his command.

The Venetians hauing intelligence of Triumlio his good successe, caused their army to march, consisting of seven thousand horse, and as many foot, which vnder the command of Aluiano, hauing crossed the Oglio, and entred the enemy country, did in a short space take diuers townes and castles; and coming before Carauagia, the chiefe City of the country, tooke it by force, with other townes neere the River Adda.

The number of the Venetian
army.

The end of the fifth Booke of the fourth Decade.

Bbb

The

The Contents of the sixth Booke of the fourth Decade.

10

Odouico is troubled with the newes of the league betwixt the French King and Venetians against him.
Alexandria is taken by the French. The Milaneses revolt, and Triulcio entreats Milan for the King. The Venetians take Cremona. King Lewis comes to Milan.
The Venetians fleet against Bajazeth. It sustaines great hurt by fire. The Turke takes Lepanto. Lodouico is receiued into Milan by the disloyalty of the Inhabitants. Lodouico, going forth of Nouara, is taken by the French and sent prisoner into France. The Venetians great warr with Bajazeth. The Venetians through want of winde at sea lose the battail.
The Turke takes Modon. Coron and the fort of Iunca are yeilded to the Turke on composition. Naples in Morea, besieged by the Turke, is brauely defended. The Isle of Samorbrace yeeldeth to the Venetians. They take the City of Cephalonia. Confederacy betwixt Ladislaus King of Hungary and the Venetians against the Turke: Peace betwixt the Venetians and Turke: The Portugals traffick to Calicut for spices: The castles of Moua and Faenza are re-delivered to the Venetians: The Pope complaines against the Venetians in regard of the Cities of Romagna: And lastly, are set downe the Venetians Ambassadors inuectiue to the Emperour Maximillian and French King against the Pope.

40

The

The sixth Booke of the fourth Decade,
of the History of Venice.

10

Hese newes did greatly afflict Lodouico Sforza, putting him in feare of his State: who lost (as it often happeneth in sodaine Aduersities) both courage and counsell, flying to bootlesse and vnprofitable remedies.

20

He sent an Ambassador to Venice to vse some meanes to pacifie the Senate. This Ambassador comming first to Ferrara, Duke Hercules sent one of his Gentlemen before to the Senate with Lodouico's letters, intreating them to suffer his Ambassador to come thither: The contents of his letters were, that himselfe and his brother Alcanio sent an Ambassador to them on great and important affaires, requesting them to giue him audience. The Senate hauing read both their letters, commanded the Ferrarois presently to leaue the City, and gaue Lodouico's letters to the French Ambassador.

The Venetians
refuse to giue audience to Lodouico's Ambassador.

30

At the same time Frederick King of Naples did by his Ambassador acquaint the Senate with his desire to send fiftie hundred horse to Lodouico's aide. The Senate told the Ambassador, that hee should make his King this answer; That the Cauallery he intended to send to the Duke of Milan would doe him small good, he hauing need of farre greater forces; and that if he should send him any, they would take it as a wrong done to themselves: adding, that there was no man liuing who had receiued more fauours and benefites of them, then hee; which he had requited with ingratefull iniuries: That the time was now come when God was his enemy, whom hee had so often offended by his disloyalty and periuery, and that therefore his King should doe much better to leaue him to him selfe.

40

In the end, Lodouico, frustrate of all hope, made meanes to the people of Milan, who extremely hated him for his great exactions: and hauing assembled them, he did acquit and release part of his imposts to them, and therevnto added very earnest speeches to winne their loues, which were heard with more attention then profit: that done, hee enroled all those in the City that were able to beare armes.

50

The Venetian army in the meane time still preuailed, and after the taking of the towne and castle of Carauagia, crossed the Riuer Adda, on a bridge of boats, and made incursions as farre as Lodi. The French army on the other side besieged Alexandria, where Galleas, Lodouico's sonne in law, lay with twelue hundred men at armes, twelue hundred light horse and three thousand foot, who the third night after the seege, acquainting none of his captaines with his intent, but only Malucza, did secretly flie from Alexandria to Milan, with certaine light-horse. His departure knowne in the city, as many as tarried behind beganne, in tumultuous manner, some to flie, others to hide themselves: wherevpon the French army entring it by day breake, did not only rancke the souldiers, but sack't the whole city.

The taking of Alexandria caused those of Placentia to send their Commissioners to Triunficio with their Cities keys; the like did those of Paugia, and all other townes round about. There was the like confusion at Milan as in other places, where the foot companies demanding pay, Lodovico sent them to his chiefe Treasurer, who giuing them no satisfaction was by them wounded and left for dead.

This accident did to terrifie Lodovico, as he sent his children to Coma, together his with mistris, (for his wife was dead) Cardinal Ascanio his brother, and Cardinal Sanseuerine brother to Galeas, and from thence into Germany, himselfe resoluing ere long to goe thither. The Milanese perceiuing Lodovico to destrutt his owne forces, made an assembly in their towne-house, where they appointed foure of the chiefe among them to take order for their affaires. These comming to Lodovico told him that they were resolued to yeeld to the French King seeing that in distrust he had sent his children and family forth of the City: So soone as he heard this, he caused pay to be giuen to five hundred light-horse and with teares in his eyes, departed with them and Galeas of Sanseuerin his sonne in law towards Germany. He was scarce gonne forth of the castle, when Count Gagezza came to him, and the better to collour his disloyalty told him, that he now thought himselfe freed from the martiall oth which he had made him, seeing that he abandoned his State, and that he was now at liberty to goe whether it pleased him; and at the very instant not tarrying for an answer, went his way to serue the French King, with the same company which he had leauied and entertained at Lodovico's cost. Before his departure from Milan, he left Bernardin de Corte of Paugia, whom he had brought vp of a child, to gard the castle, whereof he was then Gouvernor, with three thousand footmen, vnder captains whom he greatly trusted, with prouision of victuals, munition, and money sufficient to defend it for a long time, preferring this man before his brother Ascanio, who had offered to take that charge vpon him.

Foure daies after his departure Triunficio, sent for by the Milanese, entred the City, where he was receiued with great ioy, reseruing the capitulations till the Kings comming; all other townes of the Dutchy which yet held out, yeelded on a sodaine. The Venetians comming nere Cremona, the townesmen sent to entreate them to grant them some respite to consider vpon their yeelding. This granted, they sent to Triunficio, to request him to receiue them for the King, for they abhorred the Venetians gouernment but answered, that by agreement made betwixt the King and them, that city was theirs, the chiefe Citizens, with the Bishop and Clergy, went to the Gates and there receiuing the Prouidators, placed them vnder a Canopy, and in this manner accompanied them through the City to their lodging, where they intreated the Venetians to free them from the taxes and impositions wherewith Lodovico had oppressed them, the which was presently granted.

There is in that City, a very strong castle which being well furnished with all necessaries, it was a hard matter to take it. Antonio Bastaglione was Gouvernor there, vnto whom Lodovico had committed the guard of that place. The next day the Prouidators sent to him, willing him to yeeld vp the castle to the Venetian State: at first he made refusal, but after sundry messages too and fro, the Prouidators sent it by meanes of an hundred and fifty pounds of gold, which they paid him, some in hand, and the rest by promise, with letters of a Venetian Gentlemans place, and an house in Venice, and an other in the country nere to Padua with diuers other lands.

The same day that the Venetians entred the castle of Cremona, Triunficio did the like into that of Milan, which was yeelded vnto him by Bernardino de Corte, with al Lodovico's and Galeas rich mouables in recompence of a certaine summe of money, a company of an hundred Launces, and a perpetuall pension.

Cremona

Cremona obeying the Venetians; the Senate sent two Presidents thither to gouerne it, and to doe iustice, Dominico Trenisan, and Nicola Foscarinis were sent thither: and beside these, two Ambassadors were chosen, and all foure of them appointed to goe to Milan to receiue the King, and in the States name to congratulate his new conquest; so loone as he should arriue there.

The King receiuing newes at Lyons of such fortunate successe his expectation, rode presently in post to Milan, where receiued with in credible ioy, hee granted to the people, vnreasonable in their demands, exemption from diuers taxes, but not from all, as they vainly presumed, and gaue great rewards to many Milanese Gentlemen; and among others to Triunficio, vnto whom he gaue Vigeas and other townes, in acknowledgement of his desert. All the Potentates of Italy went thither to him (King Frederick excepted) some personally and some by Ambassadors, some to congratulate his happy successe; and others to electe themselves, from imputation of inclining to Lodovico Sforza more then to him, and others likewise to secure their owne euer after. The King gently receiued them all, and compounded with them all, but after different manner, according to the diuersity of the conditions, and greatesse of the profit he expected from them. But whilst these things were done in Lombardy, the Senate hauing intelligence that Bajaceth armed by sea and land, made Antonio Grimani 20 General of their Nauall army, commanding him speedily to depart.

He vawilling to prolong his journey for want of money, their treasure being much wasted by continuall warre, lent the State foure score pounds of gold to pay the mariners and other officers of the fleet, and promised to carry as much with him to Corfou and other places to supply the fleets want when need should be.

Those of Corfou vpon intelligence that the Turkish fleet was vnder saile, and that the State was not able in a short space to set forth a Nauy able to resist it offered men and money to arme three score vessels, provided that the Senate would furnish them with bread and ordnance. The Senate willingly accepted 30 this offer, and command a florin of gold to be giuen to euery man which should enter into those vessels.

The Gouvernor of Zara aduertized the Senate that two thousand Turkish horse were entred on their confines, and had taken great numbers of the country people, still continuing their incursions. The arriual of the Turkish cavallery on the Zaratin made the Venetians thinke that they would not at that time beleage Rhodes. Wherevpon, they forthwith made two Prouidators, namely, Francesco Cicogni for Morea and Romania, and Andrea Loredano for Corfou; and beside these, Andrea Zancani was with forces sent into Frioull, because they had intelligence that the Turke determined to come thither.

In the meane time, the Turkish fleet came forth of the Streight, consisting of more then two hundred three score and tenne saile, and being come nere Negrepoint, directed it course towards Romagnia, the great Lord being there in person, who before his departure from Andrinople, commanded all the Venetians which were in Constantinople to bee imprisoned, and amongst others Andri Grissi (before mentioned) who was more streightly looked to then any other, for that in loue to his Country, he had by letters written in character aduertized the Gouvernor of Lepanto of al the Turks proceedings against his country, which had like to haue cost him his life. Grimani hauing speedily assembled all the vessels which were in the Islands nere adioyning, made vp the number of 50 forty six Gallies, seuentene great marchant ships, and forty other lesser ones, with as many brigantines and light vessels, and anchoring at Modon, had an eye on euery side vpon the Turke.

Hauing intelligence that the enemy was comming to seeke him, hee sailed. Bbb 3 with Lodovico determined to flee into Germany.

Count Gagezza takes the Kings part.

Milanese receive Triunficio for the King.

Cremona yeelds to the Venetians.

The castle of Cremona yeelds to the Venetians, vpon recompence.

The castle of Milan doth yeeld to Triunficio for money.

King Lewis comes in post to Milan.

All the Princes of Italy come to him to Milan.

The Venetians send a fleet against the Turkes.

The Turke on the raising conjuncts.

Andrea Grissi imprisoned. The number of the Venetian fleet.

The two fleets were together.

with all his navy towards the Isle of Sapienza opposite to Modon: and there embarrailed his fleet, and hauing giuen order for all matters necessary for fight himselfe went somewhat forward with foure Gallies, the Turkish fleet being not farre from thence, which with the winde hee might haue assailed at his pleasure: yet he deferred the fight and returned backe to Modon: where after that the Turke had in a few daies made two or three severall brauadoes, Grimani ordered his fleet, resolving to fight with him, when at the very instant Andrea Loredano with eleauen Brigantines and foure great ships arrived; hee came to Grimani and told him that hee was come to doe seruice to the State, intreating him to commaund what hee would haue him doe. Hee was a valliant Gentleman, and skilfull mariner, and at his arrivall the whole fleet made great signes of ioy. The Generall placed him in one of the great ships.

The Venetian fleet burnt by fire.

Albano Amerigo commanded an other great shippe, who in open Council was enioyned by the Generall to assaile the enemies biggest ship, which he performed, and Loredano an other, who grappled with it to fight more conveniently: and in the bickering wild fire was throwne into the enemies ship which being on fire, was by the winde carried amongst the Venetians and fiered them: This accident did more hurt to the Venetians then Turkes, because that they did easily saue their men with other small vessels, but our men could not bee reskewed in time, so that they all perished, some few excepted with Tomaso Duodo recouered in his long boate, Albano was saved by the Turkes.

Turkish crueltie.

Grimani wonderfully troubled with this losse, founded the retreat, and without any farther fight retired to the Isle of Podroma: the Turkish fleet for a time remained in the selfe same place where it had fought. Albano, brought to Constantinople was solicited by Bayazeth to turne Turke, which he boldly refusing to doe, was sawed a sunder in the middle and so constantly died.

Grimani left his place of Generall.

The French King, solicited by the great Master of Rhodes (whether it was reported the Turke would come) to releue him, dispatched two and twenty Gallies, which being rigged in Prouence failed towards Rhodes. But that island needing no supplies as then, they did by the Kings command ioyne with the Venetian fleet. The Venetians and French coming to Zant, resolved to assaile the Turkish fleet which lay at Tornos: but drawing neere it, perceiving that the enemies vessels lay with their poopes to land ward, and their prowes towards the sea, filled sixe small vnseruiceable vessels with reedes and other combustible matter mingled with wilde fire, and sent them before the winde vpon the enemies fleet, but it succeeded not according to their hope. And Grimani in the meane time omitted a second opportunity to fight with, and vanquish the enemy, wherevpon, an other being sent into his place, and himselfe cited to Venice, he was committed to the examination of the Councill of Pregati. The Turkish fleet went forward to Lepanto, whither the Emperour was already come, and by the arrivall of his vessels hauing beguirt the towne by sea and land, those within it depaying of releefe, and wanting all necessities, yielded. These newes did greatly trouble the Venetians, and augmented their hatred toward Grimani, euery man saying, if he had done his duty, the enemies fleet would haue bene defeated.

Lepanto yielded
to the Turke.

The Turkish Cavallery on the other side, scouring the confines of Zara, entered Frioull to spoile and wast, and finding the country not defended, spoiled and burned all places as farre as Liuenza, where they tooke many prisoners: vpon these newes Lancani with great forces was sent to the frontiers.

Seven thousand of the enemies horse came in troups through very badde waies into Histria, and then crossing the Riuer Liuenza, came and encamped nere vnto Gradisca, where Lancani lay, determining if hee came into the field to fight fight with him. But the enemies Generall perceiving that he meant not to come forth, sent two thousand horse to wast and spoile the Cuntry, whom hee commanded to make no long stay.

These dispersing themselves ouer that goodly Contrey, tooke many prisoners burning and wasting many Contrey houles, both on the Treuifan and Paduan territories. Three hundred Albanese horse sallied forth of Vdina, and defeated some hundred of the Turkes, if Lancani with his forces had done the like, the Turke would haue received a great overthrow, but he would not suffer any one to goe forth of the Towne: whereof, accused at Venice, hee was sent for thither as a prisoner, and by a Decree of Senate confined for foure yeares to Padua.

Lancani confined in Padua

On such times stood the Venetian State at home and abroad, when Cesar Borgia with the King and Senates forces, went into Romagna to beseege certaine townes which of right did belong to the Church, & being conquered Pope Alexander gave them to his sonne.

This Borgia, was a Cardinall (as hath bene sayd) and casting off his robe and Hatre of Cardinall, married a wife in France. Hee coming before Imola and Furl, after some assaults enforced the inhabitants to yeeld; but the Castles which were very strong held out longer, especially that of Furl, for the other yeelded sooner.

The Senate in the meane time to secure their owne territories during the warre in Romagna, sent three thousand foot, and two thousand horse to Rauenna, vnder Alutaius command, to distribute them through the territories of the Confederates neere adioyning, with two prouidators, Francesco Capello and Christophoro Moro, the one for Arimini, and the other for Ferrara: So soone as Borgia had taken the Castle of Furl, Giulian Sforza Lord of Pessare, knowing that Borgia hated him, fearing least he would come and assaile him, was desirous to commit himselfe and State to the Venetians protection. The Senate answered that they would neuer defend one that had been so great an enemy to them: for he had concealed the Ambassador which Lodouico sent to the Turke against the State of Venice, and furthered his passage: The like had hee done by the Turkes messenger sent to Lodouico, whom he entertained in his house, and caused him secretly to be conducted to Milan, himselfe likewise hauing often acquainted the Turke with the occurrences in Venice.

Borgia deferred his punishment till some other time, because Triulcio was inforced to call back those troopes which hee had lent him, by reason of some tumults feared in Milan, in regard of Lodouicos arrival, who had brought some small aid forth of Germany, with which, and by their assistance who distasted the French, he hoped to recover what he had lost. The Senate presently commanded their forces, both horse and foot, to passe into the Cremonese, leuied three thousand Swisses, and appointed Pietro Musello and Christophoro Moro prouidators in that warre.

Lodouico took a service with the French of Gimay.

Lodouico coming at the same time to Coma, tooke it without strokes: for the French within it fearing to be shut in betwixt the inhabitants, and Lodouicos troopes, went their way. Hee sent his brother Afcanio before to Milan, from whence the King not long before, was gone home into France; hauing left a strong Garrison in the City, and Triulcio his Gouernour Generall in the Duchy: but the Lombards not so well rewarded by the King as they had expected, proued false to him & refused to obey Triulcio, who was cheefe of the Guelphi faction, for the Gibeline party was very strong in the City: wherevpon, the most of the Nobility and people, desirous of inuouation, wisht for Lodouicos returne, and openly proclaimed his name, and so soone as they heard of the losse of Coma, and that Afcanio was not farre from Milan, the people rose, and the cheefe of the Gibeline faction, began to tumult: so as Triulcio was glad to retire to the Castle: and the night following from thence to Novara.

Lodouico recd.
merch, and Lodovico cre-eth Milan by of the Inhabitants.

The morrow after Cardinall Afcanio entred Milan, Lodovico followed him, who by this meanes recovered it as easly as it was lost; Paulia and Parma presently echoed his name: Lodi and Placentia would haue done the like, had not the Venetian companies by their arriual preuented it. The Senate aduertised of this reuolt, determined to send a man of worth to command the Caste of Cremona. Lodovico in the meane time, desirous to haue the Senate his friend, made sure that Afcanio his brother might send the Bishop of Cremona to Venice, to offer them his seruice: but it was in vaine, for the Senate refused nor to quitte the French Kings confederacy. The Genoies refused to obey him, and the Florentines contemned him.

The King
sends an army to recover Milan.

The King in the meane time hauing intelligence of the rebellion of Milan, vsed great speed and sent the Lord Trimouille into Italy with six hundred lances, leuyed great numbers of Suisses, and appoynted the Cardinall of Ambois his Lieutenant Generall beyond the mounts, who comming to Ast, had in short space assembled one thousand five hundred lances, ten thousand Suisse, and 6000.
French vnder the command of the Lords Trimouille, Trivulcio and Ligni.

Lodovico is taken prisoner by
the French and sent away into France.

Lodovico before these supplies came from France, went and besieged Nouara, which hee tooke, but not the Caste. The French Army assembled at Mortara drew neere him, and did cut off his vittuals: then both sides falling to blowes, Lodovico was enforced to retire into the City; where the Suisses mutined for want of pay; hee being notable to pacifie them. They told him that they would sodenly depart home into their country; whereupon hee earnestly entreated them to safe-conduct him to some secure place, which they denying did at last consent that hee should march amongst them disguised like one of their footmen, and in this manner marching amidst their troopes was by them discovered to those that fought after him, who presently apprehended him as the Kings prisoner and sent him into France to the tower of Loches.

His brother Afcanio followed him, who taken by the Venetians and carried to Venice was deliuered to the King and sent into France, where hee was more ho-norablely and with greater curtesie enterdayned then his brother, for hee was sent prisoner to the great tower of Bourges, where the same King had bene imprisoned two whole yeares: yet afterwards hee was enlarged, but this brother dyed in prison.

Lodovico Manenti (sue to the great Turke

Now to returne to the Turks. After the taking of Lepanto, the Senate despatcht Lodovico Manenti, Secretary to the Councill of ten, to Bejazeth, to complaine for that hee had without cause inuaded them by sea, and had contrary to the treaty of peace made not long before with him in the Signories name by Andrew Zancani their Ambassador, and to entreate him to enlarge the Venetian Mar-chants, which by his commandment at the beginning of the warre had bene imprisoned. That it might likewise please him to surrender Lepanto vnto them, which hee vniustly had taken from them. And lastly if hee would grant none of these, yet at least to renew the League with them.

The cause which moued
the Venetians to send Manenti.

Two things moued the Senate to send this Ambassage, the one, because some that were very inward with the great Lord, had written to them, that if they sent an Ambassador to Constantinople, they might be reconciled to his fauour: the second, for that they considered how chargeable it would bee for them, if they should bee enforced to set forth a new Army against him, their treasure both publick and particular beeing exhausted. Whereby all their attempts would proue vaine and vnprofitable against so mighty an enemy.

The Turke answers to Ma-
nenti.

Manenti arriuing at Constantinople, all his demandes were crost: for the Turke answered, that if the Venetians were desirous of peace with him, they should deliuer vnto him, Modon, Coron, and Naples, three Cities which they held in Morea, and pay vnto him as his tributaries an hundred pound in gold yearly: otherwise hee protested to make warre vpon them.

With

with this answer Manenti returned. But because at Manenti his departure from Venice, there was a report, that great numbers of Turkish horse were come into Albania: the Senate fearing least the desire to spoile the Country of Frioul, might draw them thither, as the precedent yeare, appointed Pietro Doria, and Angelo Brozzi Prouidators, who taking along with them the Governor of Vdina and others of the Country should consult together about repairing and fortifying the townes and wayes necessary and fit to repulse the enemy; giuing them for assistants Aluiana with his light horse, and Gurlio of Rauenna with two thousand foote. Pietro Marcello likewise one of the Prouidators of the Army in Lombardy, was commanded to carry forces into Frioul, but the Turkes came not thither at that time, because their Emperour called home their Generall to Constantinople.

The Venetians
take order for the defence of Frioul.

This report againe reuiued about Midsummer, that the Turkish army was in field to waste the Venetians confines, Count Petillan with a great part of the forces, and Gionan Baptista Ceracciola Colonell of the States Fantery, did by the Senates command march into Frioul, where all the inhabitants of the plaines retired with their goods to the Castles and strong Townes: yet the enemies came not thither, eyther for that they had intelligence, that the townes were fortified, or else beeing employed by their Emperour in the warre of Peloponessus.

Manenti was newly returned to Venice, when the Senate fearing to loose the Isle of Corfou, sent Angelo Quirini and Lodovico Canale, with a hundred foote to gard the two fortes of the Island which are seated on two Promontaries neere one another, and not farre from the City, beeing so small, as they needed no greater forces to defend them. Newes was afterwards brought that the Turkish fleete which had wintered at Lepanto much increased, determined to saile into Morea (their Emperour beeing with them in person) to take those townes which hee had demanded of Manenti.

Supplies sent to Corfu.

The designe of the Turkish fleete.

Hereupon the Senate commanded ten great Gallies, and foure great ships to bee made ready vnder the command of Iacomo Venieri, with a particular Ca-pitaine to euery vessell, whose pay was augmented, the better to incite them to goe the voyage. Rowers were sent for from the firme land, and money giuen to pay the fleete, diuerse Brigantines and other lesser vessels apt for warre, were rig'd to attend vpon the fleete. Melchior Treuisan which lay not farre from Cephalonia, to keepe out all Turkish ayde, beeing assured of the enemies designe, made speedy meanes to send men, vittuals and ordnance from Candy to Naples, because all men thought that the Turke would make his first attempt there: hee likewise sent vittuals to Modon.

The Modonois hauing wasted the countrey round about their City, and burnt the houses, because the enemy should not make vse of them, builded a Forte neerer to the Hauen, to keepe the enemies vessels from the walls, leauing but a little space at the entrie of the hauen, for one ship to come in at once. Melchior Treuisan beeing come to Zant, sent for the whole fleete thither, consisting of seuentie vessels, both Gallies and ships of burthen: but that of the Turke in number more then two hundred, comming to the confines of Naples, had sent part of the caualry before by land to scoure as far as the city. The horse within the town to the number of one thousand five hundred, made a sally vpon the enemies, and in a manner defeated them all. Thereupon, the enemy leauing Naples went to Modon, from whence hee sent forces to besiege Iunca, which is a Caste seated on a hill with a hauen beneath it some ten mile from Modon. Those within it hauing bene newly supplied with men and vittuals by Ieronimo Contaren the Prouidator did brauely repulse the enemies, so as despairing to take it, they returned to their fleet. In the meane time Melchior Treuisan fell sick and dyed neere to Cephalonia, whereupon by a Generall consent, Contaren the Prouidator was chosen to command the Army, till the Senate had otherwise prouided.

Those of Ma-don fortifie
against the Turke.

Melchior Tre-uisan has died.

The

The Turke came and assailed the Burrow of Modon, and with his Canon did beat downe a great part of the wall, those within it being out of hope to defend the breach, carried away all their goods into the City, and abandoned it. The enemy entred it, and hoping ere long to become Lord of all, did without intermission batter the wallies of the City.

Whilest this siege lasted, Contareno left Zant, determining if it were possible to releue Modon, or at least to annoy the enemies fleet, whose great ships lay neere Sapienza, and the Gallies and other lesser vessels in the Hauen of Iunca: So soone as the Venetian descried them, hee resolved to fight with them, and ordering his fleet, did brauely set forward. The Turke seeing them to come on, receiued them with an hundred Gallies, the fight was sharpe and cruell, victory inclining to the Venetians, so as the Turkes were once ready to make towards the shore and flie. But the misfortune was, that whilest they fought the winde slackned, whereby the shippes of burthen could neither goe backward nor forward, and part of the Gallies durst not come vp to them: the Turkes seeing this, tooke courage and renewed the fight for three houres space, till night, one great Venetian Galley was sunke, and an other taken, but all her men slaine, who alone had fought all night with the enemy. Contareno's Galley beeing shotte thorow both sides, and a great leake in her, himselfe leapt into an other and retired to Zant, to trim his vessels which were much bruized.

*Pejare Gen.
rall of the Venetian fleet.*

The Senate having notice of Trevisans sickness and death, chose Benedetto Pejare to succeed him, who receiuing money to pay the Army, departed from Venice three dayes after his election. Contareno having trim'd his Gallies, resolved to releue Modon, fearing least the besieged despairing of helpe should yeeld to the enemy: Hee chose five Gallies out of the whole fleet, which hee loded with all necessaries: yet before their departure, hee thought good to aduertise the besieged thereof, that they might be ready to receiue supplies. To this end hee sent a valiant and courageous fellow in a Frigate with tenne Oares: Hee at noone dayes passed thorow the enemies fleet, euen in their view, and entred Modon, dooing his message.

Supplies enter into Modon.

The next day Contareno with the whole fleet, sayled towards Modon, and beeing in sight of the enemy, hee called for the Captaines of those five Gallies, intreating them valiantly to releue the besieged, foure of them with great difficulty passing thorow the middest of the enemies, entred the Hauen; the fifth, slower then the rest, perceiving diuerse of the enemy Gallies to come vp towards her, returned to the fleet.

*The Turke
sakes Modon.*

The Modonois greatly cheered, ranne presently to the Hauen to receiue those supplies and to carry them into the City, and they were so earnest in it, as those on the other side of the City which were on the walls forsooke their guard, and ranne thither likewise, so as the walls were bared of defence; which the enemy perceiving, and loth to let slippe so faire an occasion, reared Ladders, and entred the City, killing some few that resisted. This being knowne, the Townesmen and Soldiers ranne vpon them, and fought valiantly with them a long time in the middest of the City, killing great numbers of them. But the multitude of enemies still increasing, and all the streetes stop't, the Christians were in a manner all cut in peeces. Those which escaped the slaughter, fired the City, and with it burnt themselves and goods.

*The Castle of Iunca yeelded
to the Turke.*

In this manner was the City of Modon taken: The Venetian Magistrate being tyed in chaines, was by the Turkes command carried to Iunca, to be scene of the Captaine of the Castle, and all those within it, who therupon yeelded, their liues and goods saved. As the Venetian fleet returned towards Zant, an horrible tempest arose, which disperfed them into sundry farre Islands, euen to Candie, their masts, rudders and tacklings being all broken in peeces. Modon taken, taken, the Turke sent one of his Barchas and part of his fleet to Coron, who toletchem that if vpon honorable composition the would yeeld before he beseegethem, he would vse them currencously, otherwise, if they stayed till the Canon were planted, he would put them all to the sword. They terrified with the defaeter of the Modonois, without respect to the Magistrates or Captaines, who had prepared all things for defence, did vpon very profitable conditions receiue the Barcha into their walls.

*Coron yeelds
to the Turke
on composition.*

The Turke supposing to take Naples in the same manner; and as soone as hee had done Coron, sent part of his army to their Confinnes, and sent thither with his Captaines, euen to the City gates, Paul Contareno a Venetian Gentleman that was married in Coron, and well knowne in those Cuntries, who after Coron was taken, the Turke tooke along with him to this end, to perswade the Neapolitans to yeeld. He conferring with those in the City concerning their yeelding, and standing vpon the edge of the Dike right ouer against the Gate, did on a suddaine and vnperceiued spur his horse, and leaping into the Dike presently entred the City. The Neapolitans both by his aduice, and being willing of themselves, did very valiantly repulse all the enemies attempts; and did moreover as occasion was offered, make very fortunate sallies. And the Turke sending for his whole army thither, thereby thinking to terrifie them, they despised all his threatenings, and brauely defended the shielues.

A braue and bold deed of Paul Contareno

The Turke's army before Naples.

In the meane time, Pejare comming to Corfou, and from thence to Zant, tarried there, till the fleet, disperfed by tempest, was reuined. The Vessells trimmed and made ready, there were 18. great Gallies and 25. lesser ones, and 20. shippes well riged and armed; with these hee determined to seeke the enemies fleet and fight with it. But the Turke hauing intelligence of his comming to Zant commanded his Barchas to raise the Seege, and to carry back the fleet to Constantinople, and himselfe, with his whole army departed from thence the next day. Pejare at the same time sent a Frigate to Naples to view the enemy fleet: but perceiving they were gon, he failed to Legina, which the Turke had taken during the seage of Naples, where landing his soldiers, hee tooke the Port, and slew all the Turkes within it, reseruing the Captaine for his prisoner, and restored the Island to the Venetian State. From thence he went to Mitilyn, where hee did the like, giuing the spoile to his soldiers and mariners. The next day he failed to Tenedos which he burnt downe to the ground. And finding the enemies fleet, which fled at the mouth of the Straight, hee gaue in vpon their taile, and tooke diuers vessels and many prisoners, whom, vpon Gibets set vp on the two shores that diuide the confines of Europe and Asia hee hanged; and afterwards spoiled and wasted the Contrey with fire and sword.

The Turke discompeish from before Naples.

The Venetians take the Isle of Legina.

They recover Mitilyn.

*Pejare assails
the enemy fleet*

From thence he directed his course to the Isle of Samothrace, where vnderstanding that the Islanders obeyed the Turke on constraint, he sent Lodouico Canalis to them, to know if they would yeeld to the Venetians: they willingly accepted the offer, and he promised to giue them a Venetian Gentleman for Gouvernour, vnto whom for his entertainment they offered to giue the tenth part of their reuenues.

Then after that he had taken and sacked Carista, hee returned with his fleet to Naples loded with spoile: and hauing there made a reuiue of his forces, hee did by his bounty highly please and content his soldiers. And vpon intelligence that the King of Spaines fleet, commanded by Gonsaluo Ferdinandes, came to aid the Venetians and was at Zant, hee sailed thitherward, and passing along by Iunca, hee caused Charles Contareno's head to be cut off vpon the Prow of his Galley, who commanding that Cattle for the Signory, which was exceeding strong, both by nature and art, had yeelded it to the enemy vpon the first summons, not being enforced by a seage.

*Samothrace
yeelded to the Venetians.*

Charles Contareno beheaded.

Beeing

Coron yields to the Turke
on compulsion.

Being come to Zante, hee there found Gonsaluo, with whom and the Spanish Captaines that were with him, hauing consulted vpon the affaires of warre, by their aduise and consent of the Prouidators, hee determined to goe and besiege Modon: But because they wanted store of vessels, they sent all their workemen, to Cephalonia (which a bounds in woods and Forrests,) to cut downe trees.

Whilst some were busied in cutting of wood, because they would not loose time, they resolved to besiege the towne of Cephalonia, because the Turkes should not say that two fleets vnited, durst not assaile them. This thus resolved, Pesare and Gonsaluo, caused Ordnance to bee brought from the shippes to batter the walls; and giuing euery man his charge, they were desirous to make tryall of the valour of those within the tower, who were in number three hundred.

The same day as they would haue begun the battery, there fell such flore of raine, as they were enforced to deferre it till some other time. The weather at last beeing faire, the Ordnance was planted against the walls, where after a breach made, an assault was giuen; but the enemies did with all sorts of weapons so valiantly defend themselves, as the towne could not be taken, so as our men were enforced to retire, and great numbers of them hurt. The Generalls thus repulsed, raised a mount higher then the enemies fortifications, from which they might easily see whatsoever was done in the city: and then gaue an other furious assault, where the Venetians and Spaniards so brauely behaued themselves, as they constrained the Turkes to retire into the Forte, who within a while after yielded to Gonsaluo, fearing the Venetians indignation whom they had so often deluded and offended.

During the siege of Cephalonia, the Castle of Iuncea returned to the Venetians, by meanes of one called Demetrius of Modon, who practised it with an Albanese, a friend of his, which was of the garde of the Castle: where killing fiftie Turkes that lay there in garrison, and enforcing the rest to leape ouer the walles, they became Maisters of the place, whether Pesare presently sent Ieronimo Pisani, the Prouidator with forces, and after him Siluestro Troni for Iudge. In this manner in a short space they tooke Cephalonia and Iuncea. Gonsaluo who had already made warre at sea many moneths, perceiuing that Pesare deferred the siege of Modon till some other fitt time, and that the enemies had strongly fortified it since the recovery of Iuncea, returned into Sicily. Pesare presented him with fife hundred peeces of Malmsey, and seuentie thousand weight of sweet meates of all sorts, which the Senate had sent him from Venice.

Pesare, aduertised that the enemy had made certaine Galleys at Preueze, and that some of them were already lanchd, sayled thether with foure-teen well armed Galleys, and drew them thence, notwithstanding all the enemies resistance, and directed his course to Corfou, there to trimme his vessels, and to reuiue his fleet. The Senate in the meane time recompensed those who had well deferred in that warre, as well those that were liuing, as their heires that were dead. The Precedent year, the state had sent an Ambassador to Ladislaus King of Hungary, to moue him to warre vpon the Turke, who after a long discourse, did in the Senates name make a league and confederacie with him, by which the King was bound, to make warre on the Turke with his whole force, and the Venetians to giue the King yearly, at three distinct times, three thousand pounds of gold. The Pope would needs make one in this treatie of peace, and sent a Cardinall thither for his Legate, promising for three yeares space, to giue foure hundred pounds of gold yearly to the same King. Pesare hauing repaired his fleet, determined to burne the Turkish Galleys

Leaguee-twixt the Venetians and King of Hungary against
the Turke.

Galleys at the mouth of the riuer Bojan: but this enterprize tooke none effect because that the Turkes had intelligence of it, who fearing the like danger as at Preueze, with-drew their vessels foureene miles vp the riuer from lea. The Turke at the same time recovered the Castle of Iuncea.

Pesari returning to Corfou had intelligence that the enemies Galleys vpon the riuer Bojan would shortly come forth, hee sent certaine of his Galleys thither to keepe them in; himselfe in the meane time with the rest of the fleet consisting of fife and twenty Gallies: returned into Morea, where from the confines of Coron, hee laded his Gallies with great numbers of men, women and young children, carrying them into Cephalonia desolute of inhabitants. From thence hee returned to Corfou, expecting the French King, and King of Portugall's fleet.

Whilst these things were done abroad, Prince Angustino Barbado dyed at home, hauing governed the Common-wealth fiteene yeares: and in his place, according to the vsuall manner, Leonardo Loredano, a man wise and noble, was chosen.

The Thirteenth Siege of Iuncea.

The first great Councell held after he was made Prince, Benedetto Pesare, Captaine General of the fleet, was made Procurator of Saint Mark in steed of Philippo Troni, who was newly dead. In his time the French Fleet went to ayde the Venetians against the Turke, the like did that of Portugall, according to both those Kings promises, but they came not both at one time, nor to one place, for that of Portugall went to Corfou, and the French to Zant, and yet neither the one or other did any great seruice to the State, which hauing long time maintained warre against the Turke, alone of it selfe, and in the company of the King of Hungary, did at last make peace when it least so thought thereof.

The French &
Portugall fleets aid the Venetians against the Turke.

For those beeing redeemed, who at the beginning of the warre were imprisoned at Constantinople, Andre Gritti was one of the number, who returning to Venice, was by his Countrey-men kindly welcomed home. He brought letters to the Senate from Achmet, one of Baziasets chiefe Captaines, which contained,

Ccc

that

that if they were desirous to end the warre they should send one to Constantinople to treat of the conditions of peace, and that hee would bee their friend.

The Senate vpon these letters sent word to Pesare to dissolue the fleet, twenty Gallies excepted which he should keepe with him, and wrote to Ladislaus King of Hungary, (sending him Achmet's letters) that they determined to send an Agent to Constantinople, intreating him to doe the like, to the end peace might be made with more honor. Ladislaus vnderstanding the Senates determination did highly commend it, and promised to grant what they demanded: But the King prolonged the matter, because if the Senate made peace with the Turke, vnles there were some new agreement betwixt them, he should be deprived of the yearly sum which the Signory gaue him: wherevpon the Venetian Ambassadors that were in Hungary fearing to prolong the treaty with the Turke, granted that the three thousand pounds of gold which they paid him yearly towards the war, should (if peace were made) be reduced to three hundred pounds of gold so long as Baiazeth lived.

In the mean time Baiazeth made peace with the Sophi, & therby finding himselfe more free to continue warre against the Venetians, grew haughty, and told Achmet that he would not haue peace with the Venetians, except they would redeliver the Isle of Saint Maur which not long before they had taken from him. The Senate aduertized thereof by Achmet's letters written to Gritti, and sent by an expresse messenger, vnwilling any longer to consume them selves in expence by continuing the warre, quitted that Island to Baiazeth, and made peace with him, reseruing the Isle of Cephalonia to themselves, in old time called Leucadia.

The Venetians were much troubled for that the King of Portugall forestalling their traffick, had appropriated vnto himselfe the trade for spices, which their vessels and Marchants bringing from Alexandria, did with mercuriall profit vent into all places of Christendome: For the Portugalls going by Sea into those remote partes, and in the Indian Sea insinuating themselves into the freindship of the Kings of Calicut, and other lands their neighbors, haue gotten to themselves the Commerce for spices which the Alexandrian Marchants before were wont to haue: and bringing them home into Portugall, send them by sea into those places whether the Venetians vsed to trade.

But to returne to the Peace, the Senate commanded thanks to bee given to God: and three pounds of gold to be distributed to the Priests. Baiazeth sent an ambassador vnto whom the Prince should sweare to obserue the peace, as he had done to the Venetian Ambassador.

At the same time Lewis the French King, sent Iohn Laferis of Constantinople his Ambassador to the Venetians to request them to renew the league and Confederacy betwixt them: for he being enforced to make warre vpon Gonsalues Lieutenant Generall to the King of Spaine, who had defeated his Army in Calabria, was desirous to haue the Venetians take armes in his behalfe: and to induce them thereto propounded many faire conditions, but they refused to renew the Confederacy and also his offers, saying that they were satisfied with the old one. Pope Alexander in the mean time supping in a Garden neere to the Vatican with the Duke Valentinois his sonne, was on a sodaine carried thence for dead to his Pallace, whither his sonne was likewise carried sick like the father, and the day following the Pope dyed, black and swelled and very vgly: very euident signes of poyson, but the Duke his sonne, by reason of his youth, and presently taking diuers counterpoisons escaped, but was afflicted with a long and greuous disease. At the same time, Benedito Pesare Generall of the Venetian fleet, being ready to returne from Corsou to Venice fell sick of a Quintidian and there dyed.

In the place of the deceased Pope, Cardinall Picolomini of Syena was chosen, a man Noble and for his other qualities not vnworthy such a dignity, who to reuue the memory of his Vnckle Pius Secundus, intituled him selfe Pius the third: But the 26. day after his election he died, wherevpon the Cardinall of Saint Peter ad Vincula, mighty in reputation and wealth was chosen in his stead, and was called Iulius Secundus; thus did highly please the venetians: They presently appointed eight Senators to go as Ambassadors to him to congratulate his election, Antonia Iustiniana being one of them. At their arrivall in Rome, being brought to the Popes presence, hee louingly entertained, and embraced them, saying; that he was much bound to the state of Venice, and that he would deny them nothing in his power: Then entering into discourse concerning Duke Faustino, Iustinian told him, all men thought that his Holiness would aide and assist him: that he was desirous to haue the Townes and Castles which he held in Romagna to bee taken from him.

This saying of his did highly content the Venetian Senate, which aspired to the peaceable possession of the whole dominion of Romagna, and had presently after Pope Alexanders death sent forces to Rauenna, with which the City of Cesenna was on a sodaine in a night assaulted: but the people valiantly defending it; they were enforced to retire to Rauenna, being come thither without ordinance: yet this could not discourage them, but they espied all occasions to get footing in that Prouince; not long after a faire occasion was offered, by means of a controuersie betwixt Dionisius the noble, and the Faentines, who were desirous to repeale the Manfredi: This did Dionisius contradict, and in despite sent for the Venetians, vnto whome hee gaue the Castle of Val de Lamone which hee kept, in which the Venetians placed a strong Garrison, they did the like in the castle of Faenza, which the Capitaine, corrupted with money, deliuered vnto them.

They did like wise hold Forlimpopoli and Rimini by the peoples consent, recompensing Pandolfo Malatesta in an other Prouince: then they went and besieged Faenza, because that the Faentines, nothing terrified with the losse of their Castle, which, seated in a low place, they had diuided from the City by a deepe ditch, made valliant resistance, as well for their loue towards the Manfredi, as prouoked there vnto by the Florentines, who feared nothing more, then to suffer Faenza to be the Venetians: And to these ends employed the aid and credit of Cardinall Francisco Sanderini their country-man, to make the new Pope grow jealous of the Venetians, who one day talking with his Holiness told him that the Venetians did already possesse the Castle of Faenza, and all places neere the City, the which they shortly hoped to winne; not so much to take from the Valentinis that which he vnjustly possessed by vsurpation, as to appropriate it to themselves. And that their custome was, neuer to restore any thing they held: That Faenza being a territory belonging to the Church, the Pope could doe no lesse then to take it into his owne Protection.

The Venetians being aduertized of this discourse of the Cardinall, Iustinian went to the Pope to excuse the state, and to entreat him not to giue credit to their enemies tales: and after a long discourse there-vpon made, the Pope replied, that hee had neuer beleueed any thing against them, being well assured of their loue and friendship to ward him, as they of his: But for that which concerned Valentinis state, he could haue wished that what-so-euer did belong to the Church might haue first bene surrendered vp, with this answer the Ambassador tooke his leaue.

The Venetians notwithstanding all this continued the siege of Faenza, and beginning their battery, the besieged, despairing of all aid, yielded, the venetians hauing agreed to giue Astor a small pension to liue by. They could as easily haue taken Imola and Furlibut they determined as then to passe on no farther, because they would not incense the Pope: where vpon they sent their forces to Garrison, having,

C c c

having beside Faenza and Rimini taken diuers townes in Romagna. At the same time Andre Grizzi returned from his Ambassade of Constantinople, where hee had confirmed certaine Articles of Peace with the Turke, to the profit of the Signory. Not long after, Iustinian acquainted the Senate that the Pope had given the Valentinois leaue to goe and recover his State. These newes caused them to write to the Prouidators that were in Romagna, to vse meanes to take whatsoeuer might be for the profit of the State, from Duke Valentinois: by meanes whereof Tossignana and Meldola two strong townes, did vpon the first summons yeeld to the Venetians.

Tossignana and Meldola yeelded.

The Popes letters to the Venetians.

Their answer

The Pope much incensed against them for this manner of proceeding, sent Angelo Bishop of Triuoli to Venice, to reprehend them for that they had taken Faenza and Rimini which belonged to the Church, which he craued to haue surrendered to him, intreating them likewise to aid him to recover the rest; he being resolu'd to leaue the Valentinois nothing, yet he would haue whatsoeuer should be taken, to be restored to the right owners. The Senate, displeased with the Popes demands, answered, that they did neuer expect this from him; in regard of their long friendship confirmed by many reciprocall good offices; especially, because they knew he had no interest therein: that they had embraced the offered occasion to leaze on Faenza and the rest, those townes being not posselt by the Church, which in open Consistory had disclaimed all her right therein and transferred it to Duke Valentinois: As also, for that the precedent Popes did neuer posselt those territories, but from time to time, had given them to new Tenants without any other acknowledgement of superiority then the rent, which they offered presently to pay. Lastly they besought him, that being Pope he would continue towards the Venetian Signory the same freindship which he had euer born them being Cardinall, and that in so doing he might make vse of their men, force and meanes as themselves.

Such was the Senates answer to the Bishop of Triuoli the Popes Nuncio. But the Pope continuing his resolution, and knowing his owne forces to weake to inuade them, sayd, that he would craue the aid and assistance of forraigne Princes. Iustinian did put him in mind that the Signory of Venice had done nothing but by his counsell and aduice being Cardinall; wherevnto he replied, let them first surrender Tossignan which belongs to the territory of Imola to me, and then afterwards I may chance to do somewhat concerning Faenza and Rimini; heereof Iustinian aduertised the Senate, who whilst they were assembled to determine thereof the Bishop of Triuoli arriued with letters from the Pope, whereby hee tooke from them all hope of agreement with him, vnlesse they did deliuer vnto him those Townes they had taken, saying, that to those ends, hee would implore the aid of God and men, threatening, if they did it not, to doe his worst against them.

The Bishop of Triuoli comes against to Venice from the Pope

The Venetians send Ambassadors to the Emperor Maximilian and the French King.

The Senators were greatly troubled and incensed with these letters, but more against the Bishop then Pope, whom they thought had incensed his Holinesse against them. This discontent was accompanied by an other: for the Pope had sent an Ambassador to the French King by whom complaining of the Venetians, he craued aid and assistance against them, requesting him to enter into league and Confederacy with himselfe, and Maximilian, called to be a third man against them. This being knowne at Venice, the Senate presently sent Ambassadors to those two Princes, to let them vnderstand that the Signory had taken nothing from the Pope, but only Faenza and Rimini from a wicked man, fearing least the Florentines, their enemies by reason of Pisa, should seaze on them as they had determined, having already sent forces thither: That they had recompensed those that kept them, giuing them other Townes in exchange. That those two Cities with their dependances were wont to be given to new Tenants, before Valentinois had them; and the Senate demanding them in that nature, the Church

Church could lay no claime to them, so as they payed the vsuall Rent, but on the contrary ought to bee content therewith, because they could not fall into the hands of any, that were better able to defend and keepe them then the Venetians: That the Pope had bene the Author and motiue of the Signories taking of Romagna from Valentinois, and now changing his opinion did causelesse seeke all meanes to expulie them thence. And therefore the State of Venice did earnestly intreat King Lewis, not for that regard to infringe the league made with them; and Maximilian in like manner, that he would rather side and assist the Signory, as a good friend and neighbour, in so iust and reasonable a matter, then the Pope who craued a thing wholly vnreasonable.

Their remonstrances being kindly entertained by both these Princes, they promised to debate the matter with his Holinesse. This answer did in some sort satisfie the Senat. Count Petellan at the same time, being on great promises entreated by diuers Kings and Princes to serue them, would neuer forsake the Signory. In acknowledgement whereof, the state of Venice made him Generall of their Army for three yeares, with a yearly annuity of five hundred pounds of gold.

20

The end of the sixth Booke of the fourth Decade of the History of Venice.

FINIS.

THE SECOND VOLUME OF THE GENERALL HISTO-RY OF VENICE.

Aaaa

The

REPRODUCED FROM THE COPY IN THE
HENRY E. HUNTINGTON LIBRARY

FOR REFERENCE ONLY. NOT FOR REPRODUCTION

The Contents of the seventh Booke of the fourth Decade.

He Emperor entreateth the Venetians to deliuer the Cities of Faenza and Rimini to the Pope. Lewis the French King maketh the same request to them. The Emperor craues leaue of the Venetians to passe in armes thorow their state to Rome to his Coronation, which they deny. John Paul Baillon restoreth Perugia with her territory to the Pope. Bologna is yeelded in the same manner to the Pope by the Bentiuolies. The King comes into Italy, by reason of the revolt of Genoa. The Pope doth greatly suspect and distrust the French King. Enteruiew of the Kings of France and Arragon at Sauona. The Emperour performeth bad offices in Germany toward the French King. How the report of the Emperours comming downe into Italy did trouble the Venetians. The Emperour commeth into Italy, and returneth sodainly into Germany. The Almains are defeated in the vale of Cadora. The Venetians take the town of Goritia. The conclusion of the truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians did breed some discontent betwixt the King and them. Confederacy sworne at Cambray against the Venetians, by the Pope, the Emperour Maximilian, and the Kings of France and Arragon. The Venetians make great warlike preparations against this confederacy. The Pope casteth a terrible excommunication on the Venetians. The Kings army and that of the Venetians very neere together. The Venetians are defeated by the French in the Countrey of Giradade. The great progression of the French army ouer Italy after the Battaille. All Romagna in a manner is yeelded to the Pope. Lastly the Venetians resolving to quit the firme land, doe leaue Padua, Verona, and all the other Cities appointed to the Emperour.

The

The seventh Booke of the fourth Decad of the History of Venice.

MAXIMILLIAN, forgetting the promise which he first made to the Venetians to debate their cause before the Pope, sent two Ambassadors to Venice to entreate them to yeld Faenza & Rimini to him. That it belonged to him to make that request, as Protector of Holy Church and of whatsoever appertained thereunto. If they thought it an vnreasonable matter, they should referre it to arbitrement: That he would labour to cause the Pope to condescendingly accept thereof; and that if they would choose him for their vmpier, he would willingly accept thereof; and would giue sentence according to equity. The Senats answer with that of the Great Coucel to these Ambassadors was, (having reiterated all that which their Ambassadors had first of all declared to the Emperour from the Senate) that their right to those lands being so plaine and euident, they would not put it to compromise. Vpon this answer one of the Ambassadors departed from Venice to Rome, the other stayed there, whose expences were defraied by the State.

In the meane time a league and confederacy was made betweene the Emperour Maximilian and the French King, after long strife and disputation of their Ambassadors. This league being concluded, King Lewis sent againe John La Garis of Constantinople his Ambassador to Venice, to entreate them to seeke all possible meanes of agreement with the Pope: for that being done, they were determined to ioyne altogether against the Turke. He added that his King had sworn league and friendship with Maximilian, not to hurt any man, but only for the safety and preleruation of each others State.

The Senate, who had already decreed that the Ambassadors should haue a pound weight of gold giuen him every month towards his expences, made answer, that they had omitted nothing, either by entreaty or promises to giue the Pope satisfaction, having not long before made him this offer, that al-be-it Pope Alexander had giuen Faenza and the other lands to the Valentinois free from all conditions, they were content neuerthelesse to hold Faenza and Rimini of the Church, on what conditions and rent it pleased, promising to make true payment every yeere, but this would not be accepted of: That they were exceeding glad that two such great Princes, had conuerted their hatred and contention into a found and firme league & friendship. But because it was specified in the contract betwixt King Lewis and them, that neither of them two might make alliance with any other Prince whatsoever, without the consent of his fellow, they did willingly desire to know, why his King had not first aduertized them thereof.

At this demand the Ambassador made some little pause, then he answered that he knew nothing of it: yet neuerthelesse it was mentioned in the treaty, that each of them might within foure months space name a fellow whom he would, whereupon it was lawfull for his King to name the Signory of Venice.

The Ambassadors answer did not greatly content the Senate, and could not hinder regulation.

The Venetians

hinder them from suspecting this league contracted without their knowledge. Whereupon they thought it most expedient to trie if they could appease the Pope, vnto whom certaine months before, they had offered to deliuer vnto him Rimini, and withall that which they had possessed in Romagna since Pope Alexander his death, provided that he would be content, that they might still retain Faenza with her Territory. This was for feare of the French King, and likewise because the Emperour, at the Popes request, had sent an Ambassadour vnto them, to will them to make restitution of the lands belonging to the Church, as hath beene said.

The Popes answer to the Venetians offer.

But the Pope hauing given them this resolute answer, that he would not in any fort consent to the with-holding of one onely towre: and threatening them to recouer yet before he died Rauenna, and Ceruia, which they possessed as wrongfully as they did Faenza, they passed on no farther at that time. But their feare being increased, by reason of this new confederacy betwixt the Emperour and the French King, they offered by the means of the Duke of Vrbin, a friend to both sides, to deliuer vp all that which they possessed (the appurtenances of Faenza and Rimini excepted) if the Pope would giue admittance to their Ambassadors to come and make the oth of obedience, wherevnto in time before he would not consent. The Pope inclined to this proposition made by the Duke of Vrbin (though vnwillingly) in regard he had so highly threatened them, for hee perceived the affaires betwixt the Emperour and the French King to be drawne out at length, and that in the meane time those of Furlie, Imola, and Cefenna, did indure many discomforts.

Agreement betwixt the Pope
and the Venetians.

Vpon this consent, that which they had offered being re-delivered, the Senate sent their Ambassadors, who after they had protested obedience with the accustomed ceremonies, they brought home with them to Venice no signe whereby it might be perceived that he was become any whit the milder. In the meane space the Pope perceiuing well enough that without the French Kings aide he could not hurt the Venetians, and that he could not as yet induce him to make warre vpon them, to the end his Popedom should not be spent vnprofitably or without honour, he turned his thoughts else-where, and entreated the French King to helpe him to reduce vnder the Churches obedience the Cities of Bologna and Perugia, the which in all ages did belong to the Sea of Rome, and were possessed the one by John Paul Bailion, and the other by John Bentiuogio whose predecessors hauing vsurped them, were become absolute Lords thereof.

The Popes request to the
French King.

The Popes request was very pleasing to the King, because thereby hee might finde meanes to keepe his friendship, from which he was in some sort estranged, in regard of the Kings alliance with the Venetians, which did much trouble him. Wherevpon because he would not disappoint him, he offered him all aide and succour: and the Pope on the other side gaue him the breefes of Cardinalship for the Bishops of Achy, and Bayeux, with authority to dispose of the benefices of the Dutchy of Milan. The execution of this enterprise was delayed, by reason of the iourney which Maximilian desired to make into Italy with his army, to receiue his Imperial crowne at Rome, wherein he being desirous not to be hindered by the Venetians, hee sent foure Ambassadors to acquaint them with his intent, and to intreate them to grant a passage for him and his army likewise, assuring them that he would passe thorough their territories without disturbing them in any fort, being desirous likewise to vnite himselfe with them.

The Emperours
answer to the
Venetians.

The Venetians
answer to the Emperour.

The Venetians hauing a long time consulted therevpon, made him a pleasant answer: for after they had giuen him to vnderstand how much they desired to conforme themselves to his will, they counselled him to come into Italy without armes, especially comming for so peaceable a matter which was pleasing to all men, where on the contrary comming in armes, Italy desparing for so many calamities which it had sustained, would rise, determining to take armes, and not to lay

lay open a way to new troubles: and that the French King might doe the like for assurance of the state of Millan.

The determination of Maximilian caused the Pope to deferre his enterprise till an other time, being perswaded therevnto by the King, who was vrged of his promise about that business, least they by reason of that accident of Italy should rise in armes: as also because he feared to prouoke the Venetians, who had sent him word, that they would take armes for the defence of Bologna, if the Pope did not first giue ouer to them the right to Faenza which did belong to the Church.

But the Pope being by nature fadaine and impatient, would not temporize, but sought all meanes to effect his purpose after a furious manner. And without staying for any other resolution, he departed from Rome with five hundred men at armes, where fortune did so fauour him, as John Paul Bailion, by the Duke of Urbins perswasion, went to him to Oruietta, where he was receiued into fauour, hauing wholly referred himselfe to the Popes discretion and deliuered into his hands the castles of Perugia and the territory therevnto belonging, into which he afterwards entred. Then marching towards Bologna, being attended on by six hundred French Launces, and three thousand footmen of the Kings forces, he went by the way of the mountaine, because he would not come vpon the territory of Rimini which the Venetians held, and being come to Cefenna, he commanded Bentiuoglio to depart from Bologna on paine of most greuous censures both spirituall and temporall.

John Paul Bailion, who deliuered up Perugia and his territory to the Pope.

The Pope threatneth the Bentiuoglio.

The Bentiuoglio had made great preparations for their owne defence, but all their hope was turned to dispaire, so soone as they heard of the French mens arrivall in the Popes army, and much more when the Lord of Chaumont, who conducted them, did tell them the same day that hee arrived at Castell-nouo on the Bolognians territory, that the King being willing to obserue whatsoever he was tied vnto, by the capitulations of the protection, did meane to continue him in the possession of his goods, so that he would leaue the Government of the City to the Church. At these words Bentiuoglio and his children, who before, with great threatnings had published euery where that they would defend themselves, being wholly discouraged made answer, that they would altogether referre themselves to his arbitrement, beseeching him by all meanes to mediate tollerable conditions. Vpon this answer the Lord of Chaumont being come within three miles nere to Bologna, delt so with the Pope, as he gaue him leaue safely to depart from Bologna with his wife and children, and to dwell in what place of the Dutchy of Milan he pleased, permitting him to sell and carry away with him all his mouables, and to enjoy the immouables which he possessed with iust title.

The Bentiuoglio being discouraged, submit to the Pope.

The Bentiuoglio being departed, the people of Bologna sent their Ambassadors to the Pope for to giue him the entire government of their City. At the same time the King of Arragon being imbarcked at Barcelona came along by the coast of Prouence to Genoa, and from thence keeping close by the land continuing his iourney he entred into the Hauens of Gayetta. Then being conducted to Naples, he was receiued with great magnificence. Ambassadors from all places of Italy came thither with speed, and among others from Venice, whither George Pagan and Marc Dandolo were sent to congratulate and honour so great a Prince.

Bologna sends to the Pope.

The King of Arragon cometh into the Realme of Naples.

The Pope likewise, notwithstanding that he was displeased for that he had not sent to offer his obedience as the manner was, sent a Nuntio to him to incite him against the Venetians, thinking that for the recovery of the Hauens of Apuglia, which the Venetians held, he had wished their overthrow: And the Venetians on the contrary did still study to keepe his friendship.

Soone after King Lewis came into Italy, by reason of the rebellion of Genoa, the Venetians sent Dominico Trevisano, and Paul Pisani their Ambassadors to him to congratulate his arrivall, who came to Milan, whether the king came so soone as he had recovered Genoa.

Lewis the French King cometh into Italy.

The great hatred which the Pope did bear to the Venetians.

1557

A brief relation of the Pope concerning the King.

The false reports which the Pope threw abroad against the King.

Interview of King of France and Arragon at Savona.

The Pope being at Bologna, had solicited the King to come into Italy, that they might confer together, whereunto the King did incline, albeit the Popes intents were against the Venetians, whom he hated in regard of the Cities of Romagna which they possessed. But when he understood that the King determined to take arms in favour of the Gentlemen against the people of Genoa (because the strife betwixt the Gentlemen and the Commons had bene cause of the rebellion) he was much discontented thereat, because he had ever favoured the people against the Nobility, and he perswaded the King as much as in him lay to abstaine from armes, alleging that it might kindle some fire in Italy, which would hinder the warre which they had decreed against the Venetians. To the which, perceiving the King would not agree, being transported with cholles, he gave out on a souldain at the beginning of the years 1557, contrary to all mens expectation, that he would returne to Rome, saying that the aile of Bologna did not agree with his health; whereupon the King was troubled, not knowing what to thinke, because he interrupted that which himselfe had craved, and did all he could to alter his determination. But the Kings earnest instance to change his minde did encrease the Popes suspicion, which he had conceived that the King would keepe him still there, where they might meet together at one selfe same place, which did so much the more confirme him in his determination, wherein being obstinate, he departed from Bologna about the latter end of February, being not able to dissemble the disdain which he had conceived of the King.

By this wrath, shewd which he did beare to the Venetians being in some sort mitigated, hee determined to passe by the City of Faenza, new quarrels arising every houre betwixt the King and him, in regard of the Bentivoles, whom he would have the King to expell from the Duchy of Milan, albeit by his owne consent they were permitted to abide there, in such sort as nothing could appeale him, complaining grievously of the King; and being thereby provoked, he did by his Nuncios and by a Breafe, give the Emperour, and the Electors to the Empire, to understand, that the French Kings preparations for his passage into Italy, with a mighty army, vnder pretence to appeale the sedition of Genoa, was in effect to oppress the state of the Church, and to usurpe the Imperiall dignity.

The Venetians likewise fearing the Kings coming into Italy with so great an army, did give the like advertizement; Maximilian being desirous of novelty, having received these advertizements, held an Imperiall Diet in the City of Constance where all the Barons, Princes and Common-wealths of Germany being assembled, he did in such sort aggravate the matter against the French King by his oration, as the mindes of all those that were there present, were mercifully mooved, where he exhibited the Popes and Venetians letters of advertizement.

The French King having intelligence of the whole matter, did on a sodaine cather his army, to take away the cause of such a suspicion, and would himselfe have passed the mounts, had not the desire which he had to speake with the King of Arragon staid him, who was preparing for his returne into Spaine, and leaving Naples came directly to Savona, where he had appointed to conferre with the French King, who for that cause was come from Milan to attend him there: where Fernand with the Queene his wife being arrived, all distrusts being laied aside on both parts, with infinite numbers of reciprocal embrassings they had diuers long and secret conferences betwixt themselves, and by that which fell out afterward, it was apparent, that they promised a perpetual league of friendship one with the other, and that Fernand should use means to reconcile the Emperour and the French King, to the end that all of them being united together, they might afterward shew themselves open enemies to the Venetians.

The two Kings departed from Savona the fourth day after their arrival, with the same shewes of loue and friendship. The one went by sea to Barcelona; and the

the other by land returned into France, leaving the other affaires of Italy at the same stay. King Lewis in the meane time perceiving that the Diet of Constance continued, where Maximilian had to highly animated all the German Princes against him, he feared vnder hand certain men of purpose to Constance, who should not be publicly knowne, but dealing secretly, should worke means, by the hidden fauour of the Princes his friends, to appeale the mindes of the rest, excusing those slander which were imputed vpon him, by the euidence of the effects, seeing that after the reduction of Genoa to his obedience, he had on a sodaine cathered his army, and returned with all possible speed into France, to take away all suspicion that he would attempt nothing against the Church, nor against the title of the sacred Empire, and with these iustificacions they wrought means to appeale the Germans armes, by the force of gold which they so highly loue.

These things did greatly trouble the French Kings minde, who was altogether vn certaine of the Venetians meanings, who would not openly discover themselves but had ever held matters in suspense. The Diet of Constance being ended it was there concluded, after sundry disputations, that Maximilian should haue for his passage into Italy eight thousand horse, and two and twenty thousand footmen, paid by the Country for fixe months; and fixe score thousand Florins of the Rhyne for the expence of the Artillery and other ordinary charges. Vpon the report of these newes the Venetians were greatly perplexed in their mindes as well as others, because they knew not whereon to resolve, in regard of the great means which every one of them vied to winne them to his side. The Emperour at the beginning sent three Ambassadors of great place to them; to intreat them to giue him passage thorow their territories, and to make a more strict alliance with him, wherein should be mentioned that they should be participants of the reward of the victory. The French King on the other side did not cease by his Ambassadors, and by that of Venice, which was resident with him, to doe all he might to induce them to oppose themselves by armes against the Emperors comming; as hurtfull to either of them, offering them for this purpose all his forces, and to continue for euer their confederates.

The Venetians who could haue bene well contented to haue lined at quiet as Newters, perceived themselves to be in such sort pressed by the Emperour, as they were of necessity either to refuse it, or to grant him passage. For they feared, that by their refusal they should be troubled first, and by granting it, they should ensting their confederacy with the King. And yet neuerthelesse, each of the Senators did affirme that it was necessary openly to adhere to one of the sides, but they knew not to which, and after great diuersity of opinions, the remembrance at last of the Emperors continuall inclination, to recover the Cities which they possessed, which he pretended to belong to the Empire, or to the house of Austria did most preuaile.

They made answer then to the Ambassadors, that their determination was to grant him passage comming without an army, and to stop if he came in armes; saying that necessity enforced them so to doe, in regard of their confederacy with the French King, by which they were bound to assist him in the defence of the Duchy of Milan, with a certaine number of men specified therein.

Maximilian being frustrate of his hope to haue the Venetians on his side, was incombred with other doubts which did wholly delay the effect of his desires. For first of all, That foundation whereon he chiefly builded; that the Cities and Potentates of Italy, fearing his name and army, would come to composition, and would furnish him with sufficient summes of money, did daily decay. Then the conclusions of the Diet of Constance vanished into ayre, when they perceived the great preparations of the French King, and the new resolution of the Venetians.

The Pope likewise, who would not shew himselfe more affectionate to the one side

Advertizement to the Princes of Germany to deter the French King.

What was concluded in the Diet of Constance.

The Venetians greatly perplexed.

The Venetians refuse answer to the Emperors Ambassadors.

The Emperour sheweth him selfe frustrate of his hopes.

The Popere-
fect the Em-perors request.

side then the other, did refuse the demand he made that it might be lawfull for him to take a hundred thousand ducats which were leauied in Germany for the warre against the Turkes and were kept in the same Prouince, and were not to be converted to any other vse without the Leauie of the Sea of Rome: Yet neuerthelesse in the middelt of all these difficulties, he forgate nothing which might nourish the report of his comming downe, in such sort as all those who stood in awe of him made mighty provisions in diuers places, but they were vncertaine, with what forces, at what time, and from whence he would come.

The great preparations of King Lewis the first Venetians to stop the Em-perors passage.

The French King had provided for the Duchy of Milan, and for the frontiers of Burgundy: And had besides sent John James Trinuice with foure hundred French 10 Launces, and foure thousand footmen to Verona to the Venetians aide, who had sent the Earle of Petillan to Rouero, with foure hundred men at armes, and store of foot-forces, to the end there to keepe backe those which should come by Trent, and Bartolomeu Aluiana into the Friul with eight hundred men at armes.

The Emperor
summons those of Verona to submit passage.

The Emperour at the beginning of the yeere 1508. was desirous to put in execution the reports which had beene spread abroad of his comming downe, and sent an Herald to Verona to summon the inhabitants to provide lodging for himselfe, and for foure thousand horse which he brought with him, going to Rome to take the Imperiall crowne. The Gouvernor of the City, by the aduice of the Senate, with whom the matter was communicated at Venice, made him an- 20 swere, that for his coronation which he mentioned he needed not so many men at armes and such store of Artillery.

The Emperor
commeth towards Vincen-za and on a so-daine returne into Germany.

Maximilian vpon this answer being already come to Trent departed thence in a morning before day with fiftene hundred horse, and foure thousand footmen, not of those which had beene graunted him at Constance, but of those of his Court, and of his owne State, and tooke the way of the mountaines towards Vincenza. And the Marquis of Brandenbourg marched at the same time towards Rouero with five hundred horse and two thousand foot-men, but he returned the next day, not being able to obaine any passage. The Emperour by the way of the mountaines being come within twelue miles of Vincenza, and hauing taken 30 the territory of the seuen Commons, did on a sodaine returne towards Bollane which is a towne farther off from the confines of Italy then Trent, whereat all men did greatly wonder.

The Venetians
great preparations.

This did awake the Venetians courage, did incite them to leauy diuers foot-roupes, and to make great preparations, vrging the French King to doe the like. They chose two Prouidatori, Andre Gritti & George Cornare, one of whom went towards the Rheticke, and the other into Friul. Aluiana was commanded speedily into Friul where George Cornare the Prouidator already was, because foure hundred of Maximilians horse and five thousand of his footmen being comethither and entred into the vale of Cadora, had taken the Burrough and 40 the Castle.

Aluiana hauing passed the mountaines full of snow, came in two daies neere to Cadora, where tarrying for his footmen that came after him; hee seized on a passage, which was not kept by the Germans, by which men enter into that valley. The comming of Aluiana did encourage those of the Country who did affect the Venetians, who sodainly did possesse the other passages of the valey, by which the enemies were to retire. The Germans perceiving themselves to bee shutt in, and that no hope of safety was left them but in their armes, they came with great furie to assaile Aluiana, who did brauely receive them, the fight lasted certaine houres with great feruency, but at the last the Germans being not able to resist the numbers not pro- 50 uesse of their enemies, were defeated, and aboue a thousand of them laye dead on the place, with diuers of them taken prisoners: of the Venetians verie few died.

Before

Before this exploite of warre, the Emperour had sent Luke de Renaldi his Ambassador to Venice, to entreat the Senators to grant him passage thorow their territories, as hee had often-times before requested them, that hee might goe to Rome, saying that his King would come armed for feare of his enemies. Neuerthelesse hee did assure the Signory of Venice, that hee and his would passe without dooing wrong to any of their subiects, or else that hee would passe without Armes, provided that the common-wealth would giue him hostages for the assurance of this passage. To that, Prince Lorezano answered, that Maximilian was not ignorant, how that the Common-wealth had euer beene a friend to him and 10 to his father the Emperour Fraderick, and that it was not well done of him in counterchange, to vse all hostile actions against them, as to rauage and spoile their country, to take their townes and castles by force, whereof they had iust cause to complaine, and to call God to witnesse, whether they had deserued it at his hands: neuerthelesse hee would propound the demand to the Senate, and according to the same, he would giue him answer.

And because Cornare had written to the Senate, that the enemies should in short space recompence the wrongs and spoiles which they had committed, the Senate was of opinion to deferre the answering of Maximilians Ambassadors, till such time 20 as they had newes from Friul. And so soone as they heard from thence, they answered the Ambassador as they had done in times before, without making any mention of the defeat of the Almans, and caused him to bee accompanied thorow the Rhetike country, to the end he should receiue no out-rage.

Aluiana after the taking of the castle of Cadora would not stand still in so faire away, but pursuing his good fortune, recovered Portonauoue, then Cremoula seated on a high hill, and from thence went and encamped before Gorithia, which is at the foote of the Alpes, strong by situation, and well fortified, and which hath a castle of difficult access. But hauing planted his Artillery before the towne, hee 30 tooke it the fourth day after by composition, by reason that they within wanted Armor, water, and victuals. The Captaine of the castle yelded vp the place in few dayes after, receiuing foure thousand Ducats. The Venetians made diuerse fortifications there, to serue in time to come against the Turkes, to stop their passage ouer the riuer Lisona.

Aluiana after the taking of Gorithia, went to besiege Thyrseste, and tooke it with the Castle likewise, which being seated on the Gulphe of Venice, was very commodious to them for their traffick: wherevpon the Venetians beeing puffed vp with their prosperous successe, determined to follow the course of the victory, and to make warre on Maximilian, by entring farther into his country: But Dominico Morosino, Procurator of Saint Marke, a man of foure-score and ten yeares 40 of age, wise and aduised, began to speake and to entreate the Senate, not to suffer any farther attempts to bee made, saying "That Germany was not pleased that Maximilian made warre on the common-wealth, when as hee might freely liue at peace: that it was also to bee feared, that the same Germany would take it in euill part, and would resent it, if any farther roads were made into their country, for they would not suffer their Imperiall dignity to be so abased and contemned. That the offence which he had committed against the common-wealth was not great, for which neuerthelesse thorow the goodnesse of God, he had made a worthy satisfaction, all his souldiers hauing beene cut in peeces in Friul, Cadora, and Portonauoue being recouered, and wee haue lost nothing on the Verona 50 territory, nor receiued any disgrace. And heerevith beeing satisfied without passing on any farther, we shall receiue great profit by our cessation from Armes, and especially the friendship and good-will of the whole German Nation, of whom wee receiue infinite commodities, as well for the trade of merchandize, whereby our customes are encreased, as for all other matters concerning proui-sion "

The Emperor
reiterates his Ambassador to the Venetians
for passage.

The Senate
answer to the Emperors Ambassador.

Aluiana his exploits in Friul.

An old man speech to the Senate.

“ fion of victuals. That it was indeed a glorious matter to vanquish a mans ene“ mies in warre, and to augment their owne bounds and confines: But that it was “ more glorious to tame and vanquish a mans owne passions and himselfe: that the “ cuments of warre depended commonly on fortune, who is variable and inconstant:
 “ But Councells proceeding from mature deliberation and from wisdom are “ firme and stable and do profit much more than those which issue from furious “ rashnesse.

The good old man having vttered this speech, the heate of those who craued warre was in some sort cooled; and therefore they concluded nothing for that present; but said only they would consider of it at more leisure. But Maximilian continuing the warre in the confines beneath Verona, and raising forces in diuers places of the Friul against them, thereby abusing their loue, warre was resolved against him on the fourth of April. This resolution of the Senate was on a solemn sent not only to Griffi & Cornaro Prouidatour, but likewise to Ieronimo Contar-ien who was Prouidatour in Histria with certaine Galleis, to the end that each of them should enuade wharsoeuer they found to belong to Maximilian, either on the firme land or at Sea. According to this commandement Cornaro, and Aluiano, pursuing their victory tooke Protonoue, then Fume which is a City of Sclauo-nia; which they burnt; and passing ouer the Alpes they tooke Possonia seated on the marches of Hungary: This was done in the Friul, whilst not farre from Trent the Germane Army which was come to Calliana did assaile three thousand Venetian footmen, who being well fortified on the hill of Bretonic fled thence neuertheless so soone as they descried the enemies, wheruppon the Germans deriding their cowardize, did raze the fortifications which they had made on the hill, burning the houses and then went back to Calliana.

But this great army of Maximilian, within a short space came to nothing, by reason of a contention of small importance which arose about the payment of the Grifons, who mutining therefore did spoile the victuals of the Campe: by meanes whereof all things being in disorder, and all the Grifons being departed, the residue of the Army, who were about seven thousand men, were enforced to retire. The Venetians then made incursions on the neighbor Villages, and came and assailed La Pietra, six miles from Trent: but those of Trent comming to their rescue the Venetian companies retired, and went to assaile the Fort of Cresse, which is a place of importance, which yielded before the supplies from Trent arriued, which caused the Almains to re-assemble their foot forces, and to returne with a thousand horses and six thousand Lanquenets to Calliana which is distant from La Pietra a crosbow shotte.

The Venetians returned to beseege this Castle of La Pietra with foure thousand horse and sixteene thousand foote, determining to batter it with sixteen peices of Ordinance: The two armies were within a mile one of another, each of them having the Castle before them. But the Venetians hauing lost diuers of their men there, with two peices of ordinance which the Almains tooke from them in a skay, thinking it lost time to tarry there any longer, seeing they could not enforce the enemies to fight they went to Rouero, and the Almains to Trent, the most parte of whom within a while after disbanded.

Maximilian, who during these warlike exploits had runne vp and downe from place to place to be relieued with men and money, perceiving all men to forsake him, after the defeat of his forces at Cadora, sent a Gentleman of his to Venice to craue truce for three monethes: but the Senate contemned it, and would not grant any for lesse then a whole yeare, nor without the knowledge and consent of the French King: Maximilian being the more danted for the losse of Tryeste, and other places of the Sea-coast, did sollicite the Bishop of Trent to inuite (as of himselfe) the Venetians to truce, thinking by that means the sooner to purchase Peace. The Venetians made answer; That it lay not in their power: but that he ought ought to mooue the French King.

For this purpose Commissioners were appointed to meet and conferte together, for Maximilians part, the Bishop of Trent, and Serentano the Emperors Secretary: for the French King, Trinulce, and Iacomo Galfredo President of Millan, and for the Venetians, Zacharie Contarene, a particular Ambassador deputed for that business. Conferring together they easily condiscended to all conditions fauing that the Frenchmen would haue a generall truce, and that all the confederates of either of them, as well out of Italy as within should be therein comprized, and especially the Duke of Guelders, wherunto Maximilians Agents would not consent, because their maister had determined to ruine that Duke, saying that in the treaty there was nothing mentioned but the warres of Italy, and that nothing ought to be entermigled therewith but that which concerned Italy. The Venetians did all they might to content the French King, but perceiving the Al-maines to be obstinate in that business they resolved for their part to accept of truce in the same manner as they had concluded it, being desirous to free themselues from such a warre, which lighted wholly on their dominions; and notwithstanding the protestation of the French Kings Commissioners, that a mutuall enterprise ought not to be finished but in common, the Venetians went on, and concluded the truce on the twentieth of April, the which was speedily ratified by the 20 Emperour and the Venetians, by meanes whereof the warre ceased betwixt them, and diuers did hope that Italy thereby should for a time enioye Peace and quiet.

Armes being layd aside, Aluiano and Cornaro returned to Venice where they were receiued with great pompe, and in a manner triumphall: The French King hauing intelligence that the truce was concluded and signed, shewed signes of discontent, and complained to Antonio Condelmerio Ambassador for the Venetians in his Court, saying that he had not deserved of the Seigneury of Venice that without staying for his answer and consent they had granted truce to Maximilian: That he did not greatly care if the confederates of Italy were comprized therein; provided that the Duke of Guelders might be assured in his state, whom he much affected, and yet neuertheless the Signory had made his desire frustrate, wherein he did hope to be assisted and furthered: And yet he had an hundred thousand crownes ready to employ in his ayde, and that he would not endure that any wrong should be done to him by the fault of his confederates.

The King hauing vttered these words in choller did repent him of it, and sei-ning to forger all matters, he beganne to entertaine him with more pleasing discourse; namely when the Ambassador had excused the commonwealth, and told him that the Senate euer had a principall regard to maintaine him in the Duchy of Millan, to the end that whilst the truce lasted hee might not be molested in that State. The King gaue him then some hope that he would ratifie the truce, 40 but in himselfe he beganne to thinke on all meanes how to be reuenged.

The Emperour on the other side not digesting the braudoes which the Venetians had offered him, and being desirous to resent the wrongs which he had re-ceiued, because he had no hope to draw any more aid from the Germane Princes, made shew that he had a will to vnite himselfe with the French King against the Venetians, as the only remedy to recover his honor and lost states: The Pope likewise prouoked the King against them, because, besides the old hatred which he did beare to them, he thought that the Bandetti of Furl, who dwelt at Faenza, had by their meanes made some attempt on that City.

The King calling to minde (besides his new displeasure for the truce) all the 50 wronges which he thought they had done him in his warres of Naples, and bee-ing desirous to snatch forth of their hands Cremona and other townes which had beene a long time possessed by the Dukes of Millan; had the same inclination like to the Emperour, wherefore the better to bring it to passe, they began betwixt themselves to harken to the contention betwixt the Arch-duke, & the D. of Geldres, and leaving betwixt the Commissioners, as finished about the truce.

Truce betwixt the Em-perour and the Venetians.

The French
 King, complaining of the truce.

The French
 King dissem-bling.

which was practised under hand against the Venetians.

and for that purpose they chose the City of Cambray for their place of conference. Whether from the Emperor came the Lady Marguerit his daughter, Regent of the Low Countreys, and Mathew Langy the Secretary, and for the French King the Cardinall of Amboise, who vnder colour of treating a peace betwixt the Arch-duke and the Duke of Guelders (as they gaue it forth) to the end that the true cause might not be knowne to the Venetians, they concluded a perpetual peace and confederacy, betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the French King, and the King of Arragon, against the Venetians, each of them to recouer those things which they held from them.

Confederacy of the Pope, Emperor, French King, and King of Arragon, against the Venetians.

The Confederacy ratified by the Emperor and the King.

The difficulty which the Pope made to ratify the confederacy.

The new confederacie being thus concluded, the Cardinall of Amboise departed from Cambray, the Bishop of Paris, and the Count of Carpy went to the Emperor from the French King, for the ratification of the peace, who did soone ratifie and confirme it by oath, the like did the French King, and when it was afterwards brought to the King of Arragon, albeit he had some doubt in his mind, yet neuertheless he did forth with ratifie it with the same solemnities: But the Pope made more difficulty in the matter, being on the one side swayed by a desire to recouer the cities of Romagnia, and with his hatred to the Venetians, and on the other side, his feare of the French Kings forces did greatly moue him: As also for that he thought it a dangerous matter for himselfe, if the Emperour by recouering from the Venetians the places which they held, and which did belong to the Empire, should grow too great in Italy. To preuent this inconvenience, hee thought it more commodious to seeke to recouer his townes by a more gentle way then by warre.

To this purpose then hee laboured by all meanes to induce the Venetians to yeeld vp Rimini and Faenza to him, declaring to them that the great dangers which threatened them by the combination of so many Princes, would be much greater if hee vniued himselfe with them in this confederacy. For hee could not choose but pursue them both with spirituall and temporall Armes; Hee caused in secret this remonstrance to be made by a Greeke called Constantine Comnino to John Badoario Ambassador for the Signiory of Venice to the Sea Apostolicke, for this confederacie was not yet diuulged. The Ambassador gaue speedy notice thereof to the Senate, who had an ynking of it from else-where, and were determined by no meanes to quit those townes, as they aduertised the Ambassador according to the discourse made to him by Constantine.

The Pope secretly menaces to the Venetians.

The Venetians secretly practise with Maximilian.

Now it was told them that they might easily cause Maximilian to change his minde, and distract him from the alliance with the French King, in regard of the ancient enmity betwixt them: they secretly sent John Peter Stella, Secretary to the Senate, to Maximilian, who had often-times bene with him, and was very well knowne to the Emperour, to the end hee might finde meanes to reconcile him to the Senate. This man being too hasty in the execution of his desseigne, and not hauing well considered on the meanes, and discouering himselfe to the Emperours domestick seruants, King Lewis his Ambassadors, who were with Maximilian, had knowledge of his comming, whereby hee did no good to the common-wealth. George Pisan likewise comming to Rome, by the Senates commandement, to treat with the Pope, his journey was to no purpose.

The Senate despairing of peace, made leuiies of men and horse, and decreed to enrole the greatest number of men at armes and light horse that they could raise, among whom were diuerse Stradiots, and a great number of footmen, they commanded likewise for resistance at Sea, if King Lewis should come to assaile them, fiftene Gallies to be armed. They likewise dispatched André Badoario to the King of England to purchase him for their friend.

The Venetians great preparations for their defence.

In the meane time Lascaris King Lewis Ambassador at Venice was dismissed, the like was done to Condemare, who was their Ambassador in France, vnto whom from the King was presented a chaine of gold, the which he refused, saying That

That he would not receiue any present from a King, that was their enemie and so departed. Carfode, in like manner who was Agent at Milan departed thence: within a while after supplies came to the Senate, of a thousand light horse, and five thousand strangers foote-men, a thousand Archers from Candy, and another thousand armed at all sortes from the Country of Albania. They did after-wards with speed fortifie the Cattle of Cremona, and forsooke it withall things necessary for a long seige: As also all there Townes, and Castles neere therunto of which fortifications the Count Pesillan had expresse charge, who comming one day meanelly accompanied to Bergamo, to see what was done there, those of Milan hauing notice thereof by their spies, two hundred horse sallied thence of Milan, in the night, every horse-man hauing a huge busier behind him, who hauing crost the riuier Adda, hid themselves in the wood, to surprize him, which they might easily haue done, he not mistrusting it. But the Gouernor of Bergamo, being aduertized by peasants of the country of the Ambuscado, sent sodainly after the Earle who was already departed, and so saued him from that danger. The Senate hauing notice of the French mens Ambuscado to surprize the Earle, accounted the warre to be denounced, where-vpon they chose Andrew Gritti and George Cornare for Brouaders, who in the time of the Rhetick war, had the same command. The Pope who had deferred to ratifie the confederacy, till the very last day assigned for the ratification, did confirme it, but with expresse declaration that hee would not execute any hostile act against the Venetians, till the French King did begin the warre. This was about the latter end of the year 1508. When as the league being ratified, by all the confederates, the French King began to make very great preparations, and being come to Lyons, hee caused his companies to march towards the Mounts, and like thousand Swisses, whome hee had in a readinesse, prepared themselves to come downe at the same time into Italy.

Ambuscado to surprize the Count Pesillan.

The Pope effects the treaty of Cambray.

The Venetians all employ in vain to be reconciled to the Pope, and the Emperour.

The Venetians on the other side with great courage made preparations (as hath bene said): but considering afterward how all Christendome in a manner were in armes against them, they desirous to trie by all meanes possible if they could dissolue that Vnion, repenting for that they had not separated the Pope from the other, the which they might haue done by the onely yeelding vp of Faenza vnto him. They would haue renewed their former treaties, both with the Emperour, and the King of Spaine: but it was in vaine with all three of them: for the Pope could no more accept of that he had desired: the Catholike King had no meanes to diuert the rest, and the Emperour did so abhorre them, as he would not vouchsafe to looke vpon their Ambassador: wherevpon they conuerted all their thoughts to defence, and to wage (as hath bene said) great numbers of horse and foote, and to arme diuers vessells as well to keepe the sea, as the Lake of La Garde, the riuier Po, and other Neighbour places.

The Venetians are assembled at Sondry had prepared.

Sondry prodiges which did happen did greatly terrifie them: First they lost a barge within the which were ten thousand Ducats, sent by the Senate to Raenana, which was drown'd: then lightning fell on the Castle of Bressia: after that, the place where the Charters of the Common-wealth were kept, fell wholly downe to the ground, and fier tooke either by chance, or by the secret malice of some in their Arcemall in the same place where their salt peeter lay, where it burnt twelue Gallies, and a very great quantity of Munition which did much amaze them, because it presaged nothing but mishap. They made preparations then chiefly on that side, whereby the French King was to come, which was towards the Giradade, crossing the riuier Adda, neere to Cassiana, and therefore they assembled their army at Pontuico, on the riuier Oglio: the Earle of Pesillan was made Generall thereof, Bartolmeo Aluiana was Gouernor, and George Cornare and Andrew Gritti about named were prouidary.

These men being assembled after what manner the warre should be

B b b b

The Venetians
aimy on the entry of the country of Gi-radda.

Sundry opi-
ons of the Venetian Captaines.

The Lord of Chamont
General of the Kings army.

The French
take Treui.

Casal-Major yielded.

The Popes terrible monitory
against the
Venetians.

The Duke of Venice his an-swere to the French Kings
Herald.

be managed, the opinions were different: betwixt the generall and the gouernor: This man was of opinion to make the lease of the way in the enemies country, rather then in their owne, and to goe and assaile the Duchy of Milan, before the French King should passe the Mounts: The other, who for his long experience, would not heare tell of tempting fortune, was of a contrary opinion, and coun- selled, that contemning the losse of the countrey of Gyrradade, they should en- camp neere to the City of Orei, as in times past other great Captaines had done in the warres betwixt the Venetians and the Milanois. The Senate reiected both these counsellis, that of Aluiana as to bold, and that of the Generall as ouer fearefull: wherevpon they determined, that the army should draw neare to the river Adda, because they would not leaue the Gyrradade in prey to the enemies, with the Senates expresse commandement, not to fight with the enemy but vpon great hope or vrgent necessity.

The French King hauing passed the Mounts with an intent to fight, sent his Herald to Venice, to denounce warre; and in passing by Cremona to doe the like to the Venetian Magistrates. The Lord of Chamont beganne the first motion of the warre on the fifteenth of Aprill, crossing by a foord the river Adda, neere to Calciana, with three thousand horse, and passed ouer by boate six thousand footemen and the Artillery after wards, marching directly to the towne of Treui, which being beleaged and battered, yielded: wherevpon Iustinian Morosini, Vite- lidesotto de Castello, and Vincenzo de Naldo, who were within it, and with them an hundred light horse, and about a thousand footemen remained prisoners, the Stradiots saued them selues by flight. Vpon report of the taking of this place, diuers neighbour towne did like-wisely yield. The Lord of Chamont did soone after with all his forces, repasse the river Adda. The Marquis of Mantua came with his forces to Casal-Major, which forthwith yielded. Rocafalini like-wisely hauing on a bridge of boates passed the river Adda, where it entrench into the Po, came and made incursions on the Cremonois, with an 150. Lances & 3000. foot- men, the like also did they of the Garrison of Loda. The peasants likewise of the Mountainy of Brianca made incursions as farre as Bergamo. After these first attempts of warre, the Pope for his part began by spirituall armes, for hee publi- shed a terrible Bull, in forme of a Monitory against them, specifying al the vspur- ations made by the Venetians on the Churches lands, and the authority which they attributed to them selues to the preiudice thereof: whereby he admonished them to yeeld vp within foure and twenty daies next following the Churches townes which they possessed, with the reuenew received by them euery since they enioyed them, vpon paine, in case of disobedience of incurring censures, and interdicti- ons, not onely for the City of Venice, but likewise for all the townes vnder their obedience: declaring all those to be excommunicate, who should in any sort detainee them, giuing power to all men in all places, to seaze on their goods and to make slaues of their persons. The Senate kept this Monitory close from the people, for feare least they should haue mutined, and threw in an appeal to the next General counsell, which was carried and fixed on the Churches of Rome, by unknown persons. At the very same time, in a manner, King Lewis his Herald came to Ve- nice, who in his Kings name in open Senate did denounce the warre already be- gunne for diuers occasions which he declared in their preference. The Duke by the aduice of the Senate, answered, seeing that the French King did denounce warre, contrary to their aliance with him, the which they had neuer violated they would with their forces, and with the iustice of their cause seeke to defend them selues.

After this answer, they gaue order to their army, the which being assembled at Pontuico, to the number of two thousand men at armes, three thousand light horse and stradiots, fifteen thousand footemen chosen forth of all Italy, and fifteen thousand other choice footemen of their own territories, with great quanti- ty of Artillery, came to Fontanella, which is within six miles of Loda, a place very

very commodious for the reliefe of Cremona, Crema, Carauagia & Bergamo, Cities vnder their obedience. And because they had a fit time to recouer Treui, by reason that the Kings Armie was not yet assembled, the Senate was of opi- nion to assaile it. The ordinance being planted, which made great execution, those within did yeeld the next day following, on condition that the souldiers liues should be saued, who were disarmed, the Captaines to bee prisoners, and the to one to be vied at their discretion.

The King was at Milan, who departed thence: so soone as hee vnderstood that that towne was battered, for to relesce it, and came and passed ouer the river of Adda on three bridges made of boats, neere to Castiana, with his whole Ar- mie, the enemies not staying stopping him, who hauing entred Treui, busied them- selues in pillaging the towne, from whence the Captaines could not wish draw their souldiers, neither by entreaties nor threatnings, vntill that Aluiana in a rage caused the towne to be set on fire, to make them to depart thence. But it was too late, for the French were wholly come ouer the river.

The King so soone as hee had passed ouer the River, came and lodged within little more then a mile of the Venetians campe, who being encamped in a place strong both by site and arte, the King could not assaile them but with great disad- uantage. The matter was debated, where some of the Kings counsell were of opi- nion to draw out the warre in length, expecting the Emperors coming downe, for then the Venetians should bee enforced to come to a batle, not being able to looke to so many places at once. But the King was of a contrary opinion, as well for feare least the Emperour would come too late, as for the desire which hee had, being there in person with all the forces of his kingdom, that he might with- out an others helpe finish that warre by a glorious victory. The armies in the meane time did not stirre, but remained incamped, the one before the other, for the space of a day, with sundry skirmishes betwixt the light horse on either side. The next day the King marched towards Riualta, to prouoke the enemies to come thither, that hee might fight with them, but they did not stirre, shewing thereby that they had no meaning to fight. The Artillery being brought before Riualta, the Fort within a few houres was taken by assault, wherein the King with his whole armie lodged the same night.

The King wondering at the enemies proceedings, the which to himselfe he ne- vertheless commended, resolved to depart thence, & to come into a place where he might cut off their victuals which came to them from Cremona and Crema, thinking that the want of victuals would breake their determination: wherefore, hauing staid one day at Riualta he dislodged and burnt it, and tooke the way of Vailla and Paudina, the very next night, because that either of these places were in the way by which victuals came to the enemy.

The Venetians did very well perseiue the Kings meaning, and how they were of necessity to remouee: but the Count Petruccio would haue them to tarry till the next day, and Aluiana would haue them instantly to depart, to the end to preuent them, the which was done. There were two waies to go to the places about men- tioned, the one lower, & farther neere to the river, with crooked turnings, by which the Kings armie marched, which was said to consist of more then two thousand lances, six thousand Swifles, and twelue thousand foot, as well French as Italians, with great store of Artillery, and Pioners: the other farther off from the river, and the shorter way, the which led directly for the passage of the Venetian army, where- in were 2000. men at armes, more then 20000. foot, and great numbers of light horse, some Italians, and some Albanefes: there being nothing betwixt the two armies but bushes & shrubs, which hindered either army from seeing one another.

The two armies marching in this manner, the French vanguard conducted by Charles of Amboise, & the Venetians reuerward conducted by Aluiana, encountered one another. Aluiana not thinking to fight that day, did not march in good order.

Bbbb 2

Bui

The Venetian Armie at Fontanella.

The Venetians
recouer Treui.

The Kings
Armie lodged within a mile of the Venetians.

Sundry opi-
ons in the Kings Armie.

The Kings
resolution to enforce the enemies to fight.

The number of the Kings
Armie.

The number of
the Venetians
Armie.

But perceiuing himselfe to bee so neere the enemy, and in such a place as hee was enforced to fight, aduertised the Count Pezillan, who went with the Vanguard, of his necessity, crauing his ayde. The Earle sent him word to march on still and to eschew the fight, according to the Senates determination. Aluiana in the meane time placed his footmen with fixe peeces of Ordinance on a little rising: and then assailed the enemies with such force and fury, as hee enforced them to giue back: but the Armies battaile, wherein the Kings person was, comming forward: the chance of the Dice soone turned, albeit Aluiana for his luckie beginning had promised to him selfe the victory: who running vp and downe, now heere, now there, encouraged his soldiers: They fought on all sides with great fury. The French were on fire by their Kings presence, who not sparing himselfe, was exposed to all dangers, and did not cease where need was to command and encourage his souldiors. The Venetians on the other side full of valour, by reason of their first good successe, did fight brauely: But at the last, after long fight, and the Venetians loosing rather their strength then their courage, not turning their backs to the enemies, they fell downe in a manner all dead vpon the place, and chiefly the footemen, some of whom affirmed that there were eight thousand of them slaine there. Barthelmew Aluiana was taken prisoner, who being hurt in the eye, with his face all bloody, was brought to the Kings Paullion.

The Kings
As mis and that of the Venetians, fight furiously one with an other.

The Venetians
lose the battle of Gyradade.

The King take eth Carauagia.

Brescia yeelds eth to the King.

How the Venetians were damaged at the report of the battaile losse.

The Venetians
offer to the Pope.

The Venetians
seek to be reconciled to the Emperour.

Such end had the battaile of Gyradade, which was fought on the fourteenth of May, in the yeere 1509. The King in memory heereof caused a chappell to bee builded on the place of battaile, which hee called Saint Maries of the Victory: then because hee would not loose his opportunity, hee came to Carauagia, which yeelded vpon composition, and foure and twenty houres after, the Castle, on no condition, hauing bene beaten with the Artillery. Bergamo did the like the next day, and the Castle a day after. From thence hee marched towards Brescia, which by the counsell of the Gambares, did cast off the Venetian yoke, and yeelded to the King; and the Castle two dayes after did the like, on condition that all that were within it might depart, (the Venetian Gentlemen excepted) because the King would not haue them comprized in the composition of townes, not for hatred that hee did beare to them, but in hope to draw great summes of money from them.

The newes of the battailes losse, and of the kings progression after that, did afflicke Venice with such griefe and vniuersall feare, as it is scarce credible, so great it was. For from all parts of the city, people ranne to the publick Pallace with great cries and pittifull lamentations, where the Senators knew not on what to resolute, their Councell beinge dulled by despair; so weak were their remedies. At the last taking courage, they determined to vse meanes to bee reconciled in any sort whatsoever with the Emperour and the Catholick King, not mentioning the French King, because they did as much distrust his hatred, as they were

The Senate then did write to Dominico Grimani, and to Marco Cornaro, sonne to the Prouidator, both of them beinge Cardinals at Rome, to promise and offer to the Pope, in the Senates name, that the Citties which hee demanded in Romagnia should bee yeelded vnto him, by meanes whereof they beought him not to abandon the common-wealth to the pleasure and dispole of barbarous people, such as the French-men were, who if they should once become maisters of all Lombardy, the Popes them selves should not bee safe in Rome.

They likewise decreed, that Antonio Iustiniano (who beinge chosen Prouidator for Cremona, was ready to go thither) should directly go to the Emperour Maximilian, and conclude a peace with him, if it were possible on any terms whatsoever. That the Senate was ready to deliuer to him Thyrse, Portonoue, and the other lands which they had taken from him the yeare before, and that the Signory would acknowledge to hold of him whatsoever it possessed in Frioul, in Lombardy, and in the country called old Venice. So weak and vncertaine were their remedies, as if one of these two did not helpe to repulse the audaciousnesse of the French, they had not any sure meanes left to stay them.

Neuertheless, makinge a vertue of necessity, they consulted for their defence how to prouide mony to wage new companies, for those which remaind aliuie after the defeat were bereft of strength and courage. They determined likewise to augment their army by sea, whereof Andre Truisan was General with fifty Gallies to oppose against that of the enemies which was preparing at Genoa. But the French Kings sodaine speed did preuent all their Councells, vnto whom, since the reduction of Brescia, Cremona was yeelded (the Castle expected which the Venetians yet held). Pisquetona did the like: then hee marched towards Pifcara to take the Castle, for the towne was yeelded: And as they began to batter it, the Swisses and Galcons made a furious entry by small ouertrures in the walls, and slew all those that were within it, except the Capitaine and his sonne who were Venetian Gentlemen, who were both by the Kings commandement hanged on the Castles battlements, to the end by that example to moue those of the Castle of Cremona, not obstynately to make defence, nor to hold out till the very last.

The great progression
of the French army.

The King in this manner, in lesse then fifteene dayes after the victory, had recovered (the Castle of Cremona excepted) all that which did belong to him, according to the diuision which had bene made at Cambray. The Pope had enuaded the Citties of Romagnia, with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, and eight thousand foote-men, and with the Duke of Ferrara his ordnance, vnder the command of Francisco Maria de la Rovera his Nephew, Sonne to his brother Iohn, who with that army scoured from Cesenna to Cetrui, then tooke the towne of Saurolla, betwixt Imola and Faenza, and that of Bre siquella with the Castle, and all the other townes of the Faentyne territory.

The Burrow of Ruffi, strong both by nature and art, after the Kings victory did yeeld to the Pope on composition, the like did the City of Faenza, which being vnfurnished of Venetian soldiars, and at her owne command, did promise to acknowledge the Pope for her Lord, if it were not releued within fifteene dayes, which was not done. Rauenna did the like, so soone as the army of the Church drew neare (the Castle excepted.) In such sort as the Pope conquered more by the fame of the French Kings victory, then by his owne army, the Venetians possessing no more in Romagnia but the Castle of Rauenna, new enemies shewing them selves dayly against them, euer since the defeat of their army.

All Romagnia
yeelds to the Pope upon the safety of the Kings victory.

The Duke of Ferrara on a sodayne shewed him selfe, who till then had abstained, and hauing expelled the Visdoms from Ferrara (a magistrate which the Venetians kept there) hee did forcibly without any let at all recouer the Possession of Rouigo. The townes of Azole and Lunate yeelded to the Marquis of Mantua, which the Venetians had in former time taken from Iohn Francisco Gonzaga his great Grand-father. Christoforo Frangipane held Pifinia and Diuinia in Histria. The Duke of Brunswic with his forces, entering Friull by the Emperours command, tooke Feltr and Bellone Thyrse likewise and the other townes vpon his arriall did returne to the Emperours obedience. The Earles of Sodron seized on certaine Castles and Villages which lay neere them: the like did the Bishop of Trent who tooke Riua di Trente, and Agresta.

The Duke of Ferrara declares his selfe against the Venetians.
The Marquis
of Mantua
doth the like.
The Emperours
army under the Duke of Brunswic.

The Venetians being brought to all extremity determined to quit the Signory of the firme land, to the end to auoid so many enemies, hoping that good fortune one day returning, they might easily recouer it. Becing contented then onely to retaine the salt waters, all their care was to fortify their City with men, vittuals, and munition, and they sent Mandates

The Venetians
quit Padua Verona, and other places of the firme land.

to the Magistrates and Officers of Padua, Verona, and other Cities allotted to Maximilian, that they should soderly depart thence, leaving them to the power of the people.

The Venetians
obtaine nothing of the Pope nor Em-
perour.

During these achievements, Antonio Iustinian who had beene sent to the Emperour, being admitted to his presence in publike audience, did speake with very great submission, but it was in vaine, for hee would doe nothing without the French King. The Venetian Cardinals likewise, who besought the Pope to absolute the Monitorie, seeing they had offered to make restitution of the townes within the space of foure and twenty dayes, could obtaine nothing: For the Pope answered, That they had not obeyed, because they did offer it with limited 10 conditions, not mentioning the profits which they had receiued by them. The Senate sent likewise into Puglia to yeeld vp the hauens to the King of Arragon, who being certaine to obtaine them with ease, had sent a small flecte from Spain, the which had already taken possession of diuerse places belonging to those Cities, and Sea hauens.

In this manner were the affaires of the Venetian common-wealth throwne head-long downe, all hopes failing them. Those of Verona would yeeld to the King, seeing the Venetians had forsaken them, but hee would not receiue them, meaning faithfully and wholly to obserue the capitulations made with the Emperour, seeing hee had conquered all that which did belong to himselfe, and he commanded the Ambassadors of the Veronois to present the Keyes of their Cittie to the Emperours Ambassadors, who were in his Army, the like did they of Padua and Vincenza.

Hope giuen to
the Venetians.

This determination of the French King, not to passe with his Armie beyond his limits, gaue some beginning of hope and safety to the Venetians, concerning whom the mindes of all Italians were diuersly mooued: Some were highly pleased with their misery & calamity, and said, That with great ambition they had sought to subiect all Italy to themselves, by meanes whereof they had made their name very odious. Others considering more iudiciously, how valseemly a thing it would be for all Italy to be brought vnder the bondage of strangers, did infinitely lament the disaster of that City, the ancient seat of liberty, and which more then 30 any other had upheld the common glory and renowne of all Italy.

The Pope being moued with pity, takes compassion on the Venetians.

This compassion began to touch the Popes heart, who fearing the power of the Emperour and the French King desired to diuert their thoughts from any more oppressing it by intangling them in affaires. Therefore hee resolved (but secretly) to hinder as much as hee could, that the miseries of that Signory should goe on no farther, and did willingly receiue the letters with Denis Loredan wrote vnto him, requesting that it might please him, to receiue sixe Ambassadors which the Signory would send vnto him of the principall Senators, most humbly to entreat him to pardon and absolute them. The letters were read in open consistory, where their petition being propounded, the Pope consented to admit 40 them, notwithstanding that the Ambassadors of the Emperour, and the French King sought to hinder it, alleging that by the league of Cambray, he was bound to pursue them with spirituall and temporall Armes, vntill that each of the confederates had recouered that which did belong to him, and that the Emperour had not yet recouered all. Hee answered them, That the ancient custome of the Church was not to shew it selfe obdurate to those, who repenting of their faults did craue pardon, but that hee would not absolute them, before they had giuen satisfaction to euery one.

Truies con-tinueth obdient to the Venetians.

This reception of the Pope did encrease their hope, with the newes they 50 heard from Treviso, which being forsaken by the magistrates, and by the Venetian companies, as others were, Leonardo of Dressina banished from Vincenza, being come thither without forces to take possession thereof for the Emperour, they in the city mutined, and began with a generall voyce to cry S. Marke: protesting testing that they would acknowledge none other Lord, and a fellow that was a shomaker named Marke being their leader, he carried with great shoures and concourse of people the Venetians banners into the market place, and hauing drinen thence Dressina, they placed fouldiers in their City, and speedily fortified it with victuals, and all other necessities, the horse-men which were within it scouring the country round about.

10

The end of the seventh Booke of the fourth Decade.

20

The Contents of the eight Booke of the fourth Decade.

30

That moued the Venetians to hope to raise themselves. An enteruie resolved on betwixt the Emperour Maximilian. and Lewis the French King broken on a sodaine by the Emperour. The Venetians recouer Padua, whereby they become masters of the Champaine Counry. The Marquis of Mantua is taken by the Venetians. The Emperours proposition to goe and beseege the City of Venice. Frangipane maketh warre in Histria. The Venetian Ambassadors come to Rome by night. The Emperours seege before Padua. The King of Hungary refuseth to make warre on the Venetians during their aduersity. The Venetians recouer Vincenza and beseege Verona. The Venetians nauall army on the Po. scowereth as farre as Fiquerolla. The Venetians conquer the Pollesin of Rouigo. The Duke of Ferrara defeateth the Venetians nauall army on the Po. The Emperour holdeth a Dyet at Inspruch. The Pope absolueeth the Venetians, notwithstanding the oppositions of the Ambassadors of the Emperour and the French King. The Popes displeasure against the French King. The French Kings greuous displeasure conceiued against the Swisses. The Pope in hatred to the French King assaileth Ferrara. The Vincentines are enforced to craue pardon of the Prince of Anhalt. The French take Legnaga. The Emperour engagerh Verona to the French King. Monsielesia taken by the French. The Popes Popes designs and propositions against the French King broken and come to nothing. The King of Hungary summons the Venetians Ambassador. Lastly the French King resoluth to make warre on the Venetians and the Pope.

The eighth Booke of the fourth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

*The Venetians
take courage.*

He Commotion of Treuifo and the Emperours carelesseſſe gaue hope to the Venetians to retaine ſomepart of their Signory, and to execute diuers great exploits, which afterward they did. For in all this great courſe of victories there was nothing heard of but the Emperours name only, albeit by meanes of the French army, and for feare of it, diuers townes had beene yeilded to him. He had runne to diuers places ſince the confederacy of Cambray to get money by way of loane of the Flemmings and other his ſubiects, the which hee quickly ſpent prodigally after his vſuall manner, beſide a hundred thouſand crownes which he had receiued of the French King, for the inueſtiture of the Duchy of Milan. Forthwith after the newes of the battaile of Gyradade, he ſent the Duke of Brunfwick to recouer the Country of Friul, but for himſelfe he did not moue at all, for want of money, al-be-it the Pope did greatly ſolicite him thereto, being afraid of the French forces, and to cauſe him to make halt, had ſent him fifty thouſand Ducats.

*An enteruie refuſed on betwixt the Emperour and
the French
King.*

At the laſt hee came to Trent, from whence by letters hee thanked the French King, for hauing by his meanes recouered his due. The Cardinall of Amboiſe beeing come thither from the King to talke with him, they concluded betwixt themſelues that he and the King ſhould ſee one another and talke together in open field, neere to the towne of La Garde, on the marches of eithers Countrey. The King ſet forward to be there at the day appointed. But the Emperour being come as farre as Riua di Trento for the ſame purpoſe, hauing tarried there two houres, returned on a ſodaine to Trent, ſending the King word that, by reaſon of certaine accidents newly hapned in Friul, he was enforced to returne backe againe, requiſting him to deſerre their meeting till an other time, and in the meane ſpace to tarry at Cremona.

*The Emperour
on a ſodaine breaketh the enteruie.*

This alteration of the Emperour, together with his tedious negligence in not providing ſufficient gariſons to defend Padua and the other Cities, were cauſes, that the Venetians did help themſelues by this opportunity offered them to recouer Padua, which they knew to be badly man'd with ſouldiers, and the which they had by ouer-haſty counſell too ſoone giuen away. They concluded then that Andrew Gritti, one of the Prouidators, ſhould goe to Nouale on the Paduan territory, and that there he ſhould take part of the ſootmen (who being followed by diuers of the Country were ſent to the village of Mirana) and ſhould march towards Padua, to aſſault the Gate of Codalonga, and Chriſtofero de Mora the other ther Prouidator, ſhould follow him at the heeles with the reſidue of the army: This deſeigne being thus decreed fell out better then they thought for: for being early in a morning come to the Gate, they found it halfe open, by reaſon of certaine carts laden with hay, which were a litle before entred. So as poſſeſſing it without any difficulty, they tarried there without any noiſe till their fellows were arriued who were not farre of, then they marched to the market-place, before any one had deſcried them.

But Dreſſina, who was Gouernor of the City for Maximillian being lodged in the Cittadell, hauing heard the noiſe, came forth with three hundred Lancequenets which he had only for the gard thereof, with Brunaldo of Saregia with fifty horſe, who perceiuing the townſmen to forſake them, and no man to offer them any helpe made great haſt to enter into their fort, the which being not well fortified they were conſtrained to yeeld certaine houres after. The Venetians by this meanes being maſters of the City, commanded no hurt to be done to it, and that the Iewes houſes only, with certaine Paduans who had ſhewed themſelues their enemies, ſhould be ſpoiled.

*The Venetians
take Padua.*

The French King, who not long before had by compoſition taken the Caſtle of Cremona, knowing the Emperours anſwere, and not ſtaying to doe his bidding, went towards Milan, reſolving to caſſie his army, for to free himſelfe from ſo great expenſes and to returne into France. But the departure of the Kings perſon and his army did much diminifh the reputation of the Emperours affaires. For after the Venetians had recouered Padua, they ſoone became maſters of all the Countrey round about, becauſe the Cities and the champaigne countrey did fauour them. Vincenza of it ſelfe had done the like, if Conſtantine of Macedonia, who by chance was not farre off, had not ſpeedily entred it with certaine forces. They recouered neuertheleſſe the towne and caſtle of Legnaga, a very commodious place to indomage the countries of Verona, Padua, and Vincenza.

*The French
Kings reſolu-tion.*

*The Venetians maſters of the champaigne
countrey.*

It was ſuppoſed that the taking of Padua would delay the Kings returne into France: but that, notwithstanding, he determined to paſſe forward ſo ſoone as hee had made new agreements with the Popes Legat in the City of Biagrasſa whereby the Pope and the King did bind themſelues to protect each other. He left on the frontiers of the Veronois the Lord de la Paliffe with ſeu hundred Launces, to doe whatſoeuer ſhould pleaſe the Emperour. But before his departure an other happy euent befell the Venetians, which was, the taking of the Marquis of Mantua, with the defeat of all his ſouldiers, who were ſurprized halfe a ſleepe in the Iſland of Eſcalla: who being brought from thence to Padua, and then to Venice, was impriſoned in the little tower of the publike pallace to the great contentment and wonderfull ioy of the whole City.

*New agreements betwixt
the Pope and
the King.*

*The Marquis
of Mantua taken priſoner and brought to Venice.*

The Emperour till now had not hindred nor did hinder the Venetians proceeding, as well becauſe he had not ſufficient forces, as alſo for that he was kept backe by the peaſants in the mountaine, and in the planes likewiſe by other companies of peaſants, who waited for him at a very ſtrong paſſage, where he was in danger. But ſurmounting all theſe difficulties, and hauing not as yet forces ſtrong enough, he buſied himſelf in meane enterpriſes, beſeiging now one village, and then an other, ſcouring and ſpoiling the country. The Prince of Anhalt did the like, who by the Emperours command hauing entred Friul with ten thouſand men attempted in vaine to take Monſalcone, but he gaue a furious aſſault on the towne and caſtle of Cadora where he committed great ſlaughter on thoſe that were within it.

*Cadorna taken and ſackt by
the Imperials.*

The Venetians in the meane time tooke the towne of Valdeſera by force, and Bellona by compoſition. The Emperour perceiuing that his forces were not worthy the name of Imperiall, propounded to the confederates the vnting of all their forces in one to aſſaile the city of Venice, and to that intent to vie the helpe of the ſea armies and Gallies of the French King and the Pope. The French King would

*The Emperour
propoundeth to aſſaile Venice.*

would willingly haue consented thereto if he had seene any likelihood of the matter. But the Pope and the Catholike King gainesaid it, as a thing most vnjust and dishonorable. The Duke of Brunswicke on the other side being sent by the Emperour could not take Venna the Capitall city of Friul nor Ciuital-D'Austria, which he likewise besieged. Christoforo Frangipane did the like in Histria where nere to the village of Verme he defeated the Venetian officers, and did greatly burne and spoile the whole country.

Frangipane makes warre in Histria.

The Venetian
Ambassadors come by night into Rome.

The Emperour
determines to besiege Padua.

During these temporall accidents of armes in diuers places, they disputed at Rome on spirituall armes, whither before the recovery of Padua the fixe Ambassadors from the Senate were arrived; namely Dominico Trisano, Leonardo Mocenigo, Paulo Pisani, Ieronimo Donato, Paulo Capello, and Lodouico Maripietra: who entering by night in poore and wretched habites, because the Pope would haue it so, who did not let them, they went to the palace of the Cardinal of Naples to conferre with him and the other Commissioners: Great were the practises of the Ambassadors of the Emperour, French King, and the King of Spaine to hinder them from obtraying absolution: and on the contrary the Archbishop of Yorke solicited for them in the behalfe of Henry King of England.

The Emperour in the meane time hauing assembled all the forces he was able to make, as well of his owne as of others that assisted him, determined with a mighty army to goe and besiege Padua.

The great Turkes offer to the Venetian
Senate.

The Venetians weighing how much the preservation of that city did import them did not forget to furnish it with all necessities for defence. Wherevnto Prince Loredan did greatly incite them in an Oration full of mighty perswasions by whose counsell two hundred young Gentlemen departed from Venice to goe to the releefe of that city; where they were received with incredible ioy of all men. They receiued letters at Venice at the same time from Andre Escole Ambassador at Constantinople for the Common-wealth nere to the great Turke: whereby he assured the Senate that the Turke was mightily displeased when he vnderstood of the defeat of their army at Gyradade and for that they had not acquainted him with their enterprizes and requested his aide, and that now he freely offered them all aide and fauour, it being his pleasure that Prince Loredan should be speedily aduertized of this offer. The Senate by their Ambassador did highly thanke him, but would not accept the offer, because it was neither seemely nor profitable.

The Emperours
progression nere to Padua.

But to returne to the Emperours preparations, who whilst he tarried for forces which came to him from all parts, he came to the bridge of Brente three miles off from Padua where hauing taken Rimini by force, and turned aside the current of the water, he marched towards the Possesin of Rouigo keeping aloofe off from Padua to open the passage to his victuals, staying for his Artillery which was to come forth of Germany, and tooke the village of Este by assault which he sackt, and next he tooke Monselecia & the castle, with the town of Montagnane by composition. From thence returning towards Padua, he encamped nere to the bridge of Bassionella nere to the city, where he attempted, but in vaine, to turne backe the course of the Riuer Brento.

The Emperours
besieged Padua.

To this place came the artillery and the munition which he expected, with the residue of his army, wherewith he went forward and encamped nere to the Suburbs of Saint Croffe, determining to giue an assault in that place: but when he vnderstood that it was the strongest part of the city, he changed his purpose, and remooued towards the little Gate on the way to Venice, as well for that it was the weakest part of the city as also to cut off supplies that might come thither by land or water: wherein hauing spent much time vnprofitably and giuen leisure to the enemies to fortifie and furnish themselves with victuals, He approached nere to the wals with his army, which besides the French Kings seuen hundred Launces, vnder the command of the Lord de la Palisse, consisted of one thousand Italian

Italian men at armes, eightreene thousand Lanquenets, fixe thousand Spaniards, six thousand boot-halers of sundry nations, & two thousand Italians. After these followed a great traine of all sorts of peeces of battery, with wonderfull store of munition: so as neuer any siege in Italy was of the like expectation as well for the importance of the place, whereon depended the good or bad successe of the Venetians, as in regard of the greatnesse and authority of such a leader, which caused the number of the army daily to encrease, al-be it the souldiers were not paid, who fed themselves neuertheless with hope of the Cities spoile. On the other side the army which the Venetians had in Padua for the defence thereof, was little inferior to the Emperours. For there were fixe hundred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, fiftene hundred famous and well-experienced Stradiots: and besides the Caualery, there was twelue thousand footmen of the best souldiers of Italy, and tenne thousand other footmen, as well Sclauonians, as Greeks, and Albanezes drawne from their Gallies, and besides all these, all the Venetian young Gallants were there with their followers, whose example did much encourage the rest. Moreouer it did not want great abundance of all necessary provisions, nor great store of artillery, with a merueilous quantity of all kinde of victuals, and a multitude almost numberlesse of peasants, who without intermission laboured in the Cities fortifications: so as within a short space, it was fortified with bastions, rampiers, casemates, parapets, and necessary trenches.

The number of
the Emperours
army.

The number of the army in Padua.

And to the end that the courage of all those within it might be answerable to those preparations, the Count Petilian, who was General, caused them all to be assembled in Saint Antonies market-place, where hauing encouraged them by graue & valorous speeches, he first bound himselfe by sollemne oth, and then the captains, the whole army and the townsmen in like manner, faithfully to employ themselves in the defence thereof euen to the death.

The Count Petilian binds the command in Padua.

In the meane time, the Pope, the Emperour, and the French King, did earnestly sollicite the King of Hungary to make warre on the Venetians, telling him how easily he might recouer all the lands which they held in Histria and Sclauonia, now when as they had in a manner lost all their forces, and were assailed on every side. But the King of Hungary would neuer giue care thereto, but continued still their friend. Whereof the Senate being aduertized by Vincenzo Guidochi their Secretary and Agent in Hungary: sent Petro Pascalio their Ambassadors to the same King, to entreate him to continue in the alliance which he had sworne of a long time with them, the which he promised to doe.

The King of Hungary, will by no means make warre on
the Venetians, being solicited thereto.

Now the Emperour hauing made his approaches nere to the wals of Padua, towards the little Gate, where his army was extended round about the city three miles in length, he beganne to plant his peeces of battery, which could not be done in a long time, by reason of the number of them; some of them being of a merueilous greatnesse. Being planted, they would needs see how the enemies could defend themselves, and therefore the French and the Lanquenets gaue an assault on that side where the Lord de la Palisse had command at a Raucelin of a Gate, but it being valiantly defended, they returned to their quarter. The next day the artillery plaied with great fury, and did beate downe a great part of the wall: the shot from the city likewise did greatly hurt the whole army and those within the town made many sallies, especially the Stradiots and the light-horse.

Assault giuen
to a Raucelin
of the city.

The artillery hauing plaied nine daies together, and made so large a breach as all men thought was more then needfull, the whole army made preparation the next day to giue an assault: But when they perceiued how that the same night they within had filled the dike with water, the Emperour sent backe his souldiers to their quarters. They beganne afterwards to batter the Bastion which was nere to the Gate of Codalonga, the Emperour determining to doe his utmost to force it, and hauing overthrown a part thereof with the ordnance, he caused the Spaniards and Lanquenets two daies after to giue it an assault, who fighting furiously

Assault giuen
to the breach of the Bastion of Codalonga.

Those that came to the assault.

furiously did mount it, and placed two Enseignes thereon. But the valour of the defendants was such, and the abundance of defensive engines so great, as they were enforced to leape downe in heapes, & many of them were slaine and hurt: By meanes whereof those who were already prepared to give an assault to the wall, thinking that the Bastion was taken, retired and disarmed themselves, without attempting any farther.

There Emperour raiseth his camps from before Padua.

Maximilian by this attempt did wholly loose the hope of victory, wherefore resolving to dislodge, having first sent away his artillery to a place of safety, he raised his campe, and came with his whole army to Limini the seventeenth day of the Iege, from thence he went to Verona, all men generally blaming him for that by his owne fault he had lost Padua, and had not taken Treviso. And he on the contrary imputing it to other men, complained of the Pope and the French King: of the one, for suffering the Venetian Ambassadors to goe to Rome, and of the other, because he had deicide to send supplies of men. But these complaints did no whit better his condition: for the Pope cared not greatly for him, and the King was glad to have his faults and changings knowne. Having retuled the oath of fidelity of those of Verona, he departed thence towards Germany, determining (as he said) to returne the next spring with greater forces to make warre in Italy, leaving the Marquis of Brandenbourg for the gard of Verona.

The Emperour
returneth into Germany.

Contention betwixt the Pope and the King.
Upon the Pope's meaning
was.

The Emperours returne into Germany left all that which he possessed in great hazard, and all Italy in doubt, in regard of some contention, arising betwixt the Pope and the French King, which being soone after appeased, there remained neuertheless some discontent in the Popes minde, whereupon he wished that the King might loose whatsoeuer he held in Italy, and was willing to employ himselfe to effect it: And al-be-it he propounded so great a designe to himselfe, yet neuertheless he would not enter into league with any one, but trusting wholly to himselfe and to the authority which the Papall See had ouer all Princes, hee shewed both by deed and words that he did not greatly account of any one, and waxing strange to all others he inclined only to the Venetians side, whom for the safety of all Italy, and for the preferuation of his greatnesse, he thought fit to absolve, and to assist with all his power.

The Popes answer to those who hindered
the Venetians
absoluton.

The Emperours and French Kings Ambassadors opposed it, the like did the Ambassador for the King of Arragon, alleading the confederacy made at Cambray, by which they were not yet fully satisfied. The Pope made answer therunto, that it was not the office of Christs Vicar to pursue with spirituall armes, to the preiudice of the saluation of so many soules, those who repenting had with great humility craued absolution: especially the cause for which they were censured ceasing. That it was an other matter to pursue them with temporall armes, and therein he was determined to perseuer, and made offer to consent with the rest to obserue the league of Cambray. Being in these termes with the Ambassadors, he would willingly haue absolved them, if the Venetians would haue given place and consented to two conditions. The one, to leave the navigation of the Adriatick Sea free to the subiects of the Church; the other, that they should keepe no more a Magistrate called Risdomo in Ferrara, which was a City depending on the Church.

The Venetians
reconuer Vincenza.

The Venetians in the meane time, vpon this different meaning of Princes, not greatly esteeming the Emperour, sent forces vnder the conduct of Andrie Grisi the Protidaior to Vincenza, on assurance that they were wished for by the people, who at his arrival took the suburbs of Posterla, then being brought into the city by the townsmen, the Prince of Anhalt and Fraunce retired into the castle, which was yielded foure daies after. It was verily thought that he might haue taken Verona likewise, if he had gone thither on a sodaine: but while he tarried for the reduction of the castle of Vincenza, new companies of the

Emperours

Emperours entred into it, and three hundred Launces of the French Kings, commanded by the Lord D' Ambigni, so, as there being in it five hundred Launces, and five thousand footmen as well Spaniards as Lanquenets, it was a hard matter to take it. The Venetian army neuertheless came thither soone after, vpon hope, that at their arrival, they in the city would rise: but because it being diuided into two parts, did not shew it selfe before the wals at one time, the businesse fell not out according to their proiect.

The Imperials
suffer Verona with men and vittuals.

The Venetians at their departure thence tooke Basciana, then Felte and Ciuitall, with the fort of Escalla. At the same time Antonio and Jerónimo Saurogniane, gentlemen of the country followinge the Venetians party in Friull, tooke Castell-nouo beyond the riuer of Tailemont, no newes being heard of Maximilian. The Venetian army for the recovery of the Pollesin of Rouigo, marched towards Monflecchia and Montagnane, to the end from thence to enter on the territory of Ferrara. Having moreover, sent their naual army, conducted by Angelo Trevisano, to make warre on the Duke of Ferrara, which entring the Po at the mouth of Fornaces, burnt Corbello and other villages neere to the Po, not sparing the whole country as farre as the Lake of Scarra, from whence the light horse which kept way with it by land scoured as farre as Fiquerolles.

The Venetians
naual army scurth the Po as farre as Fiquerolles.

The incredible hatred which they had conceived against the Duke of Ferrara did moue them to doe so, who not being content with that which he said did belong vnto him, did detaine that which was none of his owne, hauing received of the Emperour for money the village of Este in Fee, and that of Montagnane by engagement, he hauing no title to those places, which from time to time belonged to the Venetians.

The cause of the Venetians hatred
to the Duke of Ferrara.

The Duke of Ferrara was much amazed at the comming of this army, and at the report that their land-army followed it: for he had no meanes to defend himselfe, till the supplies which he expected from the Pope and the French King were arrived, but only with his artillery planted on the banks of the Riuer to stop the enemies farther passage, which was the cause that Trevisano lay at Ankor in the midst of the Riuer behind a little Island, tarrying for the land forces, without which he knew he could not goe forward: And to remaine there at more safety till their arrival, he caused two Bastions to bee made on the Riuer Po, the one on Ferraras side, and the other on the opposite shore with a bridge of boats, to the end he might be able to releue the Bastions, chiefly that on Ferrara side.

The Venetian
General build two Bastions on the two banks of Po.

The Duke determined to hinder the finishing of that worke, whereupon hauing assembled the greatest forces he could, as wel of the City as of strangers, he sent them before to assaile the Bastion, and he himselfe followed after with store of horse.

But those of the Bastion being releued by their owne fellows out of the vessels did with such fury charge the Ferrarois as they put them to rout, so as the Duke, who followed them at the heeles with his caualry, meeting with them, turned them backe and encouraged them, but it lasted not long. For the enemies fury was such, together with the safety of the place well fortified with small peeces of Ordnance, as at the last he himselfe was constrained to retire with great losse of his people, who were slaine and hurt. This moued the Lord of Chaumont to send a hundred and fifty French Launces for the gard of Ferrara: and the Pope being incensed against the Venetians, for that without respect to him they had assailed the Duke, sent thither likewise the two hundred men at armes which hee had allotted for the Emperour.

The Venetians
drive the Fer-rarois from the Bastions.

But this aide would haue come to late, if the Venetians had not bene enforced to call backe their army, the which hauing conquered all the Pollesin, was in readinesse to goe to the reliefe of their naual army: for it was enforced to returne backe, hauing left foure hundred light horse, and as many footmen for the defence of the Pollesin, and for the helpe of their vessels: because the Lord of

The Venetians
reconuer the Pollesin.

C c c c

Chaumont

Chauumont hauing entred Verona with great forces, had lent eight thousand Ducats to the Emperour who had engaged to the King for the same sum, and for others to be paid afterward the towne of Valeggia, fixe miles from Bressia, and a passage of the Riuer-Mincia of great importance: and made preparations beside (as it was said) to goe and beseege Vincenza.

The Venetians
provide for Legnago, Suaua, and Vincenza.

The Venetians diuided their army into three parts which they placed in Legnago, Suaua, and Vincenza: then being desirous to conserue Vincenza, they beganne to fortifie it with strong rampiers, and with deepe ditches full of water, they like they did afterwards to Suaua and Legnago; and in this manner standing on their guard, they assured the whole country, especially for that winter. Ferrara by this meanes was in some sort eased, but not altogether freed from feare and daunger: For those in the vessels, seconded by the cawellery that was left with them, did daylie scoure euen to the Cittie Gates, and other Venetian vessels comming by an other way to assaile the Ferrarois, had taken Comachia. But by the arrivall of the Popes, and French Kings forces, the Duke and the Cardinall of Este beganne to take courage, and for to make diuerse attempts to draw the enemies to fight, they which they refused til the return of their army.

The Duke and the Cardinall perceiuing that the ouer-throw of the vessels would gaine the victory, and that it might easily be effected if meanes were made for the safe planting of the artillery on the banke of the Riuer, the Cardinall came and assailed the Bastion once againe, and hauing beaten backe the enemies, who were come forth to skirmish, hee did take and fortifie the nerest part of the cauley, vnknowne to the enemies: then in the night hee brought the artillery to the shoare opposite to the enemy and planting it with great silence, it began in the morning to discharge very furiously. The vessels would haue escaped by flight, but not being able to make way by reason of the shot, they were in a manner all funke or taken. The General leaping into a Skiffe saued himselfe by flight with the chiefe standard of the common-wealth, fifteene Gallies fell into the Dukes power, certaine great ships, diuers Fufts, with other small boates, almost numberlesse, two thousand men died there, as well by the shot as by fire and water, and three-score banners were taken. Many that came on shoare were saued by the Venetian light horse men.

The Duke of Ferrara de-feates the Venetians naual
army.

The Duke of Ferrara takes Loretta.

The Duke after this defeate, sent forces of horse and foote to doe the like to those who had taken Comachia, who recovered Loretta which the Venetians had fortified, and they had defeated the army which was there if it had not retired to Bebies knowing the danger.

Such vnfortunate end had the sege of Ferrara which lasted about one month. Their affaires prospered better on the Paduan territorie: for the Emperour being on the Vincentin with foure thousand footmen, the Venetians, by the aide of the country peasants, almost vnder his nose and before his face, tooke the Paces of Escalla, Cogola, and Basciana: whereof the Emperour complaining said, That the departure of the Lord of La Palisse had bred diuers disorders: and therevpon hee went to Bolane, and from thence to Inspruch to hold the Dyet which hee had appointed, and the Lord of Chauumont following his example retired to Milan, leauing strong garrisons in all places on the frontiers, and especiallie in Verona, which the Emperour could not haue defended alone.

The Emperour
goeth to hold a Dyet at Inspruch.

A treaty of truce, motioned betwixt the Emperour and
the Venetians,
is broken.

During this cessation of armes, Maximillian fought to take truce with the Venetians: the Bishop of Pescera the Popes Nuntio, practized it with his Masters commandement; the Ambassadors were at Hospitaletto, a little about Escalla, and conferred with John Cornare and Lodouico Mocenigo the Venetian commissioners: But the Emperours excessive demands brake off this treaty

treaty without any conclusion, to the Popes great grieve, who wished that the Venetians might be freed from this warre, that he might ioyne them to himselfe against the French King, whom he more and more hated, thereby to lay foundations of great importance, and to this purpose had secretly sent a messenger to the King of England.

The Venetian army in the meane time being quartered at Saint Boniface on the Veronois, held Verona in a manner besieged, al-be it deeds of armes were coldly performed on either part, according to the season which was cold. The Princes mindes neuertheless were greatly troubled, and especially the Emperour, who inuenting all meanes to get the vpper-hand of the Venetians, drew his affaires still out at length, and did publish an other Dyet at Ausbourg, where the Electors of the Empire hauing made instance for a treatie of peace with the Venetians, before they mentioned any provisions for the warre: he thought that the Bishop of Pescera the Popes Nuntio had solicited the matter, wherevpon hee sent him away.

And considering that the resolutions of Dyets were long & vncertaine, he resolved with himselfe to induce the French King to condescend to take Padua, Vincenza and Tretiso with his owne forces, and to accept of a sufficient recompence for it. This offer being propounded in the Kings Counsell, was much debated on all sides, and the King almost consented by the counsell of diuers, to accept it, and to returne againe in person into Italy with a mighty army: But vpon the difficulties which were made to the contrary, hee delayed the answer and resolved about all things, to vse meanes to appease the Pope and to make him his friend if it were possible, at least-wise that hee should not bee his enemy: and for this purpose sent post to Rome Albert Count of Carpi, a man of excellent wit and iudgement, vnto whom were given very ample instructions, and commission likewise to diswaide the Pope from absolving the Venetians: but as hee arrived, the Pope had already concluded and promised it: the Venetians hauing after long disputations for certaine monthes space consented to those conditions, whereon the difficulty lay: because they saw none other remedy for their safety, but to be ioyned with him.

The Emperours
proposition to the French
King.

The Ceremonies of the absolution being ended, the Ambassadors returned to Venice, leauing at Rome, neere to the Pope, Ieronimo Donato a very learned man, one of their owne number, and very pleasing to liis Holincesse, who did great good seruice to his country in matters which he afterwards treated with him. Maximillian and the French King were displeased for that the Pope had absolved the Venetians; the one because hee had not yet recovered his owne according to the treaty of Cambray, and the other because he desired for his owne particular profit that the Venetians might no more recouer themselves: But neither of them did in any sort perceiue the Popes meaning, especially the French King whom the Pope fed with vaine hopes.

The Pope absolutely the Venetians.

Maximillian
and the French King are displeased with the Pope for absolving the
Venetians.

For after the absolution, contrary to Kings meaning, hee gaue leaue to the Feudataries and Tennants of the Church, to receive the Venetians pay, and to John Fk. of Bailion to bee Generall of their army in Count Petillans stead, who was newlie dead: Then hee vsed meanes to reconcile the Venetians with the Emperour, to the end that they three being ioyned together might make warre on the French King. But they could not agree, for the Emperour would absolutely haue Verona for his share, and the Venetians stoutly craued it for themselves.

The Popes had meaning to the French King.

Moreover, the Pope did secretly sollicite the King of England to make warre on the French King, putting him in minde of the ancient quarrelles betwixt those two Kingdomes, and the faire occasion which offered it selfe with fortunate successe.

He did besides continue his practizes begunne with the Swisses by means of the

Cccc 2

Bishop

Bishop of Syon whose authority was great amongst that Nation, which fell out in the end as hee desired.

The Kings anger against the Swiss.

Whereunto
the Popes allions tended.

The enterprise upon Verona discouered.

The Popes
baird to the King dash'd saile the Duke of Ferrara a new.

The French
King greatly perplexed.

For they growing proud that all men sought their friendship, the King soliciting them to renew the league which was almost expired, with great boldnesse and presumption they craued the augmentation of their pensions which were three score thousand pounds a yeere, besides the secret pensions which were given to priuate persons: At which insolency the King being moued, he reiected them with haughty speeches, making shew that he did not esteeme them, and flatly denied to augment their pensions, hauing made alliance with the Valesians, and the Lords of the Grisons.

The Pope being glad of this disunion, made new confederacy with them, and thought he had done much for the execution of that which he intended, and first of all he assailed the Duke of Ferrara, for spite that hauing receiued so many benefits at his hands, he depended more on the French King then on him.

And he imperiously forbad him to cause any more salt to be made at Comachia. Duke Alphonso complaining for that he went about to hinder him from receiuing the profit of his owne reuenues, would not obey this commandement, whereupon he threatned him with greuous censures if he did not desist, his thoughts and actions wholly tending to defend and raise the Venetians.

The Emperour and the French King, who desired nothing so much as their downefall, being displeased with the Popes proceedings, did more strictly vnitethemselues together, and resolu'd to assaile the Venetians that Summer with great forces, and summoned the Pope to ioyne with them according to the purport of the confederacy of Cambray; but he answered that he was no more tied to that confederacy, which was accomplished, it being Maximilian's fault that hee had not Treuisio, or recompence in money for it: In the meane time Verona had like to haue bene taken by the Venetian Garrison which lay at Saint Boniface, who being sent for by the townesmen, came by night neere to the Cittie, to scale the Castle of Saint Peter, but in setting vppe their Ladders, which were too short, they were discouered, whereupon they returned to their Garrison, and diuers of the conspiracy in the city were punished.

About the same time the Pope hauing notice that peace was newlie concluded betwixt the Kings of France and England, and perceiuing on the other side the brauado which Maximilian vsed in his behalfe, in demanding of him the loane of two hundred thousand Ducats, threatening him if hee refused it to vnitethimselfe with the French King against him, hee was desirous to reunite himselfe with the King, and beganne to deale with the Earle of Carpi who was still at Rome.

But on a sodaine hee changed his minde, so soone as hee had notice of the small aide which the commissioners in the assembly of Ausbourg had offered the Emperour, and that the King of England had not made him such an answer as hee expected: By means whereof taking courage, hee beganne a new to assaile the Duke of Ferrara, because the said Duke had raised some new impositions on marchandize which was brought to Venice by the Riuier Po, saying, That by the law, the vassall could not do it without the leaue of the chiefe Lord, and that the same did preiudice those of Bologna his subiects, threatening him, if he did not take away those imposts to make war vpon him.

The King heereby found himselfe greatly perplexed, for on the one side it greeued him to make warre on the Pope, and on the other hee would not forsake his friend the Duke of Ferrara, being obliged to maintain. And defend him: and the more the Pope did vrge him to forsake him, the more constant he was in his defence. After diuers reasons alleged on either side, that the King had propounded conditions, whereby, for the most part, he should bee satisfied, for those losses which hee should pretend to haue sustained by the Duke, hee was moreouer content to bee bound, (according to the Popes request made vnto him) that his army should not passe ouer the Riuier Po, vnlesse it were to protect the Florentines, and to molest Pandolpho Petrucci, and John Paul Bailon.

thoſe

During all these differences the Lord of Chaumont had taken without any impediment with fiftene hundred Launces, and tenne thousand footmen with great store of Ordnance, followed by three thousand Pioners, the Pollesin of Ro- uigo which the Venetians had abandoned, and the tower Marquifana, the Duke of Ferrara being ioynd with him with two hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse and two thousand footmen. Then he came to Castalbado, and from thence to Montagnane and Este, which he tooke at the first summons, and gaue them to the Duke.

The Prince of Anhalt, the Emperours Lieutenant, came forth of Verona, with three hundred French Launces, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand Lanqueters, and following the Lord of Chaumont, they came both together towards the Vincentine territory, where the whole country did forthwith yeeld vnto them, the Venetian army being retired into a place of safety: by means whereof the Vincentines perceiuing themselues to be wholly forsaken, hauing of themselves no meanes of defence, had none other hope left but only in the victors mercy the which they did hope to obtaine by the meanes of the Lord of Chaumont, of whom hauing gotten passe-port, they came to the Campe in wretched habit, where one of their number hauing with great humillity declared to the Prince of Anhalt the infinite and intollerable losses that they had sustained, and the misery and calamity whereto they were brought, to the end to moue him to some compassion, and to appease his wrath, they receiued but a very vnpleasing and vngentle answer, which in effect was to haue their liues, goods and honours, at his owne discretion. The Vincentines being daunted with so cruell an answer, remained for a certaine space like men without any motion or feeling, and not knowing what to answer or thinke, they at last by the Lord of Chaumonts counsell, fell downe prostrate on the earth, and did absolutely referre themselues and their city into the conquerors hands. But the Lord of Chaumont making intercession for them, with diuers others, the matter was so handled as the Prince of Anhalt was content to promise them, that their persons should haue no harme, but the disposing of their goods should be absolutely referred to his will and pleasure.

After the taking of Vincenza, al-be it the Emperour did in no sort stirre against the Venetians, as hee had promised hee would, but on the contrary, his companies decreasing dayly for want of pay, the Lord of Chaumont neuerthelesse perceiuing that whatsoever had bene done till then, was to no purpose, vnlesse Legnaga were taken, hee determined to goe and encampe before it; where hauing overcome the difficulties of the waters, which the Venetians had in such sort let forth, as the whole country was drowned therewith, hee wanne Porto, which is a part of Legnaga, and hauing caused foure thousand French foot, and sixe peeces of ordnance to crosse ouer to the farther side of the Riuier Adice, hee beganne to batter the Bastion on both sides the Riuier, part whereof being beaten downe, the Prouidator who was within it, al-be it his souldiers did what they could to rampire it vp againe, being daunted with feare, retired on a sodaine the night following into the castle with certaine Venetian Gentlemen.

This retreat being knowne by daie breake, the capitaine of the foot-men which were in the Bastion, did yeeld on condition of safetie of liues and goods. The Towne was forth-with sackt, and they who kept the other Bastion

Cccc 3

sted

The Lord of Chaumont tak-eth the Polle-sin of Roigo.

The Vincen-tine commissioners craue pardon of the Prince of An-halt.

The Vincen-
tines yeeld themselves to the victors mercy.

The French be-liege Legnaga.

Legnaga taken.

The death of the Cardinal
of Amboise.

flod throw the Marshes : The castle yeelded soone after, on this condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen should remaine prisoners, and the souldiers should depart with white wands in their hands. There did the Lord of Chaumont receiue newes of the death of the Cardinall of Amboise his vncke, whereat the Pope made great shew of contentation, thinking that so long as he liued he should euer haue an enemy : And so much he told the Venetian Ambassador, discoursing with him concerning other occurrents.

The Lord of Chaumont
takes diuers places which stopped the Emperours com-ming into Italy.

The Lord of Chaumont hauing left for the gard of Legnaga an hundred Launces with a thousand footmen, determined to returne into the Dutchy of Milan, according to the Kings command, but by the Emperours entreaty he was countermanded till the month of Iune were ended, by which time the Emperour promised to come into Italy : and to the end his coming downe might bee more easie, the Almaines desiring to recouer Marostic, Ciuitella, Balciana, and other places neere about, the Lord of Chaumont came and encamped with his army at Longare, to keepe the Venetians troups from entering into Vincenza, wher was a weak Garrison: but the Venetian army was retired to Padua.

The Almaines who were ioyned with the Lord of Chaumont went to Torricelles, then to Ciuitella, which soone yeelded; the like did Marostic, Balciana and other places not farre from thence, which were abandoned by the Venetians. From thence they marched towards Escalla which the Almaines did much desire to take, because it was a commodious passage for those companies which were to come forth of Germany, but they could not passe forward : for the peasants wonderfully affecting the Venetians, had possessed diuers places in the mountaine: so that hauing taken Castelnoua by composition, which is likewise a passage in that mountaine, they returned to the Brenta, where they had formerly bene quartered.

From thence the Prince of Anhalt did by an other way send diuers foot-companies towards Escalla, who passing by Felre did spoile and burne it: then being come to the place of Escalla, they found it wholly abandoned, and Couola likewise. The Country of Friul was no lesse ruined and assaulted on euery side, now by the Venetians, and then by the Almaines, now defended by some, then spoiled by others: There was nothing to be seene euery where, but dead bodies, and burnt and sackt places. The time drawing neere that the French army was to depart, the Emperour and the French King made new couenants together, That the army should remaine there the next whole moneth following, and that the King should lend him fiftie thousand crownes, to defray extraordinarie expences, and for the payment of the foote-men that moneth, and the King should receiue in pawne Verona, with her whole territory, as well for these fiftie thousand crownes, as for the other fifty thousand which had bene lent him before.

Verona and her territory pawne to the King for a hundred thousand crownes.

Inregard of this agreement, the King sent to command the Lord of Chaumont to remaine there, who soone resolued to assaile Monselesia, to pluck forth that thorne from his foote, for which he made preparation so soone as foure hundred Spanish Launces were arriued, sent by the Catholike King to the Emperours aide. Hauing then together crossed the Riuer Brenta, and that of Baquilan at the village of Purle, they came to Monselesia, which is a towne seated on the plaine at the foote of the hill which is very high, on the topp whereof is a castle; and on the backe thereof, which as it goeth on waxeth more narrow, there are three enclosures of walles: The towne was on a sodaine abandoned, and the French men being quartered in it beganne to batter the first wall, where-in hauing made a reasonable breach in diuers places, the French and Spaniards being come to the assault, those within it after a slight defence beganne to retire in such disorder, as the French and Spaniards hauing already entred the first first wall, did in skirmishing enter pell-mell with them, into the other two, and then euen to the Castle, where the most part of them being slaine, the others retired into the Dongeon, where yeelding vpon discretion they were massacred by the Almains, who hauing not men to keepe that place, did raze the Castle and burne the Towne.

Monselesia with her castle taken & razed

This exploit being executed, the armies retired, albeit the Almains did incite the Lord of Chaumont to goe and beseege Treuifo, but he answered them, that if the Emperour had come against the Venetians, with his promised forces, it had bene an easie matter to haue done it, but that those who were ioyned with him, were brought to a small number, and not sufficient for such an enterprife, seeing that within Treuifo, there were store of souldiers, and besides, the Venetians had greatly fortified it, and last of all, that there was no more victuals to be found, in the country.

During these exploits, a new commandement came to the Lord of Chaumont, from France, to retire speedily with his army, into the Dutchy of Milan, leauing foure hundred Lances, and fiftene hundred Spanish foote-men, paid by the King to accompany the Almains, the which hee did, vnder command of the Lord of Perfi, and him-selfe speedily marched whether hee was sent for: For the Pope would neuer haue abfolued the Venetians from the censures; nor prazitized the Swisses alliance, but onely to bring to passe, that which he had determined in his minde, not onely to reintegrate diuers states to the Church, which hee sayd did belong vnto it, but like-wise to driue the French King forth of Italy; who not desiring to make warre on the Church, and wishing by all means to auoid the hatred thereof, did agree to make new conuentions with him. But the more that the King drew neere to the Popes demandes, the farther was the Pope from coming to any agreement, and seemed to be displeased with nothing, but for that the King had taken the Duke of Ferrara into his protection; whom hee extremely hated: where-vpon the King propounded diuers Articles to giue him content; but hee would not accept of any one. At the last hee craued that he should absolutely quit the Dukes protection. The King replying, That in so doing he should incurre great dishonor, he answered, That seeing the King refused it, he would neither bee his friend, nor his enemy.

The Lord of Chaumont
with his forces returneth to the Dutchy of Milan.

The Popes discontent against
the King.

These were the outward behauiours of the Pope, but hee beganne secretly to treat of greater matters then against the Duke of Ferrara, seeing that hee had the Swisses on his side, and that the Venetians were on foote againe, and also because the King of Arragon was not sincerely conioyned with the French Kings. That the Emperours forces were weake, and for that hee was not out of hope to cause the King of England to sitre. The Pope then working very secretly, would haue Genoa to bee besieged at one time, by sea and land; that twelue thousand Swisses should come downe into the Dutchy of Milan; that the Venetians with all their forces should come into the field, to recouer the Cities held by the Emperour; and that his owne army should enter the Ferrarois, meaning afterward to cause it to march into the Dutchy of Milan, vpon the good successe of the Swisses enterprife.

The Popes secret practises.

In the meane time hee caused it cunningly to bee giuen forth, that the Swisses preparations and his owne, were but onely to assaile Ferrara on the sodaine. But the coming of Lodouico Fiesco to Genoa, for the King, with eight hundred men of the country, did assure the Citty, and brake all the Popes delignes; with those of the Bandetti. On the other side the Popes army had entred Romagna, vnder the command of the Duke of Vrbin, who hauing taken the townes of Lugo, Bagnacuallo, and diuers other places on the hither side the Po; did encampe before the Castle of Lugo: but being aduerted that the Duke of Ferrara was coming thither with great forces, he on a sodaine raised his seege and retired.

Genoa assured
for the King.

retired to Imola, leaving beehind them three peeces of ordnance for a prey to the enemy.

Alphonso then recovered all that which had bin taken from him in Romagna, but he did not long hold it: for the Popes army being increased, it recovered with ease, the aboue named place, and the Castle of Lugo likewise, and soone after the City of Modena, for which Duke Alphonso could not prouide: but the losse of the same towne was the cause, that hee speedily prouided for Regio, fearing the like mishap as had forfurned to Modena.

The Swisses on the other side, (the confederacy betwixt the French King, and them being expired, certaine Monthes before,) being vexed that the King had denied their demands, had determined in an assembly held at Lucerna to rise against him: The Lord of Chaumont hauing notice of their determination, and being vncertaine which way they would enter, placed strong Gardes on Coma's side, tooke all boates forth of the lake, he brought victuals into strong places, and tooke away the Mill-stones from Mills: Besides, fearing least by Saint Bernards Mount, they might passe into Piedmont, hee had procured the Duke of Sauoy to deny them passage, and by the same Dukes consent, hee sent five hundred Lances to Yuree for that purpose. The Swisses being animated (as hath bene said) against the King, and paid by the Pope, sixe thousand of them without Artillery came by the way of Bellinona, and hauing taken the bridge of Trefe, which was forsaken by fixe hundred French foote-men, they came and encamped at Varesa, waiting for (as they said) the Bishop of Syon, with new companies.

The Swisses comming did greatly trouble the French, because a great part of their forces was distributed for the gard of the strong towne of the Dutchy, and an other part thereof was ioyned with the Almains army against the Venetians: Yet neuerthelesse, the Lord of Chaumont hauing assembled, all the power hee could, came with five hundred Lances, and foure thousand foot-men into the plaine of Chastillon two Miles from Varesa. Foure thousand Swisses more came, and ioyned in that place with the former six thousand, and all of them together sent to the Lord of Chaumont, to demand passage, saying that they were going for the Churches seruice, but it being refused them the fourth day after their arriual, they all marched towards Chastillon, and in their march they Valliantly defended themselves against the French army, who was still at their side, and skirmished with them in front, and in flanke, and they answered them in like manner, no disorder being seene among them.

After they had in this manner passed along, into diuers places, the Lord of Chaumont still attending on them, they came at last to the bridge of Trefe, and from thence in troopes retired home into their country, being brought to the extremity of hunger, and want of mony, which inforced them to retire. If the Popes defeigne had taken effect, which was to haue assailed the French, in diuers and sundry places at once, their affaires would haue succeeded badly, but the enterprise of Genoa, was long before the Swisses comming.

The Venetians also tarried longer, then they thought to haue done, who comming from Padua, recovered without any difficulty, Este, Monfelfia, Montagnana, Marostia, and Basciana, and passing forward, they entred the Vincentine Territory, the Almains being retired to Verona: So as in a very short space they recovered whatsoeuer they had lost the yeare before (Legnaga excepted,) and not satisfied here-with, they came, and besieged Verona, where lay three hundred Spanish Lances, a hundred as well Almains as Italians, and more then foure hundred French Lances, five hundred foote-men and foure thousand Almains, under the command of the Prince of Anhalt, who not long before dyed.

The

The people of Verona not affecting the Almains, had taken armes, and therein consisted the Venetians chiefe hope, expecting when they within the city would rise in their behalfe. The Venetian Army was of eight hundred men at Armes, three thousand light horse, the most of whom were Stradiots, and ten thousand foot, with great numbers of husbandmen. They began with great fury to batter the cities walls, (notwithstanding that the townes artillery did greatly hurt them) and they did beat downe a great part of the wall, euen to the scarp: yet neuerthelesse, it was more valiantly defended then assailed, wherevpon the Venetian Capitaines being discouraged, perceiuing likewise that the people were quiet in the city, they determined to raise their Campe, and made hast so to doe, vpon intelligence, that the Lord of Chaumont, (who after the Swisses departure, hauing notice of the danger wherein Verona was) marched thether to their reliefe.

The Venetians being retired to Saint Martins, five miles from Verona, marched to Boniface, in regard of the Lord of Chaumonts comming. In the meane time, Vladislaus King of Hungary, being solicited by Maximilian and the French King, did at the same time call Petro Pascalic, Ambassador for the Signory in Hungary into his counsell chamber, and told him that his meaning was to make warre vpon them, vnlesse they yielded vp Slaonia vnto him, which did in times past belong vnto his crowne, and that he was resolu'd to haue it: That if the commonwealth would freely redeliuer it, hee would for euer remaine their friend and confederate, otherwise hee would let them know how much better it were to yield vp in friendship, that which they could not keepe by force. The Ambassador vpon this demand beginning to excuse the Senate, was not suffered to speake, and all the fauour hee could get was, To say that hee would aduertise the Senate thereof, craving time that hee might receiue an answer: But at the comming forth of the Council, certaine of those who had bene there present, did in secret bid the Ambassador not to bee discouraged, and told him, that their King for want of meanes could not make warre vpon them, but that those threatnings were onely to content the French King and the Emperor, who requested it, and some Hungarian Lords, who for their owne particular ambition, incited him therevnto, the which successe of that businesse prouoed afterward to be true.

Now to returne to the Venetian Armie which was retired to Saint Boniface, those of Trensio tooke the towne of Azola by composition, whilest in the Frioull they proceeded with the vsuall cruelties and variations, in destroying buildings, and spoiling the countrey. The Marquis of Mantua was at the same time deliuered from his imprisonment by the Popes meanes, who did greatly affect him, meaning to make vse of him and his Estate in his warre against the French King. Others say, that it was by the meanes of Bajazet Emperor of Turkes, who was a great friend to the Marquis, who caused the Bayliffe of the Venetian Marchants, trading at Pera, to promise that the Senate should set him at liberty, the which was speedily done, because they would not incense so mighty a Prince against them.

The Pope was againe desirous to make an attempt on the City of Genoa, promising to him selfe more then euer the alteration of that State: Wherevpon the Venetians, rather of necessity, then for any liking to his furious motions, did augment their sea Armie which lay at Ciuita vecchia, with foure great ships, the like did the Pope, adding one Galeasse, with certaine other vessels to his owne: This fleet departing thence, wherein were fifteene light Gallies, three great Gallies, one Galeasse, and three ships of Biscay, went and shewed themselves before the haue of Genoa. But the City being kept in such manner, as not any of contrary faction durst stirre, and the Ordnance of the tower of Codifa playing continually vpon them, they were constrained to retire: and being come to Portouenere, dispairing likewise of dooing any good there, it returned to Ciuita vecchia, from whence the Venetian vessels departing home-wards by the Popes consent,

Verona being seized,
The number of the Venetian Army.

The Venetians raise their Campe from before Verona.

The King of Hungary summons the Venetian Ambassador.

The Venetians take Azola.

The Marquis of Mantua is set at liberty.

Enterprise upon Genoa.

The Popes army takes Modena.

Six thousand Swisses come to Varesa against the King.

The six thousand Swisses returne home into their country for want of victuals and mony.

The Venetians recover all the places which had bin taken by the French.

The Venetian fleet shew'd by a tempest.

consent, were assailed by a terrible tempest, in which five Galleis were cast away, the residue being driven vpon the coast of Barbary, did in the end come into the Venetians hauens much broken.

In this manner nothing fell out luckily for the Pope of all that he had enterprized against the French King: for no commotion arose in Genoa as hee had confidently promised to him-selfe; the Venetians also attempted in vaine to take Verona, and the Swisses, who had rather shewed then brandished their armes, returned, and went on no farther: and in Ferrara, by reason of the speedy aid of the French who were come thither ther was no likelihood of any danger Modena only taken by stealth, remained to him.

Yet neuertheless the Venetians alone tooke his part, because his enterprizes proceeded not from any particular interest, but from a sole and sincere desire of the liberty of Italy, but he could not hope much from them, by reason their treasure was exhausted, and them-selues oppressed with sondry difficulties. The French King heeing by so many experiences assured of the Popes bad meaning towards him, determined to strengthen him-selfe as much as he might with the Emperors friendship, and to passe in person the spring following into Italy, to make warre on the Venetians, or on the Pope, according as the state of his affaires should permit.

The end of the eight Booke of the fourth Decade.

*The Contents of the ninth Booke of the
fourth Decade.*

Ich what boldnesse and resolution Pope Iulius marched against the Duke of Ferrara, and beeing not able to overcome him by temporall armes, he vsed spirituall; A Generall Council published at Lions. A new Confederacy, as well offensive as defensive, betwixt the Emperor and the French King. How greatly the marche of the French Army toward Bologna, did affright the Pope and all his Cardinals. The Lord of Chaumonts retireate into the Duchy of Milan. The Duke of Ferrara defeateth the Venetians nauall Army. The Popes Army taketh the City of Concordia. Mirandolo taken by the Confederates. The King doth wholly resolute to make warre on the Pope. The Death of the Lord of Chaumont, whereupon Triulcio is made Generall of the Army. A great Earthquake at Venice, and in the Countrey neere adioyning. The Popes Army is defeated before the Bastida Geniuola. The French Kings discontent for that the Emperor consenteth to a peace with the Venetians. The King of Arragons secret practises against the French King. The Cardinall of Pavia flies from Bologna at the arriual of the French. The flight of the Duke of Vrbin, Generall of the Popes Army. Death of the Cardinall of Pavia, slaine by the Duke of Vrbin. The French King greatly desireth to bee at peace with the Pope. How the Venetians did still maintaine their forces and greatnesse. A new confederacy betwixt the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians. The Swisses come downe into the Duchie of Milan. The Army of the Confederates, before Bologna, the which is releued by Gaston of Foix. And lastly how the Confederates Army dislodgeth from before Bologna.

The ninth Booke of the fourth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

10

The Popes
great resolution on against the Duke of Fer-
rara.

He Pope continuing his displeasure against the Duke of Ferrara, omitted all other designs onely to pursue this: and to this end hee came to Bologna, at the later end of September, by his prefence to hasten matters, and to give the greater authority to his affaires, resolving to assaill Ferrara both by land and water, with all his owne forces, and those of the Venetians, who at his request sent two armed fleets against Ferrara, which being entred into the Po by the Fornaces, and by the haven of Primara made great spoile on the Ferrara territory: the like did the Popes forces at the same time, and yet they came not neere to Ferrara, where besides the Dukes forces, were two hundred and fifty French lances, and the Popes army was not sufficient to assaile the City by land. For albeit the Pope gaue pay for eight hundred men at Armes, six hundred light horse, and six thousand foote; the complete number of so many was greatly wanting: as also for that by his command Make Anthony Colonna, and John Vistelli were gone with two hundred men at armes, and three hundred foote, for the gard of Modena. In regard whereof he requested, (seeing that the Venetians had in a manner recovered the country of Friull,) that part of their army might be brought on the Ferrarois. He did more-over expect three hundred lances, which the King of Arragon was bound to send him, according to the articles of the inuestiture of the realme of Naples, making account vpon the arriual of all these forces to assaile Ferrara for his part, and that the Venetians should doe the like for theirs; hee perswaded him-selfe that the people of the City would forth-with take armes in his belasse against the Duke, and hee would not harken to those who told him, That it would not so fall out, in regard of the garrison within it, which was sufficient to defend the City, and to hinder the people (if they were so bent) from reuolting.

40

The Venetians
intelligence vpon Bressia discovered.

About the same time an intelligence, which the Venetians had on the City of Bressia was discovered, the Author whereof Earle Iohn Maria of Martinenga was beheaded there.

The Ferrarois defeateth two fleets of the Venetians.

Now the Pope perseuering in his hope, did promise to him-selfe though all his other forces should faile, to be able to take Ferrara with his owne, and the Venetian fleets, notwithstanding all the reasons given by his Captaines to the contrary; but he found him-selfe to be deceived. For the Duke comming forth of Ferrara, did assaill the Venetians fleete, which was entred by Primaria, and comming to Hadria with two Galleis, two Fusts, and with diuers small boates, hee did easily defeat it: then hee went to meet with the other, the which consisting onely of fustles, and other small vessells had entred by the fornaces, and was come to Puliffella; which attempting to retire into the riuier Adice, by a channell neere at hand, it could not by reason of the shallownesse of the water: where-vpon being assailed, and beaten with the enemies ordnance, those of the fleet not being able to

to defend it were enforced to forsake it; and to vse meanes to saue them-selves and their ordnance. The Pope perceiuing that his temporal armes, were not of force to execute his designs, made vie of spiritual; and did publicly excommunicate Alphonso of Este, and all those who were or should come to his aid, and namely the Lord of Chaumont, and all the cheefe persons of the French army.

The Pope ex-
communicateth Alphonso of Este and all his adherents.

The French King, who already vpon the Popes behauiour determined to call a generall counsell against him, and had caused all the prelates of his Kingdoms, to meete at Orleans and after wards at Tours, hauing notice of his Ecclesiasticall censure, executed so rashly vpon his subiects, was of opinion in this assembly where he was present diuers times, that before hee would free him-selfe from his obedience to send Ambassadors to him, to aduertise him of the articles concluded on by the French Clergy, against which if hee thought to except, he should be cited to the generall counsell, which all Christian Princes had determined should be assembled by a certaine day. According to this resolution, the Counsell was published at Lyons, against the first day of March next ensuing.

A Gentrell
counsell published at Lyons.

Within a while after, the Bishop of Gurcia, sent from the Emperor arrived at Tours where his entertainment was sumptuous, which shewed how greatly his comming was desired: with whome the King continuing, to treat of matters which had already beene handled, at the first they seemed to bee very easie, but they were afterwards drawne forth at length, as well by reason that the Emperors answers were very slow, as for the doubt they made of the King of Arragon: The Emperor and the French King thought it fit to bee assured of his intent, as well in regard of the continuation of the League of Cambray, as for that which was to be done with the Pope, if hee perseuered in the Venetians trindship, and in his couetousnesse to purchase immediately the demaine of Ferrara to the Church. The Catholike King, hauing answered all these demandes, and his intent being fully knowne: the bishop of Gurcia on the one side, in the name of the Emperor, and the French king on the other, did passe a new confederacy together, reseruing place for the Pope to enter into it, within two moneths after, and for the Catholike King, and the King of Hungary within foure. The King promised to giue the Emperor a hundred thousand crownes, the one halfe to bee paid presently, and the other halfe at a time prefixed; and the Emperor promised to passe into Italy against the Venetians, at the spring time, with three thousand horse and ten thousand foote: and that then the King should send him, at his owne charge, twelue hundred horse, and eight thousand foote, with store of artillery, and certaine shipes by sea.

The Bishop of Gurcia comes mer into France from
the Emperor.

New confederacy betwixt
the Emperor
and the French
King.

But during these treaties in France with the Bishoppe of Gurcia, the Lord of Chaumont hauing recovered Carpi, determined by the soliciting of the Bentiuoles, on a fodaine to assaile the city of Bologna, wherein the Pope and his whole Court lay, in regard of the faire occasion which was presented, there being in the City but a few strange souldiours. In this determination hee set forward, and hauing taken Spilimberta, and Castelfranco hee came and lodged at Crespolana, ten miles from Bologna, meaning the next day to shew him-selfe before the gates. His comming being diuulged through the City, and that the Bentiuoles were with him, it was filled with confusion and tumult. The Cardinals and Prelats not accustomed to the dangers of warre, came to the Pope, complaining for that hee had exposed the sea Apostolike and them-selves to so greate danger, beseeching him to vse meanes to appeale matters, by the mildest composition hee could. The Ambassadors of the Emperor, the Catholike King, and the King of England made the like request. Him-selfe alone in so great confusion and disorder, vncertaine of the peoples fidelity, and discontented for that the Venetians aid was so slow, did obstinately resist all their importunities. But being at last ouer-come by the prayers and entreaties of so many, hee did consent to haue a messenger sent to the Lord of Chaumont to know of him whether

The French
army marcheth toward Bologna whence the Pope lay.

Dddd

John

John Francisco Pico Earle of Mirandola, might safely come vnto him from the Pope. The Lord of Chaumont being assured of the King his Maisters minde, who desired nothing more then to be at peace with the Pope, did freely condescend to the Earle of Mirandas coming to him, who being arrived he gently heard, and sent him backe the same day to Bologna, to signifie to the Pope the conditions, whereon he was contented to make an accord, who loone returned with an answer. The Pope hauing contrary to his custome, patiently heard the articles propounded by the Lord of Chaumont, together with the entreaties of the Cardinals who becoughe him with incredible affection to compound howsoever, did greatly complaine for that they propounded ouer hard conditions to him, and seeming greatly to doubt, hee spent that day without declaring, what his intent was. But the arrivall of Chiapin vistelli at Bologna with six hundred light horse of the Venetians, with a Squadron of Turkes whom they kept in pay, did increase his hope.

The Lord of Chaumont came the day following with his whole army and quartered it at the bridge of Rene, three miles from Bologna, whether the Ambassadors of the Emperor, and the Kings of England, and Arragon, came to see him, who returned diuers times the same day (and with them Albert Pico) toward the Pope and the Lord of Chaumont. But the disposition of either of them was much changed: For the Pope had taken courage, perceiving the people of Bologna freely to shew themselves in the Churches behalfe, and that besides these companies that were arrived, he expected the same day two hundred Stradiots from the Venetians, Fabricio Colonna with two hundred light horse, and certain Spanish men at Armes. On the contrary, the Lord of Chaumont beganne to distrust the getting of the victory, perceiving that the people did not rise in fauour of the Bentiuoles, as they had promised him, and that he began to want victuals, the which was likely to grow greater every day: The Pope by means hereof beginning againe his vniual braues, answered, vpon new conditions of peace which were propounded, That there was no meanes to come to an agreement, vnlesse the French Kinge would be bound wholly to giue ouer the defence of Ferrara; where vpon the whole businesse remaining imperfect, the Lord of Chaumont departed thence, as wel by reason of the want of victuals which were greatly diminished, as because he dispaired of doing any good, either by armes or by treaties of peace, and returned to Castel-Franco, and the next day to Rubiero, making shew that hee did it to giue the Pope time to thinke on what he had propounded, and for him selfe to vnderstand the Kings pleasure. The Pope being extremely incensed against the king, so soone as the Lord of Chaumont was departed, complained of the king, & told the Ambassadors, that he would no more giue care to peace, vnlesse Ferrara were first of all yeilded to him, where vpon he leuiued new forces, and incited the Venetians to send part of their forces to Modena, to ioyne with his, & to molest Ferrara with the other part, promising to himselfe in a short space to take Regio, Rubiera and Ferrara. If the forces of the Pope, the Venetians, and the Spanish lances vnited together had forthwith marched against the French, it was certainly thought that the Lord of Chaumont would haue forsaken Regio, but their delay encouraged him, and caused him to leuiue new companies of foote in sted of those whom hee had called at his discamping from before Bologna. Whilest the Popes army, and that of his associates did remporise neere to Modena, the Duke of Ferrara with the French companies, which were commanded by the Lord Castillon, encamped on the Po, iust opposite to the Venetian companies who lay on the farther side of the river; they making a retreat, were assailed by diuers boates of Ferrara and by the Dukes ordnance, which sank eight of their vessells, and the residue hardly escaped. On the other side, the Popes army, commanded by Fabricio Colonna in the absence of the Marquis of Mantua, did beseege Sassuola the which being beaten with the artillery was taken by assault

The Earle of Mirandola sent from the Pope to the Lord of Chaumont.

The Pope takes courage, at the coming of supplies.

The Lord of Chaumont dis-trusts the victory.

The Lord of Chaumont retireth from Bologna.

The Pope returneth to his former wrath.

The Duke of Ferrara assails with the Venetians usual
Army.

The Popes army taketh Sassuola.

and the Castle within a while after. Sassuola being taken, the Pope would haue Montechia, a very strong place, to be beseege, but Fabricio Colonna would not do it, saying, that his King had expressly forbidden him to meddle with any thing that did belong to the Empire.

The Lord of Chaumont, according to the meaning of the King his maister, hauing placed a strong garrison in Regio, went to Parma resolving to remporise till the spring. The Pope being impatient to see his designs not executed, notwithstanding the sharpnesse of the season, sent for all his Captaines to Bologna, and propounded to them the siege of Ferrara, and notwithstanding their general dislike of the matter (the Venetians excepted) they at last resolved, (to please him) first to assaile Mirandola, thereby to take from the French all means of hindering the siege of Ferrara afterward, and the relieuing thereof: and by the same meanes to beseege as they went along, the City of Concorda, which held for the King. This being determined was likewise executed: for being come before Concorda, they forthwith tooke it by force, and the castle by composition: then they drew neere to Mirandola, whether the Pope came in person, thinking that his soldiers went slowly to worke, and that his presence would aduance the businesse, preferring the fury and heate of his spirit before all other respects: albeit the Cardinals did earnestly entreat him not to go thither, and that the Venetians who were his greatest fauorits, did blame him for it. In regard of his presence, complaints, promises and threatenings, all things were set forward more then otherwise they would haue beene; and yet neuertheless the sharpnes of the weather, and many other difficulties oppugning it, no great matter was performed.

Those within Mirandola did brauely defend it (who were commanded by Alexander Triuulcio seconded by foure hundred stranger footmen) vpon hope that they should be releued, but the contention betwixt the Lord of Chaumont, and John Iacamo Triuulcio was cause of the losse of the place: for the Lord of Chaumont preferring his owne passion before the Kings profit, was glad that the 30 Nephewes of Triuulcio might be deprived of Mirandola: and therefore he excused his sending of reliefe by reason of the difficulty to bring ordnance thither in so cold a season, by so bad waies, and through such deep snow as the like had not bene seene of a long time before, which were things greatly to be considered.

The Pope on the contrary omitted nothing for the obtaining of the victory, whereby those within the towne being out of hope to be releued, and fearing that they should not be able to resist the first assault, in regard of the great breach which the enemies ordnance had made, sent messengers to the Pope, to certifie him that they would yeeld, so their liues and goods might be spared: albeit the Pope would not at first tye himselfe to saue the soldiers liues, yet neuertheless he 40 did at last agree to it at the earnest entreatie of his followers and the inhabitants that redeemed the sack of their towne which had been promised to the soldiers. The Castle in like manner yeilded. The Pope by the taking of Mirandola, hoping as suddenly to get Ferrara, would no more giue care to any talke of peace, vnlesse first of all Ferrara were yeilded to him. The French King on the other side, hauing notice of the losse of Mirandola, and considering how greatly it did blemish his reputation, perceiving likewise that the Pope continued in his displeasure against him, resolved to assaile him: therefore he sent word to the Lord of Chaumont not only to defend Ferrara, but to offend the Churches lands vpon the first occasion that should be offered: For which, the Lord of Chaumont making preparation, and hauing assembled his whole army, he made the Pope to alter his minde, who by the aduice of his Captaines went back to Bologna, and from thence within a while after to Rauenna.

The French Army being ready to march, the Captaines consulted on what place to make their first attempt: some were of opinion to goe directly,

The Popes proposition to the Captains of his
Army.

Concorda taken by the Popes Army.

The Cause of the Kings losse of Mirandola.

Those of Mirandola yeeld, vpon safety of their liues and goods.

The different opinions of the French Cap-
taines

to assaile the enemies in their trenches, hoping by force of armes and by the fury of the artillery, easily to enforce them to retire, and by that meanes to free Ferrara from all danger. Others were of a contrary opinion, and the chiefe of those was Triulcio, who was newly come from France, who hauing declared the danger of assailing the enemies army in their fortification, counselled them to march towards Modena, or Bolognia, hoping if the enemies did remouue, for feare of losing any of those townes, to fight with them, and to obtaine the victory: and if they did not remouue, they might then with ease take the one or other of them.

This was Triulcio's opinion, but it was not followed, the better thereby to diminish his authority, in regard of the hatred wiche the Lord of Chaumont did beare him: as also because that Alonso of Este, did vrge them to follow the former opinion, for feare that if the French should goe farre from thence, the enemies might enter into the Possession of Ferrara, a matter which would greatly haue augmented the Citties disafe. But the Lord of Chaumont hauing vnderstood by the way, the great difficulty which was made to come to Finall where the enemies were encamped, by reason of the waters which ouer-flowed the country neere adioyning, he beganne greatly to doubt, for the cleering whereof, notwithstanding that Alonso did perswade him to the contrary, he assembled the council, where Triulcio being entreated openly to deliuer what he thought thereof, spake in this manner.

Triulcio
his oration in defence of his opinion.

Did yesterday hold my peace, because I haue often-times knowne by experience, that my counsell hath beene lightly esteemed, the which if it had beene followed at the beginning, wee should not at this present be where wee are, nor haue lost so many daies vainely, which might haue beene spent with more profit, and I should now continew in the same opinion to bee silent, if I were not spurred forward by the importance of the matter, in regard wee now stand on termes, to commit to the most vncertaine hazard of one day, this army, the state of the Duke of Ferrara, and the Duchy of Milan, which is to great a cast except wee reserve some what to play afterwards. Besides, that which prouoketh mee to speake, is, for that as I imagine, the Lord of Chaumont desireth that I should bee the first to counsell that which he already beginneth to tast and thinke well of: Which is no new thing with me, because I haue heretofore knowne my counsels to be lesse contemned, when it is needfull to retract some what which peraduenture hath not beene maturely determined, then when the first determinations are to bee made. We treat of going to fight with the enemy, and I haue alwaies obserued that great Capitaines, haue held for a firme ground, (the which I haue like-wisely knowne by experience,) that a man neuer ought to hazard the fortune of a battaill, vnlesse he be inuited thereunto by some great aduantage, or enforced by vrgent necessity: for it is according to the reason of warre, that it belongeth to the enemies who are the assailants, and who are in the field for the conquest of Ferrara, to seeke to assaill vs; and our Capitaines whose part is to defend, ought not to attempt to assaill them, contrary to all rules of Martiall discipline. But let vs consider what aduantage wee haue, -or what necessity inforceth vs to it. It seemeth vnto me, and I doe not altogether deceiue my selfe, that it is a matter very apparent, that wee cannot do what the Duke of Ferrara propoundeth; but with our great disaduantage, because we cannot goe to that place, but by a causey and by a very narrow and bad way, where all our forces cannot display them-selues, and where the enemies may very well with small forces resist a greater number. Wee must march vpon the causey one horse after another, and wee must bring the artillery, carriage, wagons and bridges ouer this narrow causey. And who is it that knowes not that in a straight and foule way euery peece of ordnance, euery waggon that shall sticke fast

in

in the mire, will for a large houres space cause the whole army to make a stand. And that being pestered with so many incombances euery contrary accident, will easily disorder vs: The enemies are driely lodged, furnished with victuals and forage; we shal in a manner encampe in the open ayre, forrage is to be brought after vs, and we shal not be able but with great labour, to bring the one halfe of that we shal need: We must not referre our selues to that which ingeners saie, and to husbandmen which know the Country, because warres are managed by soldiers armes, and by Capitaines Councils: They are made by fighting in the field, and not by projects, which those that are ignorant of warres do figure forth in paper, or describe with their fingers, or with a stick in the dust. As for my selfe I doe not presuppose that the enemies are so weake, nor their affaires in such disorders, nor that in their lodging and fortification they haue had so small skill as not to helpe them-selues by the opportunity of the waters, and sytuations, as I can promise to my selfe, that so soone as we shal be com to the place whether we make account to goe, (albeit we could with ease ariue ther) that it lyeth in our power to assaile them, Such dry difficulties may enforce vs to tary ther two or three daies, and if there were none other let, the snow and rayne falling in so bad a season, will stay vs: And besides, how should we prouide victuals and forage, if it should fall out that we were to tary ther? And though it were in our power to assaile them, who is he that can so easily promise to himselfe the victory? Vnlesse he is it which considereth not how dangerous a matter it is to deale with enemies that are strongly encamped, and to haue to doe at one time with them, and with the discomforts of the countries situation. Vnlesse we can be able on a sodaine to reinforce them, we our selues shall be constrained to returne back. And how hard a matter will it be, in a country which is wholly our enemy, and where euery small mishap will prouoe very great. Besides, I see small reason, to put the Kings whole state in such precipitate danger, seeing we are chiefly in action for no other matter but for to releue the City of Ferrara, of which if we furnish it with a longer garrison we may be assured, (yea although we should breake vp our army,) for it is thought to be so much consumed, as if the enemies waight on it a little longer, it is impossible but it will shortly fall off it selfe. Is it not yet in our power to turne back, a most mighty remedy in warre, whereby without hazarding any one horse, we will enforce them to depart from before Ferrara: I haue euer counselled, and now counsell more then euer, to turne towards Modena or Bolognia keeping the broad way, and to fortifie Ferrara for a few daies, (for it will not be long) with all things necessary. Now in mine opinion it is best to go forthwith to Modena, wherunto the Cardinall of Este doth prouoke vs, who is a personage of great state, in which Towne he doth assure vs to haue intelligence, and that we may easily take it. For by winning a place of so great importance, the enemies shal be enforced to retire on a sodaine towards Bolognia. And although we should not take Modena, yet the feare which would possesse the enemies, as well for that as for the state of Bolognia, will constayne them to doe the like, as without all doubt they would long ere this haue done, if at the first this opinion had beene followed. The great reasons of this wise Capitaine was approoued by all men, by meanes wherof the Lord of Chaumont hauing strongly man'd Ferrara with soldiers for her safety, held on his way towards Carpi, from thence to march to Modena.

But the Pope by the king of Arragons counsell hauing restored it to the Emperour, to auoid so many discontentes and to quiet his mind, which was displeased for that the Pope had sealed on it, it being euer accounted a City of the irridiction of the Empire, was cause that the Lord of Chaumont being certefied of this restauration, desisted from his enterprise: who within a while after falling sick was brought to Corregia, where fiftene daies after he dyed, hauing before his death very deuoutly acknowledged the faults which he had committed against

Did d d j.

the

The French
Army marcheth towards Modena.

the Church; and besought the Pope to giue him absolution, the which hee freely graunted.

By his death John James Triuulce, gouerned the Army because hee was one of the four Marshall of France, vnto whome (the Generall of the Army beeing dead,) the gouernment belonged, by the customes of France, vntill the King hath otherwise disposed thereof.

A great earth-quake at Venice.

There happened at the same time a great Earth-quake in Venice, whereby part of the walls of the Ducall pallace fell downe, with the Marble statues in Saint Markes Church, which had bene set vp for the beautifying of the building, the steeples of Churches were shaken, and the Bells rang of them selues: The waters of the canals did swell, diuers houses and chimneys fell downe, wherewith infinite numbers of people were slaine, sundry women with child dyed: But Gods pleasure was that it lasted not long, whereupon the Patriarchs commanded prayers to be made ouer all the City, with fasting for three daies space, with bread and water. The like Earth-quake happened soone after at Padua, Treviso, Vdina, and in other places and territories belonging to the common wealth.

The Pope, for as defeated before the Bastid Geniuola.

Now Triuulce commanding the Army, returned with all his forces to Semidi, to goe to releue the Bastid Geniuola, which the Popes Army beleaged; and whether the Venetian fleet was going. But he went off no farther, hauing notice in that place, that the Duke of Ferrara, with the Lord Chastillon, and the French forces, were gone forth with great numbers of soldiers, and had defeated the enemies, whome they found in disorder; and taken their ensignes and Arillery.

The Emperor Maximilian inclineth to peace.

During these warlike exploits, the designs of the Princes were sundry, and vncertaine, especially those of the Emperor, who being by nature variable, and inconstant, and solicited by the Kings of Arragon, an enemy to the French name, and jealous of the French Kings greatness, determined to listen to peace; notwithstanding that he had concluded before with the French King, by means of the Bishoppe of Gurcia, to make warre withall his might on the Venetians, at the spring; and to this end wrote at one time to the Pope, and the French King, that he was resolved to send the Bishop of Gurcia to Mantua, to treat of an vniuersall peace, requesting them to send their Ambassadors thither likewise with full and ample power: hee wrote nothing to the Venetians; knowing that they would doe what so euer pleased the Pope, whose authority they were enforced to follow.

The King did please with this new determination.

This aduice pleased the Pope, ypon hope to reconcile the Venetians to him, and to disunite them from the French King, whereto he chiefly aimed. But the King was not contented with such an vn hoped for determination, as well for feare of the determination of matters concluded with him: as also for the doubt hee had, that the Pope thorow faire promises to aide him in the conquest of the Dutchy of Milan, and to giue a Cardials Hat to the Bishoppe of Gurcia, might separate him from his party: He was well assured, that it was the practise of the King of Arragon, and knew very well that his Ambassador with the Emperor had labored, and did openly labour, for the agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians; and did vse diuers other practises to contradict his designs; and among others, did hotly oppose him selfe against the conuocation of a generall councill vnder colour of currellie, and caused the King his Maister to be earnest with him to make peace with the Pope, making in a manner a siter protestation to take Armes in the Popes behalfe if hee did not agree with him.

The King first sent the Bishop of Paris to Mantua.

The French King dissembling all these dealings, because hee would giue the Emperour no cause of discontent, resolved to send the Bishoppe of Paris to Mantua; and in the meane time aduertised John James Triuulce, that that his pleasure was to haue him to command the army, but that he should not assaile the Churches state, till the Bishop of Gurcia were arriued. Triuulce ypon this command turned his forces against the Venetians, and came to Stelara; then passing on farther, he surprized certaine Venetian caualery, and sent Gaston de Foix son to a sister of the kings, being very young, with a hundred men at armes, four hundred light horse, and five hundred foot to scoure euen to the enemies barriers: who did put those that kept them to flight and made them to retire to a strong place beyond the channell.

Gaston de Foix his interuiew.

In the meane space the Bishop of Gurcia came to Mantua, but later then hee was expected, where within a while after the Bishop of Paris arriued. The Pope entreated the Bishop of Gurcia to come and visit him, hoping by his presence, and authority, and by faire promises to winne him. The Bishop after diuers difficulties propounded and wel debated on, being solicited by the King of Arragons Ambassadors, consented thereto, on condition that the Bishop of Paris should stay at Parma, and expect what would fall out by his iourney.

The Pope great entertainment given to the Bishop of Gurcia at Bologna.

The Bishop of Gurcia arriuing at Bologna, whether the Pope was of purpose come to receiue him; there was so great honour done vnto him, as a King could not be entertained with greater magnificence: the Venetians Ambassador neere to the Pope, went to the city gates to meet him, yfing signes of very great submission; but the Bishop turning from him with mercurious pride and disdain shewed great discontent, because that representing the enemies of the Emperour his matter he had bene so bold as to come before him. That being done, he went with great pompe to the Consistory, where the Pope, accompanied by all the Cardinals, staid for him; And hauing breely declared the causes of his coming into Italy he returned to his lodging. The next day with great arrogancy, he conferred of diuers matters with the Pope, and especially, that if the Venetians did mean to haue peace with the Emperor, it behoued them in any case to restore whatsoeuer they detained which did belong to the Empire.

Speech of agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

Yet neuerthelesse they beganne after to treat of agreement betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians, where at the first diuers difficulties were made on both sides: at the last after long disputation, each party cutting off some peeces of the hard conditions propounded by them, it was thought that by the mediation of the King of Arragons Ambassadors; they would come to an agreement. But so soone as they beganne to speake of reconciling the Pope to the French King, betwixt whom appeared none other contention but concerning the Duke of Ferrara, and that the Bishop of Gurcia went to the Pope to make an end thereof, (because without that, the Emperour would conclude nothing) the Pope did sodainly interrupt him, requesting him to hold on with the Venetians, and not to talke of the affaires of Ferrara, being in a manner desirous to incite the Emperour against the French: whereupon the Bishop of Gurcia tooke his leave, and without effecting any thing returned from whence he came.

The Pope breaks off the treaty.

Triuulce petitioning the departure of the Bishop of Gurcia and by that means all hope of peace being lost, came into the field, and beleaged Concordia which he tooke the same day, and then marched towards Bomport a village seated on the Riuer Panare, that he might be nere the enemies, to the end that by cutting off their victuals he might enforce them to dislodge, or to fight forth of their campe. Entering into the countie of Modena, he vnderstood that John Paul Manfran was with three hundred light horse of the Venetians at Massa nere to Final; he sent Gaston de Foix thither with three hundred foot and five hundred horse, who found John Paul Manfran at a bridge in order of batraille, to stoppe his passage, but being forsaken by his owne souldiers hee was taken prisoner by the French, with some others.

Triuulce's death.

John Paul Manfran taken prisoner by Gaston de Foix.

Triuulce found means to passe the Channell to assaile the enemies who durst not tarry his coming. The Channell being passed, hee footed Panare without impediment impediment in a very broad place, and where the water is not deepe, and marched towards Plumacia, three miles off from the enemies army, which was the cause that Castel-franco yielded to him. He was there in great doubt what to doe: for on the one side, he would willingly haue assailed Bologna, if he had beene certain that the people would haue taken armes in the Bentiuoles behalfe: on the other side he feared, if he should come thither, vpon hope only of a popular commotion, to be enforced forthwith to depart thence as the Lord of Chaumont had done his great disgrace. At the last he determined to tempt Fortune, and to try by drawing neere to Bologna, if the particular intelligences of the Bentiuoles might stand him in any stead, and came and incamped at the bridge of Laina, five miles from Bologna.

The Pope so soone as the Bishop of Gurcia was departed, and that he understood that Triuinio marched with his army, left Bologna, determining to goe to his owne army, by his prefence to induce the captiues to fight, wherevnto he could not dispose them neither by letters nor messages, but being halfe-way on his journey, he came backe againe the day following: resolving to goe to Rauenna. Yet neuertheless before his departure, he was desirous to make some small exhortation to the Bologneses, whom he sent for to come and speake with him: and after he had declared vnto them how tharby the benefit of the Sea Apostolike, & by his means they were freed fro greivous tyranny, he requested them with greater seruencie then eloquence to continue faithfull vnto him, and to shew their generosities by valiantly defending themselves, and by that meanes to oblige to themselves: and the Sea Apostolike, both himselfe, and all the Popes which should succeed him.

To this exhortation they answered: that they were not ignorant how much the city was bound vnto him in particular for hauing driuen thence the tyrants, and therefore they were resolved to spend all their goods, to hazard the honour and safety of their wives and children, and to lose their owne liues, before they would quit his party or that of the Sea Apostolike.

The Pope on this assurance departed from Bologna, leauing the Cardinal of Pavia there, and went to Rauenna: but so soone as he was on his way and that Triuinio was come to the bridge of Laina, the Bolognois were troubled with sundry thoughts: some of them desired the returne of the Bentiuoles, others on the contrary, who shewed themselves their enemies, did fauour the Churches signory: so as all the people were in armes, some for one side and some for an other. The Cardinal being amazed thereat, did attempt for his owne assurance to draw capitaine Ramassotto into the city with a thousand foot (for in all that great and populous city there were but two hundred light horse, and two thousand foot) but the people would not suffer it: wherevpon the Cardinal in despair forsooke the palace by stealth in the night, in disguised habit, and came to the Citadell and from thence attended by a hundred horse, he tooke his way towards Imola.

The Legats flight being knowne, the whole city begunne to rife, which the faction of the Bentiuoles perceiving, they would not loose so faire an occasion, but ranne forthwith to the gates which were most commodious for the French campe, and brake them open, then they sent for the Bentiuoles, who came forth with a troupe of French horse. The Duke of Vrbino, Generall of the Churches army, hauing had some inkling of the Legats flight, did in great haste dislodge with his whole army, which was neere him: whereof Triuinio hauing notice, came to follow the run-awaies, and meeting with Raphael de Passi, who for a while made head, he fought with him and tooke him prisoner.

The Venetians companies with those of Ramassotto being lodged on the most, hauing intelligence of the Duke of *Vrbino*s flight did escape by the way of the mountains into Romagna, nor without great losse. The French worne in this victory, obtained without fight, sixtene peeces of great ordnance, with diuers

Triuinio
draweth neere to Bologna.

The Pope exhortation to the Bolognois.

The answer of the Bolognois
to the Pope.

Sundry thoughts of the Bolognois.

The flight of the Cardinal
of Pavia.

The Bentiuoles
with the French, are in Bologna.

The flight of
the Duke of Vrbino.

small ones as well of the Popes as of the Venetians, with a great part of the Churches baggage, and in a manner all that of the Venetians, and more then a hundred and fifty of their men at armes were stripped. There was not any one slaine in Bologna, nor no violence offered, diuers only of the Cardinals followers were taken in the palace, from whom he had concealed his departure, and the Popes statue was dragged by the people in great derision thorow the market-place. Triuinio after the taking of Bologna came to the Borrough of Saint Peter, to attend there before he went on any further the French Kings pleasure.

The Senate hauing notice of this rout sent word to the Prouidator Gritti, who determined to goe and assaile Legnua with his army, to desist from his enterprize, seeing their affaires had so bad successe at Bologna, and that he should haue a care to bring the artillery from the banks of the Riuier Po, and to send it to Padua, and if that the French made preparation to execute any enterprise, that he should also retire for feare of being surprized.

The officers of Padua and Treuifo were likewise commanded to hasten the fortifications already begunne in their cities. And not satisfied therewith, they chose Cristoforo Mora for superintendent of those fortifications, who speedily went thither and brought with him as many foot-men as could be gathered together in Venice, for feare lest the French waxing proud for this victory should crosse the Po, and make incursions on the Paduans confines, to the end that if they did surprize any place, they might speedily recouer it againe. They wrote likewise to Donato, their Ambassadour with the Pope, what the Senate had determined, and commanded him to entreat the Pope from them not to trouble himselfe for the losse of his army, for the common-wealth would neuer faile him, but ranne the same fortune which he did. Wherevnto the Pope answering, said, that hee did greatly ioy to see the Venetians magnanimous constancy, and that it alone had much more encreased his courage against the French, and had infinitely comforted him.

In this meane time the Cardinal of Pavia arriued at Rauenna, who fled from Bologna (as hath beene said) & hauing obtained audience of the Pope to purge himselfe of accusations made against him, laid the whole blame of the losse of Bologna on the Duke of Vrbino, as on a young man insufficient and small experienced in martiall matters. The Duke hauing notice of the bad offices which the Cardinal performed in his behalfe to the Pope his vnkle, was desirous to come and kisse his feete, and to cleere himselfe of those imputations. But being come into the Popes prefence, he found him so transported with choller, as he would not suffer him to speake, but sent him away with sharpe and iniurious speeches. The Duke perceiving himselfe to be disgraced by the Cardinals meanes, resolved on reuenge. And therevpon going towards his house to speake with him hauing no great traine, he met him in the street riding on his Mule being attended on by the horsemen of his guard, with Guido Vaino his brother in law, riding to the Popes palace, the Duke drew nere vnto him, all men giuing him place in signe of reuerence, where with his owne hand hee slew him with a poinard, which being done he went to his owne lodging, leapt on horse-backe, and retired himself to Vrbino.

The Pope vpon the brute of the Cardinals death, beganne extreemely to greeue and lament, as well for that he had lost a Cardinal whom he loued dearely, as also because so high a dignity had beene violated in a manner before his face and by his owne Nephew, wherevpon he determined to stay no longer there, but to returne to Rome. Being departed from Rauenna he understood by the way that sundry libels had beene set vp on the publike places of Modena and Bologna, by which notice was giuen him of the conuocation of the Generall Councell in the city of Pisa, whether hee was cited to appeare in person, because hee was accounted vnfit to gouerne the Papacy, being Author of all the warres. The Pope being

Triuinio offered to the open statue in Bolognia.

In what manner the Venetians provided for their Cities of the firme land.

The Cardinal of Pavia performeth bad offices in the duke of Vrbino
behalf.

The Cardinal
of Pavia slaine by the Duke of Vrbino.

Libels set up in diuers places
against the
Pope.

being come to Rome, did forthwith excommunicate the Bolognois, vnlesse they did returne to the obedience of the Sea Apostolike.

Within a while after, there happened a great tempest, with haile of such vnmeasurable bignesse, as the like had neuer bene scene at Bologna, which did spoile and beate downe the fruites of the territory neere adioyning, the common people thought that it was a diuine punishment, by reason of the Popes censure. Now al be it was in the French Kings power, after this victory to haue taken Rome, the Popes forces being greatly weakened and dispersed, and those of the Venetians much more, he neuertheless commanded Trinulcio, that leauing Bologna to the gard of the Bentiuoles, he should with his army returne speedily into the Dutchy of Milan; thinking that the Pope being freed from the suspicion which he had causelesse conceiued of him, would be drawne to desire peace, the treaty whereof, had neuer yet bene wholly broken off.

But so soone as the Pope perceiued the army to be re-called into the Dutchy of Milan, he took courage, and propounded by the Scottish Ambassador whom for that purpose he had sent to the French King at his departure from Bologna very hard and greuous conditions of peace, the which neuertheless the King, for the great desire he had to be at peace with him, was content to accept of; if the Pope vpon his returne to Rome had not changed his minde thorow the perswasion of the King of Arragon. For then he made answer that he would haue no peace, vnlesse the Venetians would make an accord with the Emperor, adding diuers other excessive demands, which did so greatly moue the Kings spirit, as he determined to hinder his recovery of Bologna, the which he tooke into his owne protection with the Bentiuoles likewise, and sent foure hundred Launces thither. Then because he would still continuin in his alliance with the Emperor, he commanded that the number of souldiers granted to the bishop of Gurcia should goe from the Dutchy of Milan to the succour of the Emperors lands vnder the command of the Lord de la Palisse.

The Emperour had a great desire to make warre on the Venetians, but considering the great preparations which he was to make, especially for the taking of Padua, without which he knew he could doe no great matter, he was in a manner ready to agree with them, so as being tossed vp and downe by diuers thoughts he spent the time in vaine, without executing any enterprize, promising from day to day to come in person into Italy, or to send his forces thither.

The Venetians in the meane time finding themselves to weake to take Verona, and being encamped betwixt Soaua, and Loniga, they burnt in a night a great part of the Veronois. But hauing intelligence of the comming of the Lord of La Palisse with twelue hundred Launces and eight thousand foot, they retired into a strong place towards Legnaga and Vincenza, from whence likewise they lodged, and put themselves into Padua and Treuiso, for the defence of which cities, diuers Venetian yong gentlemen came thither from Venice.

The French army tarried diuers daies at the bridge of Barbarana, expecting the Emperours comming or his resolution, who being come betwixt Trent and Rouero, being irresolute, after his wonted manner, what to doe, after he had giuen audience to the Venetian Ambassadours, with whom he daily conferred, he solicited the Lord of La Palisse to doe and take the Pace of Castel-nouo which is beneath Escalla towards the Friul, to make his comming downe more easie on that side. The which the Lord La Palisse did brauely execute, and then retired to Escalla. But the Emperor hauing altered his determination in stead of enuading what the Venetians held on the firme land, and going to beseege Rome, retired to Trent, determining to go no more to the army, & commanded the Asmains to enter into the Friul, where they took Vidua with the whole Prouince, the they returned to ioyne with the Lord of La Palisse, who lay within fiew miles of Treuiso, the which the Emperor would haue to be assaulted, but being well fortified on

euery

euery side, they found it most expedient speedily to retire the which they did. Wherevpon the Lord of La Palisse did soone after returne into the Dutchy of Milan by his Kings command, in regard of the Swisses new stirres and confederacies which did dayly encrease. The Venetian Stradios did follow him at the heeles, hoping to endamage him at his passage ouer the Brenta and the Adiffa, but he found means safely to crosse them. His departure was cause that John Paul Bailon, Generall to the Venetians, by the death of Lake Malutze did recover all that they had lost the laste Summer; as well nere to Vincenza, as in Friul (Gradiska excepted.)

In these kindes of warlike exploits was that Summer spent, to the Emperours great disgrace, and to the encrease of the Venetians reputation, who notwithstanding the Emperours and the French Kings armies against them for the space of two yeeres, did in the end still retain theirowne forces and signories, and al be it that it was directly against the Emperour, it was neuertheless much more hurtfull to the French King. For the Emperour, by reason he wanted aide, perceiving himselfe to weake to obtaine the desired victory, did willingly harken to those who perswaded him to be friends with the Venetians, so as already men beganne to perceiue, that new designs were begotten in his minde.

The Pope in the meane time hauing made shew that he would come to an agreement with the French King, did at last declare himselfe openly against him, and made a confederacy with the Catholike King and the Venetians to preserue (as he said) the vnion of the Church, to root out the Conuenticle (for so he termed it) of Pisa, and to recover the city of Bologna, with all the other townes which mediately or immediatly did belong to the Church; the rein comprehending the city of Ferrara: that they would attempt with a mighty army to driue all thole out of Italy who should oppugne it; leauing place to the Emperour to enter if he pleased into this confederacy, being desirous to disunite him from the French King.

Don Raymond de Cardona borne in Cattalognia and at that time viceroy of Naples was made Generall of their army, who by their agreement was to haue two thousand foure hundred men at armes, two thousand fiew hundred light horse, and foure and twenty thousand foote, namely for the Popes part foure hundred men at armes, fiew hundred light horse, and sixe thousand foot, from the Senate of Venice, eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, and eight thousand foot, and from the King of Arragon, twelue hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse and tenne thousand foot: This confederacy was made vnder collour to free Italy from the Barbarians; a very speciall title which all men interpreted according to their iudgement and passion.

Gaston of Foix was made viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan and in the army, who hauing intelligence of the Swisses preparations for their comming downe, by means of the Pope and his confederates into the Dutchy of Milan, caused all the victuals of the Dutchy to be shut vp in the fortes and castles, and placed strong Garrison in the neighbour cities, hoping that the men at armes would be able to make head against them in the plaines, and by that means soone enforce them to returne, if they should come into the field. The Swisses neuertheless were not daunted with these difficulties. But being come downe to Varese, their number did daily increase, bringing with them fiewen field peeces, and diuers great Harquebuzes carried on horse-backe, with some prouision of victuals. They sent a trumpet from Varese to desie the Kings Lieutenant, who only to keepe victuals from them, was come to Assaron, a place thirteene miles distant from Milan. From Varese they came to Galera, being tenne thousand in number, and Gaston of Foix did put himselfe into Legnaga, foure miles from Galera.

Then being increased to the number of sixteene thousand, they came to Bult, where a hundred French men at armes lay in Garrison, who hardly escaped from them,

The French King great desire to be at peace with the Pope.

The Kings forces in the Dutchy of Milan.

The Venetians doth insist on their justice and greatness.

Confederacy betwixt the Pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians.

The Emperours fudy thoughts.

The number of the confederates army.

The Venetian army retired to Padua and Treuiso.

Gaston of Foix Lieutenant General for the King in the Dutchy of Milan.

The Emperour changing his minde goeth back to Trent.

The Swisses desie Gaston of Foix.

The Swisses come down into the Dutchy of Milan.

them, loosing their baggage and some of their horses: by meanes whereof the French, which still retired as the Swisses aduanced, came and quartered themselves in the suburbs of Milan, within two miles whereof the Swisses were come: but wondering that they heard no newes from the Pope nor from the Venetian army (as it was knowne by letters intercepted which they sent to their Lords) certaine daies after they retired towards Coma, and from thence returned home into their country.

The Swisses returned home to Genoa.

Whilest they were retiring two posts arrived from the Pope and the Venetians: whereupon it was thought of a certaine that if they had come sooner, the Swisses had not returned. But they being gone (as hath bene said) the Spaniards and the Popes forces ensued into Romagna, where all that which the Duke of Ferrara possessed did forthwith yeeld vnto them (the Bastion of La Fossa, and the fort of Geniuola excepted.)

The Bastide taken by the Spaniards.

Petro of Nauarre, Colonel of the Spanish Infanterie, till such time as all their companies were come together, came and besieged the Bastide, and hauing battered it with three peeces of ordnance, and giuen it an assault, he tooke it the third day after his arriuall, where all the footmen that were in it were slain with Pestello their capitaine. Petro of Nauarre leauing two hundred foot there, returned to the viceroys army: but the Duke of Ferrara going thither afterwards with nine great peeces of ordnance, did so furiously assaile it as he recouered it the very same day: where all those who were within it with their capitaine were slaine, in reuenge of the death of his souldiers.

The confederates army marcheth toward Bologna.

The confederates army: namely that of the Pope, and the King of Arragon, to the number of eighteen hundred men at armes, eight hundred Genets, eight hundred light horse, and sixteene thousand foot, as well Spaniards as Italians, abundantly furnished with munition, the most of them being come forth of the Realme of Naples, determined to encampe before Bologna. The Venetian army on the other side being come vpon the Marches of Verona, seemed to threaten the city of Brescia.

Now the viceroys Generall to the Pope and the Spaniards, caused his army to march, and came and incamped betwixt the Riuer Adice and Bologna, where hauing giuen order for matters necessary to beseege it, he drew nere to the walles, quartering and extending the most part of his army betwixt the hill, and the high way which goeth from Bologna into Romagna, in regard of the commodity of victuals which came from thence, and seized on Saint Michels Monastery which is very nere to the city, seated on an high place, and which doth in a manner command the towne.

The forces that were in Bologna.

Within the city, beside the people which did beare armes and certaine companies of horse and foot, paid by the Bentiuoles, Gaston of Foix had sent thither two thousand Lansequenets, and two hundred Launces, commanded by Oder of Foix Lord of Lautrec, and Tues of Alegre, two famous captaines, and with them were the captaines Fayete, and Vincent furnished the great Diuell, who vpon the assurance made to them by Gaston of Foix to releue them, did freely enter it, in regard of the Cities large circuit. Yet neuertheless they began to be bold, when they perceiued the enemies small progression, who were nine daies before the walles, and enterprized nothing but onely made certaine idle Coluerine shot from Saint Michels Monastery into the city: but they sodainly abstained, perceiving very well that they spent their munition vnprofitably. They were diuers daies determining on what side to batter the city, especially to keepe cleefe from it: and after diuers and sundry opinions, they resolved to assaile it on that side nere to Saint Stephens Gate, by which men goe to Florence, and the artillery was planted within thirty fadom of the walles.

The confederates small progression before Bologna.

Petro of Nauarre on the other side made a mine, drawing towards the gate of Chastillon, in a place where within was a little chappel called Baracane. The artillery

Artillery hauing begunne to play, did in foure and twenty houres space beate downe an hundred fathom of the wall, with the tower of the gate, the which was abandoned, by reason it could be no longer defended: so as the assault might be easily giuen on that side, and in the meane time they caused bridges of wood to be made, and filled the dike with sagots to come with more ease to the assault. The mine being finished they gaue fire to it, which with mercurious force did in such sort blow vp the wall and the chappel, as in that space, those without the towne did plainly discerne those within the city, with the souldiers who stood ready for defence, but the whole wall falling downe againe on a sodaine did light in the very same place from whence the violence of the fire had forced it, and was in such sort retyred to the selfe same foundations, as one would haue thought that it had neuer stur'd from thence, which was accounted by all the people for a strange miracle.

Abreach made at the mine.

The captaines within the towne perceiving the enemies preparations, before the mine was fired, fearing least the people through feare might be woune, did speedily send to demand aide of Gaston of Foix, who the selfe same day sent thither a thousand foot, and the morrow after, a hundred & foure score Launces and then resolved to goe thither in person with the whole army, notwithstanding that in counsell all the captaines contradicted it. Therefore hee came forth of

Aide sent to the besieged.

20 Finall, late in the euening, and the next morning he marched towards Bologna with the whole army in battaile, notwithstanding the snowes and sharpe windes and entred it by Saint Felix gate, hauing in his company thirteene hundred Launces, six thousand Lansequenets, & eight thousand foot both French and Italians.

Gaston of Foix comes to the aide of Bologna.

The enemies had no knowledge of his coming till a day after, that a Stador, of the number of those who were come forth among others to skirmish, was taken, who being questioned what was done in Bologna, answered, That he could not say much, because he came thither but the day before with the French army: whereat the enemies wondering did more exactly examine him in what manner and what numbers had entred, and finding him constant in his answers, they beleued him, and resolved to raise their campe, in regard it was dangerous to tarry there, as wel in respect of the cold season which did greatly afflict the souldiers, as also for the neighbour-hood of the City, so great an army being within it. Wherefore the next night following, which was the nineteenth day of the siege, after they had with great diligence and silence, retired their ordnance, they dislodged early in the morning.

The confederates army dislodgeth from before Bologna.

It was thought of a certaine that if the French army had sallied forth the next morning after their arriuall, as Gaston of Foix had propounded it, they had surprized the confederates campe, who in no sort doubted that he was come thither (as hath bene said) but Tues of Alegre councelled to let the companies rest one day, who were weary with their iourney and the bad way, thinking that the enemy had knowne of their coming, as it was to be presumed, entring at broad day light, and by the high way of Rome.

The end of the ninth Booke of the fourth Decad.

50

Eccc

The

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the fourth Decade.

THe City of Bressia taken by the Venetians is rescued by Gaston of Foix, by means of the Castle which held out still for the French. Bergamo by the example of Bressia expelleth the French. The defeat of Iohn Paul Baillon and Meleager of Furlie by Gaston of Foix. The imprisonment of Andrew Gritti and Antonio Iustiniano. Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians by means of the Pope. Rauenna besieged by Gaston of Foix. The Battaille of Rauenna wherein the French were victors. The death of Gaston of Foix slaine by the Spaniards, after the battaille was wonne. In what perplexity the Pope was after the French mens victory. The Swisses come downe into the territory of Verona, with their great hate to King Lewis, and vpon what occasion. The Champaine Country of Milan is forsaken for to keepe the Cities from the Swisses. Milan, with all the Cities, almost of the Duchy, is redelivered to the confederates. The City of Genoa reuolteth from the King. League and confederacie betwixt the Pope, and the Emperour. Maximillian Sforza is restored to the Duchy of Milan. The death of Pope Iulius the Second. A league concluded betwixt King Lewis and the Venetians. The Election of Pope Leo the Tenth of the family of Medicis. King Lewis his great preparations for the warre of Italy. The Venetians take Cremona. The whole Duchy of Milan in trouble and tumult in the behalfe of the French. The French make re-entry into all the state of Milan, two towne excepted. The Swisses resolution to make warre on King Lewis. They come downe to Novara.

The

The Swisses comming forth of Novara in the night obtaine the victory against the French. The French are driuen forth of the whole Duchy of Milan. And lastly the taking and dismantling of Legnaga by the Venetians.

The tenth Booke of the fourth Decad of the History of Venice.

THe army being dislodged from before Bologna, Gaston of Foix having left there three hundred Launces, and foure thousand foot for the garde thereof, came with great speed to the reliefe of the Castle of Bressia, for the Venetians tooke the City the same day that hee entred into Bologna. For Count Lodouico Auogara a Bressian Gentleman, being wearied with the arogancy and indiscretion of the French, hauing written to the councill of the Tenne, That if they would send their army to Bressia, he would finde meanes to raise some tumult there, during which hee would by night open a gate for them, by which their forces might easily enter, and seize vpon the city. This matter was for certaine daies debated in the counsell of Tenne, and then by them referred to the great councill, to the end it might be maturly determined, whether Count Lodowicks offer ought to be entertained or refused. After diuers and sundry opinions it was concluded to accept it, the matter being commanded to be kept secret; then they acquainted the Prouidator Gritti therewith, enioyning him to march speedily with his troups towards Bressia, and to march at the very houre, and to the gate which Count Lodowick should send him instructions for.

Gritti vpon this commandment crossed the Riuer Adice at Albera, then that of Minicia, at the mill of La Volta, and comming to Montecelaro with three hundred men at armes, thirteene hundred light-horse, and three thousand foote; he encamped that night at Castagneta, five miles from Bressia, from whence he on a sodaine sent his light-horse to scoure euery to the gates. But the enterprise being discovered by a wife of one of the complices, who aduertized the Gouvernour thereof, of whom she was enamored; and by that means the towne being carefully guarded, Gritti thought it not fit to passe on any farther, wherevpon Count Lodowicke not being staied by the French, came with his loane forth of the City. And Gritti being returned neere to Montagnane, from whence he first came, lest a sufficient gard for the bridge which hee had made ouer the Riuer Adice, to the end to assure the passage, if he should happen to returne againe, as it afterwards fell out. For within a while after being recalled, he crossed the Riuer with two Cannons and foure falconets, and returned to his quarter at Castagneta.

Eccc 3

Count

Gaston of Foix relieves the castle of Bressia.

Andre Gritti
returns.

The Venetians returning to the assault of Brescia, enter
the City.

Count Lodowick on the other side being accompanied with very great numbers of the people of the vales of Eutropea & Sabina, who he had caused to rise, was come within a mile of Brescia. And al-be it they within the City did not yet make shew of fauouring the enterprise, yet neuertheless Gritti perceiving, that he had greater forces then at the former time, he resolved to haue it by force: And beeing come with all those peasants, he assailed it in three severall places, two of which had good successe, namely at the Gate of Piles where Auogare fought, & at the gate of La Garzulo, where the souldiers entered at the iron grate, by which the river of the same name entreth into the city, notwithstanding all the attempts and resistance of the French, who perceiving the enemies to bee entered, and that the Bresians did rise in their behalfe, they retired to the Castle, with the Lord of Luda their Gouverneur, looting their horse and baggage.

Bergamo expelled the French.

Brescia being taken all the townes along the Lake of La Garde, did drive away the French, and yielded to the Venetians: Bergamo did the like soone after (the two castles excepted) the one of which standeth in the midst of the city, and the other halfe a mile off. It was thought that if at Venice (where the ioy was incredible) they had forth with provided that which Andre Gritti did so dainely write for, namely to send souldiers, and artillery which he had need of to win the castle of Brescia, they had made greater progression, or at least the victory would haue beene more assured.

The speed of
Gaston of Foix.

But during these exploits, Gaston of Foix being aduertized of what had passed at Brescia, did speedily march thither, who hauing passed the Po at Stellata, did soone crosse the river Mincia at the bridge of Molino, then he came and lodged at Nogera on the Veronois, and the day following at Pontpescara, and at Treuilla, where hauing intelligence that John Paul Bailon was come with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, and twelue hundred foote to lodge at the Island of Escalla, hee ranne speedily thither with three hundred Launces and seuen hundred Archers, the residue of the army, who could not march so speedily, comming after, and finding him to bee gone, they followed him hastily and ouertooke him, as he was at the point of the passing a foord of the river Adice.

John Paul Bailon
is broken and defeated by Gaston of Foix.

John Paul Bailon hauing defcried him a farre off, thinking it to be nothing else but part of the forces of Verona, did embattaile his souldiers and tarried for him. Both sides ioyning, fought valiantly for more then an houres space: but the Venetians fortune beganne to decline by the arriual of the residue of the army which came in file, and notwithstanding that they disordered them, they neuertheless rallied themselves diuers times, vntill being no longer able to resist the great numbers, they betooke themselves to flight; wherevpon John Paul passed the river safely, but diuers of his people were drowned.

Gaston of Foix
defeateth the hanger of Furlik.

The morrow after, Gaston of Foix did likewise put Meleager of Furlitour, whom he incountred as he conducted certaine Venetian light horse, then hee came and encamped in the suburbs of Brescia, and without any delay at all hee sent to assaile the Monastery of Saint Fridiana, which stood halfe way off from the hill vnder which he was lodged, and hauing assaulted it, hee draue thence those which garded it, and turned with his army to the other side of the towne, that hee might be the nearer to the castle. The next morning by day breake, hauing chosen out of the whole army, foure hundred men at armes well armed, and six thousand foote, and going vp on that side nere to the Gate of Pises, he entered without any resistance into the first wall of the castle, where after hee had for a while caused his souldiers to rest and refresh themselves, hee did encourage them with faire speeches, and promises of an inestimable booty. That being said, he marched forward. But at the comming forth of the Castle hee found certaine footmen, who with the Artillery thought to haue staied him, but their attempt was

Gaston of Foix
having entered the Castle of Brescia marcheth to the rescue
of the gown.

in vaine, for hauing put them to flight, he came downe furiously vpon the voide place where capitaine Barlettes palace stood, where the Venetian forces being close ioyned together, did attend him with great boldnesse: and there ioyning, they fought furiously on either side for a long time, the one fighting for their owne safety, and the others for glory, and for desire of the spoile and sack of so rich a City.

The French after a long fight became masters
of the City.

The Venetians at the last, hauing bravely defended themselves were driven from the place. For the French being victors, did by force drive their enemies before them in all places, not going to pillage, vntill they were wholly become Masters of the city, following the command of Gaston of Foix who had so enioyned them before their comming downe. Of the French side there died many foot, and some number of men at armes, but more then eight thousand of the enemies were slaine, and great numbers of them taken prisoners, amongst whom were Andre Gritti and Antonio Iustiniano with many others. Count Lodowicke Auogare and a sonne of his being taken amongst the rest were beheaded in the public place of execution.

Andre Gritti
and Antonio Iustiniano taken prisoners.
Count Lodowicke
Auogare
beheaded.

Gaston of Foix preserved the honour of the Nuns, but their goods were pillaged, and those who had retired into their Couents and other Churches, were the captaines booties. In this manner fel the City of Brescia into extreame misery, which in dignity and nobility did not giue place to any other of Lombardy, and which did for wealth surpass all the rest, (excepted Milan). It was sackt seuen whole daies together. The newes of this reprisal being come to Venice did greatly trouble the whole City, who thought they should be no more able to enterprise any thing, condemning chiefly the small speed that was made to send necessary forces and munition to the Prouidator Gritti, the which was cause of that lesse. The Senate forthwith consulted about the repairing of their army, sent to leasy two thousand foote in Candy, and a great number of Stradiots in Albania. Two hundred pound weight of gold was sent to the viceroy of Naples, as had beene promised. The foot which were not at Brescia, and the horse-men which elcaped, together with those who were stript and disarmed came to Vincenza. Iustiniano and Gritti were sent prisoners to Milan.

The losse of Brescia troubled
the Venetians.

The Pope vnderstanding that the French had recovered Brescia, counselled and petswaded, euen with threats, that they should accord with the Emperour. And certaine commissioners beeing assembled for that purpose, perceiving the great difficulties which were made in the treaty of peace, it was propounded to make truce for a while in the meane time, during which they might with more ease deliberate on the Articles of peace and other reasonable conditions.

According to this aduice, truce was concluded at Rome in the Popes presence betwixt the commissioners, on condition that the Senate should at two payments giue foure hundred pound of gold to Maximilian, to the which were one hundred pound more added, to cause the Emperour to ratifie this agreement, the whole amounting to five hundred pounds of gold.

Truce agreed on betwixt the Emperour and
the Venetians.

Gaston of Foix after the recovery of Brescia, hauing giuen order for his affaires, (for Bergamo which had rebelled, and all the other townes neere adioyning had recalled the French) and refreshed his army which was wearied with so great and long trauaill, determined to goe and incounter with the confederates army, according to the commandement which hee had receiued from the King, which did expressly import, that with the greatest speed hee could, hee should march against them, whom hee heard to bee verie weake, and therefore he promised himselfe the victory, and being victorious, hee should beseege Rome and the Pope without any respect, to the end to free himselfe of so many dangers which did threaten him, and for the diminution of his enuy, & increase of his owne iustifications, he would haue that enterprise to be made in the name of the council of Pisa, which should depute a Legate to goe to the army.

Gaston of Foix departed from Bressia, and came to Finall, there for to gather together all the companies which were in Italy (those excepted who remained for the gard of the Cities) and from thence he went to Saint Georges on the Bolognois, where there came to him three thousand Gascons, a thousand Pioners, and a thousand Picards which were newly sent him, being all choice soldiers. These being arrived, he found that he had with him five thousand Lansequenets, five thousand Gascons, and eight thousand, as well Italians as French, with one thousand six hundred lances. The Duke of Ferrara was to ioyne with him, with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse and a great quantity of excellent munition, because the Generall had left him at Finall, in regard of the bad waies. The Cardinall of Saint Seuerine being deputed Legate by the councill came likewise to the army.

Gaston of Foix marching in this equipage did burne with desire to meete the enemy and to fight with him, as well to satisfie the King as for his owne valour and prowess: his meaning neuertheless was not to assaile him rashly, but only to trie if by approaching nere to him he would cheerefully come to the battaile, in any place where the quality of the situation might make them equall.

The enemies had an other intent, who thought it not safe for them to fight in an equall place, at least wise before the six thousand Swisses whom they expected were arrived: as also for that the King of Arragon had commended them to abstaine as much as they could from fight, for diuers considerations by him alleaged.

The two armies did often change places, marching continually nere together in good order, the artillery going before and their faces turned towards the enemies, as if euery houre they were to beginne the fight. Gaston received a new commandment from the King to hasten the battaile. Wherevnto his King was incited so soone as he understood the truce made betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. But Gaston perceiving that hee did winne nothing by coasting the enemies in this manner, in regard of the commodiousnesse of the Cities of Romagna, whether they still retired, determined to beseege Rauenna wherein Marke Antony Colonna lay for the Pope with fiftene hundred foot, and five hundred horse, thinking that the enemies would not suffer such a city to be lost before their faces, and by that meanes occasion might be offered to fight with them in an equall place. He came and lodged betwixt Contignola, and Granarolla, then at Rassi, hauing driuen them thence who kept it, and from thence the day following he came and encamped nere to the walles of Rauenna betwixt the two Riuers, namely, Ronca, and Montona betwixt which the towne is seated. He possessed the space which is betwixt the one and other riuer.

The next day he caused his ordnance to be planted, and by all meanes hastned the battery, that he might come to the assault before the enemies (whom he knew were remooued) should arrive, as well for to get the towne, as in regard of his great want of victuals, by reason of the Venetian vessels which lay at Fiquerolles, and at the mouth of the Channel: which falleth into the Po, which stopped those that came both from Lombardy and Ferrara.

This was the reason why he refused to give the assault the same day, albeit he knew that there was no reasonable breach made; and that he could not enter but by ladders: those likewise which were sent thither, being out of hope to force the City: and perceiving themselves to be greatly hindered by a Culverynes, hauing fought for the space of three houres, retired with the losse of three hundred foot, and of certaine men at armes, and as many in a manner were hurt. But the retreat was no sooner made, but they desiered the confederates army continuing to the relief of the towne, the which marched along the riuers side.

So soone as the French had discovered them, they arose in armes and placed themselves vnder their ensignes, having in great hast with-drawn their ordinance from before their walles, the which they turned towards the enemies: who imagining onely by the shew of their army, that Rauenna was sufficiently releued, thinking that the French durst not assaile it they being so nere, they encamped within three miles of Rauenna, at a place called Moulinachia, which they forth-with fortified, with as deepe a trench as the shortnesse of the time would permit them. The French were long in counsell, to know what was to bee done, either to assaile the City, or the enemies. In the end after diuers and sundry opinions, they resolved to goe and assaile the enemy, so soone as it was day. Which Gaston of Foix gladly approving, had caused the same night a bridge to bee cast over the Ronca, and to liuell the causes on all sides, to make the waies easie. There by day breake, being Easter day, hee prepared to march against the enemies; and hauing encouraged his soldiers with a more eloquent, then Martiall oration, hee enforced the enemies by the shew of his ordnance, to come forth of their trenches, and to ioyne fight with him; where the confederates were so dele with, for the space of six houres, that the fight lasted, as not being able to make any more resistance, they turned their backs, and among others the Viceroy and Carsnagio were the foremost, carrying away with them a squadron in a manner whole and vnbroken: so as the French remained masters of the field.

But because the Spanish Infanterie made a soft retreat, and in good order, Gaston of Foix was desirous to breake them; and going furiously to assaile them with a squadron of horse, hee was on a sodaine enuironed by the enemies, and being beaten from his horse, was slaine by the push of a pike, thrust into his flanke. The Lord of Laurec lay by him, in a manner dead, being wounded in twenty places, but being brought to Ferrara, hee was there healed.

The Generalls death caused the Spaniards to escape without any impediment, the residue of their army being dispersed and put to flight; and their baggage, ensignes and artillery taken. The prisoners were the Popes Legat, Fabrizio Colonna, Pedro of Nauarre, the Marquis of Palu, Biscondio, and Pesinar; with many other Barons and great Lords. The horse was that there died on both sides, eightene thousand men; one third part French, and the two thirds of the confederates. But the losse of the victorious was greater, without comparison, by reason of the death of the Generall, of Trab of Aleppo, diuers French Gentlemen and Almaine Capitanes, to whose valour the victory was partly ascribed.

The victors being returned to their Campe, those of the City saw word that they would yeeld, but whilst they capitulated, the Lansequenets, & Gascons perceiving the walls to be carelessly kept, did enter it at the breach which was made before the battaile, and made cruell spoyle, for despite of the losse which they had sustayned in the battaile, but they could not take the Castle, whether Marke Antony Colonna was revolted, which hee afterward yeelded, upon condition to haue their goods and liues saved.

The Venetians hauing news of this losse, sent word to Vincenico Naldi whome they kept in pay with a thousand foot in Flaminia, to guard and defend the lands of the Church. The Viceroy neuer said till hee came to Ancona, where hee vied meanes to renew his army, promising to him selfe, that being ioyned with the Swisses, hee would easily drive the French forth of Italy: so as euery one would employ him selfe in that businesse. The Venetians being advertised of his intent, sent to comfort him for his losse and to offer him all ayde and releefe by Antonio Dandolo, who brought thither a good summe of money from the Senate, the like also did King Ferrand Ambassador which lay at Venice.

The number of Gaston of Foix
his army.

Gaston of Foix
his great desire to fight.

Gaston of Foix besieges Rauenna.

The resolve to assaile the enemy and was the City.

The French are victors in the battaile of Rauenna.

Gaston of Foix is slaine by the Spaniards.

Rauenna taken and spoiled by
the French.

The French Army being daunted with the death of their Generall, remained within 4. miles of Rauenna, attempting nothing, expecting the kings pleasure. In the meane space newes being brought to Rome, of the losse of the battaile, all the Cardinals came forth-with to the Pope, earnestly entreating him to accept of peace with the French King, the which they assured him hee might obtaine, on honest conditions, they seeing no other remedy for all these dangers, but peace onely. The Ambassadors of the King of Arragon, and the Signury of Venice insisted on the contrary, giving him to vnderstand that matters were not so desperate, nor the army so much decayed, but that it might easily bee restored in short space, without any greates expence, with many other very pertinent reasons, 10 to induce the Pope to their opinion. But he continued in very great doubts for on the one side, hatred and disdain against the French did possesse him, and on the other, feare, and danger. Wherevpon hee answered the Cardinals that he would make peace with the French King, and yet it was not with that resolution, which might giue any certaine hope: and last of all when as Julius of Medicis a Knight of Malta, who was after-wards pope, came to him from the Cardinall of Medicis, and had fully informed him how greatly the French were weakened, by their Generalls death, and of diuers other particularities of the French army, which did much recomfort him; And bringing him into the Consistory, he caused him to rehearse the selfe same things to the Cardinals, who neuertheless 20 did perseuer in their desire of peace; the which though in words hee made them (to please them) to accept of, hee had neuertheless resolved not to graunte, but vpon the last extremity, and rather to leaue Rome, hoping that his cause would bee maintayned by the armes of Christian Princes.

But so soone as hee vnderstood that the Lord of La Palisse, who commanded the French army, after the death of Gonslo of Foix, was called into the Dutchy of Milan by the Generall of Normandy, for feare of the Swisses coming; and that hee was with the army departed out of Romagnia, he found him selfe freed of the doubt and feare which hee was in concerning the affaires of Rome, where- by hee was more then before confirmed in his obstinacy, albeit the Legate of 30 the counsell carried still in Romagnia, with three hundred lances, three hundred light horse, six thousand foote, and eight peeces of ordnance.

Now the Pope being greatly confirmed by that which hath bene already said, and by the great hopes which the King of Arragon gaue him, so soone as hee had intelligence of the losse of the battaile of Rauenna, promising to send him Gonsaluo the great Captaine into Italy with new supplies and likewise by the commission which the King of England had sent to the Cardinall of Yorke, to enter into the league, hee did openly reject peace, and pronounced in open Consistory a Monitory, against the French King, if hee did not release the Cardinall of Medicis, whome hee kept prisoner in Milan, where hee was 40 honorably yed.

The Swisses in the meane time, who stood badly affected to the French King, and did wonderfully hate him, being assembled at Coire, a city of the Grisons there antique confederates, marched from thence to Trent; the Emperour to collout the matter with the King, saying that hee could not stoppe their passage, in regard of the ancient confederacy which he had with them.)

From Trent they came vpon the Verona Territory, where the Venetians army expected them, who together with the Pope did contribute for their pay. They were in number more then six thousand, though no more were demanded: For the hatred which they did beare to the French King was 50 so greates as contrary to their custome they did patiently endure all difficulties, and namely, they came from home having received only one florin of Ryne a peece: whereas in time before they would not march for the Kings seruice, vntill they had had bene promised many payes and their Captains presented with sondry guifts.

La Palisse comming first of all with the Army to Pontoglio to stop their passage, thinking that they would come that way into Italy, perceiving afterward their meaning to be otherwise, came and camped at Chastillon of the stirrop, nor being assured whether they would come downe into the Dutchy of Millan or els march towards Ferrara. It was certainly thought that they would haue held on the way towards Ferrara according to the Popes directions, had not a letter which the Lord of La Palisse sent to the General of Normandy, been intercepted by mishap, the which fell into the hands of the Venetian Stradiots; by which 10 he lent him word how his affaires stood and that it would be a hard matter to resist them, if they should turne towards the Dutchy of Millan. This letter made them change their determination, and caused the Cardinall of Syon, the chiefe moriue of this warre, with the Capraines, to resolve to enterprise that which their enemies most feared (as was perceived by that letter). Therefore they came to Villafranca to ioyne with the Venetian army, vnder the command of John Paul 20 Basilon, which was of foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and fixe thousand foote with peeces of Ordnance, as well for battery, as for the field.

La Palisse, who in all had not aboute seauen thousand foote and a thousand 20 lances, did with the Capraines determine wholly to forsake the field, and to looke to the defence of the townes of most importance, till such time as those great numbers of Swisses should be wasted, or else some fresh supplies might come to them from France to make head against them. Wherevpon he did put into Brescia two thousand foote, one hundred and fiftie lances and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines: into Crema fiftie lances and a thousand foote, and into Bergamo, a thousand foote, and a hundred Florentine men at armes; he brought the residue of the army to Pontuico, which consisted of six hundred lances, two thousand French foot, and foure thousand Lanquenets. But the next day letters came from the Emperour, who commanded the Lanquenets 30 forthwith to abandon the French Kings seruice: they not daring to disobey, departed the very same day, because they were all his subiects.

La Palisse despayring (by reason of the Lanquenets departure) of being able any longer to defend the Dutchy of Milan, did in great hast retire to Pisquetona. The Venetians in the meane time hauing already taken Valegia and Piseara, did still with that Army winne the Contrey as they went along. Those of Cremona being wholly forsaken did yeeld to the Cardinall of Syon and gaue him a good 40 somme of money, to the end that the Swisses should not enter into their City. The like did Carauagio and Soncino, wherein the Cardinall of Syon placed his owne people in Garrison, in steed of deliuering it to the Venetians, as it was mentioned in the treaty of the League. All other townes neere to the riuier Adda did yeeld to the Venetians, the like did Bergamo with her territory, by reason that La Palisse, had recalled his companies which lay there to ioyne them to the army.

La Palisse forsooke Pisquetona, and went and crossed the Riuier Adda, hoping to keepe the enemies from passing the riuier if the footmen which they made account to leany had arriued: But through want of money to pay them, none were raised, wherevpon he retired to Saint Angelo, and the day following to Pavia, determining to stay there. But after that Triulzio came thither to him, and had shewed him the vanity of his opinion, and how that it was impossible to hold 50 back so great a ruine, seeing there were no footmen in the Army, nor meanes to wage new, as well for the shortnesse of the time, as for that there was no money to pay them, he went and made a bridge ouer the Po, at a place where it is most narrow, to the end that the companies might more commodiously passe holding on their way towards Ast.

So soone as the French had passed the Riuier Adda, Loda yeelded to the confederates

What allowance next the loss of the battle brought to Rome.

The Pope's perplexity.

The Pope will by no means have peace with the French.

The Cardinall of Medicis prisoner at Milan.

The Swisses hatred to the French King.

The Swisses take the way towards the Dutchy of Milan.

La Palisse forsake the field, and gathereth the company.

The Lanquenets forsake the French King.

The Venetians great progression in the company of the Swisses.

Triulzio comming to the Army of opinion to abandon the Dutchy of Milan.

who being come to Paulia, beganne to batter the Castle. The French like-wile did soone abandon it, and came to the stone bridge, which is ouer the riuier Thesin, fearing least it should be surpris'd, hauing but that place alone, whereby to escape from Paulia. All the French men, with certaine Lancquenets, who were not departed with the rest, being come forth of Paulia, the Citie promised to pay a great summe of mony to auoyde the sack thereof, Milan had already done the like, compounding for a great summe, and all other townes, Brescia and Coma excepted did with great desire doe the same.

Genoa reuolted from the
King.

All matters were gouerned in the name of the holy league (for so all men called it,) and all the profit fell to the Swisses, which caused many more of that nation to come downe into Lombardy, and to vnite themselves with the first. In this change, Parma and Placentia were giuen to the Pope. The Swisses seized on Lucarna and the Grisons on Voltolina and Chiauenna, Iano Fregossa, by the Venetians aide, in whose army he seru'd, went to Genoa, and so handled the matter, as the French gouernor being expelled, it reuolted and created him Duke.

In the like manner all the townes and Castles of Romagnia did returne to the Pope. Bologna like-wile yielded to his officers, after the Bentiuoles being deprived of all hope, had forsaken it. The Cardinall of Medicis had already before then escaped, by meanes of some stirre which hapned of purpose, as hee entered into a boate at the passage of the Po, whereupon hee was taken from the French who kept him, who intended flight rather then resistance. The Senate in the meane time, being desirous to recouer Brescia and Coma, solicited the Cardinall of Syon to come with his troupes and their army to beseege those townes, who making no halt, being loth to encrease the Venetians greatnesse, came in the end and encamped before Brescia, neere to Saint Iohns gate, battering at one time both the towne and Castle, whether the Viceroy came to them with the Spanishe army. The Lord of Aubigni who was within it, perceiuing that in the end he could not choose but deliuer it, thought it best to yeeld it, together with the Castle, rather to the Viceroy then to the Venetians, compounding with him, that all the souldiours within should depart with liues and goods. The French that were at Legnaga followed the same counsell. Crema did other-wile which was be-30

Legnaga yielded.

seeged by Ranice de la Cere, with a part of the Venetians forces, vnto whom, Benedict Cribario (being corrupted by guifts, and vpon promise to be made a gentleman of Venice) did yeeld the towne by the consent of the Lord De Duras gouernor of the Castle, the which he would not doe to Ottavian Sforza, Bishop of Lodi; for & in the name of the future Duke Maximilian Sforza, being come thither for that purpose, with foure thousand Swisses. In these interims, the Bishop of Gurcia as Lieutenant to the Emperor went to Rome, who being receiued with all honor they beganne to treat of the establishment of the common businesse, and how to 40

The treaty betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians
huddled.

root out particular strife and contentions, to the end that Italy being vnited together might resist the French King: and the hardest matter of all this was, the agreement so often treated of betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians: For the Bishoppes of Gurcia demanded to haue Verona and Vincenza, to remaine to the Emperor, and the other townes to the Venetians, for which they should presently pay to Maximilian two hundred thousand florins of the Rhyne, and thirty thou-50

Difficulties concerning the agreement.

with

with spirituall and temporall armes, and made a league with the Emperor, to the end that he might allow of the Councell of Lateran, and disallow the Conuenticle of Pisa: The Spanishe Ambassador would not enter into that League, saying that he had no commission so to doe from his King.

The confederacy being contracted, the Bishop of Gurcia at the next Session of the councell of Lateran, did in the Emperours name adhere to the Councel, where he affirmed in the presence of all men, that the Emperour had neuer consented to the Conuenticle of Pisa, reiecting all those who had vsed his name. This being doone, the Bishop of Gurcia tooke his leaue, that he might be with Maximilian Sforza at such time as he should take possession of the Dutchy of Milan the which he did. After his entry, the Viceroy went and beseged the fort of Tresa vpon the riuier Adda, which was yeilded vnto him vpon condition that they within it might depart with their goods.
10

League betwixt the Pope and the Emperor.
Maximilian
Sforza in possession of the Dutchy of
Milan.

The confederacy made at Rome, had not wholly broken off the hope of agreement betweene the Emperour and the Venetians, and therefore the Pope sent Iacomo Stasilea Auditor of the Rote to Venice, to entreat the Senate to agree with Maximilian, and to enter into the league, saying; That to his great greefe he had forsaken them, the which, many taking in bad part, said that they were assured that it would cause them to enter into League with the French, and by that meanes to recall them a new into Italy; but that he for his part did so much presume on them, as he knew they would neuer do it: and in regard of these matters beeing troubled with sondry thoughtes, he fell sick, and his health dayly empairing, not being able to eate or sleepe, he decessed the two and twentieth day of February in the year 1513.

The death of Pope Iulius
the second.

Now the Venetians having determined before the Popes death to contract League and alliance with the French, according to the motion made by King Lewis to Andrew Gritti, prisoner at that time in France, they resolved / the matter hauing a long time been debated in councell) to send one of purpose into France to treat of this businesse with the King: and to this end they named Lodouico Pic-30

A motion of agreement betwixt the French King and the Venetians.

tro Secretary of the Councell of Tenne. Hee beeing departed from Venice, and onward on his way, they had newes of the Popes death: but for all that they did not call him back, not knowing who should be his successor, and least of all what his affection towards them might be.

The league concluded betwixt the King and the Vene-
tians.

The Secretary beeing come into France, the King did enlarge Andre Gritti, and did forthwith conclude the league with him on condition that Cremona and the contrey of Giradade should belong to the state of Milan, and that the Venetians should haue Brescia, Bergamo and Crema, (the King making ouer all his right to them, which he could pretend to those Cities:) That they should be bound to aide one another, and to hazard together one selfe same fortune, vntill the King should recouer the whole state of Milan: and that likewise the Republicke should be restored to the entier possession of whatsoever it did enioy on the firme land: And lastly that al prisoners on either side should be set at liberty, and the fugitiues restored to their goods and contrey.

The Articles of
the League.

In the meane time, after the Popes death, the Cardinalls entred quietly into the Conclau, and did the seauenth day following with a generall consent chooe for Pope, Iohn, Cardinall of the title of Saint Mary in Dominica, of the most illustrious family of Medicis, of seauen & thirty years of age, which was a strange matter, and contrary to the custome: He tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth. This election was pleasing to all men, and cheefely to the Venetians, who did euer greatly affect that family: by reason whereof, the Senate did hope easily to draw him with them into this league, confederacy and alliance. But Leo hauing obtained the Pontificall dignity, found himselfe to bee assailed with sondry thoughts, reuoluing in his minde diuers matters, as well belonging to warre as to peace.

The election of Pope Leo the tenth.

His

His antient habit and manner of life from his youth, did excite him to embrace peace and quietnesse, especially now when he saw him-selfe established in the supreme dignity, so as the name of warre, in regard of dangers past was displeasing and odious to him: And on the other side, hee found no great safety in peace, in the midst of armies, and confusion of all things, as also, because the memory of his predecessor, who by armes had much encreased the dominions of the Church, did prouoke him to warre. But by taking armes, hee knew not to which side hee should rather incline. For the returne of the French into Italy did not like him, in regard of the wrongs and grieuances which he in particular had received by them, and his predecessor like wife, and which did still threaten him, in regard of the counsell of Pisa, which was transferred to Lyons. On the other side, the French, confederate with the Venetians, did in such fort daily encrease, in strength and reputation, as hee knew not by what means, to oppose him-selfe against such warlike attempts.

Leo then being thus troubled with sundry thoughts, did oftentimes change his determination. At the beginning of his papacy, he sent a breefe to all Christian Princes, exhorting them to peace, and vnitie: and the more easily to induce them thereto, hee determined not to shew him-selfe more affected to one side then to another. Yet neuertheless, perceiuing at the same time that there was no greater hope of peace, hee beganne to prouoke the Venetians, against the French, vnto league themselves with him selfe, the Florentines, the Swisses, and the Duke of Milan, for the liberty of Italy. The Venetians would not consent to his proposition, thinking it to be against reason to abandon for vaine hopes, an alliance already made with the French, and also for that considering matters more iudiciously, they perceived that at the first hee promised some apparent liberty: but that dangers did still encrease, and that they went about to throw all Italy head-long into perpetual bondage.

With these discourses did the Venetians maintayne their opinion, soliciting the French King in the meane time to make the greatest hast hee could with his army into Italy, to surpris the townes, before they were man'd with garri- sons, putting him in mind, that the victory of an enterprize, dependeth chiefly on speed. The French King being moued by these remonstrances, did wholly bend his actions to this warre, and to cut off all lets that might hinder him therein, he made truce for one whole yeare with Fernand, King of Arragon, onely for that which concerned matters forth of Italy.

And as for the English, whome hee vnderstood were making great preparations for their comming into France, hee made no great reckoning thereof, hoping in short space to driue Sforza from the state of Milan, and to returne victorious with his Army into France, time enough to resist their attempts.

Now the Rendezuous for all the Kings troupes was at Suza, from thence to march with ease into Italy, vnder the conduct of the Lord of La Tremouille, albeit the warre was managed by Iohn Iames Trivulce, a man of great repute, for his excellent skill in martiall discipline. The report was that there were twenty thousand soldours in the Kings Army. The Venetians had for their parts eight thousand foot-men, twelue hundred men at armes, and five hundred light horse, with great store of munition and ordnance: Dominico Contaren, and Andre Loredan were prouidors of the army and Bartilmeo Aluiana Generall in the Count Petrillans sted, who was deceased.

Hee beeing come to the Army, which lay on the bankes of Adice, sent to the Senate to know if hee should passe on farther whilst the enemies were vnprouided of all aide and succour, and their townes without garri- sons.

The

The Senate beeing assembled therevpon, after sundry opinions, decreed, that their Armie should not passe the Po, nor Adda, referring the rest to the pleasure and discretion of their General, according as he should think it fit. For the Senate had as yet receiued no certaine newes, whether the French Armie had passed the Alpes, wherevpon they thought it not discretion to abandon their state to the enemies mercy, or to send their Army into any place, from whence, (if matters should fall out vnfortunately) they should not bee able to withdraw it.

But Aluiana beeing full of courage, and desirous to exploite some gallant enterprize, if occasion should fitly serue, resolu'd without delay to passe ouer, and first of all tooke his way directly towards Verona, hoping for to winne it. Pandolfo Malateste commanded for the Emperour in one of the Fortes of the City: Hee with certaine of the Townsmen, had practised to giue him entrance: But the next day, five hundred Lanquenets entred Verona by the Riuer Adice, and the matter beeing discouered, Aluiana perceiuing that the City could not bee easily forced, and that it would aske much time to besiege it, did on a sodaine march towards Cremona, and by the way made him-selfe master of Valegia, and of the Forte of Piscara two strong and commodious places for the Venetians, in respect of their situation.

Vpon report of Aluiana's comming, a great tumult was raised in Cremona: those which were of the contrary faction, forsooke the towne, and the others without contradiction did receiue Aluiana into the city, who being entred, hee did sodainly disarme Caspar Fieramosca, who lay there in garri- son with three hundred horse, and five hundred foot of the Duke of Milans. Hee needed not to spend any time for the recovery of the castle, by reason it was euer held for the French King: Wherevpon hee forth with erected the French Kings banner, saying; That hee did receiue the City, for, and in the name of the French King, for whom Theodore Triuulce his Ambassador was there present in the Venetian Armie. Hee went afterwards to Piquetona, Sonzino, Lodi, and other places neere adioyning, hauing already, by the change of Cremona, erected the French Kings Banners.

But on the Verona and Vincentine territories, the Venetians affaires were differently managed. For so soone as Aluiana was departed with his Armie, Rocandolphe Captaine of the Lanquenets, and Frederick Consaluo of Bosiola comming forth of Verona with sixe hundred horse, and two thousand foote, went to Saint Boniface, where Aluiana had left vnder the command of Sigismund Cuallo, and Iohn Fortino, three hundred light horse, and six hundred foote: who beeing scattered heere and there, vpon newes of the enemies comming, fled to Colonia, and were so neerely pursued by the Lanquenets, who entered the towne by force, as they were all taken prisoners, and the towne beeing sacked and burnt, they returned to Verona laden with spoile.

The enemies for this exploit waxing more prou'd and insolent, foure thousand foote, and five hundred horse, sallied forth of Verona for to assaile Vincenza: whereof Iohn Paul Manstom, the Citties Governour, hauing intelligence, hee caused great numbers of peasants on a sodaine to enter into the City, and did so carefully provide for the rest, as the enemies hope beeing frustrate, hauing spoyled the country round about, they were enforced to returne so Verona.

But during these exploitos on the Veronois and Vincentine territories, the whole Duchie of Milan was in vpror and Armes: There was no Towne, Village, nor Castle, but did rise and take armes vpon the comming of the Venetian Armie, vpon the report that was spreade, that the French had passed the Alps: for albeit that the people of Milan, wearied with the French government,

Ffff

had

The new Pope is telfed with sundry thoughts

The Venetians
constancy in mainteyning their alliance.

The King pre-pareth for his returne into Italy.

The number of
the French
Army.

The number of the Venetian
Army.

The enterprize on Verona discouered.

The Venetians
take Valegia and Piscara.

The Venetians
take Cremona.

The Lanquenets defeat some of the Venetian force.

The Lanquenets
enterprize vpon Vincenza broken.

All the Duchy of Milan is in vpror.

had desired the returne of the Sforzas their antient Lords : yet neuertheless, hauing not by their returne obtained the liberty and freedome which they hoped for, but on the contrary all discommodities and charges, they changed their mindes, and desired the returne of the French. Many likewise, enemies to the quiet of other poore banished men, or moue'd by the diuersity of factions, did fauour the French. In regarde whereof the Earle of Manoe, sonne to John James Trinuice, riding vp and downe the Champaine countrey of the Dutchy of Milan, to stirre them vp to commotions, found it no hard matter to make them to reuolt and to take armes.

Maximilian Sforza retired to Nouara

Maximilian Sforza being daunted thereat, not knowing whereon to resolute, perceiving all things to tend to his ruine, thought it most expedient for his safety and escape, and for the tryall of his latest fortune, to retire with certaine horse to Nouara, where he vnderstood some Suisses were arriued, resolving there to tarry for the rest, who in great numbers were coming down for the defence of his state.

Those of Milan, seeing them-selves to bee without garrison, and without a Capitaine, that their well fortified Castle held for the French, and that the Venetians Army did approach, some of them being stirred vp with hope of better fortune, others with feare and distrust; thought it fit to yeeld to the French, and to that end, to send an Ambassador to the Venetian Generall; who hauing made a bridge ouer the Adda, threatened that hee would shortly bee with them. The French on the other side, (with whom André Gritti was in quality of Ambassador for the Signory) entred Italy, tooke diuerse townes and castles, some by assault, and others by a voluntary redition: so as the state of Milan being enuaded by two mighty armies, French and Venetian, was in short space reduced vnder the French government: Two Citties only held out for Maximilian, Nouara, and Coma.

Milan reduced to the French government

The Venetians, for these so fortunate attempts, did promise to them-selves a glorious end of this warre: for their armie had gotten such reputation by the taking of Cremona, as Ranxe de Cera going with a troope of Soldiers to recover Brescia, it was yeelded vnto him vpon the first summons; by reason that the Spanish Soldiers, who lay there in garrison, being frightened at his coming, retired into the Castle. There was but one onely thing which could cut off the hope which all men had conceiued of the victory, and that was the coming downe of the Suisses. For the common report was, that the Suisses had with such affection entertained the protection and safeguard of Duke Maximilian's state, as it was certainly thought that they would omit nothing which might further the conseruation thereof.

Brescia yeelded.

The Suisses protectors of the State of Milan.

This Nation was at the same time very famous for their exact obseruation of martiall discipline, and they could by no means swallow the contempt and disgrace wherein King Lewis held them, at such time as hee sent to renew the league with them (as hath beene said) hauing more esteemed a little over-plus of money, then their friendship; as also because the desire of gaine did prouoke them therevnto, hauing seene their fellowes to returne home from other warres victors and laden with wealth.

The Suisses discontent make warre on the French king.

Now these Suisses hauing assembled their generall Councell, did all with one consent resolute to make warre on the French, and they proceeded therein with such earnestnesse, as the most of them, contrary to their custome, enrolled them-selves for very small pay, diuerse also without any pay at all, and in a short time after, they leuyed a great Army, both of horse and foote, which beganne to come downe into the Dutchie of Milan, one company after another.

The newes of their coming downe, did at the first amaze the French, in regard of the recent remembrance of matters brauely executed by them: But when they considered that they brought no caualery with them, nor victuals, artillery, nor ought else fit for such an enterprize, they thought it best not to enforce such enemies, who came rather to steale then to fight, being so vnprovided of all warlike necessities, as they assured them-selves that their Army would shortly dissolue it selfe, as it had done at other times, and would returne home againe, by reason of the want of all things.

The French therefore contemning them in this manner, hauing left a strong garrison in Alexandria, came and encamped before Nouara. Their intent was to trye if they could winne those Suisses by money, rather then by force, and to practise with them for money to deliuer Maximilian Sforza into their hands, as the same nation had done by his Father Lodowick Sforza in the same place. And if this should not fall out, they thought it no hard matter to take that Towne, the winning whereof, as they thought, would bee the ending of the warre.

But the wise and well experienced Capitaines did detide these designes and vaine imaginations, and did blame the French, who instead of assailing the Spanish Armie, and breaking it, which they might easily haue done, did busie them-selves in besieging Nouara, and employing all their forces there, which was directly against Gritti's his aduise, who did many times put the French Capitaines in minde of the fault which they committed, in not first of all assailing the Spaniards, who seemed to bee the enemies chiefe prop. In regarde whereof the Senate thinking it fite to bee done, had commanded their Generall to make a bridge ouer Adda, causing it to bee giuen forth, that hee would presently with the whole Army passe ouer and ioine with the French, to the end that the Spaniards, being moue'd by this report, might not alone abstaine from ayding the Suisses, but thinking how to escape, might bee enforced to returne to Naples. But the French trifling the time vainely before Nouara, brake all these sound determinations, and found them-selves to bee entangled with many difficulties: because the rumor dayly encreased, that of a certaine great ayde was coming to the besieged, the which did make their enterprize more difficult: And as their discamping from thence, would greatly blemish their reputation, and encrease the enemies boldnesse, euen so their long stay there was dangerous and vnprofitable. And therefore diuerse Capitaines were of opinion to retire from those boggy places, and to goe into the Champaigne countrey, where their caualery, wherein their chiefe hope consisted, might bee employed and shew their valour, counselling to goe and meete the enemies, promising vnto them-selves to obaine the victory with ease, they coming so vnurnished of all warlike preparations.

The French besiege Nouara in vain.

But the authority and opinion of Triunleio did most preuaile, who thought it not fit to hazard the whole, on the vncertaine euent of a battaile, but by altering their forme of warre, to retire two miles off from the City, neere to the River Mora, to the end that being safely encamped, they might cut off the enemies victuals, and enforce them thereby to yeeld. The Campe being gone thus farre from the city, certaine troopes of Suisses entred it without any empiedment, where they were receiued with great ioy: and not loosing one minute of time, Captaine Motir, one of the chiefe of the bands, called them all into the market place of Nouara, where after he had encouraged them with most vehement speeches, hee resolved with them by a generall consent, to depart about midnight, and on a faine, by the fauour of the night, to goe and assaile the French Campe, wherevpon hee commanded them to goe to rest, and to refresh their bodies, and to bee ready when the drumme should call them.

The French retire from before Nouara.

The resolution of the Suisses.

This nation did neuer make a more bold and braue attempt, being a few against many, without horse and Artillery, against an Armie excellently well provided of all necessities. About midnight then they sallied with great fury forth

The Swisses
fully ready to fight with the French.

of Nouara, on the first day of Iune, in the year 1513. They were about ten thousand men, who were disposed and ordered in such manner, as seauen thousand were appointed to assaile the ordnance, about which the Lanquenets were lodged, and the residue should march with their long pikes against the men at armes.

The French
Campe in fere and confusion at the Swisses battering.

The French being come into that place, hauing continued the remainder of the day, and a part of the night in armes, betooke themselves heere and there to sleep (according to the report of the spies at Nouara) not doubting that any such accident would so soone befall them, hauing in no sort fortified their Campe. The tumult and confusion was very great vpon the Sentinels report of the enemies comming. The Artillery began to play with great fury vpon those who came to assaile it, and did greatly hurt them. Trinulcio was lodged in the midst of the battaile, because Trinulcio fought in the right wing, and Robert de La Mariche on the left, each of them exhorting the Souldiers to doe well. The men at Armes did readily put them-selues in battaile, and the Lanquenets, who were followed by the other footmen, did on a sodaine place themselves in order. The Swisses notwithstanding that many of their fellowes fell downe dead round about them, did neuertheless, with marueilous boldnesse, marche forward vpon the ordnance, not esteeming present death, nor were danted at the death of those that fel downe at their fecte, vntill that comming vnto the Artillerie, the Lanquenets and they did charge one another with incredible fury, fighting with great rage, and yet neuer brake their order. All in generall did fight with great courage (the men at armes excepted) who stood still and did nothing, no persualions, commandements, nor entreaties of the Lords, Trinulcio and Trinulcio being able to preuaile with them: beeing so affrighted, as they had no courage to charge the enemy, who stood before them, and the Swisses were well pleased with their standing still, and for that they came not on to the ayde of the footmen.

The Swisses victory at Nouara.

At the last, the great boldnesse and valour of the Swisses, carryed it away, who hauing brauely wonne the ordnance, did turne it vpon the French whom they put to rout, the footmen as well as the men at armes doing nothing worthy of praise. This is the famous battaile of Nouara, where they fought for the space of two houres, with great losse on both sides, but most of all on the French, which did afterward bring great calamity on the Venetians.

By this defeat of the French a great alteration followed in Italy, chiefly in those matters which concerned the Venetians. Gritti who was in the French army was likewise one that accompanied them in the fight, who beeing by no reason able to perswade them to tarry at Alexandria or in Piedmont and not blot their reputation with so base and shamefull a flight, perceiving their Armie to bee wholly broken, and knowing that hee could in no sort aduance the seruice of the Common-wealth, went to Sauona, and from thence to Genoa, thento Luca, and so at last he came to Venice.

The whole
Dutty of Millan yielded to
the French.

This victory caused Milan, with other townes which had openly shewed them-selues for the French, to send to begge pardon, which was granted them, on condition to paye the Swisses, vnto whom by right was due, not onely the profit, but the glory of the victory, purchased by their valour and blood.

The Viceroy, who till then had still kept the Spaniards in their garrisons, and not shewed himselfe against the French nor Venetians, following the victors fortune, did on a sodaine crosse the Po, and marched towards Cremona (where he knew the Venetian army lay) to assaile it. Whereof Aluiana hauing intelligence and how that in other places the people began to rise against them & the French, in Maximilians behalfe, attempting to cut off victuals and passage from them, determined to leaue those confines, and to draw his Armie in safety from thence; the which the Senate vpon the report of the battailes losse, had commanded him to doe: but yet neuertheless, to retire in such manner, as his retreat might not fauor of a manifest flight, least it should discourage his owne soldiery, and cause the enemies to become more audacious.

detee

Aluiana being departed, and Cremona left naked of Souldiers, the Spaniard did forth-with leaze on it, and wholly sackt it, because it had giuen entrance to the Venetian Army. Then sending ayde to Maximilian Sforza to Nouara, and to Ozanian Fregosa at Genoa, against the Adorni, he brought the residue of his Army towards the Venetians confines, hauing crossed the riuer Adda, where without any difficulty hee tooke the Citties of Brassia and Bergamo. These Citties were taken in the Emperors name, and rated at certaine great summes of money, which being rigourously leuied, were distributed among the Spanish Soldiers.

Aluiana in the meane time, with all his forces remaining on the Veronois, beeing much discontented to see the great defeignes which hee had projected to bee snatched forth of his hands, resolved on a great and difficult enterprise: for hauing wonne the towne of Legnaga, he left John Paul Baillon at the siege of the Castle, with twelue hundred foot, and himselfe went speedily with the residue of the Armie to assaile Verona, to trye if hee could take it on the sodaine. Baillon hauing made a breach in the forte of Legnaga, gaue a furious assault to it, and notwithstanding the Spaniards resistance, it was taken by force, for which hee was greatly esteemed by the Senate.

This place beeing taken, was not able to bee kept without a strong garrison, wherefore they resolved to dismantel and forsake it. Aluiana on the other side, being come before Verona, did assaile it on the weakest side neere to Saint Maxims gate, where hauing planted his ordnance, hee did with great fury batter the Tower of the gate, and the wall thereto adioyning, expecting in the meane time when any tumult would be raised in the City; and hauing beaten downe to the ground forty fathome of the wall, with the tower which fell downe likewise, hee gaue it a fierce assault. But three hundred horse, and three thousand Lanquenets beeing in Verona, it was valiantly defended, by reason that the breach was very high on the townes side, which made the descent very vneasie. Which Aluiana perceiving, and that the Veronois did in no sort stirre, contrary to his hope, he did with great speed retire his footmen and artillery from before the walls, as wholly despairing of the Victory, and returned the very same day to his quarter, from whence he came in the morning, hauing in that assault lost about two hundred of his soldiers.

In this exploit there was nothing worthy of praise, but his great speed, because he had done that in one day, which other Captains were scarce accustomed to doe in three or foure. After that, hee spoiled the Countrey, trying whether for feare thereof he could enforce the Veronois to come to any agreement.

Cremona taken and sacked
by the Spaniards.

Legnaga taken and dismantled
by the Venetians.

The Venetians
besiege & battle Verona.

Aluiana raising his siege spoileth the Countrey.

The end of the tenth Booke of the fourth Decade.

Ffff 3

THE

The Contents of the first Booke of the fifth Decade.

HE Spaniards take the Castle of Legnaga. Pope Leo reui-ueth the treaty of peace betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. Offers made to the French King by the Venetians. Lewis the French King submitte himselfe to the Pope. The Venetians lose the towne and Castle of Pescara, Padua besieged by the enemies; they soone quit it. The enemies make great spoile beeing come within sight of Venice. Aluiana comming forth of Padua with his Army, opposeth him-selfe against the enemies passage. The enemies are greatly perplexed, by reason they could not come to any place of safety. The enemies doe defeat, and put the Venetians to rout neere to Vincenza. The admirable constancy of the Venetian Senate after the losse of the battle. Prospero Colonna doth secretly fauour the Venetians, by diuerting the siege from Treviso.
The Pope in person makes a Compromise, concerning the strife betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians, which takes none effect. Selim King of Turkes, his warre against Acchomat his Brother. The difficulties which held back the Pope from procuring peace betwixt Christian Princes. The Countreys of Padua and Friul wholly ruined. Frangipan taketh Maran, by the treachery of a Priest. The Venetians are defeated before Maran. A great fire in the Cit-ty of Venice. A new compromise made in the Popes person, concerning the same differences. Feltre taken and spoiled by the Almaines, is opportunely releued by the Venetians: The difficulties which were found a new in the accord betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians, with the Popes arbitrarie sentence.
The Venetians defeat the Almaines in the Countrey of Friul. And lastly, the meanes which the Venetians vsed to recouer money for the emertainment of their Armie.

The

The First Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

WHilest the Venetians spoiled the Countrey about Verona to enforce the Veronois to some agreement, the Spanish army came forward, the Viceroy fearing, least thorough the bad disposition of those of Legnaga, Verona would open her gates to the Venetians, and therefore hee determined without delay to giue ayde to the Emperors affaires: which made him to crosse the Po at Stradella, & to encampe before the castle of Legnaga, which was guarded by two hundred and fifty foot, the which (notwithstanding the common opinion that it might well haue held out for certaine dayes longer) he tooke by force, the Venetian Prouidator being taken prisoner, with all the footmen which were not slaine at the assault. Aluiana hauing intelligence of the Spaniards approach, retired to Albera, on the farther side of the riuer Adicé, where he vied all the means hee could to repaire his armie, the which hee afterward diuided for the gard of Treviso, and Padua, sending John Paul Bailon, Malatesta Sogliana, and the Knight de la Volpe to Treviso, with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and two thousand foote, and himselfe went with the residue of the Armie to Padua.

During all these warlike exploits, and different practises, because the treaties of the accord betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians were not wholly broken off, Pope Leo would haue them to be reuiued, thinking it an easie matter to obtaine of either of them that which hee pretended. For he supposed that the Emperor, beeing inuited by his occasions beyond the Mounts, would bee content to hearken thervnto, that hee might with more ease recouer Burgondie for his sonnes sonne: and the Venetians much more, as well because they were daunted with the defeat of the French, as for that they knew that the French King (many dangers threatning his kingdome) could not for that yeare thinke on the affaires of Italy:
and besides, he saw the Spanish Army at their doores, with which the companies that were in Verona went to vnite themselves: They were more ouer drawne dry of money, vnprovided of Soldiers, and namely of footmen: and they were to make resistance alone, no sparke of light appearing, nor no ayde neere.

The Senate neuertheless made a most constant answer, That it would not hearken to any agreement, vnlesse Vincenza and Verona were yeilded to them.
And on the other side they solicited the French King, by their Ambassador Dandulo, resident with him, to renew his army, and not to make shew of being danted for one onely losse hapned at Nouara: not to suffer those mountainer Swisses to boast for that they had driuen so mighty a king from his state, and rob'd him of the fruit of the purchased victory: That hee should boldly make choyce of counsell worthy his greatnesse, that the Venetians would not faile him in any thing: That hee should make vie for his seruice, of their Armes, Soldiers, and meanes: that so long as life should remaine in their bodies, they would bee ready to vnder-goe all paine and danger, for the greatnesse of the Realme of France, and for the defence of their common cause.

The Castle of Legnaga taken by the Spaniards.

The Venetian
Armie retireteth to Padua and Treviso.

The Pope reuiveth the agreement betwixt the Emperor and the
Venetians.

The Venetians
conspire.

The Venetians
offers to the French King.

King

The French
Kings answer
the Venetians.

The Venetians
answer the French King.

The Kings
Submission to the Pope.

The Popes
reproachfull speeches at the Venetians.

The Pope
sendeth forces to
the Emperor
against the
Venetians.

King Lewis thanked the Venetians for their offers, and with faire words gaue them good hope, manifesting his desire to bee reuenged on his enemies, and to continue his friendship and confederacie with them: that the French Kings custome was not to be chargeable: but to bring all aide, profit, and comfort to their friends and confederates. But because it was certainly thought, that the Realme of France, being assailed in sundry places: namely, by the King of England at Calais, and by the Emperor, and the Swisses in another place; it would bee hard for King Lewis, to intend for that whole yeare the affaires of Italy. The Venetians in the meane time did exhort him to free himselfe from all those difficulties which might in time to come hinder him from the conquest, of that which did belong vnto him in Italy, and to purchase friends in the Countrey, especially the Pope.

The King, who desired nothing more then the vnting of his Realme with the Church, the which was earnestly craued by all his Court and subiects, did willingly hearken to the Venetians intreaties and remonstrances, and resolved for the same purpose to send the Bishop of Marsailles his Ambassador to Rome, and perceiving that hee could neuer hope for any alliance with the Pope in temporal matters, vntill he first of all did compose spiritual diffentions, hee gaue his Ambassador in charge to assure the Pope, that hee had broken and reuoked the Councill which hee had caused first to bee assembled at Lyons, and afterwards at Pisa: and that hee would not allow of any other Councill then that of Lateran, which was then to be held in Rome: that hee would euer (like to his Predecessors) greatly honor and reuerence the Popes name, and the sea Apostolick, and would be ready with his whole power to defend the Church of Rome.

The Venetians at the same time, sent ten Ambassadors to the Pope; for age and dignity, the chiefest of the City, for to giue him sufficient testimony of the good will and affection which they did beare to him: and had besides (the better to please him) enioyned Francisco Foscare their Ambassador resident with him to be present at every Session of the Councill, in the name of the Republick, so soone as it should be begun at Saint Johns of Lateran. But they found afterward that the Pope did not so greatly affect them as they imagined, because that being wholly (since the rout at Nouara) freed from the feare of the French, instead of dissembling (which before hee had done) he began to discouer himselfe openly. He did aloud rebuke the Venetians and greatly taxe them, for recalling the French into Italy: and that they who ought to haue had most care of the liberry and quiet of the Prouince, were those who had stirred vp more troubles in it, and had reduced it vnder the seruitude of Barbarians. And to make them more odious, hee did accuse them to haue had a desire, if matters had fallen out prosperously, to recover the Cities and Townes of Romagna, which they had enioyed. The Pope did often vse these reproachfull speeches.

The Emperour in the meane time did sollicite him to send him the aide promised in the treaty passed with Julius his Predecessor, and ratified by himselfe against the Venetians, in which demand the Emperour still persisting with great obstinacy, albeit it was troublesome vnto him (feearing least the French King would be displeased therewith) hee sent vnto him, (being not able to delay it any longer), vnder the conduct of Troilo Sauella, Achilles Towrella, Mutio Colonna, the number of soldiers which he craued, because he would not (by refusal) giue any signe, that he was not desirous to perseuer in the confederacy contracted with the late Pope, as also because it seemed vnto him that he had no correspondence with the Venetians, who, besides, that their Army had after a sort behaued it selfe in hostile manner on the Parmesan and Placentine territories, at such time as Aluiana lay neere to Cremona, had not chosen any Ambassador to make the oath of obedience to him, after the ancient custome, vntill the French, being vanquished, were gone forth of Italy.

Nothing

Nothing did so much astonish the Venetians, as because the Pope had declared himselfe their enemy. Yet neuerthelesse they hauing in his behalfe neuer failed in the reuerence and affection which they were bound to, (as himselfe did confesse it) they were perswaded that they might yet be receiued into his fauour, and make vse hereafter of his grace and friendship. Neuerthelesse, they did not alter their former determinations, but resolved to resist fortune as much as they might, and seeing themselues to be out of hope of peace, and that the number of their enemies increased, they speedily began to provide all thinges necessary to resist so many dangers. They made great leuyes of footmen as well in Romagna as else where, they armed a great number of vessells, called home all those which they had in Candy and other places, and with the same speed, they made great prouisions of victuals, munition and money.

Some of the Senate were of opinion to haue their nauall army to saile into Puglia, to assaile the sea townes, or at least to seeme to resent the many wronges which King Ferdinand without cause had done them. But hauing maturely considered how important a matter it was to prouoke so mighty a King, they rejected this proposition, as more couragious then discreet, as well in respect of his power, as for that he had alwaies made shew to counsell the Emperour to peace. The Venetian Generall in the meane time being encamped on the banks of Adige, his espies aduertised him that the Spaniards had taken the way of Vincenza, determining to marche towards Padua, and that Cardona, with whom the Popes forces were vnited, came directly towards him with all his forces, he then thought fit to crosse the Riuer, as well to free himselfe from danger, as for to assure the Cities of Padua and Treuifo, and came and stayed at Montagnane. But so soone as hee had crossed the Riuer with his forces, the Venetians affaires, who by reason of some prosperous and good success, had begunne to bee re-established, did a new fall into decadence: For the Polish of Rouigo, did forth-with yeld to the enemy, and the other people of the countrey did likewise sodainly rise, because those of the Venetian iurisdiction, perceiving that the enemies did waxe strong, and did greatly molest them, and that the Venetians on the contrary grew weak, and could not releue them, all men in heapes ranne to the enemies. Ranée de Cere alone deserued great commendation, who remaining euer constant in the Venetian seruice, did at times sally forth of Crema, where he lay in garrison, and made incursions on the enemies Countrey, spoiling and burning whatsoever he met with.

The towne of Pescara, after a small resistance, with the Castle likewise, albeit it was well fortified, fell into the enemies hands, thorough the strife and disention of those within it, Lodouico Contarini the Prouidor, and all the Captaines with the most part of the soldiers were taken prisoners, the rest escaped by flight.

The Bishop of Gurcia, as Lieutenant to the Emperour in Italy, comming to the Armie, was of opinion to goe and besiege Padua, saying, That hee had so great hope in the Lanquenets and Spaniards valour against the Italians, as in the end they would surmount all difficulties. That it was a matter of small labour to take Treuifo, but that the reward of the victory was different, because that to winne Treuifo onely, did not import much for the conclusion of the warre, but by the taking of Padua, they should altogether assure the Cities of the Emperors obedience, from the dangers of warre, and deprive the Venetians of all hope, of euer being able to recover those places that they had lost. It is certaine, that the Bishop of Gurcia did obstinately maintaine this proposition against the aduise of all the Captaines, who were of a contrary opinion, judging it rather an impossible then hard matter to take Padua by force, in regard of his fortifications almost incredible: It is not knowne whether the Bishop of Gurcia propounded it by the Emperors commandement, or else of his own motion, hoping

Provision made by the Venetians.

The Venetian
Army on the banks of Adige.

The last of Ranée de Cere, Colonel of Crema.

The Venetian
last Pescara.

Of which importance the taking of Padua
was.

hoping thereby of greater praise, as for an high and difficult enterprife.

At the last, notwithstanding all the Viceroyes reasons, and those of the contrary opinion, the Bishop of Gurcia his will was followed, by meanes whereof the Imperiall Armie approaching neere to Padua, went and lodged at Bassanella, on the right side of the channell, a mile and a halfe from the city, in which place being much molested by certaine double Canons, planted vpon one of the citties bastions, it crossed the channell, and lodged a little farther off.

Aluiana, who had already sent his Artillery and baggage to Padua, to bee the lighter to take what way should be most expedient; hauing notice of their resolution, determined to march towards the city, to keepe and defend it against the enemies, Baillon being already in Treuifo (as hath bene said) with sufficient forces to defend it, whether the Senate sent Andre, Mari-pietro for Prouidator. And although that Padua seemed to bee well furnished with men, and all other necessities, the Senate neuertheless would haue certaine leuiues of foot companies to bee made, as well of Venetians as Histrians, who speedily marched thither, with all the husbandmen neere about, which were come to Venice for refuge, to the end to vse those men for necessary reparations, in steed of Pioners. Diuerse young Venetian Gentlemen likewise went to the defence of the city: So great was their care and diligence to keepe these two citties, as well for the commodity of their situation, as for the fertility of the soyle, hauing made the country plaine round about, cut downe the trees which were there, and rased all the farmes and houses of pleasure, so as there was nothing within a mile of the city, which lay not open to the mercy of the Canon.

The enemies encamping round about padua, sent the footmen to S. Anthonies Church, which is within halfe a mile of the towne where they beganne, (that they might approach with lesse danger) to make trenchies neere to Saint Anthonies gate. But the work being great, and the want of Pioners greater, it went forward slowly and with danger, because the soldiers on the fodaine making many fallies, as well in the day time as by night, did greatly hinder them that wrought.

On the other side the number of the enemies was to smal for such an enterprife, for they were not aboue eight thousand foot and a thousand horse of all sortes, so as a final quantity of the towne being enuironed by the enemies, the Stradiots sallied forth at other places and did freely scoure the whole contrey, intercepting what soeuer was brought to the Camp, the like did certaine armed boates which the Venetians had placed for that purpose on the Riuer Adicé so as victuals beginning to faile them, they wee eury day to seeke new.

They had worthy Captaines in their Campe, but their skill and experience was to no purpose in that businesse, in regard of the authority and obstinacy of the Bishop of Gurcia. That which did most trouble them, was the bringing of their ordinance neere to the walls, and how to bring the souldiers after ward to the assault, the which they could not doe without a broad and large trench, to auoid the shot of the ordinance which incessantly plaid from the towne, and they wanted Pioners to continue it. These difficulties being propounded by the Viceroy in the enemies counsell, with the sicknesse where-with the soldiers were afflicted, by reason of the bad aire, the campe being seated in a low place, and subiect to the ouer-flowing of waters, all men were of opinion, that it would be lesse disgrace to correct the determination vawisely made, by discamping, then by perseuering in that error to be cause of some great losse that might happen, the which would bee followed with greater disgrace.

The Viceroy acquainting the Bishoppe of Gurcia with this determination, hee made answer in the presence of diuers Captaines, that martiall discipline being none of his vocation, he was not ashamed to confesse, That hee had no vnderstanding in martiall matters, and if he had councelled to besiege Padua, it was by the Viceroyes aduise, who by letters and expresse messages had councouncelled the Emperour that it might be so, and giuen him great hope to be able to take it: and therefore he gaue consent, (difficulties still continuing) to raise the seege, the which was done on the sixteenth day of August, after they had encamped twenty dayes before the walls of Padua.

The enemy marched directly to Vincenza, the which being found, for the most part, empty of inhabitants, and abandoned by the Venetian Magistrates was forth with seized by them, and made a prey to the enemies, where they committed cruell and foule actions, not spoyling alone cittizens houses, but Churches and sacred places, nor for hatred they did beare to that wretched city, but because their army was altogether maintained by theft and robbery.

The Bishop of Gurcia and the Viceroy remained certaine dayes at Vincenza with bad intertainment, as well in regard of the continuall molestation of the stradiots who scoured the contrey day and night, as scarcity and want of victuals, in the City. This enforced them to dislodge: The Bishop of Gurcia with his Almans went towards Verona, and the Viceroy encamped at Albera on the Adicé, where he tarried certaine dayes, as well to giue meanes to the veronois to gather in their haruest vintage, and to sow their grounds, as for to make a bridge ouer the riuer, hauing an intent to bring his troopes to winter on the Bressan and Bergamasc territories. But Aluiana perceiving that the viceroy made no hast to depart thence, was of opinion to falli forth of Padua and Treuifo with their forces and to assaile the enemies, who without any suspicion thereof, being dispersed heere and there about pillage, gaue occasion of an assured victory: shewing, that that Army being defeated, the warre was for a time ended.

The Senate iudging otherwise of the matter, said that it was not necessary to hazard, on the vncertaine euent of a battaile, that army, wherein consisted the chiefe hope of the preservation of their State: thinking it likewise no discretion to vnfirmish, in so dangerous a time, the Citties of Padua and Treuifo of their garrisons: Neuer the lesse, concealing their intents, they caused it to be giuen out, That their Army should shortly come forth into the field, to the end, that the enemies being troubled with this newes, should abstaine from making any more incursions, and dislodge forth of their confines.

But the Viceroy making no great account of these rumors, in regarde hee saw no likelihood thereof, propounded to him selfe greater designs, and changing his former determination, to place his armie in garrison on the Bressan and Bergamasc Country, hauing no other meanes to feede his Armie, but by boot-haling, hee sent for the Almains, and went to Montagnane and Este, and to the village of Boudolente, from whence bringing away great store of Cattle, the souldiers burned diuerse goodly houses neere adioyning: Then being provoked by the desire of spoyle, and emboldened because the Venetian troopes were distributed for the garde of Padua, and Treuifo, they determined to draw neere to Verice (contrary to the opinion of Prospero Colonna) and hauing crossed the Riuer Baquillon, and spoiled Picua di Sac, which is a great Burrow, they went to Mestre and Marguera, seated on the salt waters, where the Viceroy commanded his Artillery to stay, and seeing the City of Venice before him, hee caused tenne peeces of great ordinance to bee discharged vpon it, the bullets whereof fell on the Monastery of Saint Secundus, and at the same time, his souldiers robb'd and spoyled the whole country, making warre most vniually on the very walles, for being not satisfied with their booty, they cruelly burnt Mestre, Marguera, and Lissafalina, together with other townes and villages.

The Imperials raise their siege from before Padua.

The enemies spoile & raine Vincenza:

The Senates opinion on: Aluiana disposes to fight with the enemy.

The incursions of the Imperial Army.

Now

Now the Viceroy beginning to perceiue his error, and therefore being desirous to make halt to gette from thence, could not keepe back his soldiers from pillaging, neither by his authority nor by shewing them the danger they were in if they stayed any longer there, in regard of the ouer-much liberty which they had taken to spoile.

Aluiana his great griefe that he might not come forth

Aluiana being with his army shut vp in Padua, was extreemly grieved to see his reputation so soiled, and that before his face the enemies passing along neere to so strong a Citie, should so vnluckily giue spoile to so great a Countrey. Therefore he aduertised the Senate that his intent was toally forth of the Citie with his forces and to come and meet with the enemies, to stop their passage at their returne, saying that being laden with spoile as they were, they could not chooseth but march in disorder and by that means they might easily be broken and defeated. That certainly their Republicke was fallen into a wretched condition, farre vnworthy their ancient glory, the which they could not shake off, but by some valiant and generous exploit. But the Senate inclining to the contrary, thought that the same did not proceed from a base and abiect mind, but rather from a generous constancy, carefully to provide for all inconueniences that might happen, and that it was no great wisdom to hazard all on the euent of a battaile, which for the most part is doubtfull and vncertaine: therefore their opinion was, that he should assaile the enemies with the Caualery only, and leaue the foote-forces for the gard of the citie.

Aluiana his earnestnesse to the Senate that he might fight with the enemies.

But Aluiana being carried away with an extreame desire to obtaine the victory, by which oftentimes he was spured forward by vaine glory, as by a certaine dazzling, so as hee did not fore-see dangers, and contemned all counsell how wise and profitable soeuer, did every day make greater instance, that he might with the Army come forth into the field, the Prouidary made the same request, being induced as they said by the great affection which they perceived in the Captaines in the Republicks behalfe.

The Senate permits Aluiana to come forth with his army.

The Senate at these intreaties, gaue over their former opinion, and referred all to *Aluiana*s discretion, if he thought that his coming forth of Padua with the army might turne to the profit and vtility of the common wealth; and that to those ends he should assemble all his soldiers, and cause all the peasants, as well of the champaigne as hilly countrey to rise, to stoppe if it were possible the enemies returne (as Aluiana promised to him selfe to do) who were so rashly gonne forward, being come betwixt Venice, Treviso and Padua.

The Viceroy (as hath beene said) having acknowledged his error made all the hast he could to march away, and being come to Ciuitella, he could not take it, by reason that it was well-manned with soldiers. For Aluiana according to the Senates permission being with all his forces come forth of Padua leauing a garrison in Ciuitella, came to Cotincella, where the River Breno might bee forded. The enemies failed not to come thither, for they could not enter Ciuitella: But perceiuing Aluiana to bee lodged on the other side with the Artillery, they durst not passe over: and making shew that they would passe a litle beneath, Aluiana turned all his forces thither, whereupon they passed the night following, without any let, at the passage called the new Croffe, three miles aboue Ciuitella, taking afterwards with great speed, the way towards Vincenza.

Aluiana sheweth himselfe at the enemies passage.

The Imperiall army might passe the river Breno.

Aluiana having notice of their passage, resolved to stoppe them at the River Baquillon: André Gritti, and John Paul Baillon, coming forth of Treviso, ioyned with him, with two hundred and fiftie men at armes, and two thousand foot, determining not to fight with displayed Ensignes, but onely to garde the strong passages and commodious places to stoppe their way, on what side soeuer they should turne, as well on Montefias side, as on that of Barberana, having having sent forces thither for that purpose, and caused the countrey peasants to possess all the passages leading into Germany, and to fortifie them with dikes and trenches, Aluiana having left Theodore Triaulza in Vincenza, with sufficient garrison, came with the residue of the Army, and encamped at Olma, which is a place two miles distant from Vincenza, on the high way of Verona, which was so stopped with ditches and trenches, with artillery planted on the waies, as it was almost impossible to passe. Aluiana chose this place as most safe and commodious, where he determined to stay for the enemies, (according to the Senates aduise) having in abundance all things necessary for a campe, and the enemies on the contrary wanted all.

Aluiana encamped at Olma, determining their to tarry for the enemy.

The Viceroy in the meane time holding on his way was come within foure miles of the Venetian Campe, and stayed at a place called by those of the countrey La Motta, where hee was much troubled in his minde, together with his other Captaines, what way hee were best to take, all their opinions were different: For they could not passe along by the sides of the mountaines, by reason of the marsh countrey which was full of water, nor yet by the streight-waies of the mountaine, which was garded by diuers armed men. So as being in a manner enuironed on euery side by the enemies, in front, on their backs, and in flanke, and continually followed by great multitudes of light-horse, they could not determine on any thing which was not hard and dangerous. Whereupon after long consultation, they resolved at the last to open their way by armes, thinking it fit and well becoming to shew in great dangers a singular and vnusuall valour. Therefore the viceroy, perceiuing the difficulties, that did present them-selves could no longer bee concealed from the soldiours, hee thought good without dissembling any thing, to let them vnderstand how their affaires stood: and by some remonstrance to exhorte them to doe well, and to open their way with their swords points, putting them in mind, how much hee had euier relied on their valour and prowesse, the which alone had made them to enter so farre into the enemies countrey, hoping that they would altogether strue to free them-selves from danger, if any should bee offered, as then was: for having on the one side, sharpe and high mountaines, possessed by the enemies, and on the other side the Venetian Army stopping their returne, they were resolved them-selves by fighting to endure sondry discomforts to winne way, which would neuertheless be great disgrace to them, who had neuer benee vanquished: And therefore hee thought it much better to come at the first to handy-strokes with the enemies, and to passe thorow the midst of their campe, continuing their journey: for want of victuall enforced them to depart thence.

The Imperiall brasse regiment follow.

The soldiours being greatly encouraged by this remonstrance, promised the General to behaue them-selves bravely in the fight, and in this resolution they marched the next day by day-broke to Bassan, turning their backs to the enemies, marching alwaies in order, with small hope neuertheless of escape. Aluiana by reason of a thicke mist, did not very soone perceiue that they were dislodged, which was done without drummes or trumpets: but having notice thereof, hee speedily followed them with his forces: so that their difficulty in marching, passing thorow narrow waies, full of ditches, did still increase their danger, and having gonne about two miles in such way, not without great trouble, Aluiana not being able to containe himselfe, did assaile, not disorderly, but with his army ordered to the fight, and with the artillery the enemies reuered, conducted by Prospero Colonna, who having bravely received them, sent speedily for the viceroy, who led the battaile, and the Spanish foot-men commanded by the Marquis of Pescara, marching at the same time on the one side, and the Lansequets on the other: The Venetian soldiours being with great fury charged vpon, not being able to susteine the enemies force, did basely on a coldaine beake them-selves to flight, slinging their pikes from them vpon the ground.

Gggg

The

The foot-men of Romagna were authors of this flight: the residew of their army did forth with follow them, so as none in a manner did fight. Aluiana himselfe was so amazed at so sodaine a rout, as without fight hee left the victory to the enemies with all his baggage and artillery, the foot-men dispersed themselves in diuers places, and as for the men at armes, part of them fled towards the hill, and the other faued themselves in Padua and Treviso, whether Aluiana and Gritti did likewise retire. Many Captaines were slaine there, and many were taken prisoners, but the Providator Loredan made proofe of them both, by reason that two soldiers struing who should haue him, the one of the two did most inhumanely kill him. And in this manner at this battaile, as well dead as taken prisoners, foure hundred men at armes, and foure thousand Venetian foot were found by reason the matthes which hindered the escape of many.

But notwithstanding that the Senate was adicted with so many miseries, and amazed at an accident contrary to their hope, yet neuertheless, the same day that they receaued these lamentable newes, they determined to write to Aluiana. That they could not deny, but that they were in some sort troubled at the report of so strange an accident, but not daunted or wholly discouraged, wherevpon they were rather to awake themselves in such aduersity, then to lose one iota of their viual constancy, Therefore they did with great affection entreate him to take courage, and not to yeeld to fortune: That they were very carefull of his health, in regard of the great hope they had in his valour, and that they did still hope, if hee recovered his strength and magnanimity, to breake the course of aduerser fortune, to calme her too much rigor, by bringing backe in the end victory from the enemies, albeit they were now victorious: They willed him then speedily to provide for the defence of Padua and Treviso, that the Senate would soone furnish him with soldiours, armor, victuals, and money, and generally with whatsoeuer they knew to be necessary for the safety and preservation of those Cities.

These letters being written, the Senate made prouision of all things needfull. Prince Loredan by a graue remonstrance inciting euery one to employ himselfe therein, said, That it behoued them, selves to releue their state, and not to hope for aide from elsewhere, and that each man ought to aide the common-wealth with what hee knew was in his ability. As for him selfe: hee was determined to spare nothing that he knew might serue the Republique; and how forth that purpose hee resolved to send his two Sonnes, Lodouico and Bernardo; the one to Treviso, and the other to Padua, for to expose them to all dangers which should happen, consecrating them to his country.

The Princes speech did greatly moue; but his example much more, by which diuers young Gentlemen of the cheefest families of the City, and of great hope being incited did like wife depart for the gard of those townes; diuers of the common people were like wise enroled to bee sent to Treviso, whether there report was, that the enemies might first come. The which undoubtedly had beene done, had not Prospero Colonna by suffering from day to day the resolution of that businesse hindered the execution thereof.

Hee, as it was after wards knowne, did sufficiently fauour the Venetian affaires, for the conseruation and defence of the common liberty of Italy: so as after many and sondry determinations, hee caused the counsell at last to condescend to deferre the matter till the Bishop of Gurcia coming, saying That there was nothing which did so much wrong their reputation, as to attempt an enterprize, and then to be enforced to giue over, without effecting it; as they had done at Padua. And thus the Viceroy, and Prospero concluded together to leaue part of the Army at Vincenza, and to leade the residew to Verona, staying for the Bishop of Gurcia: where hauing delayed the time twenty daies, Colonna tooke vpon him the place of Captaine Generall of Maximilian forscast army, and forsooke the Spaniards.

The Viceroy being desirous to renew his Army: sent for all the Captaines with their Companies which lay on the Bressan and Bergamask, assuring them that vpon their arrivall, he would forthwith goe and beleage Treviso: Gritti was within it, with the Knight La Volpe, Hugo de Pepoli, Iohn Paul Manfron, with diuers other worthy Captaines, great numbers of horse and foot, and store of victuall. The Viceroy being aduertized thereof, and it being winter, he deferred the matter till some other time, and sent his army to winter on the Paduan territory, some to Este, and the rest to Montagnane and Moncefelia.

In the meane time matters were changed from Armes to consultations of peace, which were treated of in the Popes Court, whether the Bishop of Gurcia was gone; at whose coming a compromise was made by him and the Venetian Ambassadors in the Popes person, concerning all the strife which was betwixt the Emperour and their common-wealth: but it was a compromise in name and shew rather then in effect and substance: the Pope likewise left the matter imperfect, albeit hee had declared by a Breefe, that there should bee a surcease of armes on both sides: for this was not well obserued, neither by the Viceroy, whose soldiers since the victory did nothing but robbe and spoile euery where, nor by the Germanes, who by means of a Preeft did by stealth take Maran which is a Sea towne in the Country of Friul, then they tooke Montefalcon; In the recouery of which townes, Fortune shewing her selfe no more fauourable to the Venetians, then in other places, they were on both sides much endamaged.

At the same time as these affaires were thus managed in Italy, there were great stirrs in Asia. Selim sonne to Bazaset, his father yet liuing, did vsurpe the Ottoman Empire, and hauing in sondry battailes vanquished Achomet his brother, who likewise laid claime therevnto, had enforced him for releefe, to haue recourse to his neighbor Kings, and cheefly to Hismuell Sophi, King of Persia. And albeit that Selim in his victories gaue sufficient testimony of his vile and cruell nature, and the desire hee had, (being freed from this warre) to assaile the Christians: The Venetians neuertheless being else where molested, and hauing no meanes to resist his greatnesse, relolued to purchase his frendship, and to fit themselves to the time. Therefore they were of opinion to send an Ambassador to him, and they appointed for this purpose Antonio Iustiniano, in the Republicks name to congratulate his coming to the Empire, and to reioyce with him, and to confirme a new the ancient frendship and alliance which they had with the Ottoman family.

This Ambassador was honorably receiued by Selim in the city of Andrinopolis, where he then was with his army, who gaue him great entertainment, knowing very well that without peace he could not assure his affaires of Europe, then when he was to passe with a great Army into Asia against his brother Achomet, who being backt by the Sophies forces, had already recovered certaine places in Cappadocia, and approached to assaile him, whilest hee as yet was not strong enough to resist him; wherevpon Selim (perceiuing that which he had cheefely wished for to be freely offered) did willingly imbrace the Venetians frendship, promising for cuer to obserue it inuiolably: And in this manner the alliance was renewed betwixt them on the same conditions as they had beene before treated of with Bazaset.

This treaty being concluded and effected, Iustiniano returned to Venice, with whom Selim sent Alimbei his Ambassador, to cause the Prince and Senate to ratifie the present treaty, vnto whom he likewise wrote, exhorting them to entertaine his frendship: And that he for his part would neuer faile them. The Turkish Ambassador being come to Venice, and brought into the Senate, Prince Loredan, swore and ratified, as well in his owne name as in the Common wealthes, all that which Iustiniano, their Ambassador, had agreed to, and

The Providator Loredan, slaine.

The constancy of the Venetian
Senate.

The tenor of the Senates letters sent to Aluiana.

Prince Loredan
dan his two sonnes.

Diuers Venetian young gentlemen are sent to Padua & Treviso.

The force of Treviso is defer till another time by Prospero Colo-na.

Compromise made by the Pope.

Troubles in Asia.

Selim cruell

A Venetian
Ambassador
sent to Selim

and signed. Selim by this means being out of feare of the wars on Europes side, hauing likewise renewed the truce with the Kings of Poland, and Hungary, hee marched courageously against Achomat, whome hauing broken and defeated, hee commanded to be slaine, to the end that by his death hee might without contradiction become absolute Lord of Asia the lesse, thereby promising to himselfe, that nothing should bee able to resist him: whereby hee became so proude as hee thought hee was able to conquer the whole world, and cheefely Italy, on which hee began to fixe his thoughts, imagining that hee could with ease subuigate it, being weake and molested by the forepassed warres.

He was moreover incited thereto by the Emperor Maximilian, who thought 10 on no thing more then how to ruinate the Venetians. It is certaine that he sent an Ambassador to Constantinople to aduertise Selim of the great opportunity then offered, to enuade the sea coasts of the Venetians state, whilest hee with his army would assaile them by land: but it was not certainly knowne, on what place he intent first to attempt.

Selim being thus solicited, caused that winter diuers Vessels to bee armed, and new to be made, and to new builde those that were broken. But at the spring 20 newes was brought to Constantinople, how that Amurath, Sonne to his brother Achomat, (who being not at the battaile where his Father fought, with such bad successe, had escaped into Persia) had on a sodaine entred Cappadocia with great numbers of horse and foote, where affrighting the whole country with great waft, hee was become maister of diuers places of that Prouince.

Selim being greatly daunted at these newes, and considering that the Sophia 30 lone was cause, as well of those present troubles, as of those which Achomat his brother had in time before raised, resolved to take reuenge: and to this end determined to send all that great army, as well by land as sea into Asia, the which was leuied for Europe. This Asian warre fell out opportunely for the Christian Princes, whome this most mighty and cruell enemy would haue wholly ruined, and afterward would haue gone on in despite of all their resistance.

This being considered by Pope Léo, with the great good which this warre of 30 Persia had done, thought it his duty to meditate a firme peace among Christian Princes, to the end that being vnited together, they might with more ease oppose them selues against that Barbarous enemy. The Cardinalls solicited him thereto, in setting on foot the treaty of peace, and not to leaue till it had taken effect according to their desire. But albeit the Pope did very well know that this was more then reasonable, yet neuer the lesse hee reuolued in his minde, which was troubled with diuers matters, that as the successe of that wholesome counsell, did promise a very great and certaine commendations, even so the diuers respects of warre and peace, and the difficulties which he met with in this treatie did affright him and wholly draw him backe from that enterprize. For his feare lest 40 the French should retorne againe into Italy, and make head against the Spaniards and Almans, did extremely trouble him: thinking verily that the same would happen, if the realme of France were not enuaded in some place or other, knowing that King Lewis, by nature, was altogether an enemy to quiet, and that so soone as hee had made peace with the English, hee would turne his thoughts vpon Italy, for the recovery of the Duchy of Milan, in regard hee had euer reiected all motions of peace wherein was propounded that hee should quit his claime to the state of Milan.

The Venetians affaires were almost at the same stay, the Pope being not desirous to haue them recover their former greatnesse, nor yet to be to much dejected 50 in regard of the common reputation of Italy. Whilest the Pope was in this sort afflicted with sundry thoughts, and that at one time hee would fauour the Venetians, and at another shewe them an angry and froward countenance, the Achomat brother to Selim vanquished and slaine.

The Emperour Maximilian promoueth Selim against the Venetians.

Amurath Sonne to Achomat in armes against Selim.

Selim marcheeth into Asia with the army which he had prepared for Europe.

The Pope resolued on peace.

The difficulty which held backe the Pope from procuring a generall peace.

the warre did still continew, notwithstanding the sharpnesse of the Winter, for Prospero Colonna with the Duke of Millans forces marching to Crema, ioynd himselfe to the Spannish army, the which did re-enforce the Citties sege, and the Paduan territory was daily scoured and spoiled by the enemies incursions, the like was done in the Contrey of Friul, where there was no towne or castle so strong, either by art or nature, which was not enforced to obey that partie who was strongest in the field; so as the inhabitants of that poore contrey, were wholly stript of all.

And for to dispatch them at once, Bernardino Frangipan hauing forsaken the 10 Venetians, did by treachery seaze on the Fort of Maran (as hath beene said) by means of a Preist called Bartholomeo, who being a familiar frend to Alfandro Marcello Prouidator of the place, got leaue of him on a morning, before day, to haue the Castle gates opened for him, vnder couler that he went forth to hunt, so as Frangipan, according as it was concluded betwixt himselfe and the Preist, did on a sodaine seaze on the gate, with certaine Almaine foot, and some horse, vntill his troopes were arriued, whereby hee became maister of the place. But the traitor within a while after was paid his desert; for being taken by Nicolo Pisare who commanded in Grunare, hee was sent to Venice, where beeing hung vp by one foote, hee was by the people stoned to death.

20 This place beeing very commodious for the Venetians, the Senate was of opinion to haue it speedily beleeged, the better afterwards to assaile Goritia, which Frangipan had taken in the same manner, and held it in the Emperors name. The land Army marched thither vnder the conduct of Balthazar Scipione of Luca, and the nauall army, commanded by Bartholomeo de Must a man well experienced in marine matters. These two Armies being come before Maran, an Herald was sent to the inhabitants of the towne, and to the Almains that were within it, to summon them in the name of the common wealth to yeeld vp that place to the Venetians, aduising them not to delay till it were taken by force.

30 Those within it made shewes wholly contrary to the summons, and vsed many iniurious speeches to the Herald, whereat those of the Camp being incensed, determined to giue an assault, not tarrying for certaine galleyes which were to arrive, but at the first shot of ordnance which the beleeged made vpon the armed boates, which did disorder them, and slew some, the sailers and soldiers were so danted, as on a sodaine they retired as far off as they could from the shot of the Cannon, whereas at the beginning they craued to be led to the assault, so as afterward they durst in no sort stirre, vntill that foure armed galleyes arriued to their aid.

The towne-walls next to the Hauen were in some sort lower then other places, 40 where the small towers likewise had beene beaten downe by the Canons, the Venetians made account to enter there with ease; and to make the matter lesse difficult, to assaile it on a sodaine in sondry places, as well on the land side, as on the Hauens, to the end that the beleeged beeing busied in so many places, might be the weaker in all. According then to this resolution they went to the assault, but on a sodaine there fell such a shower of frayne, as those on the land side were enforced to retire, not only from the walls, but a great way from the towne, the whole plaine being couered with water, by reason of the Marshes neere adioyning, by means whereof the beleeged being assured on that side, turned all their forces towards the Hauen, from whence with ease they draue 50 the assaillants, who already beganne to mount the walles.

At the same time as this happened, the soldiers whom Scipio had sent to garde the passages of the mountaines, to stoppe all ayd from the beleeged sent intelligence to the Campe, that Frangipan approached with great numbers of soldiers, requesting to haue supplies sent vnto them, otherwise they should

GGGG 3.

The Paduan territory with the Friul was sacked by the enemies incursions.

Frangipan treacherly Maran by treachery.

The traitor punished.

The Venetians beleeged Maran.

The assault resolved on Maran diuers places at once.

Those that guarded the mountaines, forsook the passages.

should bee enforced to abandon those places, beeing to weake to resist them, Sauorgname who was in the army, being out of hope to take the towne, vpon these news turned his forces towards the Mounts, but he had not marched a mile, ere he met with those that sent for more aide, who being affrighted at the great numbers of those who were said to be comming, to releue the towne, had not the courage to attend them, and Sauorgname vniuing them with his forces, went to the horse-mens quarter, who were lodged on a little rising hill, not farre from the campe, and did earnestly entreate them (having acquainted them how their affaires stood) to approach neare to Maran, to ioyne them-selues with the residew of the army, and to keepe backe the aid, that was comming to the towne: they were not ashamed to refuse it, where vpon those of the Campe being affrighted, at the report of the enemies great numbers, did in a manner all disband, vnder collour that they had not their pay.

The Campe before Maran disbanded.

Frangipan conuinceth Maran with his succors.

The Venetians are defeated before Maran.

Strafoda and Montfalcone taken by Frangipan.

A great fire in Venice.

A new compromise in the Popes person concerning the strife betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The Almans take Feltre.

Frangipan in the meane time, beeing come with his succors, did without any difficulty enter the towne, finding no where any resistance, where he tooke without delay part of the Almaines, who lay there in garrison, and ioyning them with his soldiers they made a good troupe, with which hee went on a sodaine, and assailed the remnant of the Venetians campe, who little expected it, so as with ease hee did put them to rout, who thinking on nothing but how to escape, forsooke their campe and their ordnance, whereby the greatest part of them were either taken or cut in peeces.

Franisco Tron Captaine of a Gally, did winne that day great reputation; who remembering the Venetian glory, did neuer forsake the place which hee had seased on with a few soldiers, vntill he saw the most part of them slayne, or greuously hurt. Frangipan following the course of his victory, went on a sodaine to Strafoda and Montfalcone, townes of the Friuli, which hee finding vnfortified of garisons, did easily take, and committed most lamentable spoyles.

During this vnfortunate successe of the Venetians warre, and the small hope they had that the French King would that yeare send an army into Italy a greuous fire hapned in Venice in the night, in the beginning of the yeare, 1514, on the bridge of the Rialto, which being driuen forward by the North-windes did so runne on, as no diligence or humane labour could for a long time quench it: it burned the most inhabited and welthiest part of the City.

The Pope at the same time, being desirous to atone the Emperor and the Venetians, did in his owne person cause a new compromise to bee made, with ample & vnlimited power, wher vpon by a breefe he commanded both parties to forsake their armes, which was not very wel obserued by the Spaniards and Almans, because the Spaniards in the meane time did spoyle the whole country neere to Este, and the Viceroy sent to take Vincenza, because hee would be found to bee possessed thereof at such time as the sentence should bee giuen. Frangipan on the other side, hauing done great harme in the Friuli (as hath beene said) began to scoure the whole country, the like did the Almans vnder the command of the Captaines Rissan, and Calapine: who seperating them-selues, Calapine came afterwards to Feltre, which he tooke by assault, where slaying three daies, hee was expulled by John Brandolino, who marching to the recovery thereof by the commandment of Jeromimo Pisare the prouidator, with strong troopes gathered together from Valmarino, and with his light caullery, enforced the enemies, who were daunted at his sodaine arrivall, to abandon the City, and to seeke meanes to escape by flight.

Calapine with the greatest part of his soldiers retired to Bassan, where not standing on his garde hee was assailed a new by Francio Duoda, Gouvernor of the country for the Venetians, hauing called to his aide Bernardino Antignole with his light horse, and Calapine being surprized in that place was taken prisoner, and three hundred of his foot were slaine. But Rissan with eight hundred foot and three three hundred horse, hauing taken the way of Goritia, met with Frangipan as he returned, and hauing vniued their forces together, and by that meanes beeing to the number of fixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse, they resolved to assaile Vdina. The Senate hauing intelligence thereof, sent Malateste Sogliano and Iohn Vittori: thither, the one to command the army, and the other to be Prouidator, with fixe hundred horse and two thousand foot: Jeromimo Sauorgname was there already with two thousand men of the country, where after long consultation, whether it were best to tarry there for the enemy, or by crossing the River Liuenfa to goe vnto some safer place: at the last it was concluded vpon the aduice of the inhabitants concerning the commodities and discommodities of that place, to quit and abandon it, and to retire else where beyond the River: the which was speedily done, for feare lest the enemies preuenting them, their passage might be stoppt: Sauorgname retired to Osof, a place of his owne, to keepe and defend it from the enemies.

The City of Vdina abandoned to the enemies.

Vdina being thus abandoned did yeeld at the enemies first summons. their liues and goods being saued, on condition to pay a thousand crownes to the army to auoide the sack of their City: The like did Cinidale Port Gruera, and some others. But the enemy finding no victuals in that Prouince wherewith to feed the army, after they had wasted and spoiled it, were desirous to march towards Treuiflo, to ioyne with the Spanishe Infanterie, which lay on the Paduan and Vincentyne territories, to the end that being vniued, they might execute some notable enterprise. But one only matter delayed their desigine; which was, not to leaue the fort of Osof behind them, the which was able to stop their victuals, and aide, coming forth of Germany. Therefore they resolved to assaile it before they went on any farther; and that which induced Frangipan to do so, was the hope hee had to take it, as he had done the castle of Chiule, strong by sytuation, the which the soldiers that kept it, had yeilded vpon the only sight of the enemies, without feare of reproach, so as Osof being taken, there was nothing that could stop their victuals or reliefe from Germany, or hinder them from conquering the whole country of Friuli.

But Sauorgname trusting to the sytuation of the place, and to the valour and courage of his soldiers, al-be-it he had but an hundred foot, and four score cross-bowes on horse-backe, with some few peasants, did hope to keepe and defend it in despite of all the enemies attempts.

The Almans then comming to encampe before Osof, seated on the top of a steepe mountaine, did batter it with their ordnance, and gaue diuers assaults to it in vaine, which made them resolve to winne it by a long seerge, hauing intelligence that they within it wanted water; but God provided for them, for at the same time there fell great store of raine, wherewith they were abundantly replenished. In regard whereof the enemies renewed the assault, but all in vaine, so as despayring to take it, either by assault or by long seerge, they raised their campe.

Osof besieged by the Almans.

Whilst these things were done in the Friuli, the Venetians affaires, although they were not very peaceable in Lombardy, did neuertheless succeed more prosperously, where Rance de Cera commanding Crema for the Venetians, did performe sundry notable exploits, notwithstanding that the Spaniards and Sforzas forces were encamped before the towne. These things did greatly displease the Pope, who as a deputed arbitrator sought to bring them to accord, but he could find no meanes of agreement, which might content both parties, by reason that by the frequent alteration of matters, hopes changing according to the successe thereof, it happened that when the Emperor had giuen his consent to quit Vincenza, referring Verona for himselfe, the Venetians refused it vnlesse they might be repossessed of Verona: and then when the Venetians being dejected, were satisfied onely with Vincenza, the Emperour would haue both or none.

The enemies dis campe from before Osof.

Rance de Cera his braine exploits.

Difficulties in the agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.

The Pope being wearied with these difficulties, al-be it he doubted that his declaration would not be accepted, was desirous neuerthelesse (to shew that it was not his fault) to pronounce his sentence, after this manner: That the Emperour should commit Vincenza into his hands in deposito, and all that at which the Spaniards and himselfe did possesse on the Paduan and Trevisan territories: That the Venetians should doe the like by Crema. That as for other matters, each partie should hold these possessions they enioyed, till the declaration which he pretended to make within a yeere, of the conditions of the peace, but that in the meane time, armes should bee laied downe on both sides: That each of them within a month should ratifie that sentence, and that the Venetians in ratifying it, should pay vnto the Emperour five and twenty thousand Ducats, and within three months after, other five and twenty thousand: And if each of them did not ratifie it, the sentence should be of no validity.

After this maner he gaue iudgement, because he would not discontent any of the parties: but this sentence came to nothing, by reason that the Venetians would not ratifie it: for their desire was to haue had the conditions of peace pronounced at the same time. Therefore they returned to armes, and determined to recouer the Friull, wherevpon they sent Aluiana thither for that purpose, with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horse, and seuen hundred foot, who marching on the high way of Portonone, where part of the Almaines lay, his light horse which scoured before, met with capitaine Rissan, the Almain, without the towne (of whom wee haue heretofore spoken) with two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horse, and comming to handy-stroakes with them, they had beene repulsed, had not Aluiana arriued with the rest of his forces, wherevpon beganne a furious fight, the issue whereof was at the beginning doubtfull, vntill that capitaine Rissan being hurt in the face, was taken by Malateste Sogliani: for then his forces being broken, escaped into Portonone, and delpayring of being able to hold it, did speedily forsake it, and betooke themselves to flight, whereby the City was wholly spoiled, and diuers people of the country were slaine.

Aluiana at his departure thence, tooke the way of Osof, which Frangipan had againe beseged with the other part of the Almaines, who hauing intelligence of Aluiana's approach, did soone dislodge, hauing raced the fortres which he had built thereabouts, taking his journey towards Germany, but the Venetian light horse charging him on the taile, he lost his baggage and artillery: By meanes whereof the whole country in a manner returning to the Venetians obedience, Aluiana hauing attempted in vaine to take Goritia, returned forthwith to Padua with his forces.

Frangipan said that the same disorder was no fault of his, but that being ill disposed of his person, by reason of a blow on the head with a stone which hee had receiued at Osof, he could not prouide for that which was necessary for the safe retreat of his army: But being afterwards healed, and running vp & downe the neighbour mountaines to stirre vp new troubles, and to leaue new forces, he fell into an Ambuscado, laied for him by Iohn Vitturi, where he was taken and brought to Venice: A man indeed very haughty and cruell, and a great enemy to the Venetians, and who by his ordinary incursions had for a long time greatly molested the country of Friull. In regard of this fortunate successe, wherein Sauorgnan's aide did greatly preuaile, his fame and reputation was much encreased, wherevpon the Senate for his deserts, created him Earle of Belgrado and Osof, for himselfe and his heires, to the end that the memory of his valour might be knowne to posterity, with foure hundred Ducats of yeerely reuenue forth of the publike treasury.

Now to returne to Aluiana, the number of the Almaines being encreased by his departure, they tooke againe Cremona & Montfalcon, & enforced the Venetians to remoue their seege from before Maran, for the Venetians hauing intelligence that that supplies arriued, dislodged thence and retired in great hast. Such alterations often happened in the country of Friull, in regard of the Almaines neighbourhood, who after they had robbed and spoiled, so soone as they had any notice of the comming on of the Venetians forces (with whom diuers of the country ioyned) they forth with retired home, and then returned, as occasion was offered.

The Venetians in the meane time, perceiuing that all hope of agreement was taken from them, and that the warre was to be continued, beganne to thinke on meanes how to get money, their treasure being wholly exhausted. All the magistrates were assembled to this end to consult in what manner they might raise money for the expences of the warre. Diuers meanes were propounded in the Senate, and debated with sundry opinions. At the last they resolved to make a generall taxation, whereof the highest should not amount to aboute three hundred crownes: and to this end, three persons were chosen to make this rate, according to the ability and authority of euery man, provided that it did not exceed (as hath beene said) the summe of three hundred crownes for one house. By meanes whereof in short space great summes of money were raised to pay the army: For the goods of those men that refused to pay what they were rated at, were iudged to be confiscate to the publike treasury.

The end of the first Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

The Contents of the second Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Venetians beseege Maran, and forth-with raise their campe. The defeat and taking of Vitturi the Prowidator. Bergamo is taken by Rance de Ceta, and soon recovered by the Spaniards. The Venetians take Frangipan. The Venetians recover Vincenza. The victory of Selim against Ismael. Soliman entrench Hungary. The Croisado published in Hungary against the Turkes. Pope Leo his meanes to ioyne the Venetians with the Emperour and the Spaniards, and to disunite them from France. The Venetians send Ambassadors to the French King, and to the King of England. The death of King Lewis the twelfth. Francis the first, Duke of Angoulesme, succeedeth him. The new King confirmeth the league with the Venetians. The Venetians send Ambassadors to the Pope to draw him to their side. What the Pope did against the Venetians. A league contracted betwixt the Emperour, the King of Arragon, the Duke of Milan, and the Swisses against the French King. The viceroy of Naples his enterprize on Vincenza, and the aide which Aluiana brought thither. The Swisses great gard at the foot of the Alpes against the French. The French passe into Piedmont by the hill of Argentre. Prospero Colonna is taken by the French. Agreement betwixt the King and the Swisses contracted and broken all in one day. The battaile betwixt the King and them at Marignan. The Swisses soft retreat towards Milan.

The

The Second Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

ALTIAN being returned from Friul (as hath beene said) the Venetians were of opinion by the soliciting of Sauorgnano, to renew their enterprize vpon Maran, the whole charge thereof was committed vnto him. He according to his commission hauing leauied two thousand men of the country, and foure hundred of the best souldiers from Vdina, went with his forces and encamped before Maran. John Vitturi General of the light horse, and John Paul Masfron capitaine of the men at armes, did by the Senates appointment meete him there with their Caualtery, to the end that the enterprize might be executed with more assurance and reputation. Sauorgnano at his arrival seized on a strong place not farre from the walles of the City, and there encamped, causing great trenches to be made, to the end the souldiers being the better defended, might in more safety march to the walles. And because the situation of the place was not commodious for them; by reason the ground was very low, and boggy, he by his industry and diligence overcame the discomfort of the place, by making plat-formes and bulwarkes of sundry substances, for two purposes, the one for that they should serue for a safe retreat to his souldiers, if so be the enemy should make any sodaine sally; and the other, that his souldiers coming to the assault, should be as high mounted as the enemies on their walles.

All things being in a readinesse for the assault, and some souldiers being already marched thither, certaine capitaines, who at the first were not of opinion to giue an assault made a stand, by reason of some encomberance of water which they found some what high, which caused them for that time to deferre that which had beene determined. In the meane time letters came from the Senate to Sauorgnano and to the chiefe of the army, which imported, that the Senates meaning was, to haue them vse meanes to take that towne rather by a long siege, then by assault, because the Senators feared (as the experience of what had formerly happened in the selfe same enterprize had made them wise) that being deciated through the hope of the Authors of the siege, the enemies coming on a sodaine to passe thorow their campe, the army might receiue some notable losse. As also, for that to assault that towne so often in vaine did greatly diminish their reputation. Herevpon, they resolved according to the Senates direction, to encampe only before it, and not to assault it, setting vp diuers tents and lodging places, to stir in the towne more straightly, and to keepe all victuals from being brought into it.

But whilst they spent the time thus vnprofitably, they gaue the enemy leasure to assemble his troups, and to re-encforce themselves for the reliefe of the besieged. Those of the campe hauing notice that the Allians had for this purpose gathered together great numbers of horse and foot, and that diuers peasants of the neighbour villages were gonne to Gradisca to come speedily to assault them,

The Venetians
beseege Maran.

The Senates
intent is not to giue an assault.

them, they resolu'd presently to raise their siege, and to retire to Vdina and Cituella.

The enemies so soone as the Venetians had raised their campe, did supply Maran with victuals and souldiers: by means whereof those within it being growne stronger and more audacious scoured the country round about. The Senate being much discontented with these incursions, and fearing if it were not speedily remedied some greater harme might ensue thereby, commanded the Knight La Volpe, General of the light horsemen, to goe with two hundred horse into Friul to restrain the enemies courses: Pietro Marcello was commanded to doe the like who had beene sent Prouidator to the campe: But before they could arrive there, the poore country men had endured much misery.

Vitturi the Prouidator is defeated and taken.

Rance de Cera pursues Siluio Sanello to rout.

Vitturi the Prouidator retiring with a hundred Albanese horse-men to a place of weake defence, was assailed by the enemies, where after he had valiantly defended himselfe, being hurt, and his souldiers forsaking him, he was taken prisoner, all his souldiers were either taken or cut in peeces. At the same time Rance de Cera, who lay in Crema, dispayring almost of being able to keepe the towne, in regard of the great want of victuals in it, and of the terrible plague, as also for that the souldiers wanted diuers monethes pay, did (vnlooked for) assaile Silvio Sanello, as he came from Milan, who had with him two hundred men at armes, a hundred light horse, and fiftene hundred foot, whom hee did forth-with put to rout, so as Sanello fled to Lodi with fifty men at armes only; whervpon, the Venetians did re-victual Crema the second time, & Count Nicolo Scoto manned it with fiftene hundred foot.

Bergamo taken and soon lost.

Rance being encouraged by these supplies, did within a while after enter into Bergamo, whither those of the City had sent for him, and the Spaniards that lay there fled to La Chappella. The viceroy and Prospero Colonna being awakened with the losse of Bergamo, assembled the Spanish companies, with those of the Duke of Milan, and went to encampe before it with five thousand foot, ioyned to the Spanish and the Duke of Milans forces, where having planted the artillery against Saint Catherins gate, and made a breach, Rance who was in the city perceiving that it was impossible to keepe it, left it to their discretion, and capitulated for himselfe and his souldiers, that they might depart thence with their liues and goods, without sound of drum or trumpet, and their ensignes folded vp.

Whilest these things were done at Crema and Bergamo, Aluiana hauing much importuned the Senate, that he might come forth of Padua with his forces, was permitted to doe so, to the end he might restrain the Spaniards, who although peace was treated of, did not cease to waste and spoile euery where: whervpon at his coming forth, hee made a very notable enterprize, full of wonderfull speed and indutry vpon the City of Rouigo, where lay about two hundred Spanish men at armes, who thought themselves safe there, because the River Adicé was betwixt them and the Venetian companies: for at such time as they thought not of him, he cast a bridge neere to the towne of Anguilare, and with one company without baggage, he crost the River, and being come to the towne, where of one of the gates was seized by a hundred foot, clothed like peasants, whom he had sent before vnder colour that it was market-day, he entered in, and tooke all the men at armes prisoners whom he found there.

Aluiana taketh Rouigo.

This exploit caused all the other Spaniards that were lodged in the Posseliss, to abandon it, and Legnaga likewise and to retire to Ferrara. Aluiana after the taking of Rouigo being come to Oppian neere to Legnaga, meaning to haue gon to Verona, hauing intelligence that the Spanish army had recovered Bergamo, and was returning towards Verona, he resolu'd not to tarry there, and therefore he sent the companies of men at armes by land to Padua, and he went thither by night by the River Adicé, with the Infantry, the baggage, and the ordnance, to auoide the great wet and mire, and not without feare of being assailed by the enemies,

Aluiana retreats to Padua.

enemies, who were kept backe by the waters which were risen very high; then coming on shoare he speedily went into Padua whether the men at armes were come two daies before. The Senate vpon the report of this braue exploit vpon Rouigo, did receiue great contentation, hoping still for better fortune hereafter, and wrote letters to Aluiana full of congratulation, saying that he had truly manifested his valour and martiall experience, together with the good will which he did beare to the Republique.

The same yeere, the country of Friul was in more quiet then of a long time before, by reason of the taking of captaine Frangipan, who had molested it more then any other: whervpon, the Venetians knowing how much it did import them still to detain him, refused to exchange him for John Paul Bailion. At the same time likewise Rance de Cera being returned to Crema, and finding there great want of all things, did of his owne authority without communicating it to the Senate, make truce with the enemy for sixe monethes: then, leauing Giovan Antonio Vysin in the City, with five hundred foot, and as many horse for the gard thereof, he went with the residue of his forces to Padua, and from thence himselfe went to Venice, to giue them an account of what had past at Bergamo and Crema, and also to consult with them of what was needfull to bee done. Hee was honourably entertained: and because hee had in former time refused the place of Generall of their army, no greater honour beeing at that present vacant, the Senate gaue him the towne and castle of Martinenga with all the reuenue thereof.

The country of Friul at quiet by means of the taking of Frangipan.

The Venetians give great entertainment to Rance de Cera.

The viceroy and Prospero Colonna being crossed in their designs, by reason of Aluiana's retreat to Padua, hauing sent their forces into Garrison in the Posseliss of Rouigo, they went to Isprach, to consult with the Emperour what was to be done.

Whilest fortune shewed her selfe so variable and inconstant to the Venetians, the City of Vincenza, which was reduced vnder their gouernment, was kept with a small garrison, notwithstanding that diuers of the enemies troupes lay round about it: for it continued still in the fidelity and deuotion of the common-wealth, chiefly by the means and diligence of certaine Citizens, who hauing gathered together great numbers of people of the territory neere adioyning, did keepe it alwaies well furnished and provided of all necessaries: so as Nicolo Pascale the Citties Magistrate, resoluing in regard of the small number of defendants which was in it at the beginning, to abandon it, did take new courage, and did so well exhort all the inhabitants to the defense thereof, as the enemies durst neuer come againe to beseege it.

In these petty exploits of warre, and with an vncertaine hope of peace, the Sommer of that yeere was spent for the affaires of Italy. But Asia produced greater enterprizes; for Selim marching into Persia (as hath beene said) and meeting with Ismaels army, fought with him, of whom he gat a glorious victory, chiefly by means of his artillery, the vse whereof was then vnknowne to the Persians. In regard whereof the great dangers were plainly discerned which threatened other Realmes and Prouinces, by reason of Selims fierce and haughty courage, who for this fortunate successe was become more proud and insolent. And that which did most manifest it, was, that at the same time that hee made warre in Persia, Soliman his sonne entring Hungary, did spoile the country with great numbers of horse, and had already taken diuers townes.

Selims victory against Ismael.

Soliman enters Hungary.

The Pope was desirous to remedy it, and caused great leauies of souldiers to be made in Hungary, who tooke for their badge a red crosse, calling themselves the Crossed, taking armes for the defence of Christian religion against the Infidels. But this leauy of souldiers, which were thought would haue aided and releued the King of Hungary, did in a manner ruyne him: for, weapons beeing

A Crossado in Hungary against the Turkes.

H h h h

put

The great harmes with the Creingde did to Hungary.

put into the hands of the peasants of that country, who are deadly enemies to the Nobility, they committed infinite riots, and threw the Realme head-long into greater dangers: wherewith the Pope being troubled, turned all his thoughts to the peace of Italy, and for that purpose, he sent to Venice Petro Bembo, his Secretary, a Venetian Gentleman, who being come thither, spake to the Senate in this manner.

The Oration
of the Popes Nuncio to
the Senate

That Pope Leo his affection towards the Republike had ever beene sound: That he was still greeued by their losses and afflictions, as the care which he hath had of them, might largely witnesse: Besides there was nothing more sure, then that his whole designes and ayme did euer tend to peace, and if hee had at any 10 time taken armes, it was of necessity and by constraint. That hee had euer embraced their common-wealth with a fatherly loue, and had neuer ceased to exhort, admonish and entreat them to fit themselves to the time: by which offices he thought that he had sufficiently discharged his duty, and perceiving that all which he had done was to no purpose, he had determined to giue ouer the busi- nesse, and no more to talke of peace, wherein hee had so often laboured in vaine. Yet neuertheless hauing of late changed his minde, and compared the time present, with the ancient affection which he had borne to the Republike, he had now sent him to them, to exhort them in his name, to respect their owne liberty and the safety of all Italy, and to embrace the best and wholesomest counsell: They 20 should doe well to consider the manner of the French proceedings, their great desire to command, and their immeasurable cruelty towards the vanquished. That King Lewis his great desire to recover the Duchy of Milan, was only afterward to make himselfe Master of all Italy. For, hauing once overcome Maximilian Sforza, and wholly expelled him from his fathers state, hee beleued that the way would bee easily opened to him for the attaining thereto, and for abusing, by means of other Italians, the Venetians liberty: whereas they had in time past made alliance with the French, enforced thereto by great necessity, they had done well, in respect of those times: But now to bee allied with them was most dangerous, in regard, that thinking to assure themselves, it was to 30 bee feared, that they would precipitate their common-wealth into ruine, by the friendship of the French, which is not wont to last long, and therefore it were better to haue them farre off then nere at hand: That diuers recent examples might teach them the fidelity and constancy of that Nation, who had forsaken the King of Nauarre, being driuen forth of his Realme for their seruice, and because hee would not abandon their friendship, with many others likewise who had well deserued of the Realme of France, towards whom they haue vsed the like ingratitude: and therefore they were not to hope, since they had bene forgetfull of their neighbours, that they would proue more louing to the Venetians, who are strangers: and namely that the French had sworne the totall ruine of their Republike, at such time chiefly as they had receiued infinite benefits of the Venetians, and had bene in no sort offended by them, and that they might with honour haue compounded with the Emperor. They should doe well then to resolute, to keepe the French armies farre from Italy: That it was against reason to beleue, that the French hauing conquered the state of Milan, would containe themselves within their bounds, & not fly out vpon other mens confines. That the Venetians being wearied with so many wars, ought henceforth to embrace peace, & quiet, to which there was nothing more contrary, then the comming of the French into Italy, by which it was sure to susteine a cruell war: where, on the contrary, if the common-wealth would agree with the Almains and Spaniards, & with all the Potentats 50 of Italy, to expel the French; the only report of that alliance would be sufficient to make them to lay downe their armes, & to change their present purpose to repasse the mountes and to come into Italy, which by that meanes might become quiet and peaceable. But if yee shall contemne this counsell, the Pope will take God and and men to witnesse, that he hath in no sort bene wanting to the common good of Christendome, and to the particular profit of the Venetian common-wealth. That they were besides to beleue, that he could ere then haue embraced those parties which doe now presently offer themselves to his aduantage, and perhaps he would accept them, by allying himselfe with the Emperour and Spaniards, to their hinderance, of whom so often he hath had great care, and yet to no purpose. They had no need to craue any greater assurance of him; for the interell of the Sea Apostolike, and that of their Republike was all one, so as both of them ranne one selfe same fortune, being in a manner, both the one and other subiect to like 10 accidents. That they were likewise to remember that men oftentimes are ruled by their owne particular passions rather then by reason, as then, when to be reuenged on Lewis Sforza, they threw themselves headlong into manifest danger, by associating for their fellow in armes, a forraigne King, most mighty, who was to be a neighbour to their state, in stead of a weak Prince, and their countryman. Therefore they should doe well to aduise themselves how to reape some fruit by the Popes fauor and good will, the which til then they had with great care sought to enertaine.

With these or such like speeches Bembo executed the tenor of his commission: but the Senate, (the matter hauing bene determined) thought it neither easie nor safe to alie themselves with the Emperour and Spaniards; wherupon with a generall consent it was concluded, to continue in the friendship and alliance of the French, and to make this answer to the Popes Ambassador.

The Senates
resolution on Bembo his demand,

That his Ambassador was greatly pleasing to the Senate as well in respect of himselfe, whose vertue and particular affection towards their country was sufficiently knowne to all men, as likewise in regard of the Prince that sent him, seeing they had euer borne great honour and reuerence to the soveraigne Bishops of Rome, and were particularly inclined to Pope Leo. That the Senate had euer highly esteemed his good and wholesome counsell: but the mischief was, that by how much, they, aboue all others, had desired his friendship and alliance, in 30 that vncertainty of all things, by so much more were they continually kept from it. And al-be it their loue was neuer disioyned from him; yet their forces were euer diuided. As then they did humbly thanke the Pope, and confessed themselves much bound vnto him, in that hee had bene euer ready by diuers good offices to embrace and fauour their cause, euen so likewise they were extreame- ly grieved that they could not follow his counsell, their ancient custome not permitting to leaue an old alliance for a new, especially not being prouoked thereto by some wrong, their ancient fathers thinking that alone to bee profitable, which was most honest: and that therefore they could not, with- out great blemish to their reputation, breake and abandon the alliance 40 which they had already contracted with the French. And if the Pope would call to minde the ancient benefits of the French Kings, not onely to the Venetian common-wealth, but likewise to the Church; and to consider the wealth and power of that Kingdome, hee would not onely excuse, but commend the Venetians counsell, and bee desirous himselfe to follow it, because that being backed by the French forces and those of the Venetians, there was likelihood that he should be able to lay surer foundations, as well for the state of the Church, as for the greatnesse and aduancement of his owne house.

This speech being pronounced by Prince Lauretan, they made priuate remonstrance to Bembo, how the Senate did greatly suspect, that vnder that treaty of peace some deceit might lurke, in regard it was practized by the Emperour & by Ferdinand, being assured that vnder collout of agreement, they would, as at diuers other times, practize some dangerous warre on the Venetians: because that at the same time as the Spanish Ambassador delt with the French King concerning the affaires of Italy, Ferdinand had reuiued this treaty of peace, to none

The Senates
suspition pri-uately declared to Bembo.

other end but to cause the French King to suspect the Venetians friendship, and thereby to separate himselfe from them, the better afterwards to enforce them to agree with him, to his owne great advantage: and that the same coming to passe, the Venetians being so diuided from the French, what should hinder Ferdinand to make himselfe master, and quiet possessor of all Italy, as long time before then, he had aspired thereunto.

Bembo being returned to Rome, reported all this to the Pope: but before he left Venice, he assured the Venetians, that the Pope would neuer suffer any man to attempt against their State, knowing very well that on them depended the liberty of Italy, and that he was to rely on them for the greatnesse and maintenance of the house of Medicis. The Venetians made declarations that they did not greatly care for that agreement, for thereby they should be deprived of the richest and goodliest city belonging to their state, which was Verona: and that which maintained them therein was the hope which they had that the French King would shortly come into Italy. For King Lewis being provoked with a desire to recover the Dutchy of Milan, had made peace with Henry King of England, and made preparations to repasse the mounts, and to come into Lombardy with a mighty army, whereunto the Venetians being ioyned, they hoped with ease to chase their enemies from their bounds and confines.

This hope caused them to send Ambassadors to the French King, and to the King of England their friends, for to continue them still in their affection towards them, and to this end were appointed Françisco Donato, and Pietro Paschalis, but in Donato his stead, who fell sicke, Sebastian Lusignan was sent thither.

Their chiefe commission was to congratulate both of them for the peace and alliance contracted betwixt them, King Lewis having married King Henries sister, and to thanke them, for that in the treaty of agreement made betwixt them, they had therein comprehended the Venetians, by name, as their friends and confederates.

That they should moreouer assure the French King that the Senate did beare the same loue towards him as it had done in times past, determining to preferre his friendship before any others, resolving to renew the warre, if he so pleased, and that to that end they should counsell him to returne speedily into Italy, where he should find the Venetian forces ready to ioyne with his. Now whilest these Ambassadors were on their way, King Lewis died: for as hee ouer ardently tooke his pleasure on the excellent beauty of his new wife, who was not above eightene yeeres old, not remembering his age nor the weaknesse of his complexion, he was taken with a feuer, beside which, being troubled with a continuall fluxe, hee soone departed out of this present life, and made the first day of the yeere 1515. famous by his death. It was thought that his death would haue bread great alterations. Yet for all that they did not call backe the Ambassadors, but commanding them to goe forward on their iourney, they were enioyned to stay at a certaine place, to expect a new commission from the Senate. King Lewis was a lust Prince, and welbeloued of his subiects; who neither before that hee was King, nor afterward did euer finde either bad or good fortune firme and constant to him.

The ioy which they had of King Lewis his death, who desired not the returne of the French into Italy, lasted not long. For Françis Duke of Angoulême succeeded Lewis the twelfth, as the next in ligne Masculine of the Royal blood, and of the very race of the Dukes of Orleance, whose vertues and magnanimity was admired of all men, who with the title of French King did likewise take that of Duke of Milan, as belonging vnto him, not only by the ancient claime of the Dukes of Orleance, but as being comprized in the inuestiture which the Emperour made, according to the treaty of Cambray: and besides, he had the same desire to recover it, as his predecessor had: The which he neuertheless disembled for the present, seeking first of all to prazize the friendship of other Princes, diuers of whose Ambassadors came forth with to him, whom hee graciously receiued, and among others, those of the Venetians having had new commissions sent vnto them to Lyons where they staid: with whom he confirmed the league in the same forme as it had bene made with his predecessor, and he caused the Bishop of Ast to doe the like in his name, who being sent to Venice by King Lewis, arrived still there.

The Venetians, who already did make great account of the friendship of the French, and had enioyned Marco Dandolo their Ambassador to sound what the new Kings minde was concerning their alliance and confederacy, were exceeding glad when they received his letters, and had seene the Bishop of Ast his commission, praising his gentlenesse, being desirous to shew how highly they esteemed his friendship, and therefore they commanded their Ambassadors to giue him great thanks, for the loue which he seemed to beare to their Republike, and his desire to aide and succour them, promising him to employ themselves with like affection in ought that should concerne his seruice, and would vnderstand that the French might againe hold some dignity in Italy, to the enemies feare and terror, and to the maintenance and stay of the Republike their friend and confederate: They should likewise perswade him to hasten his iourney, and assure him that the chiefe point of victory consisted in speed, and not to giue the enemies leisure, who were now weak, to strengthen themselves; as also for feare least the City of Crema, which did import much for the recovery of the State of Milan, should incurre some danger, in regard it had of a long time endured many discommodities of warre, so as it was reduced to the last extremity, being out of hope of having any longer truce with the enemies, it being almost expired, expecting every day when Prospero Colonna with new forces would come againe to beseege it. They should likewise assure him, that the Senate would neuer fail of their duty, having already made new prouision of souldiers for the land army, of armour and munition, and giuen order to arme certaine Gallies to amuze the enemy as well by sea as land, and that the King should for his part doe the like.

The Venetian Ambassadors having executed their commission with the King in the City of Paris, went into England to finish the remainder of their Ambassage, where being curiously entertained, they declared at their first audience the great sorrow and griefe that the Venetians had for the death of King Lewis his brother in law, a very mighty Prince and a great friend to the Republike, then they gaue him many thanks for the great correspondence betwixt them, for that in the conclusions of peace, as well with King Lewis, as since then with King Françis, he was euer desirous that their common-wealth, as his good friend, should be especially named and comprized. And afterward the Ambassadors being in private with the King, did earnestly entreate him, that it might please him by his authority to perswade the French King, according to the desire he had to haarken to the affaires of Italy, to giue aide and succour to the Venetians, and incite him to put in prazize his said desire. That in the meane time the peace and alliance betwixt them might continue firme and inuincible, from which would proceed nothing but good to both parties, and bee very commodious for all Christendome.

After both the Ambassadors had in this sort accomplished their charge, Lusignan remained in England with King Henry, and Paschalis returned into France to doe the like there, who being come to Paris received letters from the Senate, whereby he was commanded to goe with speed into the Low countries to the Arch-duke to congratulate him for his marriage and for the peace, whereof the common-wealth was very glad, which they would haue to be signified to him by their Ambassador.

The Venetians
desires to draw the Pope to their paye.

After this manner did the Venetians strive to entertaine the friendship and alliance of forraigne Princes, fitting themselves to the time. But their greatest care was how to find meanes to draw the Pope to their side, and to ioyne him with the French, whereof they had some hope by reason that Juliano de Medicis the Popes brother, who could doe much with his Holinesse, had married Philiberta sister to the Duke of Sauoy, and a very neere kinswoman to the French King, by which they supposed that hee would fauour the French: and that the Pope in time to come, would more encline to them then he had hitherto done, perceiving that the Realme of France beeing strengthened both by kindred and confederacy with England, and the Arch-duke, nothing was able to hinder King Francis from growing great in Italy, and from being feared there. Yet for all that the Pope being tossed to and fro with his accustomed doubts and difficulties, had no firme or certaine resolution, for now he tooke part with one, and anon with an other: sometimes being vanquished with feare he inclined to the friendship of the French, but he did oftner and more willingly discourse with the Ambassadors of the Emperour and King Fernand, and made answer to the Venetians, who spake to him about it, that they might draw some thing from him, that hee would bee a looker on, and see what the issue of the warre would bee, intending to ioyne with the Conquerour. But hee did not imagin in his heart that the French King would euer passe into Italy, so as if King Francis had already passed the mounts with his army, yet he would not beleue it.

The Venetians
send an Ambassador to
the Pope.

The Venetians beeing acquainted with his humour, sent Marin Georgio their Ambassador to Rome, with expresse commission to tell him, That he was of necessity to shew himselfe otherwise then hitherto hee had done, and to doe his best to alter his former opinion, and to that end he should make the French Kings forces to bee very great, and giue him to vnderstand how that seeing his Realme was out of danger of forraigne warres, he might without contradiction and on a sodaine turne towards Italy, wherevnto he was much enclined in regard of his desire to conquer the State of Milan, that there was nothing so hard or difficult that was able to diuert him from this designe: That the Venetians should have the same will to renew the warre, and to ioyne themselves with the French: That they euer desired as well in peace as warre, to be vnited to the Sea Apostolike, to runne the selfe same fortune with it, and had greatly laboured to haue it so. But not being able to obtaine it of his Holinesse, and perceiving the hope of the victory to be very great on the French side, the Venetians were resolu'd not to abandon their friendship and alliance, thinking that by so doing, they had discreetly provided for their affaires: The which he likewise ought to doe, hauing first maturely considered what soeuer might hinder or delay the Kings intent, and finding none at all, to preferre by so doing the papall authority and Maiesty, together with the possessions of the Church: That there was but onely one remedy left in all this, which was, that the Pope would vnite himselfe with the French and Venetians, because that the Swisses being forsaken by his Holinesse, and by his succors, would of a certaine giue ouer the defence of Maximilian Sforza, and lay downe their armes which they had taken against the French, so as the confederates being depriv'd of that aide, should be enforced to change their mindes: the Emperour would no more thinke on the affaires of Italy, and Fernand would satisfie himselfe with his kingdome of Naples; wherevpon others might recouer what belonged vnto them, namely the French, the State of Milan, and the Venetians those Cities which had bene wrongfully taken from them, and thereby a firme and sure peace might be established.

The Pope determines against the Ve-
netians.

All these goodly discourses could smally preuaile with the Pope to make him alter his opinion: but on the contrary, continuing firme in his first determination, he thought in himselfe that he might easily induce the Venetians to doe what he pleased. But perceiving that to deale with them by faire and gentle meanes,

The Popes publication against
the Venetians.

hee should neuer obtaine his desire, hee resolu'd to vse severity and rigor. Hee caused to be published ouer all the Churches territories, that no subiects or Vassals belonging to the holy sea, should vpon paine of most greivous censures, beare arms vnder the Venetians pay; commanding al Captaines as well of foot as horse, to come with al speed to the Spanish campe, with their soldiours and hories, going about by that meanes in such sort to diminish the Venetians forces and reputations, as being encompassed with so many mischeefes they should be at last enforced to haue recourse vnto him, and to doe his pleasure: but the Venetians on the contrary continued firme, and constant in their alliance, hoping by that meanes of the French, to be able to maintaine and defend their owne state.

King Francis
his dissimulation.

King Francis in the meane time beganne very carefully to gather together very great summes of mony, and to encrease the ordinance of his men at armes, to the number of foure thousand, publishing abroad that his meaning was not to make warre on any one, for that yeare, but onely to make head against the Swisses, who threatened to assaill Burgundy or Dauphiné, if so be hee should refuse to fulfill the conuentions made at Dijon in the name of the late King.

Many beleue'd it, in regard of the example of some late kings, who would neuer incommber them selues with new wars the first yeare of their reignes: But the Emperour and the King of Arragon were of another opinion, in regard of the Kings youth, and the greates preparations of warre which King Lewis had left behinde; wherevpon because they would not be taken vnprovided, they made meanes to confederate them selues with the Pope and the Swisses.

League betwixt the Em-perour, the king of Arragon,
the Duke of Milan and
the Swisses.

The Pope delayed it as much as he could: The Swisses on the contrary, whose hate against the French did not onely continue still, but dayly more and more encrease, did ally them selues with the Emperour, the King of Arragon, and the Duke of Milan for the defence of Italy, reseruing place for the Pope to enter, wherein was concluded that the Swisses should enuade, either Burgundy or Dauphiné, or the Catholike King with a mighty army should come in by Fontarabie or Perpignan, to the end that the French King beeing assailed at one time, in diuers and sundry places, might not bee able though hee would to trouble the Dutchy of Milan, but should bee enforced to defend his owne country.

The French
Kings great preparation.

The French Kings intent was for a time kept close, vntill the greatenesse of his preparations could by no meanes bee any longer concealed, in regard of his huge prouisions of mony, with which hee waged very great numbers of Lanquenets; hee caused store of Artillery to bee carried towards Lyons, and had a while before sent Pedro of Nauarre, who was newly come to his seruice into Guyen to leuy ten thousand foot on the marches of Nauarre.

It being then apparant to all men, that warre was prepared for the Dutchy of Milan, and that the King determined to goe thither in person, he openly craued to haue the Pope to ioyne with him, as well by the meanes of Juliano his brother who was (as hath bene already said) allied to the King, as by his Ambassadors, to the end to be assured of his intent.

But the King soone beganne to bee out of hope, as well because the Pope had graunted to the King of Arragon the Croizads of Spaine for two yeares, whereby it was thought that hee would raise about a Million of gold, as by the faire and goodly promises, which hee made to those who pleaded for him, and yet without any resolution at all; besides it was wholly in vayne, for hee had already before made a very secret conuention with the others for the defence of the state of Milan, the which neuerthelesse hee would not haue yet to be knowne, till such time as he had found out some more apparant pretence, whereby he might say that hee had bene enforced thereto, because the King would not graunt him what hee demanded, but the King condescended to all his request,

When first the Pope used to declare himselfe openly against the King.

requests, and notwithstanding all this hee made diuers doubtfull and irresolute answers.

The King not tarying any longer for his replies, being come to Lyons, accompanied with all the French nobility, made Charles of Bourbon Constable of France his Lieutenant General to command in the warre, if him selfe went not thither in person, whereof hee yet doubted, promising to him selfe the certainty of the victory by reason of his great forces, for hee had in his Army two thousand Lancequenets, conducted by the Duke of Guelders, ten thousand Basques or Gascons, eight thousand French, and three thousand Castadours. For of all the enemies army there was none to be feared but the Swisses, who continually came downe into the Duchy of Milan, so as already more then twenty thousand of them were there arrived, tenne thousand of whom, being come neere to the mountaines, did undertake to gard the streight passages of those valleys against the French.

This determination of the Swisses did greatly trouble the Kings mind, because it was an hard matter, in regard of the valour of that nation, to drie them from those strong and narrow passages. The rest of the confederates having left sufficient garrison for the defence of those townes which they had snatched from the Venetians, were not able to leuy the one halfe of a stronge Army.

Whilest France made these preparations, vpon the report of the Kings comming into Italy, the Viceroy of Naples, who for a time had bene at truce with the Venetians in the Vincentine territory, made shew to bring backe his army to Verona, (as hee said) to the ayd of the Duke of Milan, but it was to feaze on Vincenza, in regard of the fit season that then was to make silke, where with the country doth greatly abound, hoping from thence easily to draw meanes to pay his army. But Aluiana being aduertized of this designe, left Padua, where hee then lay, and passing speedily on the Vincentine Territory, leading along with him sufficient troups to gard the City, and to breake the enemies enterprife, whereby the inhabitants had leisure to gather their silkes, and to transport them to a place of safety.

That done, Aluiana, retyred towards Padua, (the Spanish forces dayly encresing,) and encamped with Rance de Cerra at Brentelles, two miles distant from Padua, where hee taried many dayes, because the Senate had willed him not to stirre from thence with the army before hee were certaine of the enemies purpose, to the end not to goe into any place, where hee might bee enforced to come to handy stroakes, and to tempt fortune, fearing if hee should receaue any losse, it might happen to keepe backe King Francis, who affirmed that the cheefe hope of his designs depended on the Venetians, and therefore discourting with their Ambassador resident with him, hee did counsell him that his country-men should not hazard ought, before his arrival in Italy it being indiscretion to hazard the successe of that warre on a small part of those forces which hee hoped would be great, being vnited together. Yet notwithstanding, the Venetian soldiours made often incursions, cheefely the light horse, vnder the command of the Captains Mercurio Buono, and Giovann de Nalda, who did greatly molest the enemies, taking great Booties from them, as well from Rouigo, as on the Veronosis.

In this sort did the two Armies, Venetian and Spanish, behaue themselves for a certaine time, without any other attempts, still expecting newes of the French army, who leauing the realme freed from the feare of warre, were ready to passe the mounts.

For neither the Spaniards nor Swisses, did euer goe according to their treaty of Confederacy, the one to enuade Burgundy, and the other the confines neere to Spaine, but the Swisses went and encamped at Suze, Pigneroll and Salusses, to stop the entry of the French into Piedmont, and the Spaniards kept kept himselfe in Lombardy with the Popes troopes, of whom Iuliano de medicis, his brother, was Generall.

The French then marched forwards on the fifteenth day of Iuly towards the Alpes, and being come to Grenoble they were enforced to make some stay there to resolute vpon their way they were to hold, for all the waies were so difficult, as well in regard of the nature of the places, as for the gard in them, that it was impossible to passe without danger if they would goe the ordinary high way which leadeh into Italy by Piedmont, the Swisses keeping the narrow passages of the mountaines, but there was another way betwixt the sea and Coctian Alpes, descending towards the Marquifate of Salusses, by which they might carry their ordnance beyond the mounts, not without wonderfull difficulty, because they could not do it but by the strength of men and engins.

The King resolute wholly to passe on howsoever, would needs goe directly ouer the Alpes, whereby the French in three dayes came to the hill of Argentiere, where taking the way on the left hand, and ouercomming all the bad waies, they came on the fourth day vpon the confines of the Marquifate of Salusses, without any stop at all, because no man would euer haue thought that it had bene possible to bring the Artillery ouer such steepe and sharpe mountaines, and the Swisses being lodged at Suza were ready to gard the waies by which they must passe which cometh downe by mount Senis, or mont Geneura, or the hills neere thereunto. But they hauing intelligence that the French had passed by an other way, being amazed thereat, forooke those passages and retired to Nouara: which gaue hope to the French to be soone able to end that warre, and without any great bloodshed to conquer the State of Milan, knowing that the Swisses are by nature light-headed, seditious, mutinous, and desirous of nouelty, and aboue all things, very couetous to get money: by which meanes the King thought sodainly to winne them.

Great promises of sommes of money were made to diuers of the cheefest of them if they would preferre the certaine offer that was made them before their first heate of warre, and not hazard the vncertainty of a Battaile. Wherevpon they were desirous to returne home, and in a brauery demanding their pay, they forooke their Ensignes, and refused to obey the commandements of their Generall and other their Captaines, alledging for excuse of their alteration, that the affaires of the French at their entry into Italy, had prosperously succeeded: and how on the contrary, whatsoeuer the Swisses had undertaken, had redounded to their shame and losse, and therefore they were minded to depart, and no longer to draw out the warre at length.

The French in the meane time hauing passed the mounts, the Lord La Palisse came speedily with foure Cornets of light horse, beeing lead by people of the Countrey to Villa Franca, (a towne seauen miles distant from Salusses, where Prospero Colonna with his company was lodged, not doubting any thing, by reason of the great distance of the enemies,) from whence some said, that he would depart the same day, to ioyne with the Swisses. It is neuertheless certaine that he late at meate, and dined at such time as La Palisse his souldiers arrived, who were not descryed by any before they came neere the house, because those of the towne, with whom La Palisse had intelligence, concerning that great booty, had already secretly agreed to keepe them selfes very quiet, and had seized on the scouters and Sentinels. Prospero Colonna that famous Captaine was thus taken prisoner, and Pietro Margare the Romaine with him, others at the first noyce saued themselves and escaped by flight.

The passage of the French, and the taking of Prospero Colonna, did change all mens mindes, and altogether the whole state of the affaires, causing new alteration in the mindes of the Pope, the viceroy of Naples and the Swisses. For the Pope perceiuing that the King had passed contrary to his hope, and that Prospero Colonna

Charles of Bourbon constable of France.

The number of the Kings army.

The Swisses determination in the Heights of the mountaines.

The Viceroy of Naples enterprife on Vincenza.

Aluiana retires with Vincenza.

The Venetians incursion on the enemies.

The passages of Suze, Pigneroll, and Salusses garded by the Swisses.

The French passe into Piedmont by Argentiere.

The Swisses retire to Nouara.

Prospero Colonna taken prisoner by the lord La Palisse.

The Pope amazed at the Kings passage and the taking of Prospero Colonna.

Colonna was taken prisoner, in whome hee chiefly trusted, hee commanded his Nephew Lorenzo, Generall to the Florentines in sted of his brother Julian, who lay sick at Florence, to proceed slowly: then hee secretly dispatcht Cintio his familiar friend to the French King, to excuse him for what had passed, and to begin to treat with him, if so bee it should fall out badly for the Dutchy of Milan.

The Viceroy of Naples likewise carried him selfe other wise then he had done, For remayning still at Verona, expecting meanes to cause his soldiours to march, and new companies promised by the Emperour to leaue in Verona and Brescia, he with these excuses began to deferre his departure, because he would first see what would become of the Dutchy of Milan.

The Swisses in like manner being amazed at the Kings passage came on a foddaine to Pignarol and from thence to Nouara (as hath bene said) where they beganne to treat of agreement with the King. In the meane time all the French troopes being reunited at Thurin, the King went to Vercell, where he stayed many daies, expecting what would become of the treaty with the Swisses, who shewed them selves full of variety and confusion. For they beganne to mutine in Nouara, where they lay, because they had not yet receaved the money which the King of Arragon had promised them, and they did perforce take the money from the commissaries which the Pope had sent them. And in this fury they departed from Nouara to returne home into their country, the which many of them did greatly desire to doe: but they were scarce gon from Nouara, ere the King of Arragons money was brought thither, whereupon being better aduised, they redeliuered the Popes money, that they might receave both the one, and the other, according to the usuall manner, by the hands of the commissaries. The King perceiving his hope of agreement with the Swisses to decay, by meanes of these Variations, and by the coming of other new companies forth of Swisserland, departed from Vercell intending to goe and beseege Milan, leauing at Vercell with the Duke of Sauoy, the Dukes bastard brother, the Lord of Laurec, & the General of Milan to continew the treaty begun with the Swisses. Diuers armies were in the field, as well for defence as to assail, but in such manner, as they were seperated in sundry places, not being able to ioyne together, because the enemies lay betwene them and home: by meanes whereof the King being desirous to ioyne with Aluiana, departed from Bufalore, and being come with his army to Biagrasa, whilst hee stayed there the Duke of Sauoy, with the other commissiouners, whome the King had left at Vercell, had made peace with the Swisses in the Kings name. But this peace was almost in one day concluded and broken, by the arrivall of new Swisses, who being proud for their forepassed victories, hoping to carry home with them as great wealth, as they saw their fellows laden with, they would not heare tell of peace, refusing to yeeld up the valleys mentioned in the agreement: so as by this breach of peace, matters returned to their former difficulties, and to much greater, in regard of the Swisses new forces, as also of those of the Viceroy and Lorenzo de Medicis who approched Milan. Aluiana in the meane time sent word to the French King, that he would so amuse the Spanish army, as it should haue no meanes to hurt him: and therefore so soone as hee vnderstood that the Viceroy was gone from Verona, he left the Pallefus of Rouigo, and hauing crossed the Adice, he speedily came along the riuer Po, with nine hundred men at armes, foureene hundred light horse, and nine thousand foot, with greete store of artillery neere to the walls of Cremona. The King according to Aluianas letters, came to Marignan, to giue him more easie meanes to ioyne with the royall army, and to stop the companies of the Church, and Spaniards, from doing the like with the enemies. For it did greatly import the king to haue the enemies force diuided in sundry places.

The King being come to Marignan stayed there, and wrot to the Venetian Senate, giuing them notice of his arrivall in Italy, and of the fortunate successe of

of his affaires till then, together with the hope hee had that his desseignes would prosper, in regard that both their affaires were managed by one selfe same Venion and concord.

But in these interims, Rance de Cera who had well demeaned him selfe against the enemies, being moued with ihealzo against Aluiana, for that hee would not bee enforced to obey him as Generall if the armies should come to ioyne together, craued leaue of the Venetians to depart, who being not able to make them friends, did freely graunt it. Hee was a braue Captaine, and could not abide any superior, and Aluiana could not endure an equall, by meanes whereof they could not agree together, whereupon, hauing taken his leaue hee put him selfe into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horse.

Marke Antonio Colonna in the meane time, who remayned for the gard of Verona, made a foddaine fully with three thousand foot-men and about seauen hundred horse of all sorts, and went and scoured the Vincentine Territory, spoyling and wasting what so euer he met with. Albeit this did trouble the Venetians, yet could it not diuert them from their former determination, which was that Aluiana should ioyne with the French army, knowing well that if the French Kings affaires did prosper, this could not doe amisse.

Fourc armies were at one time in one country, very neere to one another. The French army was of forty thousand men, among whome were five hundred men at armes, chosen out of the French Nobility, excellently well armed and mounted, who after they had seized on Nouara and Paula, were come to Marignan, not farre from them lay the Venetian army, of twelue thousand foot and three thousand horse, which stayed at Lodi, both armies being well stored with artillery. Against these two were two other armies of the enemies, who for the same reasons were enforced to remaine deuided one from another. That of the Pope and the Florentines ioynd with the Spaniards, was more esteemed for the old soldiers then for the great number, and it was lodged neere to the City of Placentia, on the banke of the riuer Po. The other was of Swisses which was said to bee forty thousand men who at the pursute and perswasion of the Cardinal of Syon, kept the City of Milan, which was well furnished with all necessaries.

This Cardinal returning from Placentia, whither he was fled, wondering that his country-men praetized with the French king, relying on great numbers of soldiers newly come, which did fauor his party, he came among them who were all in a manner diuided, some of them not enduring to heare tell of war, and others not of peace. And causing them all to come together on a day, he beganne with a very vehement and affectionate speech to incite them, without any more delay to go forth the same day and assail the French King, and not to set so much before their eyes the number the enemies horse and artillery, as to let it make them to forget the valour of the Swisses, and the victories obtained by them against the French. That it was not the artillery which gaue the victory, but only the prowesse and valour of the foldier. And that besides the giuing of the victory, which he assured them of, they should consider the great wealth they were to get, as well by the spoyle of the French army, as by that of the whole state of Milan. And therefore hee willed them to aduance their pikes, with their vsuall courage, and sound their drums, and without delaying one houre of time to goe and vlc their armes effectually, and to glut them selves with the bloud of thoe, who by their pride would molest the whole world, and by their basenesse doe euer become a prey to all men.

The Swisses being incited by these or such like speeches did furiously on a foddaine put on their armes, and going forth of the City did put themselves in order of battaile, and albeit it was neere night, they marched towards

The Swisses began to treat of agreement with the King.

Agreement contracted with the Swisses, and broken the same day.

The number of the Venetian army conducted by Aluiana.

The King came to Marignan.

Rance de Cera leauet the Venetian party.

Marke Antonio Colonna gardes Verona.

Fourc armies at one time in July.

The number of Swisses.

The Cardinal of Syon oration to the Swisses.

How greatly the Swisses were incited by this speech.

The Cardinal
makes use of false rumors.

towards the French Army with such courage, as if they had already obtained the victory, notwithstanding that diuerse of their Captaines thought it great rashnesse and a very dangerous matter to assaile the enemy in his camp, who was resolved for battaile. But the Cardinall of Sion fearing least delay might produce something contrary to his designs, and that as the desire of fight had easily enflamed their courages, it might as easily be quenched by the remonfrance of their Captaines of the contrary part, he gaue forth a false rumor among them that the French gathered together their baggage and prepared for their departure, and that their vantgard was already forth of their Camp, to goe and ioine with the Venetian army, to retire afterwards to beseege Milan, wherevpon he 10 exhorted them to make haft to surprize the enemy in disorder who little doubted thereof. This exhortation was seconded by diuers Captaines of this faction who did greatly praise his counsell, and incited them to battaile, going vp and downe the ranks, making the like remonfrances, wherewith the soldiers being encouraged marched on with a speedy pace towards the enemies.

Now the French being aduertized of the Suiffes comming towards them, albeit they were at the first greatly amazed, (as it happeneth in matters not foreseene nor premeditated) they did neuertheless forthwith put on their Armor, made ready their horses and all other things needfull for a battaile, then hauing taken courage, they placed themselves vnder their enfeignes and opened their felues 20 more at large. Their whole Army was deuided into three parts.

The order of the French army in battaile

The Duke of Bourbon lead the Vant-gard, accompanied by the Lord of Talamont, sonne to Trimouille, John Iacomo Triunccio, Pedro of Nauarre, and 1 other famous Captaines, with all the Almaines, Gascons, and French. In the battaile was the King, about whom were the greatest part of the men at armes, and a choyce troope of Almaine souldiers, with the Dukes of Lorraine and Albany, the Lord Trimouille, Francis of Bourbon Count of Saint Paul, Odet of Foix, Lord of Lautrech, and diuerse others. The Duke of Alanson conducted the rere-ward, with the Lords La Palisse, and Aubigni, and the residue of the Caualery.

Fight betwixt
the French
and Suiffes.

The Suiffes in the meane time hauing left certaine companies of Soldiers vpon the rere-ward, had made of their whole Army but one body, which was very strong, and being well closed together, they went on furiously (that they might the better seaze on the Artillery) and gaue in vpon the Lanfquenets, who were at the front of the French Armie. These men suspecting that the French, according to the common report, were agreed with the Suiffes, and that they came on- 30 ly to assaile them, in regard of the deadly hatred betwixt these two Nations, opened them-selues, and suffered the first charge of the Suiffes, who came furiously vpon them to passe on, where-vpon, they went directly towards the Artillery, which beeing perceiued by Pedro of Nauarre, hee on a sodaine called 40 vp his troopes, and caused them to keepe the place appointed to the Lanfquenets, whereby the enemies passage was soone closed.

The battaile
continued till fourre howers within night.

The Caualery on the other side, and the King himselfe who was enuironed with a valiant troope of Gentlemen, comming against them, their great fury was in some sort cooled, and a very cruell battaile beganne, the which with diuers e- uents continued till fower howers within night, certaine French Captaines being already slaine, and the King himselfe stricken with diuers pushes of Pikes: at the last both sides being so weary as they were able to doe no more did seperate them-selues and retired forth of the throng, without any commandement or sound of drumme or trumpet. The Suiffes lodged in the very same place expect- 50 ing day, and they suffered one an other, on both sides, to rest that night, as if they had taken truce.

How the King ordained his Army that night.

The King in the meane time did not spend the remainder of the night vnprofitably, but assembled his counsell to determine what was to be done the day fol- lowing following, hee caused the Artillery to be drawne backe, and planted in more commodious places, hee did reordaine the battaillons of the Lancequenets, who promised to amend their former daies fault, and to giue sufficient prooffe of their faith and loyalty: and sent word to Aluiana, speedily to come and bring his forces to the battaile. So soone as it was day the Swiffes went and assailed the French with the selfe same fury of the day before, who valliantly receiued them, but with more discretion and better order, where-vpon the Swiffes were beaten, partly with the artillery, and partly with the Gascon Crosbowes, and by the horse- 10 men, so as they were beaten in Front and in Flanke, at such time as Aluiana who was sent for (as hath bene sayd) arriued with his light horse and with part of his army in the greatest haft he could.

The battaill renewed by break of day.

Aluiana cometh opportu-
ly in the battail

Hee arriued at such time as the battaile was most closed and most fierce, and when matters were in greatest hazard and danger. Hee gaue in with great fury vpon the Swiffes backes, who neuer the-lesse did still fight valliantly.

But at last despairing of the victory, as well in regard of the great resistance made against them, as by the arriual of the Venetian army, they sounded the retreat, and retired with a lost pace towards Milan, keeping still their vsu- 20 all order, with such an amazement to the French army, as there was neither horse nor foote-troupes that had the courage to follow them, by reason they were much tyred in the battaile, hauing fought without intermission from day-broke till none.

The Swiffes retire with lost pace towards Milan.

The end of the second Booke of the fifth Decade.

liii

The

The Contents of the third Booke of the fifth Decade.

Contention among the Swisses, being retired to Milan after the battail. Milan, and the whole Dutchy is reduced vnder the French obedience. The French Kings entry into Milan. Aluiana his enterprise on the City of Bresia, with the Venetian army alone. The death of Aluiana, and the establishment of Iohn Iames Triulce in his place. The Venerians take Pescara. The French are present at the sege of Bresia. The Pope maketh motion of peace. Parma and Placencia are by the Pope yeilded vp to the French King. The enteruiew of the Pope and the French King at Bologna. The Campe dislodgeth from before Bresia. Triulcio giues ouer his charge. The Duke of Bourbon Viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan. The Lord of Laurec with the Venetian army comes againe before Bresia. The Popes practises to breake the sege of Bresia. The Emperor, the King of England and the Pope band themselves against the French King. Manfron and de Bue are defeated by the Imperialls. The Lancequenets are defeated by Fregola at the Castle of Ansa. The Emperor commeth with great forces into Italy, and beseegeth Asola. The French and Venetian armies retyre to Milan. The arriual of the Swisses at Milan for the King. The Emperors shamefull retreat into Almaine, and the abandoning of his army. King Francis his complaints against the Pope. The Lord of Laurec Gouvernor of the Dutchy of Milan beseegeth Bresia the third time. Bresia yeeldeth vpon composition. Verona after diuers determinations being beseeged in two severall places is by the Almaines freed from the sege. The contents of the treaty of Noyon. Verona by the same treaty is yeilded to the Venetians. The great ioy of the Venetians together with the Veronois for that reditiom.

The
50

The Contents of the third Booke of the fifth Decade.

HE Swisses after the bataill being retired to Mylan, a very great contention arose amongst them, some of them being desirous to make an agreement with the French King, and others to continue still for the defence of Milan. Those who demanded the acord, making another pretence, craved mony of Maximilian Sforza, the which they very well knew hee had no meanes to pay; but it was onely by that refusall to take an occasion to leaue him, the which they did by perswasion of Ross their Colonell, leauing fiftene hundred of their countrymen, with siue hundred Italians, for the gard of the Castle, promising Maximilian neuertheless to returne to the aide of their fellowes, whome they left behind. Vpon which promise Maximilian Sforza, accompanied by Iohn of Gonzaga, and Ieronimo Morone, and by other Gentlemen of Milan, shut himselfe vp in the Castle.

The French after the Victory remaining maisters of the field, did with ease reduce vnder their power all the townes of the Dutchy of Milan. The Viceroy of Naples who all this while had not stird forth of the Placentyne Territory, being out of hope to bee able any longer to gard and defend the state of Milan, and fearing besides that the Pope had abandoned the league, hee retired into Romagna, and from thence soone after brought backe his army into the realme of Naples. The Cardinall of Syon perceiuing him selfe to bee disgraced among his country-men, for the bad successe of the battail, went to the Emperour to sollicite aide, the like did Francis Duke of Barri brother to Maximilian Sforza.

The City of Milan being thus abandoned, gaue it selfe to the French Kings with entreaties that hee would forget what was past, promising to bee euier after more loyall and obedient, graunting to pay vnto him a very great summe of mony. The King refused to enter into it so long as the enemies held the Castle: but the Duke of Bourbon came thither to receiue the City, in the Kings name, and gaue speedy charge to Pedro of Nauarre to attempt the taking of the Castle, who promised, contrary to the opinion of all-men, to winne it within a moneth, where-vpon hee beganne to batter it with the Canon certayne daies together; then according to the visuall manner, hee made mines, where-by hee blew vp the walls and towers which were of a wonderfull height.

Sforza being daunted when hee saw a Case-mate and a part of the wall flying in the aire, and being besides ill disposed of his person, making vse of the council of some of his trustiest seruants, hee determined to receiue into the

liii 2

Castle

Disention among the Swisses in Milan after the Battail.

The Viceroy retires to Naples.

Milan yeilded to the French King.

Vpon what Artill Sforza yeilded the Castle of Milan.

Castle Antonio Brasan Doctor of the lawes, to make a draught of the agreement and rediſion of that place, which he was reſolved to yeeld vnto the French King, which imported, that Maximilian Sforza ſhould preſently conſigne to the French King, the Caſtles of Milan and Cremona. That he ſhould giue ouer vnto him all his claime to that ſtate, and ſhould receiue of the King a certaine ſomme of money for the paiement of his debts; and that he ſhould goe into France, where the King ſhould giue him a yeerely penſion of thirty thouſand Ducats, or elſe ſhould cauſe him to be made a Cardinall with the like reuenuew. There were beſides, diuers Swiſſes that were in the Caſtle, who were all of them well ſatiffied and pleaſed.

The French Kings entry into Milan.

Theſe Articles being accompliſhed, the King entred in great magnificence into the City of Milan, enuironed with the greateſt part of his caualerry. Foure Ambaſſadors of the chiefſt Senators of Venice came thither to him, namely Vntonio Grimani, Dominico Treuſan, George Carnare, and Andrew Gritti, as well to congratulate him for his victory, as to entreat him, as hee was tyed by the capitulations of the confederacy, to helpe them to recouer their Cities.

The King promiſeth ayd to the Venetians.

The King after that he had gratiouſly receiued and entertained them, commanded ſpeedily the baſtard of Sauoy and Theodore Triuulcio to aid them with fix hundred lances and ſeauen thouſand Lancequenets: But becauſe they delayed their departure, vntill they had ſcene what would become of the Caſtle of Milan, or elſe becauſe the King would ſend the ſame companies, before that of Cremona. Aluiana (whom the Venetians would not ſuffer to follow the viceroi) marched with his army towards Breſſia, to trie if he could take it by force, according to the Senates direction, who deſired (that all matters being laid aſide) he ſhould ſeek to recouer Breſſia and Verona: in regard whereof Aluiana hauing paſſed ouer the riuer Adda, marched direſtly to Breſſia, the City of Bergamo beeing yeelded vnto him preſently after the rout of the Swiſſes.

Aluiana his enterpriſe vpon Breſſia.

Now in the Venetians Campe there was diuerſity of opinions among the Captaines, ſome of them thinking it much better to goe firſt and beſeige Verona for diuerſe important reaſons, and chiefly becauſe that beeing taken, all the Townes and Caſtles of the Veronois would ſoone yeeld, the which would not ſo fall out by the taking of Breſſia. The Senate at firſt was of this opinion, but becauſe they would not ſpend the time vainely in that determination, they referred that buſineſſe to Aluiana his diſcretion, who becauſe Breſſia was neerer to the French Campe, hee marched thither, hoping to take it with eaſe; for hee thought that Breſſia had not ſo ſtrong a gariſon as Verona.

The Siege of Breſſia reſolued on.

But Scaro the Spaniſh Captaine beeing wiſe and ſubtil, who commanded Breſſia, hauing intelligence of Aluiana his deſeigne, had ſpeedily cauſed a thouſand footmen to come thither from Verona, with ſtore of victualls and other neceſſaries to ſuſtaine a ſeige; and had handled it ſo cunningly, as Aluiana had no knowledge thereof, who made account ſo ſoone as hee ſhould approach the walles to giue an aſſault in diuers and ſundry places: But by the ſodaine and vneſpected arriual of the new ayde, hee found more reſiſtance there then hee lookt for, and hauing greatly laboured in his approaches, a greuous ſecurer ſeized on him, which enforced him to leaue the Campe, and to retire to Gueda, in the Breſſian Countrey, where hee departed out of this world about the beginning of October, in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand ſiue hundred, and ſixtene, not beeing fully three ſcore yeares of age; wherewith the Venetians were greatly greued, but the ſouldiours much more, who kept his body ſiue and twenty dayes together in the army,

New ſuccors enter into Breſſia unknowne to Aluiana.

Aluianaſ death.

Army, carrying it with them when they marched in very great ſolemnnity, then it was brought to Venice, where by a publique decree, it was very honorably buried in Saint Steuens Church, where at this day his toombe is to be ſene: And becauſe he had euer made more eſteeme of honor and reputation then of wealth, hauing left his wife and children poore, the Senate in acknowledgement of his good ſeruiſe, decreed, that euery moneth threeſcore Ducats ſhould be paid to his widow, and as much to a ſonne of his fourth of the publicke treaſury ſo long as they ſhould liue, hauing giuen them a goodly houſe in the City, with exemption from all taxes, and impositions, and that to euery of his three daughters ſhould be giuen the ſomme of three thouſand Ducats for their Dowry when time ſhould ſerue.

The Senates recompence the widow and children of Aluiana.

After Aluiana his death, George Eme the prouidator did for a while command the army. The Venetians in the meane time entreated the King to giue them John James Triuulcio to be Generall of their forces, as well in regard of his experience, as for his renowne in martiall diſcipline, as alſo becauſe for the common inclination towards the Guelphe faction, there had euer beene good wil and friendſhip betwixt them and the ſame Republick. Whilſt he prepared for his going to the army, the Venetian companies tooke Peſcara hauing not long before defeated certaine troopes of horſe and three hundred Spaniſh footmen that went to releaue it; then they recouered Aſola and Lona which the Marquis of Mantua had abandoned.

John James Triuulcio Generall of the Venetian army.

Peſcara taken by the Venetians.

Aſola & Lona taken by the Venetians.

Triuulcio being arriued at the Venetian Army receiued letters from the Senate full of congratulations and entreaties that he would carry himſelfe in that place, ſo as he had euer doone in all employments: he did likewiſe receiue the army at the hands of George Eme the Prouidator, where he beganne to beare himſelfe with great wiſdome, and diſcretion and according to the Senates deſire he beſeeged Breſſia, albeit it ſeemed very hard vnto him to take it without the French army, by reaſon that the City was ſtrong, and that there were within it two thouſand foot as well Lancequenets as Spaniards, as alſo becauſe winter approached, and the weather was much diſpoſed to raine, as the euent did not decaue his iudgement. For as they battered it with the Artillery which was planted vpon the very brinke of the dike, thoſe within made a ſally with ſixtene hundred as well Spaniards as Lancequenets, who giuing in vpon the guard of the Artillery which were a hundred men at armes and ſix hundred foot, they eaſily put them to rout, albeit that John Paul Manfron did in ſome ſort ſtay their fury with thirty men at armes.

Breſſia beſeeged by the Venetians.

Thoſe of Breſſia make a ſally on the Venetian Campe.

They ſlew about two hundred foot, burnt the pouders and drew teinne peices of ordnance into Breſſia; ſo as the Venetians were like that day to haue receiued a far greater loſſe, had not Triuulcio come ſpeedily thither with certaine foot companies and Caualerry, who enforced the enemies to retire, and recouered from them certaine peeces of ordnance which they were carrying away beſide.

This diſorder cauſed Triuulcio to with-draw his armie, and to lodge it more at large, euen as farre at Coccia, ten miles diſtant from Breſſia, expecting the coming of the French, at whoſe arriual ſo ſoone as Triuulcio had made new prouiſions of artillery and munition, hee returned againe, and encamped before it: The French ſupplies beeing conducted by the Baſtard of Sauoy, which conſiſted of ſiue thouſand Lancequenets, eight hundred men at armes, and certaine peeces of ordnance; with all manner of prouiſion in abundance, beeing ioyned with the Venetians, the Campe was by a generall conſent beſeeged, hoping with thoſe forces, and by the Soldiers diligence, eaſily to ſuſh their enterpriſe.

The retreat of the Venetian army.

Breſſia againe beſeeged by the French.

Yet neuertheleſſe it fell out otherwiſe then they thought, for the Lancequenets

The Lancesquents resu-sal.

refused to march against the cities of the Emperors obedience, where-vpon being dismissed the Venetians craued Pedro of Nauar of the King, who came thither in their sted, with five thousand Gallions and French: These being encamped on the one side of the towne, and Triunlee on the other with the Venetian soldiers, the battery beganne in diuers places, the cheefe command of all matters, remaining in a manner to Triunlee, by reason that the bastard of Sauoy being sicke, was gone from the army.

Pedro of Nauar
makes use of the mine at the siege of Brescia.

After a long battery, no assault was giuen, because those within had made diuers rampiers, and very carefully provided for all things necessary for defence, so as Pedro of Nauarre had recourse to his ordinary remedies, whereof hee had not as yet made use in that siege, by reason it was very painefull and laborious, and for that he likewise feared, least by meanes of the continuall rayne that had fallen of a long time, his designe might not fall out as hee desired. He beganne then to mine and sap the walls, but those within the towne suspecting the matter, because those of the Campe had giuen ouer their battery, hauing diligently searched all ouer the City, if they could heare any noice of the miners, at last it was discouered, wherevpon they made a counter-mine, which being filled with powder and fired, they overthrew all that Pedro of Nauarre had done, and slew his people that wrought in it, so as in a moment all that was lost which had bene set forward in many daies.

Pedro of Nauar
mar his mine blowes vp.

Great dearth in Brescia.

The Venetians neuer-the-lesse did not dispaire of taking the City, but by strenghtly shutting them vp to stop all succors from comming to them, they hoped to win it, hauing had intelligence of the great want of all necessities where-with the beseeged were afflicted, which at last would enforce them to yeeld, especially the Almaines, who are impatient of long suffering: as also for that they had not received any pay of a long time from the Emperour, by meanes whereof they refused all military obseruation, and prepared them-selues to mutiny and rebellion. This being reported to Triunlee, he supposed that a faire occasion was offered to conquer the city, where-vpon hee resolved not to stirre from thence, notwithstanding the sharpnesse of the winter, the deepe snowes, and the long time that hee had layne before it, knowing how much it concerned his reputation, if that which hee had begunne should not succede fortunately.

Hee beganne then straightly to shutte it vp on euery side, to the end that no victuals might enter it, nor no soldier of the towne might come forth, and for this purpose hee still entertayned them with light skirmishes. And because those of Verona did in the meane space scoure the Bressan Territory, and molest the Venetian Army, hee placed strong Garrisons in Pescara and Valegia to stoppe their incursions, and to shutte them more strenghtly vpp.

The Pope mar-gineeth a peace

At the same time that Brescia was beseeged, there was some motion of peace, the Pope seeking to accord the Emperour and the Venetians, hoping afterwards to bee better able to conclude peace with the French. But the Venetians being so often beaten with hope of those matters, without giuing any trust to the Popes words, did not assure their State on many, but only on the friendship and alliance with the French, and to the end that their intent might bee knowne to all men, they refused all conditions propounded to them, whereof they were desirous to aduertize the French Ambassador resident at Venice, and that in like case, their Ambassadors which were at the court, should acquaint his Maiesty with the whole businesse, that hee might see how they accounted onely of his friendship, as the King did the like by theirs. The which hee made shew of to the Emperours Ambassadors, who came to him to talke of agreement from their Maister, whome hauing dismissed without any resolution, he did speedily aduertize the Venetians thereof.

As

As concerning the Pope, the King had sundry thoughts. For al-be-it his Holinesse had forsaken him, at such time as hee thought him one of his greatest friends, he neuer-thelesse did greatly desire his friendship, the which he had not left but by constraint. Therefore the Pope hauing sent his Nuntio to the King, vnkowne to the other confederates, he was curiously entertained by him, the King manifesting his hearty desire to enter into his Holinesse fauour: Yet neuer-thelesse resolving not to buy that at a deere rate which was offered, the Nuntio could obtaine nothing of his Maiesty, till the Pope had quitted and yeelded vnto him Parma and Placentia which he held.

The King desirous of the Popes friendship.

The Pope yeelded Parma & Placentia to
the King.

The Pope could hardly be induced to quit those two Cities. At last, fearing that by delaying the matter, some mischief might arise, he satisfied the Kings desire, referring the accomplishing of the rest till their enteruiew, which by their mutual consent was concluded to bee at Bologna. The Pope for that purpose departed from Rome, and the King from the City of Milan, the Venetians Ambassadors did accompany his Maiesty, all Italy receiued great contentation by that assembly, hoping that it would produce an assured peace to the whole Province. A legat was sent to the Emperour to treat of agreement betwixt him and the Venetians, and to haue him to remit Brescia and Verona to them for a pecuniary recompence.

Enteruiew betwixt the Pope and
French King
at Bologna.

The Articles concluded betwixt the Pope and
King.

The Pope likewise sent a brieft to the Venetians, exhorting them vnto peace. The Pope and the King being come to Bologna, they couenanted together, That the King should take vpon him the protection of the Popes person, and the Churches State, of Juliano and Lorenzo de Medicis, and the State of Florence. That the Pope should cause his forces to leaue Verona, and countermand those companies sent to the Emperors aide against the Venetians. Diuers other Articles were concluded, concerning onely the profit of either of them: In the which treaty hauing continued fixe daies together, both of them departed from Bologna: the King thinking that he had done a great matter, to haue drawne the Pope to his side, and to haue disioyned him from his enemies.

The King being come to Milan, beganne to thinke on his returne to France, hauing nothing to detaine him but the desire he had to see the Venetians re-established in their Cities. Therefore he commanded to re-enforce the Venetians army which lay before Brescia, and had reduced the beseeged to that extremity, as all men thought that they would soone yeeld; for the Almaines and Spaniards that lay within it, had resolved together, that if within twenty daies they were not releued, they would yeeld vp the City to the Venetians, on these conditions neuer-thelesse, to depart with displayed Ensignes, the drumme beating, with the artillery and all their baggage, which was the selfe same composition which they had concluded with the Venetians Generall. But the Almaine luccors came and entred the towne before the time agreed vpon was expired.

The composion of those of Brescia.

The report of the comming of this aide had caused sundry opinions in the army, some of the being of opinion to continue the siege; others, to lead the army else where, but the report of the number of the Almaines being greater then the effect, and for that they had notice by their spies that Marke Antonio Colonna, who was come forth of Verona, & entred the Mantua territory, made preparations to come and assaile them, caused the Venetian captaines, who feared that by staying there, the enemies might come and enclose them, so determine wholly to dislodge, and to bring the artillery to Crema and Cremona, and the rest of the army to Castellanella six miles off from Brescia.

The arrival of succors to Brescia, causeth
the Venetians to raise their empe.

These newes being brought to Venice did greatly amaze the whole City, because they expected rather to haue heard of the taking of the City, then of any thing else. The Generall and the Prouidary had written, that there was such strong Garrison at all passages, as it was impossible that any aide could enter into it, which might keepe them backe from obseruing the agreement which they had

The raising of the Campe amazes the City of Venice.

had made, and that which caused them most to beleue it, was that the French supplies which were to come to the campe, being three thousand Almaines and 400. horse, were departed from Milan and were on their way towards their campe.

This did much blemish Triumlio his reputation, whereof he hauing notice, craued leaue of the Signory, That he might depart, saying that the affaires of his owne house called him thence, and that he could tarry no longer in their army. But the Senate knowing that this mans experience was much important for their affaires, vsed meanes to appeale him by letters, and did entreate the King to cause him to take that charge vpon him, but he would by no meanes consent thereto, but returned to Milan. Theodore Triumlio tooke charge of the Venetian army, and of the whole manning of the warre, holding the same authority in the army as Iohn Iames Triumlio had done, al-be it he had not the name nor degree of capitaine Generall.

The King in the meane time hauing giuen order for his returne into France, left the Duke of Bourbon for viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan, and before his departure he commanded Odet of Foix Lord of Lautrec, to carry speedily greater aide to the Venetians, and generally to doe all matters for them, as if it were for his owne seruice, shewing thereby his great affection to the Republike, as in all other his speeches and discourses, not letting to say, that if the Venetians were not wholly restored to their Cities he would returne into Italy with greater forces then before.

The King being gonne forth of Italy, and the Duke of Bourbon tarrying there to command the Dutchy of Milan, the Venetians still kept an Ambassador nere to him, to sollicite whatsoeuer was needfull for their affaires, Andrew Treuisan was sent thither, who being come to Milan, Andre Grizzi who had remained there after the Kings departure to hasten the supplies, went to the army to be Prouidator there, in stead of Dominico Contaren, that fell sicke, and was brought home to Venice. At the very same time, the Lord of Lautrec came to the army with great forces which did much encrease it, so as it seemed that there was no doubt but that Bressia would be taken.

Now the Pope supposing that this successe did greatly crosse his designs, sought all meanes to hinder it. He propounded truce to draw the matter forth at length, hoping to cause the Venetians to condescend to some agreement, though it were to their disadvantage, by reason of the difficulty to take that City. And because he knew that himselfe could doe no good in that business, for the small credit which the Venetians did giue to his words, he determined to make vie of the King of Polands authority, whose Ambassador (hauing intelligences likewise at Venice) he perswaded to renue the treaty of peace, and to propound to the Venetians, that if they would disloyne themselves from the French, and allie themselves to the Emperor, they might add two goodly Cities to their State, Lodi, and Cremona, because that with the Popes armes, the Emperours and their owne, being vnited together, they might easily expell the French; and afterwards by the King of Polands authority obtaine them of the Emperour in gift, so as being thus separated from the State of Milan, they might for euer after be incorporated to the Venetians demaines.

Besides this proposition the Pope, hoping that by the Generals absence the siege of Bressia might be prolonged, wrote to King Francis that it might please him to command the Lord of Lautrec to goe to Rome, being desirous to confer with such a man about diuers matters concerning the affaires of Naples, to which he knew the King inclined, wherevpon he exhorted him to make haft to beginne the warre on that side, seeing that the King of Arragon was dead, and that Charles Duke of Burgondy hauing taken vpon him the name of Prince of Castile, made himselfe terrible to all those who held any States in Italy, and chiefly to himselfe. But the Popes cunning being already knowne of a long time, caused no great regard regard to be giuen to his speech. The Venetians thus continuing the siege of Bressia without harkening to any truce resolved not to stirre from thence till it was either yielded vpon, or taken by force. The Emperour, who had made warre but slowly the yeere before by his Lieutenants, determined to goe thither in person, sought all meanes to make new stirres in Italy, assembled diuers Diets, craued aide, made great leaues of souldiers, and about all, prouoked the Swisses to take armes to reuenge the death of so many braue men their companions, offering to be their captaine and not to abandon them in any traualle or danger whatsoeuer. The King of England made the same request, being ialous of the glory and reputation of the French; and for that the French King also had taken vpon him the protection of the King of Scots. The Pope did no lesse, but in more secret manner: And all three of them promised good pay to those Swisses that would come, shewing them moreouer that the profits which would redound to them by that warre of Italy and by their alliance, would bee much greater then their hire.

The Venetian captaines in the meane time, after the arrivall of the Lord of Lautrec, did often sit in council, where their opinions were very different, saying, That there was no great garrison within the rowne, and that it was besides destitute of all prouision, making but small doubt of the siege. But this opinion was not received, by reason of the vntrustesse of the time, which was in the midst of winter when it is not good to dis campe and to lead the souldiers to a new faction: As also because they thought it meere follie to quit a certainty, such as was the taking of Bressia, for the vn certaine successe of that which would happen before Verona. For they certainly knew that there was in Bressia such want of money, corne and al other kind of victuals, as it was of necessity soone to be theirs, either by agreement or by force, and this being verified by diuers, it was concluded by a general consent not to stirre from thence, and that the City should be more strictly looked to. In the campe there was plenty of all things, for the Senate was carefull to furnish it with all necessaries, notwithstanding all the impediments which the enemies vsed against the purveyors which proued vaine & to none effect. Marke Antonio Colonna, was the man, who being lodged at Verona, vsed all meanes to cut off victuals from the army, and to that end kept great numbers of Spaniards and horse-men at Legnaga, which they then possessed, so as by little and little, the enemies waxed so bold, as they came and scoured as farre as the Venetians campe whilest they were busied at their siege.

The Generall and the Prouidator, thinking if they should endure that indignity, it would greatly blemish their reputation, sent Iohn Paul Manfron and Marke Antonio Buz with foure hundred men at armes, and foure hundred light horse to surprize them, but the designe succeeded badly: for Colonna being by his spies aduertized of their coming, came forth of Verona with six hundred horse and five hundred foot, and went speedily towards Valegia and met them in the field, and coming to handy strokes, he defeated them. At this encounter Iulio, son to Iohn Paul Manfron his horse being slaine vnder him in the fight was taken, & his father fled to Gueda. A more prosperous issue had the enterprise of Iano Fregosa, & Iohn Corrado Vrsin, marching with certaine companies as well of the one as other army to the cattle of Anse to stoppe the passage of 3000. Lansequents: for they slue 800. of them, and the residew escaped with the mony which they carried into London. All these exploits were great; but not of any great consequence in comparison of the totall of the warre, and of that which happened on report of the Emperours coming into Italy which dayly encreased, whereby both the assailants and the besieged were shaken with diuers hopes and feare. The Emperour hauing assembled diuers foot and horse companies, & prouoked great numbers of Swisses to take armes, was on his way to come into Italy, intending to enter by the mountaines of Trent; and to goe directly towards Verona, then to Bressia, and leauing

The Venetians resolve to continue the siege.

The practice of the Emperour, King of England, and the Pope, against the French.

Sundry opinions in the Venetians campe.

Manfron, and de Buz are defeated by the Imperials.

The Lansequents are defeated at Anse by Fregosa.

The Emperour coming into Italy.

Triumlio leaues with his charge.

The Duke of Bourbon viceroy in the Dutchy of Milan.

The Kings affection towards the Venetians.

The Lord of Lautrec commeth to the Venetian army before Bressia.

The Popes practice to break the siege.

leaving strong garrison in both those Cities, to passe on into the Dutchy of Milan to expell the French.

The Pope having notice of the Emperours entry into Italy, the better to honour him, and to acquaint him particularly with his loue towards him, created Bernardo de Bibiena Cardinall of Saint Mary in Porticu, Legat, and sent him to him, for that he was euer wont to shew himselfe on the Popes behalfe against the French, and to hinder their proceedings. But the Venetians, beleueing verily that the Emperour would come into Italy, exhorted the French King to prouide for their common affaires, and not to suffer the Emperour and the Swisses, who enuyed his glory and greatnesse, to enioy the fruit of his labour and trauaile; and that therefore he should either in person returne againe into Italy with a mighty army, or else augment that which he had here already, according to the worthinesse of the cause, promising for their parts to spare nothing that might auail him.

The King knowing that what they said was most true, tooke great care, not only for the danger wherein he saw the Dutchy of Milan, but because he should be enforced to put off his enterprize of Naples till some other time, wherevnto he greatly inclined. Resolving neuertheless first of all to defend his owne Estates and those of his allies, he propounded to the Venetians to wage, at their common charge eight thousand Swisses: because that he hauing at the same time very opportunely renewed his alliance with them, it was expressly agreed vpon that it should bee lawfull for the King to draw what number of souldiers he pleased forth of their country.

The Venetians soone agreed to giue pay to two thousand foot of that Nation, and readily to furnish money necessary for other expences of warre. And notwithstanding that the publike treasury was much exhausted, and the whole City greatly afflicted with so long a warre, Yet neuertheless there was no want scene in any prouision for the army, nor in ought else that concerned the continuance of the warre. They made a leaue of foure thousand Italian foot, they did create their garrisons in the Cities, and created two Prouidators, Paul Gradonico and Lodouico Barbaro. In the Venetians campe were foure thousand Gascons and five hundred men at armes, commanded by French captaines: but amongst those souldiers, who were particularly vnder the command of Trioulet, were seuen thousand foot, and about fise and twenty hundred horse, as well men at armes as light horse-men, and there staid with the Duke of Bourbon after the Kings departure foure thousand Gascon and Italian foot-men, and seuen hundred men at armes.

Now all these forces being vnited together, with the Swisses who were already said to be arriued at Luree to the number of sixe thousand, seemed to be sufficient to defend the State of Milan, and to make all the Emperours attempts vaine and vnprofitable, al-be it the report was that his army consisted of fise and twenty thousand, which were no great good souldiers, especially the Almaine foot who had beene leauiued forth of his countries in hast, and his Caualery was well worse, so as his best forces were Swisses, whom the Emperour did well not to trust over much, as well in regard of the Nature of that Nation, which is variable and inconstant, as for the small loue they beare to the house of Austria: so as the Emperours forces being such, the common opinion was to march against them as they approached, neuertheless they resolved on the contrary, and the whole army departing from the Bressan Territory, came vpon that of Cremona, whither the Duke of Bourbon a while before was come with all his Caualery and foot, intending there to stay for the Swisses, who were not yet arriued, and likewise to stop the enemies from passing on any farther.

The Emperour being come by Trent to Verona, went and encamped before Asola, which was garded by an hundred men at armes, and foure hundred Venetian

Venetian foot-men, where hauing spent diuers daies to no purpose, he was enforced to depart thence and crossed the Riuer Oglio at Orcinouo, wherevpon the French and Venetians determined to raise their campe, and hauing left three hundred Launces and three thousand foot-men in Cremona, they retired on the farther side of the Riuer Adice, resolving to stop his passage. But the French and Venetians were scarce gonne from thence, but the whole country, which lieth betwixt the Riuers, Oglio, Po, and Adda, were at the Emperours deuotion (Cremona and Crema excepted) the one garded by French, and the other by Venetians.

After that the Emperour had crossed Oglio, he drew nere to the riuer Adda to passe it at Pisquerona, and finding the passage there to be very difficult, he came to Riualta, the French lying at Cassiana on the other side of the Riuer: who by reason that the Swisses were not yet arriued, and that the Adda might be forded in many places, they marched away the next day to Milan, whereby the Lord of Lautrec purchased small honour, who had published and written to the King, that he would with ease stop the Emperours passage ouer that Riuer.

Maximilian being moued at this retreat crossed the Adda, then he pursued his journey, and being come within sixe miles nere to Milan, he sent an Herald to summon those of the City, threatening the Milanois, that if within three daies, they did not chace thence the French army, he would handle them in worse manner, then Frederike Barbarossa his predecessor had done, saying that he was come into Italy, to receiue, according to the custome of his Ancestors, one of the markes of the Empire in the City of Milan, and to driue thence, and forth of all the confines of that State, the French, as vniust and vnlawfull possessors thereof. They answered the Herald according to the pleasure of the French. That the State of Milan being in times past a member of the Empire, was by the consent of Emperours cut off from it, for a summe of money giuen vnto them; in regard whereof Emperours, could no more lay any claime to it, the which was lawfully possessed by Francis the French King, as well for that it was his owne inheritance, as being likewise wonne by right of armes: and therefore that the Milanois would keepe that City for their lawfull Lord, vnto whom they had sworn homage and fealty.

Notwithstanding this braue answer the whole City was filled with great amazement, and their determinations were different. Some were of opinion to abandon the City, despayring of being able to resist the enemies, others on the contrary reiecting that counsell as too base, would not depart, but perswaded to tarry still and defend the City, and the better to doe it, they resolved to retaine all the foot-men in Milan, with eight hundred Launces, and to distribute the residue for the gard of the neighbour townes.

Neuertheless the first councill had beene followed, had not André Gritti and André Trucian, the Prouidators, dissuaded it, who by meanes of their authority procured them not to make so much haste: so that as they were ready to depart, certaine newes arriued, that the day following Albert Peter would be at Milan, with ten thousand Swisses and Grisons. These newes did encourage the Citizens and souldiers. The Emperour in the meane time came and encamped at Lambre two miles from Milan, whether he was no sooner come but the Swisses arriued at the City. This coming gaue spirit to the French, but greater terror to the Emperour. For, seeing the City to be strengthened with such a garrison, he doubted not but that the sege would be long and painefull: whereunto he himselfe had no meanes to tarry there long for want of money, victuals, and all other necessities for a sege: as also, for that he did greatly suspect the fidelity of that Nation, by reason of matters past, and for that the French might easily winne them, for some great summe of money, the which himselfe could not doe in regard of his povertry: calling to minde beside, what had befallne Lodouico Sforza at Nourara, there hauing beene Swisses in his army, and in that of the French his enemies,

The Pope sendeth the Cardinall Bibiena Legatto to the Emperour.

The Venetians exhort the French King.

The Venetians offer to the King.

The number of the French & Italian forces.

The number of the Imperiall army.

The Swisses nature.

The whole country betwixt Oglio, Po and Adda yielded to the Emperour.

The French & Venetian army retire to Milan.

The Emperour summoneth the City of Milan.

The diversity of opinions in the City.

The arrival of the Swisses at Milan for the Kings service.

The Emperour distrusteth the Swisses.

enemies, he feared least they should play him the selfe same trickes as they had done to Sforza, because he could not pay them. The Emperour being troubled with these and other such like cogitations, feare hauing mightily possessed him, determined to leaue his army, and to returne into Germany, hauing caused it to be giuen forth that his departure was only to prouide money to pay his souldiers, and that he would soone returne againe. And in this resolution, he went on his way with two hundred horse onely.

Now the souldiers of the campe, perceiving themselves to be forsaken of their captaine, beganne to take a new party, as their particular profit vrged them. The Swisses went to Lodi, which had yielded to the Emperour when hee crossed the Adda, where hauing wasted the country round about, they spoiled the towne, and had continued their rauaging, had not the other Swisses that lay in Milan protested against them, that if they did not abstaine from so doing, that they, with the French and Venetians would come and assaile them. Vpon these threatnings they ceased from spoyling, and hauing remained peaceably there for certaine daies, they returned home into their country, (some excepted) who with Marke Sctio their captaine went to gard Verona, the like did Marke Antonio Colonna with his cavallery, and Spanish and Almaine foot.

Soone after the Emperours departure the Marquis of Brandenbourg came to the campe with certaine summes of money, who although he ved all meanes to stay the souldiers, who were already disbanded, all things being in confusion, and the money likewise not being sufficient for the payment of the whole army, hee lost but his labour.

Amidst these troubles, the small loue and affection betwixt the Pope and the French King, began to shew it selfe, the which till then lay hidden. The King complained for that the Pope being moued with a bad intent, had made so long delay to lend that aide to the campe which he was tied to by their agreement; That he had secretly stirred vp the Swisses against him, and had in diuers other matters manifested his small affection towards him. The Pope on the other side alledged diuers causes which had moued him to suspect the Kings friendship. The Venetians did all they might at sundry times to accord these Princes, and to take away all suspicion from them, knowing very well how important a matter it was, for the Pope, the French King, and their Republike to be vnited together.

Whilst this agreement was handled by Ambassadors, all the enemies designs turned into smoake. For besides the Swisses, who were gonne home into their country (as hath bene said) three thousand Spanish and Almain foot, came to the French and Venetian campes, who hauing crossed the River Adda, had for certaine daies mightily molested the enemies, by diuers and sundry accidents, the French now hauing the worse, and anon the enemies.

The Duke of Burbon being at the same time departed forth of Italy, the Lord Lautrec remained Gouernor for the King in the Dutchy of Milan, who marched speedily with all the French and Venetian forces on the Bressian territory, where with the ordinance he began to batter Bressia in foure seuerall places, to the end the beleeged might not be able to make resistance in so many places at once, who held out so long as they had any hope of aide, which they expected out of the country of Tirol, it being promised them, but it came to nothing, by reason that the Venetians did shut vp the castle of Anse and other passages, so as the townsmen being not willing to endure an assault, because of the great breach that was made, couenanted to leaue the city and castle (their gods and liues being saued) if they were not releued within three daies, on condition that the souldiers might goe any whether sauing to Verona. Teuro, the Cities captaine, came forth of the towne, and the Lord Lautrec with the Venetian Prouidors entered it at the same time, where they were ioyfully receiued by all the inhabitants, who by their cries and salutations did manifest their great content, for that the City was reduced under the power of the common-wealth. Lautrec at his entry, tooke possession of the towne, and afterwards redeliuered it to the Venetian Prouidors, who soone erected the Republikes standard. In this manner did this famous City, after many thwarts and accidents of fortune, returne to the obedience of her lawfull Lords.

The newes of the redemption of Bressia being brought to Venice, did greatly reioyce the whole City, all men hoping that this happy successe would be followed with more fortunate euents which would giue end to the warres. The Senate did particularly thanke the French King, for that by meanes of his aide they had preuailed: They likewise wrote to the Lord of Lautrec, infinitely commending his speed and loyalty, exhorting him not to let slip the occasion which offered it selfe of other most fortunate exploits, as was that of Verona, if without delay the army might be brought before it, by the taking of which City, the warre with wonderfull speed would be ended.

Lautrec being moued by these wordes resolved suddenly to dis campe, and with Triulzio to march towards Verona. But being come to Pescara he had intelligence that those siue Canons of Swisses with whom the King was in league made preparations to come and assaile the Dutchy of Milan, Hee then told the Prouidors that in regard of his Kings seruice he could not be absent so farre from the State of Milan.

This businesse being debated in councell, all men were of opinion to remaine in the same place where they were, and there to expect more certaine newes of those stirres, the report whereof was yet vncertaine. But the rumor of the Swisses comming, still encreasing, Lautrec was desirous to bring backe his army into the Dutchy of Milan, notwithstanding that all the other captaines were of a contrary opinion, shewing how the situation of the place was very strong and most commodious, where they might resolve on whatsoever should be needfull, and provide for all things necessary to stoppe the enemies passage, of whose comming they were yet vncertaine. Hee on the contrary remaying firme in his resolution to dis campe, propounded that he would goe and encampe on the Bressian territory neere to Asola, alleading for his reasons, that Verona being well manned with souldiers as well Swisses as Almaines who had retired thither after the rout of the Emperours army, that it would be labour lost to beleage it, so as to attempt a difficult enterprize without great hope to effect it, would hinder their other affaires, and confound all order of warre.

Besides, hee made vse of other excuses, namely, how that the Venetians had conferred with the King of Polands Ambassador who spake to them of peace, and that the money promised to pay the Almaines, was not yet sent to the campe. Gratti the Prouidor opposing himselfe to what Lautrec had spoken, said, That he knew of a certaine, that there was great scarcity of all things in Verona, and chiefly of corne, whereby the souldiers that were come thither, did more hurt then good to the city, that they ought not to giue them time to make prouision, least that afterwards the enterprize would prooue more difficult: That hee had intelligence by the souldiers that were come to their campe, that the townsmen and souldiers were at dissension among themselves, that all things were in confusion, by meanes whereof the affaires of warre was managed more slowly, and with great suspicion: so as if the army were but before it, the people being partly prouoked by their owne interest, and partly likewise by their loue which they did beare to the Venetians, might raise some tumult, and giue them meanes for to enter the City: As for the Ambassador of Poland, that the Senate had not treated with him of peace without the knowledge of the French King, whom they did so honour and reuerence, as they had refused sundry and honest conditions of agreement, because that they would not disanure themselves from him: As for the payment of the Almains, the money was ready long before, and should be brought to the campe so soone as any safe meanes of fending it should be prelent. But when I consider that you meane to depart hence, to goe and encampe on the Bressian country, I am greatly troubled thereat, as are all those of our city, because the people of that country, who are very louing and loyall to our Republike, and by warre haue endured infinite miseries, should be againe tormented by the arrivall of the army, now when they beganne to recouer themselves and to breath, so as by this meanes, we shall charge and oppresse our friends, to ease our enemies.

The Venetians
resolution,

Gritti having vttered this speech, added, that if Lautrec would not follow them, he was resolved to passe with the Venetian army vpon the Verona territory, wherunto the Generall and all the Venetian captaines gaue their consent. But hauing afterwards, maturely considered the mischiefe which that diuiding of the army might procure to the Common-wealth, they did sollicite and entreat Lautrec, to passe on, but he would by no meanes harken therunto; and all that they could obtaine of him, was, that he would a while longer stay in that place, and expect (as he said) money from France, and that the Venetians in the meane time should make greater prouisions of money, artillery and munition; but the chiefe cause of his abode there was, to heare what end the treaty of Noyon would come to betwixt his King, and the King of Spaine: employing in the meane space his armes vpon the poore country men. For Lautrec hauing made a bridge at the village of Monzarban, was ready to reape downe all the corne of the Veronois, and to waste the champian country by his light horse, hauing to these ends sent part of his army to lodge on the Mantuan territory, where it grievously spoiled and wasted that country.

The cause
which moued Lautrec to stay still where he was,

The Lord of Lautrec being afterwards moued by the Venetians great complaints, crossed the Adicé, at Gothalonga, where after that his souldiers had taken great booties, he drew neere to Verona, but it was after that the Venetians had protested not to giue him the money which was come to the campe for to pay the Almains, vnlesse he would march to Verona. Lautrec with his army hauing crossed (as hath beene said) the Adicé, his captaines did first of all seize on all the straight passages of the mountaines, thorow which the Almains were wont to come forth of Germany to Verona, to the end that they being shut vp and stoppt, no succor might come to the City. The Swisses on the other side hauing all of them in a manner left Verona, detesting the seige, were gon home into their country.

The number of
the Venetians
army.

The Venetians army, with the French aide, consisted of eight thousand Italian foot and of sixe thousand Almains paid by King Francis; of a thousand men at armes, and two thousand light horse, with diuers great captaines well experienced in the art military. These forces being come before Verona, they were diuided into two campees, to batter the City at one time in two severall places, thereby the more to molest the besieged, who were already reduced to a very small number.

The Lanquenets refuse to besiege a City belonging to
the Emperour.

The French comming to execute what had beene determined, the Lanque-nets although they had receiued three monthes pay of the Venetian Prouidators, either of their owne proper motion, or else being suborned by the Emperour, protested that they would not come to the seige of a City which was belonging to the Emperours possessions, to which the French King had no particular claime, and so by no meanes would passe on any further: wherevpon Lautrec repassing the Adicé, lay a mile off from the walles of Verona, and the Venetian army where the Lanque-nets remained (siue hundred men at armes, siue hundred light horse and foure thousand foot being gonne away) not thinking it a safe matter to remaine beyond the Riuier, went and ioynd with him.

The army dislodged by reason of the Lanque-nets
refusall,

In the meane time the Cities forces did dayly decrease, by reason that diuers

Almain

Almaine companies returned home into their country, and others went to the Venetians campe, where they resolved to entertaine no more of them, by reason that they did some-what distrust them. Wee must thinke that the number of those who at the beginning were in Verona, was very great, for albeit many of them were gone from thence, it was neuer the lesse sufficiently well mand with souldiers: in regard wherof the Lord Lautrec, meaning not to hazard any thing, but vpon a certaine hope of good successe, demanded greater aide of the Venetians, if they would haue the army to march before Verona. The Venetians albeit they found it very difficult, in respect of the quality of the matter and the time, yet neuertheless because they would not foreflow an enterprise, which did so much import them, hauing speedily gathered together foure thousand foot out of their owne state, they sent them to the campe, with greate store of artillery, powder, and victuals, by the riuier Adicé, to the end that the campe should want nothing.

The Venetians
send supplies to the army.

Within Verona, which was strong by situation and art, and wel furnished with all kinds of artillery, were, besides the caualery, fixe thousand foot, as well Spaniards and Almains, as Suisses, commanded by Mark Antonio Colonna their General, who was no more in the Popes pay but in the Emperours, a man excellently experienced in martiall matters.

VVhat forces were in Verona,

This man had diligently provided for whatsoeuer was necessary for the Cities defence.

Lautrec approching the walls, diuided his army into two parts, He went and encamped with his infantry and caualery on that side which looketh towards Mantua: And Triunccio hauing crossed the Adicé with the Venetian forces, seated his campe against the wals towards Vincenza. The battery began at once in both those places, but with sundry intents, because that Lautrec did batter it furiously in one only place, to open away into the City, and to take from the enemies the meanes to repaire it: But Triunccio being encamped more at large did batter a great space of the wall, hoping that it being beaten to the ground, he might with more aduantage come to the assault.

Verona besieged
in two places,

Lautrec hauing espied a place neere to the gate Calcina, which was not very strong, being rampierd only with a weake old tower, he planted his ordnance against it, which being throwne downe, he commanded the souldiers to goe to the assault, who vpon hope of the sacke of that rich City, went to it valiantly, and came without feare of the ordnance or Harquebuzze shot vpon the breach, fighting with the enemies hand to hand; where the French did brauely behaue themselves: but the enemies hauing brought certaine peeces of ordnance to play in flanke vpon the breach, the French were enforced with great losse of their people to retire to the campe. But Triunccio notwithstanding that the breach was very great, did neuertheless delay to giue the assault, knowing very well that the besieged, hauing well fortified the place where the first assault was giuen, were gon to the other breach to the aide of their fellows, wherof Triunccio hauing acquainted Lautrec, entreated him to send him more aide, that he might the safer goe to the assault.

Assault giuen
to Verona,

The assailants retire with losse.

Now al-be it Lautrec had meanes to doe it, for the commodiousnesse of going from one army to an other, vpon a very strong bridge ouer the Adicé; and that he did often promise to do it, did neuertheless delay the matter. And the campe had already laine siueene daies before the towne, the enemies were reduced to extremity, the cannon had beaten downe a great space of the wall, the souldiers within the City were wearied with continuall factions, they wanted powder, the captains and the townsmen did not agree together, and yet for all that, none of these matters could moue him to make hast to force the City.

Lautrec delays etc.

Newes in the meane time came to the campe, how that great numbers of Almaine foot-men were comming to releue the besieged. These newes did amaze

Kkkk a

The Venetians
remountance to Lautrec.

The Venetians
stay to guard the bridge.

So canst the Almain will all th Verona.

The Prouidators and Venetian Senate in great care.

For what cause the French king would have the Venetians to be advertied of the treaty.

The sum of the treaty of Noyon.

amaze Lautrec more then there was cause, and distastd him of continuing the sege, so as hee thought on nothing more then how to retire his army into some place of safety. The Venetian Prouidators being aduertized of this sodaine resolution, came vnto him, where after diuers remonstrances of the great blemish he should doe to his honour and reputation to raise his campe, they infinitely entreated him with great earnestnesse to temporize for a while longer, and not to depart till the enemies were arriued, that they might see what they were: But all their entreaties could not diuert him from his first resolution. Whereupon he commanded on a sodaine to dis campe, so as all his troupes went to Albareda, Paul Gradonic the Prouidator, and John Paul Manfram remained for the gard of the bridge, with eight hundred horse, as well men at armes as light horle-men, and two thousand foot, fearing if the same were broken their army might want victuals, but they tarried not long there, for they forth-with went on to Villa Franca, where they fortified their campe.

In the meane time Rocandolf Colonel of the Almaine foot (the French and Venetian army being retired) entred Verona without any empediment, and hauing releued it with victuals and new souldiers in their stead that were hurt, returned into Germany: whereupon the Prouidators, did againe sollicite the Lord of Lautrec to returne to the sege of Verona, and not to spend time so vnprofitably. But Lautrec comforting them vsed diuers excuses for his slownesse, assuring them that the City of Verona should shortly be reduced vnder the Venetians power.

The Prouidator hauing seriously ruminated these words in his minde, beganne to doubt of some treaty which did not appeare; and namely because that at the same time as the campe dislodged from before Verona, the report was that a messenger came from France to Lautrec, who had secret conference with him, and entreated him to keepe close his comming. Therefore the Prouidators did earnestly entreat Lautrec to discouer vnto them what hee knew thereof, so the end they might be no longer enforced to entertaine so great an army, which charged the Republike with a merueilous expence: the Senate likewise being aduertized by the Prouidators of what had past, had the same thoughts, at such time as they had newes from their Ambassador in the French Kings Court of that which had passed at Noyon: Because that King Francis being desirous that the Venetians should haue time to consult of their affaires, would forthwith haue them to be acquainted with the treaty of Noyon betwixt him and the Arch-duke Charles, to the end that the Commissioners of both Princes comming to Brussels, should find all difficulties to be taken away and resolued on.

The summe of the treaty concluded at Noyon, was thus: That there should be a perpetuall peace betwixt the French King and the King of Spaine, and a confederacy for the defence of their States against all men, in the which were comprehended all other Princes, friends or allies, of either of them. That King Francis should giue the Lady René, daughter to the late King Lewis, in marriage to the King of Spaine. That the said King should within a certaine time re-deliver the Kingdome of Nauarre to her ancient King. That the Emperour might within two monthes enter into that peace, and though he should enter into the league, the French King might helpe the Venetians to recover Verona: the which if the Emperour would within sixe weekes commit to the King of Spaine, with power to giue it freely to the French King, to dispose thereof as hee should thinke fit, the King should pay vnto him a hundred thousand crownes, and the Venetians an other hundred thousand, part whereof should bee paid at the consignment thereof, and the rest within sixe monthes after, and that he should likewise be acquainted of three hundred thousand crownes which he had receiued of King Lewis whilst they were confederates.

The Venetians doubting whether the Emperour would accept of peace on these conditions, did not cease to sollicite the Lord of Lautrec to besiege Verona; and and also in regard of the summe of money they were to pay, which they desired rather to recover by armes. But peace was more agreeable to the French King then force, being desirous of accord with the Emperour: yet neuerthelesse Lautrec not knowing how to excuse himselfe to the Venetians, who had made what prouisions soeuer hee craued, as also because the Lansquenets did no more refuse to goe to the sege, hee condescended to their request and went againe and encamped before Verona.

Verona againe besieged.

Now whilst the French on the one side, and the Venetians on the other were busied in the battery, nine thousand Lansquenets arriued, who were sent by the Emperour to releue it. For the Emperour, being solicited by the Cardinall of Syon, and by the King of England, would not harken to a peace, so as his commissioners were ready to depart from Bruxels, without any conclusion, when the Emperour vnderstood that the French King had made a league with all the Swisses by meanes of a great summe of money: for then he seemed to be very desirous of peace with the French and Venetians, al-be-it that at the arriual of these nine thousand Lansquenets, the campe did rise from before Verona, and was retired to Villa-franca.

The Emperour
wholy encloeth peace.

The matter then was concluded at Bruxels as well with the King of Spaine as with the Emperour, in the manner aboue said, the which going slowly on, was hastened by King Francis, on condition that there should be truce with the Venetians. The whole businesse being thus ended, the Bishop of Trent was sent to the Lord of Lautrec, to conuey the City of Verona, in the King of Spaines name, to the French King within the space of sixe weekes, according to the contents of the Capitulation, the which was done on the fifteenth day of January 1517. after the Venetians had paid the first fifty thousand crownes, and fifteen thousand to the foot-men that were in the City: whereupon at the very instant the Lord of Lautrec, in the name of the said King, gaue it to the Senate of Venice, and for the said Senate, to André Gritti and John Paul Gradonic the Prouidators, to the great contentment of the Nobility, and the whole people of Venice, who did highly reioyce, for that after infinite expences and labors, they had made a fortunate end of so long and dangerous a warre.

Verona then signed to the Lord Lautrec
for the French King, is presently deliue-red to the Venetians.

But if they reioycied in Venice, they did no lesse in Verona, and in all the towns round about, hoping that by meanes of that peace they should be freed from all those troubles and miseries which they had so long a time endured. After all these demonstrations of ioy, the Senate acknowledging the Lord of Lautrec for a wife and valliant captaine, after they had presented him with great gifts, they commanded the Prouidator Gritti, to accompany him to Milan. But being come as farre as Lodi, he found John James Triulzee there, who came to meet and to bring him from the King the order of Saint Michel. Gritti hauing orderly performed his commission, tooke his leaue of him, and returned, according as the Senate had commanded him, to the country newly reconquered.

The great ioy of the Venetians for that they were reduced vnder the subjection of the Venetians.

The Senates
acknowledgment to the Lord Lautrec.

The end of the third Booke of the fifth Decade.

10

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the fifth Decade.

He Impositions and taxes laied vpon the people during the warre, are in time of peace reuoked. The vniuersity of Padua re-established. The Senate send two Ambassadors to Selim Emperor of Turkes. The great victories obtained by Selim. He granteth the Venetians demands. The Venetians send an Ambassade to Charles King of Spaine concerning trafficke. Truce prolonged betwixt the Emperour Maximilian and the Venetians. The Emperour Maximilians death. The French and Spanish Kings. aspire to the Empire. Charles King of Spaine is chosen Emperour. Soliman, by the death of Selim, his father, obtaineth the Empire of the Turkes. Lewis King of Hungary hath recourse to the Princes of Christendome. The Venetians in league with Soliman. The French King distrusteth the new chosen Emperour. The Emperour elect seeketh the friendship of the Venetians. The comming of Soliman into the Realme of Hungary enforceth King Lewis to implore the Venetians aide, who lend him thirty thousand Ducats. The Turke taketh Belgrade, the chiefe City of Hungary. The King of England is chosen umpire and mediator for the strife betwixt the Emperour and the French King. The French King & the King of England talke together. Why the league that was determined betwixt the Pope, the French King, and the Venetians, was not concluded and signed. A secret agreement made betwixt the Pope and the Emperour. The Imperialls practizes on the Dutchy of Milan. The Pope inuenterh matter of discontent, that hee might leaue the French King. The secret intelligences that the Pope and Emperour had with the Bandetti of Milan. The Venetians refuse to giue passage to the Emperours army thorow their territory. In what manner the Venetians did releue the State of Milan. Parma besieged by the Imperialls, and sodainely recovered by the Lord of Lautrec. The army of the league passeth the Adda, and commeth to Milan.

The

The Swisshes forsake the French for want of pay. Prospero by the aduertisement of a Traytor marcheth directly to Milan. The suburbs of Milan and the Roman gate taken by the league. The Lord of Lautrec with his Caualtery retireth to Coma. Milan is taken and sacked. The Imperialls take Coma, with diuers other townes. The sodaine death of Pope Leo. Lastly the resolution and preparations of the Lord of Lautrec and the Venetians to besiege Milan.

10

The Fourth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

30

Rimes being laid a side by the meanes aboue said betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians, the Republike was three yeares at peace, which began at the entring of the yeare, 1517. Wherevpon all the citie of the firme land, which were by the last agreement reduced vnder the Venetians government, sent their deputies to Venice to reioyce with the Senate, for that to their honor, armes being laid downe, they had recovered al their state, and to offer likewise all their meanes and forces to the common-wealth.

The Senates cheefe care was to discharge the city of Venice and all other townes and Villages of the firme land from diuers taxes and impositions laid vpon them during the warre, by reason of the small meanes of the publike treasury: to the end that particular men, encreasing their meanes by peace, if afterward any need should be, they might bee more ready to releue the publike with their wealth. It was decreed like-wise that all those who serued the common wealth in any place whatsoever, should euer after bee wholly paid their wages, which had not bin done during the warre. In a word they omitted nothing which they knew to bee commodious or honorable for the Signory.

They did like-wise re-establish the Vniuersity of Padua, which had beene vnre-frequent for the space of eight yeares. Then because they would no more fall into those inconueniences, as they had done for want of providing fortifications necessary for their Cities, they began to fortifie them, and cheefely the two famous cities, Padua and Verona, the two cheefest of their state on the firme land: and for that purpose Andre Gritte, and George Cornare were appointed, who going to those places should resolue by the aduice and counsell of Triulcio, and the other experienced Capitaines of the Venetian army, on that which was to be done, By which meanes, diuers places being ruined in time of warre, were by them re-established, and many others newly built.

But because the friendship of the Ottomans was very necessary for them, as well for the conseruation of peace, as for the cities trafficke, they decreed to send two Ambassadors to Selim Emperour of Turkes: Lodouico Mocenigo, and Bartholomeo

The Senate disburendeth the commonwealth in time of peace.

The Vniuersity of Padua re-established by the Senate.

The Venetians
send two Ambassadors to the great Turke.

CONTIEN

Selim's victories.

The Mamelukes vanquished by Selim.

Selim takes Cairo.

Selim grants the Venetians demands.

The Venetians send Ambassadors to Charles King of Spain concerning traffick.

Centarens were chosen for that purpose to goe and congratulate him in the name of the Republike, for all the goodly victories that hee had obtrayned. For Selim in an encounter hauing vanquished his brother Achmet, and put him publicly to death, did like-wise ouer-come the Adulians, who are a very valiant people of the mountaines: then going into Persia against the Sophis, hee defeated him in set battaille, and tooke the city of Tauris, the cheefe seate of that Empire, with the greatest part of Persia, the which he was enforced to abandon, for want of victuallis, because that yeare had bene very scarce. Returning afterwards to Constantinople, hauing refreshed and re-enforced his army, hee turned his forces vpon the Soldan of Suria and Egypt, who was a Prince alwaies highly esteemed by those of that Religion, and like-wise very potent, as well for the extent of his dominions, as for the experience and military discipline of the Mamalukes, for by their armies they had possessed the same Empire, with great reputation for the space of 300. yeares. Selim then being come with his army against this kinde of people, defeated them foundry times in field, so as the Soldan was slaine, and an other Soldan his successor was taken in battail, whome ignominiously he put to death openly: hee made beside, a great slaughter of those Mamalukes, and thereby in a manner did wholly root out their name: hee tooke Cairo, which is a populous city, and the Soldans ordinary residence, and in a short-time seized on all Suria and Egypt. All these great victories and encreases of his Empire, had not without cause giuen occasion to all Christian Princes to stand in awe of him, and cheefe-ly the Venetians, of whome hee pretended to demand a yeerely tribute, of 8000. Ducats, which the Kings of Cyprus were wont to pay to the Soldans of Egypt in times before. Now the Venetian Ambassadors being embarked at Venice, did first touch at Cyprus, and from thence they went to Damasco, where Selim returning from his victories had wintered with all his army. The Senate had expressly enioyned them to procure, that the Venetian merchants who dwelt at Tripoli, Alexandria, Barath, Damasco, and other marchant places of those Prouinces, might be maintayned there in the selfe same priuiledges, which they were wont to enioy in former times, graunted vnto them by the former Kings of Suria and Egypt: that it might like-wise bee lawfull for the Signory, to haue their Magistrates in those places with the same authority they were wont to haue, to doe iustice to their Citizens in their strife about merchandize, and other such like businesse. Selim ayming at other ends did easily graunt it, as well for the desire he had to entertaine the Venetians friendship, as to restore traffick to his new conquered Prouinces, whereby great profit and commodity might redound to him. At the same time for the same purpose an Ambassador was appointed to goe to Charles King of Spain, to the end that it might be lawfull for the Venetians to traffick thorow all the lands and signories newly fallen to him, as they were wont to doe in the life time of King Fernand in Spain, because that his officers did seeme to make some difficulty in it, in regard of the trade with Africke, whereof it shall not be impertinent to say some thing by the way. The ancient founders of the city had speciall care, that the citizens of their new city should exercise them-selues in voyages and sea-traffick, to bee able by their vertuous industry to encrease their domestike meanes and faculties, and make them-selues knowne to forraigne nations. The situation of their city inuited them there-vnto because the Inhabitants had not they any inheritances wheron to busie them-selues. Wher-vpon they decreed diuers ships should traffick into sondry places of Christendome, and of the Infidells, in which they sent diuers gentlemen, to learne their nauigation, and other matters belonging to the sea: some of whome remained for a time among those forraigne nations, and cheefe-ly wher there was greatest trading, negotiating for themselves and others, whereby, besides the great wealth which they purchased, they made them-selues fit by experience for great matters, so as returning afterwards to Venice they readily executed all matters committed to them.

Now

The usuall trade of the Venetian vssels.

Now the places wher these vessels, (which were commonly called shippes of traffick) vsed to goe at their departure from Venice, was first into Sicily to the City of Saragossa, from thence to Tripoli in Barbary, and hauing coasted the Iland of Gerbes, they passed on to Tunis: from thence they directed their course to the realme of Tremisen, staying cheefe-ly at Tusen and at Mega, two excellent Marchant townes, called at this day Ona and Orana. Then they went to diuers places of the Kingdome of Marocco, and touching at all the hauens of Barbary, which were antiently comprized vnder the Prouinces of Mauritania and Numidia, they failed into Spaine.

But their traffick was very different, for at their departure from Venice, they carried to the African Moores sondry kinde of mettalls, and woollen cloathes which they found there: then comming into Spaine they bought sondry kinde of merchandize as silk, wool, graine, and other things which they found in the contrey, with which being laden they returned to Venice. This traffick then being interrupted by the difficulties which the agents of the new King of Spaine did set abroad, and by reason of other accidents that did happen is wholly lost.

But to returne to our discourse, the Venetians perceiuing that a great part of the time of truce betwixt the Emperour and them was spent, they thought it necessary to come to some new agreement with him, the which the Pope desired, and that it might be by his meanes at Rome. But the Venetians trusting more to the most Christian King, referred the whole matter to him, and made meane that the Emperour should to that end send his Ambassadors into France, who comming thither, and concluding no peace the truce by the Kings meanes was prolonged betwixt them for five yeares, on condition that for euery of the five yeares they should pay twenty thousand crownes to the Emperour. The occasion of this truce, was, because that the Pope being moued by the Turkes fortunate successe, beganne to thinke on other milder matters; he sent Breefs to all Christian Princes putting them in mind of the danger which threatened them, requesting them that all discords and contentions being layd aside, they would speedily provide for the defence of Christian religion, and for their common safety, the which was exposed to very great dangers, vnlesse that they being vni- ted together did transport the warre into Turkey, in regard of the encrease of Selim's Empire, and his great desire of rule and souerainty, which would prouoke him at last to oppresse all other Princes, as he had done by the Souldan of Egypt and the Mamalukes.

These things, being by the Pope represented to the Venetians as well as to other Christian Princes, were cause that the Venetians consented to the truce (as hath bene said) made by the French King betwixt the Emperour and them, seeing that peace could be hardly concluded on: to the end they would not seeme by their refusal to turne away so great a good from all Christendome. But as for the popes proposition, made particularly vnto them to take Armes against Selim, they answered that when they should see matters set forward, and earnestly pursued, the Venetian Senat would be more ready for that enterprise then any else, and would neuer faile of their duty, knowing very well how much it did import them, not only in regard of the common interest of all Christendome, and for the Popes entreaties and exhortation, as because their Sea-state did border vpon that mighty enemy, the which he would in a moiment assaile, and molest with all outrages, before the Confederates Army would be ready to enter into his Contrey.

Soone after this treaty of truce the Emperour Maximilian fell sick and dyed at Lynx in the beginning of the yeare. 1519. which is a towne seated on the marches of Austria, his death being knowne to the soldiers that lay in Garrison at Gradisca and Maran, they sallied forth vpon the lands belonging to the common Truce was concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians.

The Pope exhorted christian Princes to take armes against the Turkes.

The Venetians answer to the Popes exhortation.

The Emperour Maximilian's death.

Common-wealth, robbing and spoiling the Venetians subiects, executing diuers other hostile actions. The Senate wrote to the Lieutenants of the Empire, saying That for their partes they would keepe, and obserue the truce, and not make any inuouation because of the Emperors death: but that they like wife should doe well, to containe, their soldiers in peaceable manner, and keepe them from making any more incursions vpon their Territories: The Lieutenants thinking this to bee iust and reſonable, the truce was inuolubly obserued euery where.

In the meane time, preparation was made for the election of a new Emperour: The French King and the King of Spaine, two great and excellent Princes, began openly to aspire therevnto: And albeit the prize was of great importance betwixt two ſuch mighty Princes, yet neuer the leſſe they handled the matter on both ſides very modeſtly, without any iniurious ſpeeches or warlike menaces, each of them ſeeking by his owne authority, and meanes, to draw the Electors on his ſide: But the Italians did ſtand in awe of either of their powers, fearing that which of them two ſhould attaine that dignity, would by the aide of the Almaines enuade all Italy, and ioyn it to the Empire, as it had bene in times before: ſo that either of their elections could not but bee very much diſtaſtfull, and grieuous to the Italians: and yet for all that they inclined more to the French King, then to the Catholik Maieſty, for diuers cauſes, and chiefly becauſe the French, as a ſtranger ſhould not beare ſuch authority in Germany as the King of Spaine, who was defended from thence, and by that meanes might turne them at his pleaſure: So as the Pope and the Venetians did rather fauour the French Kings party then the Spaniards, and the French ſending his Ambaſſador for the ſame purpoſe to Rome and Venice, they were honorably entertayned, and freely audienced.

Now beſides theſe Ambaſſadors the French King ſent the Lord of Teligni to Venice, as well for this purpoſe as for diuers and ſundry other negotiations, and among others to entreate them to lend him ſome good ſtore of mony, to ſupply his great expence hee was to make, if hee ſhould be choſen Emperour, and alſo that they would ſend forces into Germanie, to aſſiſt the Electors, to the end they might not be enforced in their election, and to aſke them what they would haue him to doe if Charles ſhould enter with an army into Italy, to enforce the Pope to free him from the oath made to Pope Iulius the ſecond, concerning the inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples.

The Senate made anſwer to the Ambaſſadors demands, That in regard of their great obligation to the French King, albeit their treaſour was much exhauſted by the late warres, they would neuer the leſſe ſtrive to ayde him with an hundred thouſand Ducats: But for to ſend forces into Germany, it would ſmally ayayle the King, and greatly hurt them, Beſides, the Almaines would neuer ſuffer their ſoldiers to paſſe, the paſſages being very ſtreight and wel guarded. As for Charles his paſſage, if without being prouoked therevnto he would enter armed into Italy againſt the moſt Holy Father of Rome, that the Venetians would no leſſe ſhew them ſelues defenders, and protectors of the liberty and dignity Eccleſiaſtical, then their Anceſtors had done, preferring the greatneſſe thereof before that of the Empire.

During theſe treaties of King Francis by his Ambaſſadors; Charles King of Spaine, being more apt to leuy ſoldiers with mony, then to give it to the Electors, ſent an army into the field, vnder colour of keeping the election from being forced, the which drawing neere to Franckfort, did encourage thoſe Electors that fauored his cauſe, and made thoſe which wanded to encline to him, ſo as Charles of Auſtria, King of Spaine, was choſen Emperour the eight and twentieth day of Iune, which was at the very ſelfe ſame time that Soliman the ſonne of Selim did peaceably obtaine, without any contradiction, the Ottoman Empire by the

the death of his father Selim: There was but one onely Captaine named Agaz-zell Governor of Suria, that did oppoſe it and make him ſelfe maſter of the Prouinces of his government, who taking armes for that purpoſe, his rebellion was ſoone appeaſed, and all the other Prouinces reduced vnder Solimans obedience, remained peaceable.

He was noted to be of a haughty courage, and fit for high enterprizes, and a great enemy to Chriſtendome: yet notwithstanding Chriſtian Princes, not conſidering the perills and dangers which followed them at the heeles, ſuffered this young Prince, their naturall enemy, to grow great, whiſt they had time to abate his power, by buſying him in the defence of his owne lands and Seignories, and meanes to keepe him from enuading thoſe of their neighbors.

Lewis King of Hungary alone, leuied ſoldiers, and made great preparations of warre, employing all mens ayde and ſuccor, as one that feared this barbarous enemy, by reaſon that Soliman would not renew the truce which this King had made with his father Selim, wherevpon he ſent his Ambaſſadors to the Chriſtian Princes, and chiefly to Rome and Venice, entreating, exhorting, and admoniſhing them of other mens ruine and loſſe by the example of his owne neere at hand.

The Venetians answered him that the power and greatneſſe of the Ottomans was ſo mightily encreaſed, as all Princes and Potentates ſtood in awe thereof, and chiefly themſelves, by reaſon their State was to neere a neighbor to them: that they had neuer reſuſed ſuch offers, but that they on the contrary had ſolicited other Princes, to oppoſe themſelves againſt the mightineſſe of their Empire, which they ſaw did daily encreaſe: but that they of them ſelues alone and with their owne forces could doe no great matter. Nor long after, they ſent Marco Minio their Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, who with their viſual preſents was to procure the articles of peace to be confirmed in the ſame manner as ſome few years before Antonio Inſimiano had done with Selim, and with the ſame authority, immunity and franchize.

Soliman thewed himſelfe very ready to graunt their demands, as beeing deſirous of their friendſhip and aliance, and for a demonſtration of his good will towards them, at the ſame time as Minio departed from Venice, Acmat Ferras ſet forward from the Port of the great Turke towards Venice, to giue them notice from him of his ſucceſſion in the Orientall Empires, and to renew their alliance begun with his father Selim. Beſides he was deſirous, (for that the Venetians trafficked into his Contries might be more free and ſafe,) with his owne forces to chaſe the Pirats that ſcoured the Leuant Seas, entreating the Venetians for their part to doe the like, to the end the nauigation might be aſſured.

This renewing of their league with the Turke, did greatly profit them, in regard their ſtate in Italy was not very firme, and by reaſon that the alarmes and ſuſpicions which they had conceiued at the beginning of the yeare, becauſe it was reported that the Turke armed, was by that meanes cleared: ſo as one part of the nauall Army that they had prepared vpon that rumor, failed into Barbary againſt the Pirats, of whom, many being taken, the paſſages were freed from danger. In this manner did the Venetians temporize with the Turke, vſing all meanes to keepe his friendſhip, depaying of being able to hurt him, ſo long as the Chriſtian Princes careleſſe of the common danger, were at ſtriſe among themſelves.

Now the moſt Chriſtian King being ſomewhat troubled with this election, and fearing leaſt Charles of Auſtria, would turne his deſignes vpon Italy to expulſe him from the ſtate of Milan, acquainted the Pope and the Venetians with the great danger that threatened them if they ſuffered the elected Emperour to paſſe with an army into Italy, and therefore he counſelled them to enter into a threefold league

The French
and Spaniſh King ſpire to the Emperors.

The French
Kings requeſt to the Venetians.

The Venetians
anſwer to the French King.

Charles King of Spaine choſen
Emperour.

Lewis King of Hungary prepares for defence againſt
the Turke.

The alliance is renewed betwixt Soliman
and the Venetians.

The Venetians
arise againſt
the Turke.

Vpon the French King did diſtraſt
the Elect Em-
perour.

league together, against those that would attempt to inuade any of their states, and specially to oppose themselves against the Emperors passage comming in armes to goe to Rome (as he said) to receiue the Imperiall Crowne, because he could not enter in that manner but to the great danger of all those who possessed any states in Italy.

The Venetians soone consented to the French Kings proposition for the safety of their states. But the Pope being resolved what to doe, and ruminating sundry matters sed the King and the Venetians with faire hope: but when it came to the conclusion, he would not consent to haue any thing set downe in writing, saying, That in such a case the onely words of Princes did suffice, with their true meaning to execute what had beene concluded. In this manner the businesse being delayed, the French Kings heate in time beganne to coole.

The Venetians had some suspicion, that the King did secretly treat with the Emperor, and that the same might bee the cause why the Pope doubted, and prolonged the affaires that were concluded on. And that which did increase their suspicion, was, for that they had certaine notice, that Arthur Gouffier Lord of Boyssy, great maister of France, and the Lord de Cheures, met at Montpelier; the one from the elect Emperor, and the other from the King, to consult of a final peace betwix both their Maiesties, and to decide all controuersies betwix them and their allies. The Venetians neuer the lesse still continuing their former resolution and firme desire, not to separate themselves in any sort from the alliance of the French, made no shew that they suspected the King, (albeit his Maiesty was sufficiently aduertised of their suspicion;) but held it for certaine, that if the King were desirous of agreement with the Emperor, they especially should be named and compised therein, and all their contention with the Emperor should be wholly compoled. Charles so soone as hee was chosen Emperor hauing turned his designs vpon Italy, knowing how much it did import him to haue the Venetians friendship, did shew him-selke desirous to compose all the differences, which had beene betwix the Emperor Maximilian his predecessor and them: and to effect this good desire, hee sent his commissioners to Verona, according as it was concluded in Maximilians life time, with ample power and authority, to conclude and decide, not onely the businesse of the truce for five yeares, but like-wise to end all other matters, which were yet vndecided two yeares before betwix them. Francisco Pesare a long time before chosen by the Senate, for that purpose went to Verona, whither for the Emperors part came foure of the chiefe of the council of Inspruck, who had ample power to negotiate that businesse. John Pin, the French Ambassador, came thither in his Kings name, who at the last truce was chosen Vmpier and Iudge of all their controuersies.

The Venetians craued possession of all the places taken from them in the last warre, and that all things should remaine as they were before the warre, saying, That it was the surest meanes to end all their controuersies, and to establish a firme and assured peace. But the Imperials alleadging now one thing, and then another, did still delay the businesse, and would conclude on nothing, so as hauing spent certaine monethes there in vaine, and being recalled by the council of Inspruck, they returned home.

Yet neuertheless the Venetians hauing at the same time their Ambassadors in the Emperors Court, they were put in hope of a prosperous end of that businesse, and that the Emperour would speedily appoint Commissioners to intend it, beeing very desirous by meanes of a sure peace to become their good neighbour and perpetual friend, his officers thereby shewing how much hee desired the Venetians friendship, who for their partes did in like manner declare, how they desired nothing more then peace: but that they could not (their faith kept inuolate) doe any thing contrary to their alliance with the French King.

After

After this manner did these two Princes at one time pursue the Venetians friendship and alliance, but by different waies, each of them seeking to make vie of them in their enterprize of Italy: so as in these practises and negotiations all that yeare passed on without any certaine resolution. The yeare following which was 1520. Italy did still continue peaceable, but Christendome was threatened by Soliman, who perceiving his Empire to be at quiet, and all things to fall out as hee wished, would not bee idle, but following rather the generousnesse of his Ancestors, hee determined to take armes, and to warre vpon the Christians.

This was a long time before foreseene of many, but remedied by none. Following then this determination hee resolved to enuade the realme of Hungary, hoping to reape great glory thereby, by reason that the Hungarians were reputed valliant and great soldiers. Therefore so soone as all things were ready hee departed from Constantinople, about the beginning of the yeare 1521. with a mighty army, and marched into Hungary.

King Lewis being amazed at the comming of so mighty an army, and distrust-ing his owne forces, did againe send new Ambassadors, to sollicite and entreate Christian Princes to aid him, it being the common cause of all Christendome, Philippo Moro Bishop of Agria was sent to the Venetians, who being brought into the Senate, spake in this manner. My King, (most excellent Prince, and yee most noble Lords) hath such confidence in your felues, in your fidelity, curtezies, and power, in respect of the strict alliance which of a long time hath beene betwix this Republike, and the crowne of Hungary, of the Common interest of both your states, of the iustice of his cause, and your owne antient custome, with that of your ancestors, who euer fauored iust and reasonable actions, and releued those that stood in need, as hee is desirous in this eminent perill of the Turkish warre, cheefely to haue recourse vnto you, my Lords, and vnto you to communicate his desires and necessity, hoping to finde from you, not onely a speedy ayde, as much as in you lieth for the defence of his Kingdome, but like-wise all fauour and furtherance to forraigne Princes, thereby the more easily to obtaine of them some succor and releefe. It seemeth indeed, and not without cause, that the first addresse belongeth to this Republike, when any question is of opposing the Ottamans greatnesse, because that as well in regard of your power at sea, as for your neere neighbour-hood to them, yee haue excellent meanes to molest that enemy, and to hinder him from growing great at other mens costs. Therefore, my Lords, yee shall purchase great glory, and shall establish a greater safety, to your state, if yee will be Authors to moue other Princes to protect and defend the realme of Hungary, against this new furious enemy to Christians. Consider, my Lords, to what greatnesse the Ottaman family hath in short space attained, and wholly (if I may so say) by the carelesnesse of Christian Princes, that haue not opposed them-selues against it. Hee marcheth forward with a swift pace to a soveraigne Monarchy: If he cries, prayers and protestations of Constantine, had beene heard, when the warlike and cruell Mahomet did assaile Constantinople the Greekes Empire should not now bee ruyned, nor that of the Mamelukes bee wholly extinct. For both the one and other gaue such counterpoise to the Turkish forces, as if they now were in force, they might with ease assure, not onely the Kingdome of Hungary, but like-wise all the residue of Christendome. Who-soeuer shall consider the progression of the antient Monarchies, will find that their difficulty was not great to attayne to a soveraigne degree, when there was none of power sufficient to oppose their greatnesse, and to counterpoise their pride, whereby the conquests which after-wards ensued proved very easie. The Romaines spent much time in subduing Italy, but beeing once Maisters thereof, and by that meanes most mighty, they in few yeares subiected vnder their power and dominion many forraigne Kings and Princes.

L III

Therefore

An. 1520.

Soliman reple-nisheth to enuade the Realme of Hungary.

An. 1521.

The oration of the Hunga-rian Ambassadors.

After what manner the Pope would consent to the Kings proposition.

The Venetians suspect the French Kings.

The Emperor seeketh the Venetians friendship.

The commissioners of the Emperor and the Venetians meet at Verona.

The demands of the Venetian commissioners.

The assembly in Prague without any conclusion, and the Venetians are put in hope of a prosperous end.

Therefore it is certaine that by how much we shall delay to cut off the greatnesse of this cruel enemy, by so much more will dangers encrease, and remedies become more difficult. I will not say that to take armes for the defence of the Kingdome of Hungary, is a matter onely honorable for Christian Princes, as well in respect of the duty of their religion, as for their profession, nor also that it is profitable for them, for any particular interest, but I will say, that of a certaine it is most necessary for the conservation of their states. For that Kingdome being lost, which hath already of a long time opposed it selfe against the Turkes attempts, and hath interrupted the course of their victories: who is it that is able to hinder him, from entering into Austria, from molesting Germany, and from making incursions on the very confines of your state? This same Kingdome, which still hath bene the Bullwarke to stoppe his progressions, being ruined, (which God forbid) and taken by the enemy, who doubteth but that it will bee very commodious for him, to subdue other nations, to enuade other Kingdomes, and generally to execute all his enterprizes? But as this defense is sayd to bee necessary, wee must not like-wise iudge it impossible, and least of all difficult, provided that Princes will no more want will and desire, then they doe meanes and power. Our Hungarian nation hath bene war-like, and our Kings haue purchased great glory by warre. Our King at this day, my Lords, and his subiects, doe not degenerate from their Ancestors, they want not courage nor ought else that men are to haue for their defence. But what can one Kingdome alone doe against such numbers of enemies, gathered to gether out of so many Prouinces? against the war-like preparation of the richest and mightiest enemy in the world? And yet, this our Kingdome is not very great or rich, to furnish store of soldiers, armor, mony, munition and so many other necessities for any long continuance against such war-like enterprizes: but if it bee aided by other Princes, her forces will not onely encrease, but like-wise her reputation and valour, so as wee doe not doubt but to make all the enemies attempts, and designs vnprofitable: and if occasion serue, wee will not refuse to fight with him in the field, to assure for a long time, at our owne perills, and by the hazard of our owne fortune (if God doe fauour, as wee are to hope, our holy and valorous enterprizes) with our owne country, other Kingdomes and Prouinces of Christendome. But I see that perhaps I haue passed my bounds by my long oration. The summe of all is, Our Kingdome is the Bulwarke and defense of all Christendome against the fury of the Turkish armes: now the common defense ought to bee manag'd by common forces, your wisdom and piety makes yee to fore-see and esteeme of dangers, and your authority and power giues yee meanes of speedy remedy.

What the Senate concluded after the Ambassadors oration.

The Ambassador was heard with great attention, and as they were before already well disposed to this business, hee like-wise left a very great impression in their mindes. Therefore they concluded to sollicite other Christian Princes, by their Ambassadors that were resident with them, to the end that they might with a mutuall consent releue the Realme of Hungary, and prouide for future dangers: where-vnto they freely offered all the meanes of the Common-wealth. But this negotiation had no better issue then the former: where-vpon, dangers daily encreasing, and King Lewis supposing that to free Belgrade from the seige, which was a very strong City, and of great importance, and which had euer bene the Rampier of the whole Kingdome, that hee must fight with the Turke, did after that send John Scutillus his Ambassador to Venice, to obtaine of the Senate certaine summes of mony, thereby to encrease his forces, to the end that being strengthened with meanes hee might at tempt, on hope of happy success, the hazard of a battail.

Another Ambassador from the King of Hungary was sent to Venice.

The Republike had often in times past ayded with mony, and other meanes the Kings of Hungary against the power of the Turkes, but it thought it selfe at that that time more bound then euer before to doe it, as well in respect of the strict alliance and friendship with King Lewis, as for their feare of the Ottoman greatnesse, who dayly grew more potent and redoubted, by reason whereof the Venetians sent the King thirty thousand Ducats, with promise of greater offers, and for a testimony of their friendship to King Lewis, they sent word to Lorenzo Doria, their Ambassador resident with his Maiesty, that he should ordinarily follow the Kings army.

The Venetians send the King of Hungary thirty thousand Ducats

But the Kings designs and enterprises had a disastrous successe, for Belgrade was lost, all the other Cities of the Kingdome continuing still fearefull of the force and violence of the Turkes, who after the taking of this towne, returned to Constantinople, hauing left his Artillery and munition in Hungary, intending to returne thither againe at the spring, as him-selfe aduertized the Senate of Venice by one of his seruants, acquainting them with what hee had done in Hungary.

Belgrade taken by the Turkes.

About the same time, Prince Loretan deceased, to the great greefe of the whole City, who with singular wisdom had fortunately gouerned the Republike the space of twenty yeares, hauing still retayned to the very last gaspe his usuall quicknesse of wit, where-with hee was adorned, hee was buried in the Church of the Twins.

ANTONIO GRIMANI the 76. Duke.

For the Pope, who (as hath beene said) was a Partaker of their designe. Hereupon the Pope tooke matter of discontent, for that without any respect to his dignity and power, or to the friendship and alliance betwixt him and the most Christian King, the French had come and used violence in his townes and Castles, making his complaints to the Venetians; whereas indeed, the King had most cause to complaine; because that by the agreement made betwixt them, it was expressly mentioned, that the Pope should not receive the bander of the Duchy of Milan into his Territories, nor the King those of the Dominion of the Church into his. The Venetians being desirous, as much as in their lay, to appease this discontent; (for the Popes resolution and the treaty made, and sworn by him with the Emperor, was now as yet manifestly knowne), fought to blot out of the Popes mind the suspicion which he seemed to have, by remembering him of the good offices which the King had ever performed to the Sea Apostolicke, earnestly entreasing him, not for a while to breake the holy alliance, so long time sworn betwixt them, seeing that by the breach thereof nothing but mischief could ensue. But all these remonstrances and entreaties were bootlesse: with the Pope, who had already contracted with the Emperor, on condition, that the French being expelled forth of the Duchy of Milan, Parma, and Placentia, should be joynt to the Church's Patrimony; and all the residue of the state should be restored to Francis Sforza; and that the Pope in the meane time should dispute with Charles for the oath which hee had taken in the investiture of the Kingdome of Naples, to the end hee might with more iust title still retayne the Empire.

The Venetians, being wholly hopelesse of making any atonement betwixt the Pope and the French King, resolved not to faile in their duty wherein they were tyed to the King, for the conservation of the Duchy of Milan. The report was that divers soldiers were already leuied by the Pope and the Emperors command, and if their secrete practises could not preuaile, they would on a sodaine fall to open warre; for which cause, the Pope, (albeit it was vnder an other colour) had leuied six thousand Swisses, and Prospero Colonna being declared cheefe of the enterprise coming to Bologna, did from all parts leuie soldiers, whilest the Viceroy of Naples, with the Cavallery of that Kingdome, and the Marquis of Pescara with the Spanish Infantry, were on the banks of the River Transte, speedily to passe over on the first occasion. This caused the Venetians, for their part, speedily to enrolle six thousand Italian foot, and to assemble all their Cavallery on the Breslan Territory, committing their whole army to Theodore Trivulzio their Generall, commanding him to encampe on the banks of the river Adda, that hee might speedily passe over, if the affaires of the French should require it. They commanded moreover Paulo Nani, Governor at that time of Bergamo, to follow the Army with the Generall in quality of Prouidator.

In the meane time vpon the rumor that was spread abroad in France of these stirres in Lombardy, the King forth with sent the Lord Lautrec to Milan, and being come thither, perceiving that his forces were not sufficient to defend that state, if it should be assailed with a mighty army, he thought it fit to keepe backe the new aide which the enemies expected from coming to ioyne with them, who already had a thousand men at armes and about eight thousand foot. The Pope had but three thousand Swisses, for of six thousand that he had leuied, there remained with him but the one halfe. And at the same time, Fernando the Emperors brother being come to villas, to assemble six thousand foot-men, to passe afterwards with them into Italy, to the releefe of the imperiall army, for which forces the Emperor having craued passage of the Venetians, they answered that they could not do so, in regard of their alliance with the French King, whome if they failed at this need they should be taxed with shame and infamy. Vpon this answer, because they would haue their passages to bee enforced, they sent strong guardions thither, yet nevertheless after diuers propositions for the stopping of the Almaines passage, the matter being found to be difficult, they left it by the consent of the Lord of Lauree to the inhabitants of the country, and sent all their forces on the Cremonois, there for to ioyne them with the French, according to Lautrecs direction, who being desirous to haue neere him some Venetian Gentlemen of authority and experience to conferre withall on the affaires of the war, and about the defence of the State of Milan, the Senate sent André Gritti to him, Paulo Nani notwithstanding remaining still in the campe as Prouidator.

They chose likewise Jerónimo Sforza for Prouidator General, who was carefully to provide for all their forces on the firme land, wherein were placed two thousand foot-men newly leuied, and certaine companies of men at armes, who on all occasions should defend them from trouble and dangers. They determined moreover at Lautrecs perswasion to haue other three thousand foot; namely fifteen hundred Gascons, and as many Valesians, and likewise to contribute to the expence of certaine horse and foot companies with whom the Duke of Ferrara promised to come into the field in the behalfs of the French, to the end that the King and all men else should know, that they had in no sort failed for the speedy reliefe of the State of Milan, according to the covenants made betwixt them.

The French in the meane time were readier to sollicite the Venetians to doe that whereunto they were obliged by the treaty of confederacy, then they were of themselves to make necessary provisions, proceeding therein very slowly, which undoubtedly is a very dangerous matter in warre: and albeit the Lord of Lauree did warrant, that the Lord of Saint Vallier should speedily passe the mounts with six thousand French; and that tenne thousand Swisses, leuied for the King, should forthwith march; yet for all that none came: and on the other side the enemies being growne strong and mighty, by being ioynd with the Almain foot having safely passed thorow the Mantuan, and from thence thorow the State of Milan, knowing how greatly speed might import them in that enterprize, were come to besiege Parma, supposing that the taking of that City would purchase them great safety and reputation.

Now the Lord Lautrec having intelligence of their march, suspecting their designe, sent his brother the Lord of Elicut with a strong garrison for the gard of that city: yet nevertheless that did not stay their enterprize, hoping easily to achieve it, as well for that the place was not very strong, as because their army was great and well stored with all necessities, as in deed it would haue come to passe, if Lautrec, who had receiued new supplies of Swisses, had not approached the enemies, by whose coming, and likewise for that the Duke of Ferrara with great numbers of foot-men marched to assaile Modena, and Regio. Prospero Colonna was enforced (as he afterwards said) to discampe from before Parma, to the great griefe and discontent of the Pope, who by his confederacy with the Emperor did chiefly harken after the taking thereof.

The event of this first enterprize having such bad successe was cause that the Pope complaining of the Emperours captaines entred into summe suspicion of them, as if they had drawne forth the siege of Parma at length, vntill that necessity had enforced them to discampe, perceiving that his great desire to obtaine that City made him freely to contribute to all the charges and expences of the warres.

The Emperour on the other side hauing discovered the Popes suspicion, feared, that if he should obtaine that which he pretended to haue by the treaty of agreement betwixt them, he would then giue over the remainder of the enterprize as easily as he had forsaken the French Kings alliance, excusing himselfe either vpon the cost or danger of the warres: whereupon for the better assurance of his designes, he resolved if it were possible to draw the Venetians to his party, and ioyne them to the league, and to that end he determined to send Alfonso Sans

The Pope is
is displeased with the Lord Lautrecs
purpose.

The Venetians sought to appease
the Popes indignation against the French.

The conditions of the agreement betwixt
the Pope and
the Emperor.

The Pope and Emperours formally made a league, in which the Venetians
were bound to follow.

The Venetians were ready to march.

The Emperor was ready to march.

The Emperor was ready to march.

Jerónimo Sforza was Prouidator of all the firm land.

In what manner the Pope did resolve the State of Milan.

The Lord of Lautrec besieged Parma.

The Emperours
besieged Parma.

The Lord of Lautrec was forced to leave Parma, because Colonna raised his camp from before Parma.

The Pope
felt the Emperours.

The Emperor
was dissatisfied with the Pope's purpose.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to his side.

The Emperour
by his Ambassador seeketh
to draw the Venetians to
his side.

to Venice to remaine there as Ambassador for the Imperiall Majesty; and whom he caused with great cunning; and vehemency to declare unto the Senate, that to ioyne with him and the Pope was the true meanes to obtaine peace no lesse by him desired then by themselves; and to be a testimony of his speech hee leade, That although the Emperour might obtaine the Duchy of Milan, by iustitie, yet neuertheless he would inuest Francis Sforza Duke of Burgundie therein, thereby to reduce the affaires of Italy into quiet and peaceable State.

The Senate for all this offered no change of their first opinion, as well for feare that the effects would not produce like unto the Emperours goodly promises, as also being misdeuill of the good offices which the French had lately done them, they thought it ill bestowing their loyalty and dignity to forsake them at their need, therefore they refused to pursue the warre they had begunne. And the armies daily encamping, as well charmed by French and Venetians; as the Pope and Emperours, by great numbers of Swisles that came to them both, and being by that means still in the fortres and walours, both of them continued for the space of six monethes, as it were at a stand, without any certaine designe, an amicable offer of negotiation, and to send out to deliver peace.

At the last Prospero Colonna beganne to march first, bending towards the River Adda to passe it, and afterwards to marche dire to Milan, which was the whole ayne of the warre. Lautrec being acquainted hereof did from thence flee from the Cremona territory, wher hee had for a certaine time remained; and marched towards Casale to stoppe the enemies passage of the River, who heere thelesse by their speedy coming thither before their reach, did cross it betwixt Ripa and Casale; and then went on their way towards Milan.

Lautrec being preiudiced of his hope did not halt follow the enemies being desirous, if occasion serued, to offer them battaile. But Prospero Colonna not meaning to hazard anything, proceeded in such manner as hee took away all meanes of coming to a battaile, which Lautrec perceiving did afterwards with his army, which did daily decrease, especially the Swisles, who were their waile without leaue vnder colliour that they wanted their pay; and came to Milan leaving the Venetian Prouidator with the artillery at Lodi; because thither the General Trinulio having followed Lautrec had entred with him into Milan.

Now Lautrec heere come to Milan perceiving his owne army to be diminished, and that of the enemies to be mightily increased, he caused the Battions and rampiers to be razed; which the Duke of Bourbon had before then caused to be made, resolving not to stirre from thence, and there to expect aide from France. Prospero having crossed the Adda, and having intelligence that Lautrec was retired to Milan, fortifying it in all hast, determined to follow him; and came and lodged in an Abbey within foure miles of Milan, called Cherallia, wher being vncertaine what he were best to doe in regard of the great numbers of men that were within the City, a husbandman was brought before him that had bene taken coming from Milan, who told him in the presence of all the capitaines, that hee was sent by some of the Imperiall faction that were within the City to Jerónimo Moron; to let them know that if they would marche directly to Milan, they were certaine that hee might enter it; but if they should delay the matter and giue the French men leisure to fortifie themselves it would not then be in their power to expell them.

Vpon this aduertisement it was concluded by the chiefe capitaines that the Marquis of Pelcára with the Spanish bands, whom he then commanded, should marche directly to the Roman gate, to be there at sunne set. Theodore Trinulio, General of the Venetian army, had the gard of that gate and the suburb, where the Marquis of Pelcára being come, taking twelve hundred men for that seruice hee gaue directly in vpon a bastion that was new begunne, and not yet defensible, wher vpon those of the gard were so amazed as without fight they were put to rout, forsaking their gard and fortifications.

Theodore

Theodore Trinulio Commander of those troupes being sicke in his head, did on a sodaine arise and marched against the enemies with such few souldiers as hee could gather together, to susteine that attempt, thinking that they would follow him, but Night not blushing, and being vnaccompanied, he was beaten downe and taken prisoner with Isidoro of Saint Seuerin, the Marquis of Vigeua, Admiraglio Bano, capitaine of the Venetian light horse, Lodouico Marin Secretary to the common wealth, with diuers others.

Lautrec hauing notice that the Venetian army being surprized had abandoned the suburbs without any fight, came with the residue of the army before the place of the castle. But perceiving that there was no meanes to keepe the City the said suburbs being lost, determined to retire, and tooke the direct way towards Coma, with all his men at armes to be nere the Swisles, expecting the succor that was to come from France, hauing before his departure left capitaine Mastaron a Galcon to command the castle with fifty men at armes and six hundred French foot.

The enemies being masters of the city, made an incalimable spoile there, without any exception of persons, for the sacke lasted tenne whole daies, no commandement being of force to cause the souldiers to giue ouer. The Venetian horsemen departed from Laude and were coming towards Milan, but hauing intelligence by the way of the Cities losse & Lautrecs retreat, they escaped to Bergamo.

Lautrec being come to Coma, the foure thousand Swisles that remained in the French campe, did the morrow after retire home towards their country, their capitaines not being able to hold them backe. Lautrec departing afterwards from Coma with the residue of his troupes, went to Lec, where hauing crossed the River, hee placed all his men at armes in garrison in the Venetian country, but so soone as he was gone from Coma, the enemies came thither, who hauing battered it ten or twelve daies, tooke it by composition.

Vpon report of these conquests of the enemies, Lauda, Paui, Parma and Placentia yielded vnto them without any difficulty. Cremona within a while after did the like; but Lautrec coming thither on a sodaine with his forces did forthwith recouer it by meanes of the castle which held out yet for the French.

In this sort did the French lose, without being defeated or fighting any one Battaille, that goodly and rich State, which they had purchased at so high a price, and with so much effusion of blood. Prospero Colonna in the meane time, to make vse of his good fortune, pursued Lautrec, seeking wholly to defeat him, who (as hath bene said) departing from Coma and being come to the Giradade, had passed the Bressan territory, and from thence was come to Cremona, which hauing recouered, he remained there three or foure dayes, and then returned into the Venetians Contry. Now in this meane time Prospero Colonna hauing intelligence that Alexandria was left to the Gard of the Citizens, he went thither and became maister thereof. At the last, because winter was well foreward, the Senate permitted Lautrec to winter in their territories, whereof the Emperours Ambassador, resident at Venice, complaining to the Senate, they answered that in so great a disaster enemies were to be releued, and that it was against reason to refuse their friends and confederates, and that in regard of the conuentions & treaties passed betwixt them, common civility did tie them to releue the French in their aduersity, and to giue them all helpe & aide, as well for the defense as recovery of the State of Milan; yet neuertheless somewhat to content him, it was decreed that the French and Venetians should remaine quiet whilst the French should continue in the Venetians territories, least that the enemies being enforced to defend themselves, should make any incursions vpon their State.

But Bartolomeu of Villa claro hauing transgressed that decree, and crossing the Adda, making incursions on the Bergamaske, the Prouidator Cristi permitted all me to defend themselves against the Imperials, wher vpon certain companies of light horse with certaine gentlemen banished from Milan going forth of Cremona, & hauing crossed the Adda did on a sodaine assault certaine numbers of the enemies men

Trinulio taken prisoner by the Imperials.

Lautrec retired with his cavalry to Coma.

Mastaron capitaine of the castle of Laude.

Milan is sacked ten whole daies together.

The Swisles retire home into their countie.

Coma taken.

The Imperials broke the Decree.

Lautrec's determination.

men at armes, and hauing disarmed them; brought them away as prisoners.

Lautrec in the meane time was desirous to march into the field with these forces that he had, and to goe to Cremona, determining to make a bridge ouer the Po at Pontuico, nere to Casalmajor, to become master of the country on this side and beyond the Riuer, that hee might freely ioyne with the Duke of Ferrara, who was in the field with great forces to trie if hee could take Modena and Reggio. As also because that place was thought to bee very commodious for the assailing of the Mantuan territory, and especially Viadana, a rich place and abounding with all things, from whence they might draw great quantity of victuals for the nourishment of the army, and enforce the Marquis of Mantua (who as Gonsalviero, or captain General of the Church, was in the army of the league) to come and defend his owne country. But the Venetians not being of opinion to enterprize any thing till their forces were strong and well confirmed, nor in time of aduersity to purchase new enemies, dissuaded Lautrec from that determination.

*The Venetians
dissuade Lautrece from his resolution.*

Pope Leo his sodaine death.

The affaires of Lumbardy standing at this stay, Pope Leo, vpon the newes that the French had lost the City of Milan, receiued such high content, and was so ouerioyed as a Cathaire and a continuall feuer killed him in three daies space. His death did greatly preiudice the army of the league, as well in regard of the Swisses, who no sooner vnderstood it but they departed sodainly from the campe and forth of the whole state of Milan and returned home into their country, as also for the departure of the Cardinall of Medicis, Legat in the Churches army, who vpon the report of the Pope his cosins death, hauing discharged the army retired himselfe to Rome.

The Cardinall of Medicis after the Popes death retireth to Rome.

A new occasion did then present it selfe for the recovery of the State of Milan as easily as it was lost, the townes not being furnished with sufficient garrisons, nor the army of the league strong enough in the field for to relecue them. Beside, there was great confusion and disorder in Milan, the people being incensed against the Imperials, for the losses which they had sustained by the Spanishe foot-men, Swisses and Almaines, for which they hated them as much and more then they had in time before done the French, and next, by the departure of the Cardinals of Medicis and Syon, who were gone to the creation of the new Pope, the authority of the league was much diminished.

*The Venetians
leauy forces to march into the Dutchy of Milan.*

For these causes the Venetians beganne to leauy forces from all parts, and commanded the greatest part of their garrisons which were disperfed here and there to march into the field: and that which did most of all confirme them, was, that the Swisses hauing published a generall assembly at Lucerna, they there decreed with a generall consent, to take vpon them the protection of the French, and to helpe them to recover the Dutchy of Milan, wherevpon, they speedily sent to the Venetians, wishing them still to continue their alliance with the French, for they were resolved to take armes for them and their allies. These newes did put fresh courage into Lautrec, and al-be-it it was in the depth of winter, hee neuerthelessse determined to march into the field, and to enter the State of Milan.

Co'onna fortifiesh Milan.

Prospero Colonna in the meane time did his best to fortifie the City of Milan, hauing strengthened the Spanishe garrison there with certain number of Lansequets whom he sent for thither, and made all preparations for the susteyning of a long seage if need should be.

The French on the other side and the Venetians sitting in councill to determine what they should first attempt, after diuers and sundry opinions, they resolved that Frederico Bozole should crosse the Po, with a good troupe of choice souldiers, and should goe to the confines of Parma, to listen what was done there, not carrying any artillery with him, so the end that if his designe prospered, not hee might freely & without danger make his retreat, & that the residue of the army, as well well French as Venetians should meet on the Cremonois. But Bozole being come neere to Parma and Placentia, not daring to attempt any thing, returned to Lautrecs campe at Cremona, as wise as hee went, and no other enterprize was made in this yeere 1527. These two great Princes neuerthelessse, the Emperour Charles and the French King continuing much incensed the one against the other, whereby it was foreseene, that Italy and diuers other Prouinces were to endure greuous warres, as it came to passe the yeres ensuing.

The French & Venetian army on the Cremonois.

The end of the fourth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the fifth Decade.

He French and Venetian campe lie before Maran. Francis Sforza commeth to Pavia with fixe thousand Lansequenets. Nouara is taken by the French. Sforza commeth to Milan with his troupes. Lautrec beseegeth Pavia and forthwith raiseth his campe. The battaile of Bicocq. The Swisses retire into their country. Lauda and Cremona yeelded to the enemies. The Emperour seeketh the Venetians friendship. The Emperour and the King of England confirre together, with the league made betwixt them. The Isle of Rhodes is taken by Soliman. The creation of Pope Adrian the sixth. League betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, the Venetians, the Duke of Milan and the Florentines. Alliance made betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians against the French King. The Duke of Vrbino General to the Venetians. The Duke of Bourbon leaue the French Kings party. The French army in Italy under the Admirall Boniuet. Nouara and Vigena are taken by the French. The French come before Milan, and soone dislodge thence. Monce taken by the French. Motion of peace betwixt the Emperour and the King. The death of Pope Adrian. The creation of Pope Clement the seventh. The French retire in disorder. The cause of the Kings discontent with the Emperour and the Venetians. The King commeth into Italy and taketh the City of Milan. The Duke of Albany is appointed to goe and enuade the Kingdom of Naples. The King beseegeth Pavia. The Venetians are sought to by both parties. A secret league made betwixt the Pope, the King, and the Venetians. The Marquis of Pescara keepeth the viceroie of Naples from dislodging forth of Lombardy. The Imperials come into the field and assaile the King. The King is taken prisoner by the Imperials and the French army army is put to rout. The Popes resolution after the defeate of the French. The Venetians resolving to defend Italy, are diuerted from it by the Pope. And lastly the wordes and gesture of the Emperour at the newes of the victory.

The Fifth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

He French army being much encreased in the beginning of the yeere 1522. by the arriual of the Swisses, who in great numbers came to their campe, and by the Venetians forces ioyned to them, which were six thousand foot, six hundred men at armes, and eight hundred light-horse. Lautrec by the aduise of all the capitaines resolved to march directly towards Milan, which was the principall moriue and aime of the warre. According to this resolution they passed the Adda on the first day of march, and the campe was lodged within two miles of the castle. The third day after the French were encamped, they marched in order, making shew that they would assault the Rampire, the which they did not, either because that at the first it was not Lautrecs meaning, or else for that in regard of the great numbers of fouldiers that were within it, the disposition of the people, and the readinesse which was scene in the defendants, hee was diuerted from it, for the manifest difficulty of such an enterprize.

It is certaine that the Lord of Lautrec had no hope to take Milan by assault, but thought to effect it by length of time, because that by reason of the multitude of his horse and great number of the bandetti which followed him who scoured the whole country, hee did cut off all victuals from it: as also because he had broken downe all the mills, and turned away the waters forth of their Channels, which brought great commodities to the Milanois, and he did besides hope, that the pay which the Milanois did giue the fouldiers would soone be waisted: for the Emperour sent little or none at all.

But the Citizens of Milans hatred towards the French was wonderful, and their desire mercurious to haue Francis Sforza their new Duke againe, in regard whereof, enduring patiently all discommodities, they did not onely, nor chagether their mindes for all those miseries, but the young men of the City did put on armes, and made capitaines in euery parishes: in such sort as the gardes which speedily ranne to the remotest places of the army, did greatly releue the fouldiers, providing beside, in stead of the mills that were broken downe, hand mills for all their meale was spent.

The Duke of Milan in the meane space, who had along time remained at Trent, expecting some fit occasion to passe forward, went on his way with six thousand Lansequenets, and seized on the Fort of Croare which did belong to the Venetians

Great numbers of Swisses in the French campe.

The French campe before Milan.

What kindred the Lord of Lautrec from assailing Milan.

With what seruants the people of Milan endured the discommodities of the siege.

The Duke of Milan cometh to Paugia with six thousand Lances quents.

Venetians, to the end to open his passage. From thence he came thorow the Veronois and Mantuan territories with ease to Casal-major, because that the Venetian army was ioynd with the Lord Lautrec, and there crossing the Po, hee came to Placentia, beeing afterwards aided by the Marquis of Mantua hee marched to Paugia, where he remained waiting for some fit occasion to goe to Milan, where his arruall was extremely wished for.

So soone as the Lord of Lautrec, had intelligence of his comming to Placentia, he raised his campe, and went and lodged at Cassin five miles from Milan on the high way towards Paugia, and the Venetians at Binasca which lieth on the same road way, to hinder his comming to Milan, where in the meane time hee tooke Saint Angelo, and Saint Colombane. But being aduertized that the Lord of Escut his brother, was come from France with money and certaine companies of foot-men, and came by the way of Genoa, he sent thither for his conuoy Frederico de Bozzole, with foure hundred Lances and seuen thousand foot, Swisses and Italians, against whom the Marquis of Mantua going forth of Paugia, came backe thither on a fodaine, standing in leare of them, by reason they were more in number then had beene reported vnto him. Bozzole hauing ioynd his forces with the Lord of Escut, both of them together tooke the way towards Nouara, and comming to the castle, which held out yet for them, they tooke the ordnance that was within it, and battered the City, the which they tooke by force at the third assault, sacking it wholly and putting all those within it to the sword, Count Philip Tourniolo the Gouvernor excepted, and some few others with him who were made prisoners; from thence they went to Vigeva, which they likewise tooke, opening the way by the taking of those townes to the supplies which they expected from France.

The French take Nouara.

But in the meane time, Francis Sforza departing secretly in a night from Paugia, went thorow by-waies, and ioynd himselfe with Prospero Colonna neere to Landriana, a few souldiers remayning in Paugia with the Marquis of Mantua, who would not paffe on any farther, because he would not be farre off from the Churches territories.

By reason whereof the Lord of Lautrec supposing his stay at Cassin to bee to no purpose, seeing that Francis Sforza was escaped, as also because it had beene no discretion for them to encampe before Milan, they determined for to turne the army towards Paugia, hoping to take it; wherevpon so soone as hee had re-assembled his army, hee went and encamped there, where at his arruall a furious battery was made in two severall places, as well by the French, as the Venetians, so that the breach was iudged reasonable for an assault: And yet the beleeged resolved valiantly to defend themselves, and to hinder the enemies from taking it, not sparing their liues and meanes.

Sforza arriveth at Milan.

Paugia beleeged by Lautrec.

Prospero in the meane time perceiving the manifest danger wherein the City was, did speedily send thither a thousand Corsicans, and as many Spaniards, who in the night passed along very neere to the campe, not being desired before they were in a manner all past, and then the French watch which was still on horse backe, did charge them on their backs, and defeated some few of them, but not very many, by reason they were to late desired. Now the breach being thought to be reasonable, the Swisses, who by nature are impatient, requested the Generall of the army that they might march to the assault, but it was put off till another time, the better to assure the businesse, staying till Pedro of Navarres mine had plaied, which was made vnder a great Bastion, to the end that the ruines thereof might helpe the souldiers in their going to the assault.

The campe dislodged from before Paugia.

And in this sort the arruall of new supplies at Paugia, and their hope in the mine, were the causes that the assault was delayed and the campe raised. For Prospero Colonna perceiving himselfe to be re-enforced with six thousand Lances

quents

quents and others which Francis Sforza had brought, did with his whole army come into the field, that he might be neere to Paugia, and he went and encamped at the Chartreux within three miles off the French and Venetians, to hinder them from giuing an assault to the City, for it had beene against reason to haue suffered it to be don, so great a power as his being so neere the enemies. Then was the Lord of Lautrec out of hope to take Paugia, wherevpon he dislodged and retired his campe to Ladrana, and from thence to Monce, that he might be releued with victuals as well from Laudesan and from the territory of Cremona as from the Venetians country, receiving in his disamping no other discommodity then a few light skirmishes.

The Imperials perceiving the French army to march towards Monce, thinking that they would haue gonne to Milan, went and lodged at Bicoca three miles off from Milan, on the high way to Laude, which is a very spacious house belonging to a Gentleman, enuironed with goodly gardens and enclosed with deepe ditches, the fields round about beeing full of fountaines and streames brought by conduit-pipes, according to the manner of Lombardy, to water the meadowes: being come to that place, they did speedily raise all the dikes, and flanked them with great plat-formes well stored with ordnance.

The Emperors campe lodged at Bicoca.

The Swisses being, according to their manner, impatient, sent their captains to the Lord of Lautrec, to let him vnderstand that their fellows were wearied with lying in campe, and that of three things they craved one, ready money, leaue to depart, or that he would speedily, without any to more temporizing, lead them to a battaile. The Lord of Lautrec considering how dangerous a matter it would haue beene to haue gonne and assailed the enemies in their campe, yfed meanes to moderate their fury, and told them that if money were long in coming, it was not thorow the Kings fault, but in regard of the danger of the waies, and yet neuertheless it would very shortly arrive, therefore he entreated them, (as did all the other Lords of the army likewise) that they would bee patient for a while longer, seeing they did hope to vanquish the enemies without fight, or at least wifely to fight with them with greater aduantage. But the captains of the French army, not being able to winne or retaine them, neither by their authority, entreaties, promises, nor reasons, knowing that the chiefe strength of their army consisted of that nation, of whom being abandoned they should remaine a prey to the enemies, they concluded to fight rather then to flie, seeing that vlesse the Swisses were lead to the battaile, they were determined to depart thence.

Now according to this resolution, the Lord of Lautrec did by the Swisses consent send the Lord of Pontormy to discover the enemies campe, who marched thither with foure hundred men at armes and six thousand Swisses, who hauing discovered it they found small likelihood of beeing able to assaile it, yet neuertheless that did not change their opinion: wherevpon the Lord of Lautrec comming forth of Monce, did with his army march towards that place, hauing appointed the Swisses with the artillery to goe and assaile the front of their campe and the enemies artillery, which was guarded by the Lansequents: That the Lord of Escut with three hundred Lances, and a squadron of French and Italian foot should march on the left hand vpon the way that leadeth to Milan, and should goe to the bridge by which they might enter into the enemies campe: As for himselfe he would vse meanes to enter it with a squadron of horsemen, hoping rather to preuaile by cunning then by open force; for the better to deceiue them, hee commanded that all his souldiers should weare red crosses on their cazakes, which was the badge of the Imperiall army, in stead of a white crosse which was the deuice of the French army: Francisco Maria Duke of Vrbin, with the army of the Signory of Venice lead the reuerard.

Lautrec sendeth to discover the enemies campe.

First at order the French did assaile the enemies.

Policy of the Lord of Lautrec.

Now the Swisses being come neere to the enemies campe, al-be it that in regard of the depth of the trenches, which were deeper then they imagined, they could not

according to their first hope assaile the ordnance, their courage neuerthelesse not diminishing, they assailed the trench, striving with great boldnesse to get our it, but in the meane time the ordnance and the enemies small shot, wherewith the rampier was stuffed, did greatly hurt them, so as the greatest part of the captaines and chiefe souldiers died there. For as loone as Prospero Colonna had notice of their comming, he embattailed his troupes, then he appointed euery man his place, accounting the victory for his owne, in regard of the strength of the place, so as the Lord of Elscut being gonne on the other side, as hee was commanded, directly to the bridge, finding, contrary to his expectation, a strong guard there, was enforced to retire, so that the whole burthen of the battaile fell vpon the Swisshes, who, as well in respect of the vantage of the place, as for the defendants valor, did labor in vaine, and did receiue a very great ouerthrow, so as being well rewarded for their rashnesse, by the death of many of their fellows, they were enforced to retire.

The Swisshes
holding in afflying their enemies.

The tail of Bicoca.

The Swisshes retire to Monce.

The Lord of Lautrec, with the other Lords of the army, perceiuing all things in disorder, would haue perswaded the Swisshes to encampe vpon the same place, offering them the next day to set the greatest part of the men at armes on foot to march in the forefront, but it was impossible to cause them to condescend thereunto, so as they would needs returne to Monce, whether marching in good order with the French and the artillery, they receiued no hurt in their retreat, al be it that the Marquis of Pescara and the other Imperiall captaines did importune Prospero to follow them, but he would not doe it, beleeuing, as it was very likely, that the French army made their retreat in good order, the men at armes remaining on the tayle of the army to repulse the enemies if they should follow them.

The army being come to Monce, the Lord of Lautrec vsed all meanes to detain the Swisshes, and to that end did giue great presents to their captaines, and among others to Albert Peter, a man of great authority amongst them, who hauing declared vnto them in an open assembly the wrong which they did to their reputation, if they should depart, then when they were in greater hope then cuer to vanquish the enemies by reason of the French Kings comming, who was daily expected, could not for all that stoppe their retreat: wherevpon, the morrow after their arrivall at Monce, they returned thorow the Bergamask home into their mountaines, their number being much decreased, for that, three thousand of their fellows, and two and twenty captaines were slaine at the trenches. The French and Venetian army did soone dislodge from Monce, and crossed the Adda at Treffa, and there the two armies being parted the Lord Lautrec went to Cremona, to giue order for the defense of the City, and afterwards for his going into France (which he did) leaving his brother the Lord of Elscut for the guard of Cremona, with the companies of men at armes, and the Lord of Boneuall in Laude and Frederick of Bozole with six companies of men at armes, and a sufficient number of foot-men.

The Swisshes
turne home into their country.

The enemies surprise Lauda.

Cremona is yielded to the enemies.

The Venetian army retired to the Bressan territory, hauing left a sufficient gar- rison for the gard of Treffa. But forthwith after the Lord of Lautrecs departure, the towne of Lauda was surprized and sacked by the Marquis of Pescara, and soone after the Lord of Elscut yielded Cremona on composition to Prospero, in regard he had no other hope to be able to hold out the seerge, but by such succors as he expected from France, of which he heard no newes.

The fortune of the French being in this sort altered, and their reputation greatly diminished, by being in so short a time driuen forth of the Dutchy of Milan, by forces no greater then their owne, it was thought that the Venetians (who had already casied their army, dismissed the greatest part of their Caualery, and giuen leaue to Andrew Gritti their Propudator in the army to goe home to his owne house, hauing well acquitted themselves (though to small purpose) of whatsoever their confederacy and alliance with the French King had bound them to) would at last follow the prosperous fortune of the Emperor

Charles,

Charles, who made thew (as hee had often times before then done) to desire their friendship, and much more then, then before, in regard of the great hope which he had conceiued in his minde, that the route of the French would incite them so to doe, promising to him selfe thereby to disioyne them, and so to draw them to his party, for the opinion hee had that this new confederacy and aide of the Venetians would chiefly auail him for the conseruation of the State of Milan, and for the obtaining of a prosperous issue of the warre.

The Emperor
seeketh the friendship & alliance of the Venetians.

The Emperor then, resolving to doe it, and not being satisfied with opening the way to Gaspard Contaren, Ambassador to the Seignory in his Court, and to haue told him how much it did import their Republick, to make the same alliance with him, as they had done before with the French King, did likewise communicate the same to the King of England, hauing talked with him at his returne from Spaine, the capitulations whereof being drawne by the Chancellor of the Empire, were giuen to Contaren, who finding them too rough, promise was made to him, that they should in such sort bee moderated as the Senate should find them reasonable. But because by the distance of places, the matter was drawne forth at length, there was in the meane time a league and confederacie concluded betwixt the Emperor Charles and Henry the eight King of England, referring place for the Venetians to enter into it within three moneths, which time was giuen them to aduise thereon. This being communicated to the Senate, there was nothing resolved on for that present, but onely to make a generall answer to the offers and signes of friendship of those two Princes, which was, That they were very desirous of peace, and of their alliance.

The Emperor
and the King of England
take a league.

A league betwixt the Emperor & the King of England.

But the report dayly encreasing of the French Kings great preparations of warre for his passage into Italy, which held the Venetians from making any certaine resolution, the Emperour and the King of England, fearing that the Venetians would still continue in their friendship and alliance with the French, determined, the better to halt the conclusion of the new league, to send Ambassadors to Venice.

The King of Englands Ambassador came first to Venice, and being brought into the Senate house, hee entreated the Senators to deale plainly, and to declare what they intended to doe, if the French King should returne with his Armie into Italy, to seaze on the Dutchy of Milan. The same request did the Emperours Ambassador make, who came thither presently after him, who going on farther, entreated, that if the most Christian King should passe the mounts, that the Republick would take armes and ioyne it selfe with the Imperiall forces to resist him. The Venetians in this treaty dealt very considerably, well weighing the inconueniences that might happen on either side, resolving neuerthelesse not to enter into any new alliance but vpon necessary, meaning not altogether to sepeerate themselves from the friendship of the French, nor yet wholly to reiect that of the Emperor, wherevpon they answered the Emperour and King of Englands Ambassador in generall termes.

The Ambassadors
of the Emperor and
the King of England come to Venice.

The Venetians greatly differ on in their resolutions.

About the end of the year 1522. Soliman Ottoman, to the great infamy of Christian Princes, tooke the Isle of Rhodes, defended by the Knights of Rhodes, who before then were called, the Knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, whither the great Turke came in person, who hauing reduced those of the Island and Towne to the extreamest point of necessity, enforced them to capitulate, namely, that the great Maister should deliuer him the towne: that as well himselfe as all the Knights of that order should depart in safteie, and carry away with them as much wealth as they could, and for to haue some assurance thereof, the Turke should retire his nauall armie from thence, and with draw his land forces five miles from the City. By meanes of this capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turke, and the Christians, (promise being kept with them) departed into Sicily, and from thence into Italy. Now to returne to the Emperor and King of

An. 1522.

Rhodes taken by Soliman.

Englands pursutes to the Venetians, for the conclusion of the about mentioned league, the Venetian Ambassadors resident with those Princes, were often dealt with; but, the better to hasten the businesse, and to prevent the delays caused by reason of the farre distance of places, Ieronimo Adorni Councillor and ordinary Chamberlaine to the Emperor, came to Venice, beeing sent by his Maister to treat of and conclude that businesse: who beeing brought into the Senate, went about to perswade them to forsake the French Kings alliance, and to embrace that of the Emperor and the King of England. But the Senate beeing mooued by sundry reasons, did still answer as they were wonte, not breaking either with the one or other.

The Creation of Pope Adrian
the first.

In the meane time, after Pope Leos death, Pope Adrian, Cardinall, Bishop of Bertheusa, and a Dutchman by Nation, who had bene Schoole-maister to the Emperor Charles, and by his meanes made a Cardinall by Pope Leo, was at the time of his Election in Spaine, and hauing receiued newes thereof (would be called Adrian the sixth, taking none other name vpon him then his owne) did embarke himselfe, and came to Nice: and from thence went to Rome, whither all the Prelates speedily came, and all Princes sent their Ambassadors to present their accustomed obedience: wherein, because the Venetians among others would not faile, they deputed sixe of the chiefe of the City: namely, Marco Dandolo, Lodouico Mocenigo, Vincenzio Capel, Antonio Iustiniano, Petro Pefare, and Marco Foscare: who being come to Bologna, and vnderstanding that the plague was very great in Rome, they remained there for certaine dayes: but beeing aduertized that the Pope was enforced to leaue the City, and to retire else-where, they returned to Venice.

The Venetians
Ambassage to
the Pope.

The new Pope was noted to bee of a generous disposition, and very much addicted to quiet, beeing very zealous for the common good of Christendom. For so soone as hee was installed in the supreame dignity, his greatest care was, to vie meanes to vnite all Christian Princes together, and to end all their controuersies, writing briefs to them all for that purpose, with great affection, causing his Nuncios to present Monitories to those Princes with whom they resided, threatening to excommunicate them, if within three moneths they did not agree together, or make a generall truce, in which meane space all their strifes might be composed and ended. He did like wise write particularly to the Venetians, entreating and exhorting them, not onely to hearken vnto peace, but to procure all other Christian Princes to vnite themselves together, and to oppose themselves against the greatnesse of the Ottoman Empire. But perceiving the execution of this enterprise to bee very difficult, hee was desirous in the meane time to conclude a league betwixt himselfe, the Emperor, the Venetians, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines, for the defence and quiet of Italy. The Senate did at the first entertaine his proposition with great affection, esteeming it to bee very good and profitable, but hauing considered in what maner the Pope did practise it, how that the end was to haue them to take armes against the Turke, they would not enter too farre into it, nor incur the displeasure of so mighty a Monarke: wherein wholly to satisfie him, they on a sodaine sent the about-named Ambassadors, that were appointed to present their obedience to him, (the plague beeing ceased in Rome) who being arrived, were honorably receiued and entertained by his Holynesse, who promised them to deale in such sort as they should be fully satisfied.

The Pope is zealous of an vniuersall
peace.

League betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the Venetians, the Duke of Millan, and the Florentines.

Thereby of agreement in the meane time with the Emperor was not interrupted, for all these goings and commings, the Senate hauing appointed three of their number, namely, Lodouico Mocenigo, Georgio Cornare, and Marc-Antonio Venier to conferre with Ieronimo Adorni the Emperors Commissioner, that they might determine of it afterwards, vpon their report, in the Councill of the Fregays, and make some resolution therevpon.

This

This conference beeing ended, and the whole businesse beeing sent back to the Councill to bee debated, their opinions were very different, some saying that it was best to continue their alliance with the French King, and others to make a new one with the Emperor; the two chiefe of these contrary opinions, were Andri Grissi, and Georgio Cornare. The first, beeing highly esteemed for the great offices which hee had borne, and for his great authority in the common-wealth, spake first, with great vehemencie in the behalfe of the French King: The other beeing of like authority, and accounted as wise a man as any in the Councill, spake to the contrary, and said, that the Dutchy of Milan did by right appertaine to Francis Sforza, and that therefore by consequent they were to make alliance with the Emperor.

Different opinions in the Senate concerning their alliance with the Emperor.

Both of them by their great and apparent reasons, did rather possesse the Senators mindes with doubts then with any certaine resolution, so that the Senate delayed the determination thereof as much as they could, their vsuall manner inducing them therevnto, which was not to doe any thing rashly, the importance of the matter, and their desire to see more preparations of the French Kings, who prouiding for warre had sent the Bishop of Bayeux, to entreate them to put off their determination for a moneth longer, assuring them that before that time were expired, hee would come downe with a greater army then had euer bene seene in Italy in the memory of man.

But because the King did dayly send new messengers to the Senate with very great offers, and for that they were aduertized that Anna of Montmorency and Frederick de Bozzolo were coming to Venice for the same cause; The Emperor and the King of Englands Ambassadors, who did very much suspect those delays, did protest in open Senate, that within three dayes next they would depart thence, leauing all matters imperfect. In regarde whereof, the Senate being enforced to end that businesse, and the trust which they reposed in the French Kings promises beginning to faile, by reason that hee had for diuers moneths fed them with vaine hope, and especially, because their Ambassador with the same King did assure them of the contrary, they resolved to embrace the Emperors friendship, with whom they made agreement on these conditions.

The protestation of the Emperor and King of Englands Ambassadors
in Senate.

That there should be a perpetuall peace and confederacy betwixt the Emperor Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, and Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, on the one side; and the Senate of Venice on the other. That the Senate should send, when need should bee, for the defence of the Dutchy of Milan, sixe hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and sixe thousand foot. That it should doe the like for the defence of the kingdom of Naples, if any Christians should enuade it (the Venetians beeing vnwilling to oblige themselves against the Turke, because they would not incense Soliman against them): That the Emperor should bee bound to defend against all men, with like number of Souldiours, whatsoeuer the Venetians possessed in Italy.

The articles of the alliance made betwixt
the Emperor,
Francis Sforza,
and the Venetians.

That the Venetians should in eight yeares pay to the Archduke, the summe of two hundred thousand Ducats, in regarde of their ancient strifes, and for the agreement made at Wormes. That the Venetians should possesse their Cities, townes and places of their demaines, with the same preheminance and iurisdiction as they then enioyed them: That all those who had bene bannished by the Senate, and their goods confiscate for taking the Emperours part, should returne into their owne Countrey, bee restored againe to their goods, and should during their life haue a yeerely pension of five thousand Ducats.

These things beeing thus concluded, the Kings of Poland, Hungary and Portu-

Portugall, as friends to both parties, the Duke of Sauoy likewise, the Florentines, the family of Medicis, Antonio Adorni Duke of Genoa, and the Marquis of Monterrat were ioyned in this league; as for the Pope and the King of England they were named Gardians and conseruers of this conuention.

The Venetians
send Ambassadors down to the Emperour to reioyce with him for this new league.

This accord beeing thus established and confirmed, the Senate elected two Ambassadors to send to the Emperour, namely, Lorenzo Priuli, and André Nougiere: and to the Archduke his brother Carlo Contarini, to reioyce with them for the new league, and for to giue them ample testimony of their affection towards the house of Austria. And because that Triunccio, Generall for the Venetians, did greatly affect the French, the Senate in that regard, did honorably dismisse him, 10 seeming to be very well pleased with his former seruice, by offering him a yeely pension of three thousand crownes if he would continew with them as a priuate Cittizen, till such time as a better opportunity and occasion should present it selfe; but refusing their offer, he went into France: And in his place they chose Francisco Maria Duke of Vrbin Generall of their forces, with the same conditions, taking vpon them the protection of his State against all men.

The Duke of Vrbin General
to the Venetians,

In Italy all men thought, that seeing the Venetians were contrary to the French King, who in time before had fauoured him, that hee would forbear to come into Italy to enuade the Dutchy of Milan, but when they vnderstood how that hee did not onely continue his preparations, but that his army began already to march: those who feared his victory, did forthwith make a new confederacie to resist him, and perswaded the Pope to be the chiefe thereof. In very deed it was a thing to be wondered at, that so soone as the French King had certaine newes that the league betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians was concluded and finished, hee made greater preparations then before to marche into the field, where as in times past, beeing solicited by the Venetians, hee proceeded therein more slowly, and that which is more, hee bent his thoughts on the Dutchy of Milan, at such time as hee had most reason to looke to his owne kingdome, in regarde of the Duke of Bourbons practices with the Emperour, the which beeing discouered, hee forsooke the Realme, and retired himselfe to the Gayd Emperour, according to his former proiect: by meanes whereof, the King determined for that time not to pursue his journey into Italy: and yet neuertheless keeping at home with him, part of thole forces prepared for the new warre, hee sent the Lord of Boniuet Admirall of France thither, with eightene hundred Lances, sixe thousand Suisses, two thousand Grisons, two thousand Valesians, sixe thousand Lansquenets, two thousand French-men, and three thousand Italians: who hauing passed the Mounts with that Armie, and beeing come to the borders of the Dutchy of Milan, marched directly towards Nouara, the which beeing not well fortified, neither with Soldiers nor Rampiers, did soone yeeld, (the Castle excepted) the like 30 did Vigena and all the rest of the Countrey on the hether side of the riuier Thefin.

The Duke of Bourbon forsaiketh the French Kings
party.

Nouara and Vigena yeeld to the French.

VVhat Prospero Colonna did, vpon report of the arrivals of the French.

Prospero Colonna (who could not be perswaded that the French King would perseuer in his determination to assaile the Dutchy of Milan for that yeare, as well because that the Venetians were confederated against him, as for the Duke of Bourbons rebellion, had not so soone as need required assembled his soldiers who were lodged in sundry places, nor made necessary prouisions for so great a motion) solicited all mento vnite themselues together, to hinder the French from passing ouer the Thefin.

The Venetians on the other side beeing aduertised of the Frenchmens arriuall, did sodainly command all their men at armes to meete vpon the banks of the Riuier Olio, determining at the same time to make a leuy of sixe thousand 50
foote, and foure hundred light horse, to send them according to the treaty of the Confederacie for the defence of the Dutchy of Milan, and three thousand other footemen to lye in garrison in their Citties and strong Townes: they

The Venetians
preparations
against the French.

they made Leonardo Eme their Prouidator generall, and sent a speedy messenger to the Duke of Vrbin, to will him to march forth with into Lombardy, for the execution of his charge there. And hauing notice of the Lord of Boniuiets progression, they commanded their Prouidator to leade their forces into the Countrey of Giradade, to assure the Citties of Bergamo and Crema, and like-wise to releue speedily the City of Milan, whither the French did bend all their designses.

The French being come to Vigena, finding the waters of the riuier to bee shallower then Prospero supposed, part of them beganne to passe ouer at a ford, and others in boates, within foure miles of the Imperials Campe, and made a bridge 10 for the artillery at a place where they found no gard, nor resistance: whereof Prospero being aduertized, did speedily send a hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot for the gard of Patia; and him selfe with the residue of the army went into Milan, where by the aduice of all the Captaines, hee beganne to repaire the bastions and rampiers of the suburbs, which had beene neglected since the last warre: so as if the French had directly come to Milan, the Imperials would haue forsaken the City, and would haue gone either to Pavia or Coma, for it was so resolu'd in their Councell; but hauing stayed longer then they should 20 neere to the riuier Thefin, to vnite them-selues together, they came afterwards to Saint Christophers within a mile of Milan; and then comming betwixt the gate of Thefin, and the Roman, they planted their ordnance in the vanguard, making shew as if they would assalt the City: but after they had encamped there certaine daies, without assailing it at all, in regard of the great forces that were within it, they went to Monce, which they tooke with ease: from thence Captaine Bayard, and Frederic of Bosfolia, marched towards Lauda, on which, (being altogether abandoned,) they likewise seized. Then determining to releue the Castle of Cremona, they marched on the Cremonois, and being without any difficulty come neere to the Castle, they did refresh it with victuals, and other necessa- 30 ries, and resolu'd to assaile the City.

The French
posse the Thefin without any let.

The error of
the French.

The Frenchlying before Ma-lando con a sodomo caile their camp.

They take
Monce.

The Ambassadors of the Emperour and the Duke of Milan, which lay at Venice, being moued by these dangers, did sollicite the Senate to send their forces ouer the riuier Oglio, to the end that they might goe and encampe in some stronge, and safe place on the Cremonois, to diuert the French from the siege of Cremona, albeit their whole enterprizes, were onely for the taking of Milan, for which part of their forces were at Carauagia, and at Monce, to stop the Venetian army from passing on any farther.

The Imperials perceiuing the enemies intent did sollicite the Venetians to ioine with them, not considering the perills and difficulties that did present them- 40 selues: by meanes whereof the Senate knowing that the same businesse did depend on the sytuation of places, and on sundry accidents which happened, did reffer the whole matter to the iudgement and discretion of the Duke their Generall, who after hee had heedelessly viewed all the passages determined to encampe beyond the riuier Oglio, betwixt Romano, and Martinenga: whereat the Imperials beeing discontented, made a new entreaty that they might come and encampe more neere to Treffa.

In the meane time other succors came from elsewhere; into the Dutchy of Milan, as well of Lancequenets by the way of Trent, as from the Vicery of Naples; and besides, they dayly expected the Duke of Bourbon, who was comming into Italy as Lieutenant generall to the Emperour.

Now in the midst of all these armes, the motion of peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King was not altogether interrupted, for the Archbillopp of Barri, who for a time had beene his Holiness Nuncio in France, was for that purpose gone into Spaine to treat of the conditions of peace, the which 50 in respect

They take
Monce.

in respect of an vniuersall quiet like was like-wise very pleasing to the Venetians, not without suspition neuer-the-lesse. that it would come to passe as it had at o-ther times happened, that those Princes shold afterwards agree to gether to ouerrunne them: yet not-with-standing, they would not without some other greater occasion faile in ought where-vnto they were tyed by their last confederacy: and therefore they sent to their Prouidator, (vpon the report that the Imperialls would march into the field) willing him to crosse the Adda, and to ioyne with the Viceroy of Naples, leauing strong garrisons in their frontier townes, and to take care to lodge euer in safe and strong places, and especially to auoide, as much as he could, from being enforced to enter into Milan.

The Duke of Vrbino neuer-the-lesse made some difficulty to execute that commandement, and to passe the Adda, thinking no safety to bee therein till the Lancequenets were first of all come into the field with the Marquis of Mantuas forces; as also for that hee had intelligence, that great numbers of Swisses were come to the French Campe, who were thought to bee ten thousand: in regard whereof, being entreated by the Imperialls, to ioyne with them at Beuregard, he refused to doe so, because that Quarter was but foure miles off from the French campe, whereby it was to be feared, that approaching so neere the enemies, they might be enforced against their wil and to their disadvantage to come to a battail: as also for that two thousand Swisses were lately come to Laude, and it was to bee doubted that they would come and assaile the Territory of Crema, or the Bergamask, whither it was like-wise reported that fixe thousand Grylons were coming, sent by the French King, who had at the same time dismissed the Venetian Ambassador resident in his Court.

But the Imperialls still soliciting the Duke of Vrbino to ioyne with them, the Senate, to take away all suspition of bad dealing, commanded their Generall to doe it, having in the meane time leuied three thousand Italian foot, and foure hundred light horse which were stradiots, for the gard and defence of their townes; the command of whome was giuen to John Mora, who was elected gouernor of Crema, with title of Prouidator General of the Bressan Territory. At the same time Petro Pefare was sent Prouidator to the army insted of Heme who fell sicke, and was retyred to Venice.

The Venetian Army being come to Tressa, and the Marquis of Mantua being gone to Pavia, the French army was in great want of victuals, all passages being stopped whereby they were wont to be brought to them, wherein the Venetian army purchased great praife, especially the Venetian Stradiots, so as the Admirall fearing him-selfe to fall into the same want of victuals wherevnto hee thought to haue reduced the City of Milan, resolved to dis campe, and to retire some twelue miles from the City.

At this stay stood their affaires, when Pope Adrian dyed on the foureteenth day of September, to the great losse and discommodity of the confederates, to whome by his death the Pontificall authority was not onely wanting, but likewise the pecuniary contribution, wherevnto hee was tyed by the Capitulations of the confederacy. So soone in a manner as the Admirall was departed from before Milan, the Cardinalls, who had already bene fifty daies in the conclaue, created a new Pope, which was, Iulius of Medicis, who tooke vpon him the name of Clement the seauenth.

This election certainly was very pleasing to all men, for the great opinion that the whole world had conceiued of him, because hee was a man of great authority and worth, and reputed to bee graue and constant in his determinations. The Senate being desirous to let him know how highly they loued and honored him, appointed eight Ambassadors to goe and congratulate him for his new promotion: and to present him with their vssall obedience: the Ambassadors were

The Venetians suspect the mission of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King.

The Duke of Vrbino dissuades by to execute the Senates command.

The Venetians make new levies of horse and foot.

Pope Adrian his death.

The creation of Pope Clement the seauenth.

The Venetians send Ambassadors to the new Pope.

were Mirco Dandolo, Ieronimo Pefare, Dominico Venier, Vincenzio Capel, Thomaso Contaren, Lorenzo Bragadino, Nitolo Tepula, and Lodouico Bono.

Within a while after Prince Grimani dyed, after hee had gouerned one yeare and tenne moneths, hee was with great pompe carried to Saint Antho-nies Church.

ANDRE GRITTI the 77. Duke.

NDRE GRITTI, Procurator of Saint Markes, a man very famous for his rare and singular vertues, was chosen in his place, who had already in time before managed abroad and at home, the most important affaires of the Common wealth.

After this manner was the yeare 1523. ended. At the beginning of the next following, the French mens difficulties, did inuite the Emperors Captaines to thinke on meanes how to finish the warres: for this purpose They sent for the Duke of Vrbino to Milan, with Petro Pefare the Prouidator of the Army, to consult how they should proceed in the warres, where all men were of opinion, that so soone as the fixe thousand Lancequenets, which the Viceroy had sent to leuy, should be arriued at Milan, the Emperors army together with that of the Venetians should assail the enemies, and either by force or famine driue them forth of the Dutchy of Milan, who being already reduced to extreame want of victuals, and money, did daily disband at the head of their Armie, the which the Admirall perceiuing

An. 1523.

The Imperialls determine to assail the French.

perceiuing, did still by little and little retire forth of the State of Milan. This retreat of the French caused the Venetian army to aduance forward, the which being come to Binasca, did ioyne with the Viceroy and the Marquis of Mantua, who hauing left a sufficient garrison in Milan, were come into the field, and finding themselves to be strong, they came within five miles of the French Camp, thereby keeping them not only from scouring the Contrey, but from victuals which were wont to come vnto them. And the Imperials and the Venetians growing afterwards more bold, did crosse the Theſin neere to Paulia, to make themselves masters of the contrey, and to take from the enemies those commodities which they vſed to receiue from thence.

The French wondering at the enemies boldnesse were likewise enforced to passe the same riuer to oppose themselves against their defeignes, the Duke of Vrbino hauing passed Theſin beganne to scoure the Contrey, and hauing on euery side bearen the plaines, he went and encamped before Garlas, a towne strongly fenced with dikes and Rampiers, wherein were foure hundred Italian footmen, to which after he had made a breach, he gaue an assault the very same day, and took it by force, with great slaughter of those that were within it. The taking of this towne caused diuers others to yeeld vnto him.

The Admirals hope being grounded vpon two points, both of them failed him: The one was that Ramé de Cera coming downe with eight thousand Grifons into the Venetians territories, would constrainethem to call back their forces to defend their owne Contrey: and the other was, that the ayd of Suisses which the King sent to him would speedily arrive, and fill vp his army which was much diminished; but both those hopes proved vaine. For the Grifons would not depart from their houses, when they vnderstood that they should find resistance and no aide, and the Suisses being come to the bankes of the riuer Stesia, tarried there still, being not able to passe it by reason of the great encrease of the waters: wherevpon the Admirall being pressed by the Enemies and the number of his forces daily decreasing, being desirous to ioyne with them, commanded a bridge to be made ouer that riuer, and the day following the caused all his soldiers to passe ouer to the Suisses, the enemies being lodged within two miles of them.

Now the Imperials perceiuing in what disorder the French were retired; who left diuers peices of Ordnance, with other munition behind them. intreated the Duke of Vrbino to pursue them in their company, wherevnto the Duke of Vrbino seemed to consent: But the Prouidator refusing so to doe, the Venetians would not passe ouer the riuer, thinking that they had already passed farther then they were tyed to by the bonds of the Confederacy, by which they were bound to nothing else but for the defence of the Duchy of Milan, and they had entred into the lands of the Duke of Sauoy: for which refusal the Duke of Vrbino was greatly commended, and the Senate being desirous to acknowledge it, albeit he had not serued them long, did neuertheless honour him with the Title of Generall of all their forces, as well horſe as foot, with a present recompence.

Now whilst the Venetians were busied in this war, sondry cares & dangers troubled them from elsewhere, for they had intelligence that Soliman practiced some high attempt, and was desirous to execute it, by reason that he made great preparations of Soldiers and armor, the which did much amaze them, and caused them to keepe strong garrisons in all their sea townes, and cheefly in the Ile of Ciprus, whereunto they knew the Turke aspired; and to furnish that expence, imposed a loane, as well on their particular citizens, as on all their cities and lubiects, which speedily furnished them with ready money.

In this meane time the French King, notwithstanding the bad successe of his army, had neither lost his courage, nor his desire to returne into Italy, being the more prouoked thereunto by the disdain which he had conceived of the Emperor, who not being satisfied with taking vpon him the defence of the itate of Milan did moreouer trouble him in his owne Realme, by stirring vp the King of England against him: wherevpon, he made great warlike preparations to returne himselfe in person into Italy the which he hoped to doe with more ease and speed, because his Army was safely returned into France.

Emperor

Theſe newes did greatly trouble the Senators, not only in regard of the huge expence they were to be at, by reason of their alliance with the Emperor for the defence of the state of Milan, but likewise for the feare they were in of their owne state, the French King being mightely incensed against them, not so much for that which they had done in their last encounters, as for that they being since then solicited to returne to his alliance and to quit the Emperors, they had wholly refused it.

The Venetians being then aduertised that the French army passed the mounts, did cause all their forces, which lay in sondry places in Garrison, to meet on the Verona territory, whether they sent word to the Duke of Vrbino to come, and willed Pesſare their Prouidator to goe thither with all speed, to waite what should be commanded him: The Pope in the meane time being shaken with feare, & sondry suspitions, told the Venetians, that it was well done to be vnited, with himselfe and the Emperor and to proceed manfully in all matters, for the liberty of Italy, and for the defence of the itate of Milan that they possibly could: but if they should not find themselves strong enough to resist the mighty army of the French, it were better to leaue in time to reconcile themselves to the most Christian King, then to delay it till he should fiercely march against them, thereby to auoyd those insolencies, which doe usually follow victories: He willed them to consider that the power of the French was very great and of force to ouerturne the whole state of Italy: and that they should doe well so send ample power and authority to Marcio Boscare their Ambassador at Rome, to treat of that which the French had already offered them.

Though the Pope propounded all this by way of Councell, yet neuertheless it was perceived thereby, that his meaning tended to a new confederacy with the French: the better to assure the state of the Church, and that of Florence. For which the Senate did not yet perceiue any reason, so soone, and without cause to quit the Emperors alliance, so to returne to that of the French King, seeing it would haue argued ouermuch lightnesse and inconstancy, and small discretion to make the Emperor their enemy, before they were certaine of the French Kings will: and therefore they had determined that their army should enter into the state of Milan, to be employed in the Emperors seruice, but the Duke of Vrbino before he would execute this determination sent them word how dangerous a matter it were for the Common wealth, to send their army abroad at that time, because that if they with their forces should assure the state of Milan, it was to be feared that the enemy would turne his defeignes somewhere else, and perhaps against their itate, and therefore he said that it were best to tarry till the French army had passed the riuer Sila; before that they did put their resolution in practise. But the French making great hast, were sooner in the Duchy of Milan then they were looked for, and from thence marching directly to the City, they came to the suburbs of the state of Theſin, before it could be sufficiently rampiered and provided with victuals: wherevpon all the Capitaines were of opinion to forsake it: therefore the Duke of Bourbon, the Viceroy and Sforza retired to Soncina with all the troopes that were within it; and the Marquis of Pescara to Landi; but they gaue speedily order, that Pavia might be well fortified and stored with soldiers and all other necessary provisions, into the which Adrien de Les entred with three hundred men of armes, and foure thousand foot, partly Spaniards and Italians being all of them his soldiers. In this fort did the French recover the City of Milan, into the which the King would not haue the army enter least they should

Nunn

The Imperials pursued the French.

The Imperials take Garlas.

V'Why the Grifons would not leave their houses.

The Venetians stand in feare of Soliman.

Cause of the French King discontent with the Emperour.

V'Why the French King was dissatisfied with the Venetians.

The Pope red most friends to the Venetians.

V'Why the Senate did not.

To maintain the French King.

The French come to Milan.

The Imperials retire to Soncina and Landi.

The Duke of Albanie en-dued Naples.

should lack it. At the same time John Stuart Duke of Albanie, appointed by the King to goe and enuade the Realme of Naples, with two hundred Lances, seven hundred light horse, and foure thousand Swisses, craved passage of the Pope thorow the Churches territories, and thorow Tuscany, to march to that enterprise, which was refused on to draw the Imperiall forces thither, to the end that the defence of the state of Milan might bee weakened, where dayly sundry townes yielded without any great difficulty.

Paula besieged
by the French
King.

All the cheefe exploits of warre were neere vnto Paulia, whither the King with his whole army was come to besiege it, resolving not to stirre from thence till hee had taken it, thinking that it would greatly diminish his reputation, if hauing so goodly an armie, hee should leaue such a City behinde him, so well stored with Soldiers and victuals, as that was. The King had (according to the common report) not reckoning those who layed at Milan, two thousand Lances, eight thousand Lanquenets, sixe thousand Swisses, sixe thousand Pioniers, and foure thousand Italians: the number of whom did afterwards very much encrease, with great prouision of Artillery, and the flower of all the French Nobility.

The Venetians
fear.

The Imperials on the other side placed their cheife hope in the conservation of that City, and therefore all men were desirous to see, what the euent of that siege would bee, especially the Pope and the Venetians, fearing on the one side, the French Kings armes who was displeased with them, if hee should prouee the victor, and on the other, those of the Imperials, if chasing thence the French, they should become maisters of Italy.

The Pope is a mediator betweene the Emperours and
the French
King.

Amidst these sundry thoughts, they shewed themselves in a manner newters, neither lending their forces to the ayde of the Imperials, nor agreeing in any fort with the French, expecting with good deuotion the successe of Paulia, which being reduced to a siege, did seeme to bee very long. The Pope neuertheless thinking it to be a part of his duty to procure peace betwixt these Princes, sent his Datarie to the Kings Campe to treat of an agreement, whereunto the King seemed to condescend; the Viceroy was soone aduertised thereof by his Holynesse, so the end hee might restifie that his desire was conformable to the duty wherunto hee was obliged by the place and degree that hee held, to vnit the Emperor and the most Christian king in a firme peace and friendship; that all of them together might afterwards arme against the power of Soliman, who was already in the field with a mighty Armie.

Conditions of peace propounded
by the Pope.

The conditions of the treaty of peace propounded by the Pope, were, That the Emperor should enioy the kingdom of Naples, and the French king the Duchy of Milan, with particular promise not to passe on any farther into Italy, without the Popes knowledge and consent. This treaty hauing continued for certaine daies, no effect thereof succeeded, but onely searouces betwixt the French and Spaniards: whereupon the Venetians were againe solicited by both parties to fauour their sides. The Count of Carpi came to Venice from the French to sollicite the Senate to renewe their alliance with the most Christian king, or at least, that they would not bee against him: The Viceroy on the other side, sent Charles of Arragon thither, to require them to send those forces which they were bound to by the capitulations of the league: They answered the French Ambassador in generall termes, how that they had referred all that businesse to the Pope: but to him the Viceroy sent, when they did not refuse his demand, yet neuertheless they answered coldely, as those who knew very well how to fit their counsailes to the euent of things, and this irresolution of theirs continued till such time as the Pope had very secretly concluded with the French king, both for himselfe and them, whereupon, when they came to resolution in the Senate, their opinions were different, either because in many of them the memory of their ancient alliance with the French King was renewed, or else for that they supposed hee would

The Venetians
fought in, by both sides.

The Venetians
fought in, by both sides.

would prouee victorious, in regarde of the great forces that hee had ready in Italy, against enemies that were wholly vnready and very ill prouided of all necessaries: which caused them rather to encline to the French, then to the Imperials.

What moved the Senate to ally themselves with the French.

An. 1525.

According then to this resolution, a peace, and league betwixt the Pope, the King, and the Venetians was determined and concluded at Rome with the Ambassadors, in the beginning of Ianuary, the yeare 1525, and confirmed afterwards by the Senate at Venice. This treaty being handled very secretly, the Senate being most importunately vrged by the Emperours Ambassadors, to ioyne their troopes with the Imperiall Armie, after sundry excuses, answered that they would not contradict the Popes command, and least of all at that time when they were vpon a treaty of peace which his Holynesse pursued by the Emperours consent, and that therefore they would not interrupt it, nor bee a meanes to prolong the warre.

The league being thus concluded, the French King sent the Bailiffe of Dijon to Venice, to congratulate them, and to assure them of his loue to the Commonwealth, from which hee promised neuer to diuide himselfe. Hee did afterwards require that the same accord, which was secretly concluded, might be published abroad, whereunto the Venetians did freely condescend: thinking it to be the best, thereby to cause the Imperials, who expected their ayde, to hope no longer for it, and that they being destitute of their helpe, despairing of being able to keepe the State of Milan, might retire some-where else, or incline to peace.

The Senate
answer to the Imperials.

The Popes was of a contrary opinion, saying, That the treaty ought not to be published, the better to reduce the Imperials to greater necessity and danger, which would happen so soone as the French should passe the Po, which they said they would doe, promising to repasse it at the Popes pleasure: but time and necessity pressing him to discouer himselfe, in regard hee was to grant passage to the Duke of Albany thorow the Churches territories, for his iourney into the Realme of Naples: the Pope made shew, as if the Duke of Albany would passe by force and violence with his troopes thorow the lands of the Church and the Florentines, and that for himselfe hee would remaine neutrall in that warre, and seeke to procure an vniuersall peace and concord, protesting against those two Princes, and admonishing them both to throw downe Armes, to come to an agreement, and to lay in deposits in the hand of a third person not suspected, whatsoeuer they yet hold out in the Duchy of Milan, for the Emperor, and Duke: Hee gaue notice thereof to the Viceroy by Paul Pettori, Captaine of his Gallies, as also how he could not stop the Duke of Albanies passage, but that it behoued him to bee assured of him by new conuentions, hee likewise sent him diuerse other articles, which hee hoped to insert in the peace.

Sundry opinions on the French side of the league.

The Pope
protesteth against
the Emperor
and the King,
if they agree out.

These propositions caused the Imperials to suspect that the Pope had agreed with the French King, (as in effect hee had done) for perceiving themselves enforced at one time, with great want of money to maintaine the warre in Lombardie, and to haue an eye to the kingdom of Naples, they could neuer be ayded either by the Pope or the Florentines, and were besides very well assured that the Venetians would forsake them, who entreaining the Imperiall Captaines with hope that they would obserue the league, did deferre the execution thereof with sundry excuses, so as the Viceroy was euen at the point to returne with his Army into the Realme of Naples for the safety thereof.

The Imperialls
suspect the
Pope.

But in the Councell held for that purpose, the opinion of the Marquis of Pescara did wholly preuaile, who shewing himselfe no lesse courageous then discreet, said, That it was most necessary to continue the warre of Lombardie, and that on the victory thereof, all other matters did depend.

The Marquis of Pescara causeth the Imperialls to tarry in Lombardie.

The Emperor at the same time according to his alliance made with the King of England, did so handle the matter, that the said king should the yeare following come to Calais with a mighty army to make war on France, who to that end sent a Knight to the Emperors Campe, which caused the Imperials to hold out more boldly, as being assured that the Christian King assailed in his own Realme; would be enforced to raise his camp, & to halt thither for the defence thereof, the agreement made betwixt the Pope, himself, & the Venetians, being not as yet divulged.

Nunc a ...

The newes then of the King of Englands great warlike preparations for his coming downe into France, being blazed abroad, caused the Venetians not to hasten the publication of the agreement, fearing least the King, vpon that report, might bee enforced to lead his forces elie where. But the successe of the enterprize of Lombardy, and of all other deceptions, depended at the last on the siege of Paulia, which held out longer then all men expected: the which the Pope and the Venetians did very much distaste, not altogether so much for the length thereof, as fearing least the French Capitaines, impatient of so long stay, should perswade the King to goe and charge the enemies, and by that meanes commit to the hazard of fortune, not onely his Armie, but likewise their States; and the liberty of Italy, which (having none other meanes to withstand the Imperials, if they should become victorious) would prouee their prey.

In the meane time the siege of Paulia still continued, notwithstanding that for want of munition, the battery did in some sort cease, which was forthwith remedied by the Duke of Ferrara, who caused great store to bee brought to the Campe thorow the Parmesane and Placentine territories, by the carriages and beasts of husbandmen. But the Imperiall forces being augmented by the succours which were newly arrived; and the Viceroy hauing notice of the decay of the Kings Armie, by reason of the long winter that they had continued in field, as also that the King had diminished his Army (namely those whom the Duke of Albany led, and five thousand men that the Marquis of Saluces had with him at Sauiora, and the places neere adjoining, besides great numbers of others, who remained as well at Milan as in other places, for the safety of Victuals) determined, till the Duke of Bourbon with the Lansquenets should arrive, to march into the field for the reliefe of Paulia. But the Duke of Bourbon arrived in the meane time, with five hundred Bourbonnion men at armes, and six thousand Lansquenets whom the Archduke paid: wherevpon pursuing their journey, not determining to giue the King battaile unless it were vpon great aduantage, but onely to trye if they could put fresh succours and victuals into the City, they came and lodged without the Parke, on the side of the Chartreuse, within Cannon shot of the Kings Campe, who being perswaded by all his followers to dis campe, and to retire either to Pinalfa or to Milan, and thither by without bloud or danger: hee might forthwith obaine the victory, because that the enemies Army being without money, could not long hold out, but would bee enforced to dissolue it self, or to be scattered vpon and downe there and there about the country: Hee would not for all that giue ouer the siege of Paulia, thinking that it would highly shame and disgrace himself that Army wherein hee was in person, should seeme to be afrayde, and giue place at the enemies coming.

The Imperials then hauing made two squadrons of horse, and foure of foot, they came thorow the Parke wall, of which they had beaten downe three score fathom some of it directly to Mirabel, & the residue to the kings camp, where after a sore fight on either side, the king being with great numbers of men at armes in the midst of the battaile, fighting valiantly, his horse was slaine vnder him, and falling on the ground, being hurt in the face and in the hand, was taken by five soldiers that knew him not: but the Viceroy arriving, hee made himselfe knowne to him, who with great reverence kissed his hands, and receiued him prisoner for the Emperor. All the French Army was forthwith put to rout, & the greater part of the soldiers were disarmed, the sereward of horse accepted, conducted by the duke of Alanson. This so great & famous victory obtained by the Imperials ouer the

French,

French; did greatly afflicke the Venetians with care, fore-seeing the great burthen they were to vndergoe, the counterpoize of the French forces failing them; and all the other Princes of Italy being too weak to make resistance: and were greatly affrighted with that successe, they alone being to defend the liberty of Italy, against such a mighty enemy, growne great in strength and reputation: being yet doubtfull whether hee would conteinie himselfe within the limits of the Duchy of Milan, or else being puffed vp with that fortunate successe, passe on farther and follow the course of his victory.

Their whole forces were but a thousand men at armes, sixe hundred light horse, and tennethousand foot, and resolving to letty more, they exhorted all the other potentats of Italy to do the like according to their strength and means: but they chiefly laboured to vnite themselves with the Pope, supposing that all other Italian Princes would depend on his authority: vnto whom after they had declared all the eminent dangers that threatened them, and that he had attentively heard them, they would not for all that, induce him to make any braue resolution, nor hinder him from thinking on an accord, determining to accept such an one as it should please the conqueror to offer him, rather then with his owne forces, and those of his friends and confederates, oppose himselfe against the violence that might bee offered him: and hee had already begun to treat with the Viceroy, fearing least the Imperiall forces being destitute of all meanes, should come and fall vpon the Church territories, and on those of the Florentines.

The Viceroy gaue a willing eare to the agreement which the Pope craved, knowing of what importance it was for the confirmation of the victory, and for the drawing of himselfe and the Armie forth of many necessities where-with they were oppressed, supposing likewise that by his example all the other Princes of Italy dooing the like, it was no more to bee feared that the French would euer afterwards come and raise any tumults in Italy.

The Venetians hauing discovered this treaty, and knowing how many inconveniences the Popes safety would bring vpon them, they not being able to diuert him from his intent, proceeded slowly in their determinations, without breaking off altogether with the Imperials, nor likewise contracting any other alliance with them, but they fought to perswade the Pope, that for their last refuge (because they would not bee found vnurnished, if the accord which hee sought to make shew of, haue no good successe,) to leuy ten thousand Swisses, and at the same instant to dispatch a Nuncio to the King of England, to entreate him to succour Italy in such an vrgent necessity: that they likewise would send an Ambassador to the same King, to make the like request, whereby they hoped to obtaine some speedy ayde of him: such great enuies and distrusts had that victory procured vnto Charles.

But the Venetians perceiving that the Popes intent did wholly tend to an agreement with the Imperials, they likewise resolved to follow him therein, seeing they could not doe otherwise. Therefore the Viceroy hauing sent John Sarmiento to Venice, to aduertise them of the victory, they courtously entertained him, with great demonstration of loue towards the Emperor: and they sent word to Lorenzo Priuli and André Nougiero, (who being already gone in Ambassage towards Charles, did tarry at Genoa) that they should prosecute their journey into Spaine, to reioyce with him in the Senates behalfe for his gotten victory, and to excuse their delay for not sending their Forces to the Imperiall Campe.

Now the Emperor being aduertised of this fortunate successe, (albeit in his heart hee was pricked forward with a desire of glory and greatness, which made him very ioyfull, yet neuertheless shewing by his speech and outward gesture

N n n n 3

The Venetians distaste on the Kings taking.

The Pope resolves after the defeat of
the French;

The Venetians
seek to alter the Popes opinion.

The Venetians
send Ambassadors to the Emperore.

The Emperore speaks and gestures vpon the newes of the victory.

The Pope and
the Venetians fear least the King should come to bat-tall.

What caused the Imperials to come into the field.

The King
would by no means dis-camp from before Paulia.

The Imperials
assail the Kings Camp.

The King is taken by five soldiers, and the great number of soldiers that were with him.

gesture, a wonderfull modestie, hee assured all men that hee would vse it, as it becometh that speciall fauour which God had done him, and for the good and quiet of all Christendome: Whereupon hee forthwith sent the Duke of Sessa to the Pope to offer him peace, and to assure him that hee was wholly disposed to the peace and quiet of all Italy. Hee caused the same speech to be deliuered to the Venetian Senate by Alonso Sanchez, his Ambassador, and by the Prothonotarie Carracciolo, who remained at that time in Venice.

But by how much the Imperials seemed to desire peace and alliance with the Potentates of Italy, at such time when as they should rather haue beene fought to, then haue solicited others, by so much more they gaue suspicion, that they practised high and secret enterprises, hurtfull to the liberty of Italy, which caused the Venetians to temporize, without concluding or rejecting those treaties which the Emperor motioned.

The end of the fifth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

The Contents of the sixth Booke of the fifth Decade.

HE sorrow which did afflict all France for the Kings imprisonment, and the Councils resolution. The Venetians answer to the French Commissioner. Accord betwixt the Pope and the Emperor. The Marquis of Pescara demandeth the Castles of Milan, and Cremona of Sforza. Accord betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. The curtezie which the King of England used towards the French King. Agreement betwixt the Emperor and French King. The King complaineth of the Emperor. A league concluded at Cognac, betwixt the Pope, the French King, the Venetians, and Francis Sforza. The King of England is entreated to enter into the league, with his answer. Landi is taken by the Confederates. The Duke of Bourbon commeth to Milan. The Armie of the league retireth from before Milan. The offer of the Pope and the Venetians to the King, concerning the enterprise of the kingdom of Naples. Genoa is besieged by the Confederates. Francis Sforza deliuereth the Castle of Milan to the Emperor. The City of Cremona is deliuered to the Confederates. Rome is surprisid by the Colonnesi, and the Pope maketh an agreement with them. The King of England giueth a great summe of money to the Pope. The Emperors preparations both by land and sea. The Confederates prouisions to resist the Emperor. The great lay of Laniquenets made by George Frondspang in the Emperors behalfe. The Marquis of Salaffes crosse the Po with his forces. Folgate exhorteth the Florentines to continue firme in their league. The Spanish Nauall Army fleeth from the Confederates. The Pope seeketh an accord with the Viceroy. Frosolona is in paine besieged by the Viceroy. The Confederates Army in the kingdom of Naples. Aquileia in Abruzzo taken. The Confederates take the

Burrow

Burrow of Sea. The Confederates summon the City of Naples to yeeld. Great disorder in the Armie of the league for want of pay. The Duke of Bourbon commeth into the field to beseege Rome. Accord betwixt the Pope and the Viceroy. Cortignola is taken by Bourbon. Great troubles in Florence. Bourbon being come neere to Rome craves passage of the Pope to goe into Naples. The Duke of Bourbon assaileth Rome. His death. Rome is taken by the Imperials. And lastly, the great cruelties which they there committed.

10

20

The Sixth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

The sorrow of all France for the Kings captivity and the Councils resolution.

He newes of the batailles losse, with the Kings taking, being brought into France, the sorrow and griefe which afflicted the Lady Regent his mother, and all the subjects cannot be imagined: yet neuertheless like a discrete and vertuous Lady, shee determined by all meanes possible to redresse it, and for that purpose hauing sent for all the Princes and Lords which were in France, to come speedily to Lyons, where shee then lay, to determine and provide for matters concerning the Kings liberty, and the Realmes safety; It was there resolved to send to forraigne Princes to vse meanes for the Kings deliuey, and among others to the Venetians, and Gaspard Sormay being to that end sent to Venice from the Lady Regent, hee declared vnto them in her name, that albeit the Realme of France did not feare the enuasions of any, but was strong and mighty enough to defend it selfe, and willing to employ all her power for her Kings deliuey; yet neuertheless shee entreated the Signory to assist her in so iust a cause, and so profitable for them and all Italy, by ioyning themselves with the Lords of France, to forme the Emperor Charles to set the King her sonne at liberty, vpon honorable conditions.

The Senate, vpon these entreaties, did manifest their great griefe for the Kings disastrous fortune, with that of the kingdome, declaring the great affection which it did beare to the crowne of France, and for that present made none other answer but this, That because the businesse was of great importance, it deferred to haue the Councell assembled to determine thereof. But during these practises, the Pope, who had sent the Archbishop of Capua into Spaine to make an agreement with the Emperor, did raise the accord, concluded and determined before with the Viceroy, by which the Venetians were excluded from it, if within twenty

twenty dayes after the signifying thereof, they did not raise it, by meanes whereof the Senate was enforced to renew their treaties with the Emperours Ambassadors, and to send, in regarde of the difficulties of importance which were offered) Pietro Pesare to Milan, to treat with the Viceroy.

The French in the meane time did not giue over their former purpurses, being not yet out of hope to ioyne the Venetians to themselves, (albeit the Popes authority might then haue drawne them to a contrary resolution); wherevpon the Bishop of Bayeux, and Ambrose of Florence came to Venice, to make in the name of the said Lady Regent, and in that of the whole Kingdome, more certaine and relolute propositions then at the former time, concerning the league and the Kings freedome. For this cause, as also for that apparent signes were dayly discovered of the Emperours great ambition, by reason of the designs of his Officers and Agents, which tended onely to make him absolute Lord of the State of Milan, and of all Italy; these French Ambassadors were attentively heard in the Senate, and their cause consulted on.

The Marquis of Pescara at the same time entering Milan with three thousand foote, two hundred men at armes, and with great numbers of light horse, required the Duke to deliuer into his hands the Castle of Milan, with that of Cremona, speaking plainly, That hee was come to take possession of the Citie of Milan, being sent thither by the Emperour for the same purpose, (in whose name all Proclamations and other Mandates were already published) and although the Pope sought to procure the Emperour to accomplish the Articles of the confederacie, by consigning the State of Milan into the hands of Duke Francis Sforza, all his purpurses were in vaine, for, delaying the matter from day to day, hee made now one excuse, and then another, imputing to the Duke diuerse faults committed by him, and among others, That hee had treated with the Venetians, to deliuer the Castle of Milan vnto them; a matter which was neuer thought of by cyther of them.

These things with diuerse others, did greatly with-draw the Venetians affection from the Emperour, and caused them to giue no more credit to all his promises; nor the Pope likewise, who speedily to preuent those perills, which threatned them dayly, resolved to ioyne in league, in regarde there was some difficulty, and more trouble and tediousnesse to call the French into it.

The Pope then renouncing the accord formerly made with the Emperour, contracted a new one, aswell in his owne name as in the Florentines, for the which hee strengthened himselfe with the Duke and Senate of Venice, in which agreement it was mentioned, that they should ioyne together, to present those dangers, which the experience of things past had taught them might happen, and to assure the peace and quiet of Italy, and their owne states in particular, each of them taking vpon them the protection of one, and others states and persons, running altogether one selfe-same fortune, not being lawfull for cyther of them to treat with any other Prince, to the prejudice of that accord; and to succour one another with foure thousand footemen, foure hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and with greater numbers if need were. And it was moreover added therevnto, that the Venetians should be bound to defend and maintaine the greatness and power of the house of Medici, to stoppe and preuent all tumult and commotions which any religious murins should practise against, and to assist and assist him, who sooner beere, that the Pope should place a Duke Governour in the City of Florence. These things being thus

French Agents sent to Venice to treat of an agreement.

The Marquis of Pescara: a his audacious demand to Duke Francis Sforza.

Accord betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.

The articles of the agreement.

The Senate answer to the French Commissioners.

Accord betwixt the Pope and Emperour.

concluded and sworn to, the Pope the better to begin for his part to prepare that which was concluded on, commanded the Marquis of Mantua to visit the Farmesan with his men at armes, taking order besides to hasten the Grisons and Suisse footmen, where they had begun to leuy, but very slowly. The Venetians on the other side determined to encrease their Armie to the number of ten thousand foote, to make a leuy in Greece of other three hundred light horse, and generally to provide for all matters belonging to their safety. And that which did greatly incite them thereto, was, the curtezie which the King of England vied towards the French, who being ielous of the Emperours power and greatnesse, fearing that if hee should grow too mighty, hee might afterwards chance to tread him vnder foote, conuerted his ill will towards the King into friendship; so as he treated with the Lady Regent, and the Councell of France, promising them all ayde and succour possible, as well of men as money to set the King at liberty, and to free Italy from all oppression.

This treaty being passed betwixt the Pope and the Venetians, gaue hope that they should bee vnited with the Realme of France, but they proceeded therein after an vnusuall manner, because that the Pope, supposing that by the confederacie which hee had already made, hee had time enough to prevent dangers, and to bee able in the meane time to obtaine more reasonable conditions of the Emperour, hee proceeded very slowly in his agreement with the French, and chiefly since the Duke of Scllas comming to Rome, who was sent from the Emperour to his Holynessee, to signifie vnto him the great desire hee had to peace, and to restore Francis Sforza vnto the Duchy of Milan, being found innocent of those crimes imputed vpon him, or if hee were guilty, to inuelt his brother Maximilian in it. But the Venetians not relying on his promises, made earnest sure to agree with the French, meaning not to trust to his offers, which onely tended to breake the league, and to delay the prouisions of warre, they likewise fearing least the French should enter into league with the Emperour, as they were desirous to doe for the recovery of their King, and all their praiches should by that meanes prouue vaine.

That hapned which they had foreseene, in the beginning of the yeare 1526. when the newes yet vn hoped for arrived at Venice; of the attonement betwixt the Emperour and the most Christian King, by which the King was not onely set at liberty, but likewise a firme peace established betwixt them, by meanes of the Kings marriage with the Lady Eleonor the Emperours sister, & that of the Emperour with the sister to the King of Portugall: and that the Duke of Bourbon should haue the Duchy of Milan, and should marry the Lady René, sister in law to the King.

This was that which they had euer most feared, but this doubt was for that time cleared, the Lady Regent having sent ample power and commission to Albert de Carpi her Ambassador at Rome, to conclude the league, the which did trouble the Pope and the Venetians: But it lasted not long, by reason of a common rumor that was spread abroad, that King Francis would neuer performe to the Emperour, that which hee had bene enforced to consent to, and that which made it credible, was, for that it was reported, that after his depature from Spaine, hee was much discontented with his entertainment in the time of his imprisonment, and especially because that to free himselfe from thence, hee had signed a very disadvantageous contract by the which hee quitted the Duchie of Bourgondy to the Emperour.

Now that they might truly know what his intent was, the Senate determined, (albeit they had decreed to send two of the chiefe of the City in Ambassage to him, to console with him for his fortunes past, and also to reioice for his delivery and message) not to spend so much time as an Ambassage would require; but they suddenly sent into France André Reffis Secretary to the Preguys, where with more speed

speed and lesse sulpition, might negotiate a businesse of so great importance: and the Pope following their example, sent Paulo Vettori thither for the same purpose.

These men needed not greatly to labour to bee assured of his meaning. For after hee had louingly entertained them, in the first discourse that hee held with either of them apart, hee did greatly complaine of the Emperours inhumanity towards him whilst hee was prisoner, not vsing him as becomed so great a Prince as hee was: assuring them that hee was no lesse free then ready to moderate the Emperours insolvency, wherevpon, the Kings conclusion was, that if the Pope and Venetians would send Commissioners, the league should bee presently made, the which they said was best to bee done in France, to the end the King of England might the more easily bee drawne into it, whom they hoped would prouee a party:

Hee sayd likewise that hee would ratifie whatsoeuer had bene begunne, and for the most part concluded on by the Lady Regent his Mother, and the Councell of the Kingdome; they were then onely to bring ample authority from their Princes to contract, because that then hee would shew them how conformable his affection and good will was: towards the common safety:

That hee did hope to finde in the King of England, the same intent and like desire to abate the Emperours greatnesse, and to prouide for the defence of Italy:

That hee would out of hand send his Ambassadors to him, and that if the Italian Princes would doe the like, it would greatly helpe and further the cause;

That with the forces of so many Potentates ioyned together, they might more easily resist the designs of the Imperialls.

So soone as the Venetians vnderstood this answer, so conformable to their desire, they sent instructions and ample Commission to Rossi to conclude the league: the Articles whereof, being before determined, were easily passed, some few things being altered.

Casparo Spinelli the Secretary was likewise commanded, (who at the same time, was Agent for the Signory, with the King of England) to vse meanes to induce that King to enter into that league, by declaring vnto him the great opinion which all men had conceiued of him, and the great account which was made of his authority, and that they onely craued him to bee Protector of that accord, and defender of the liberty of Italy.

But the Pope proceeded very slowly therein, so as they were enforced oftentimes to vrge him to it, wherevpon the Ambassador of the Common-wealth resident at Rome, shewed him dayly the goodly occasion which presented it selfe, for the procuring of their common safety, in that the French King was desirous to reuenge the wrongs which hee said hee had receiued of the Emperour: and that if the same desire should grow colde, and they two chance to agree together, by the Kings obseruing the treatie of Madrid, there was no more hope of defending Italy from the cruell and slauiish yoke of the Spaniards.

The Pope being moued by these remonstrances, resolved to send Caspar into France, in whom hee reposed great trust, with instructions and speciall power to conclude that league, albeit that at the same time Don Hugo de Alouada, comming to Rome from the Emperour, did treat to the contrary: and had in the same manner almost negotiated by letters with the Senate of Venice, to whom so soone as hee was come to Milan, hee gaue notice of his arrivall into Italy, and of the cause why the Emperour had sent him.

The King complained of the Emperour.

The King intended to take Armes against the Emperour.

The Venetians made meanes to draw the King of England into the league.

The Venetians Ambassadors remonstrance to the Pope.

But

The Pope and Venetians answer a Don Aluarez, general King for the Emperor.

But the Pope and Venetians answered all his requests in one forme, That whensoever the Emperour should seeme desirous of peace, hee should finde them disposed thereunto, but that hee was to shew it in deeds, to which they would giue more credit then to words: that hee should doe well to raise his siege from before the Castle of Milan, to restore Francis Sforza to his state, and to accomplish whatsoever hee was tyed vnto by the Articles of the Confederacie, and that if it would bee a fitt time to talke of laying downe armes, and of setting peace and quiet in Italy: but his answer heere vnto was in generall termes: whereby they plainly perceiued, that this speech of peace tended to none other end but to delay with vaine hope the prouisions for warre, and by thole cunninges to estrange the French from the Princes of Italy.

The children of France are taken for the King of Navarre.

They had almost obtained their desire, the French beinge not so greatly affectionate to the league as they were at the beginning, either because the King was not well assured of the Pope and Venetians mindes, by reason of their practices with Don Hugo de Alencastro (albeit they were communicated to him for, as some thought) that hee would but make vfe of the name of the league, onely to make the agreement more easie, and to redeeme his children whom hee had giuen in hostage to the Emperour; and that instead of Bourgondy, hee should take some other recompence: namely, for that the Bishop of Bayeux his Ambassador at Venice, sent thither for that purpose was a whole moneth without receiving any letters from the King, either for the conclusion of the league, or for the execution of that which had beene agreed vpon; wherevpon the Pope and the Venetians resolved to send againe into France, and with new offers to end the businesse of the league: to the which at last, the King, after that hee had intelligence that the Emperour would alter none of the Articles of the Capitulations made at Madrid, began more to incline, and vpon the tenth day of May 1526. it was concluded at Coignac, betwixt those of the Councell, and the Kings Procurators on the one side, and the Agents of the Pope and the Venetians on the other. The chiefe points of which, were, That betwixt the Pope, the French King, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan, (for whom the Pope and the Venetians promised the ratification,) there should bee a perpetuall league and confederacy, to the end that Francis Sforza might freely enjoy the Duchy of Milan; and the children of France be let at liberty, by receiving an honorable ransom; wherein the King of England should appoint, with other particular obligations concerning the preparations of the warre concluded with the Councell of the Realme before the Kings delivery.

The Cardinal water sent downe letters to the King of England.

The King of England's answer.

In this manner then was the league concluded, but it was not presently published, because they tarried for the King of England's resolution, whom they desired should be named one of the chiefe Contractors: Therefore the Confederate Princes resolved to send an expresse messenger into England, to sollicite him forth with to declare himselfe against the Emperour in the behalf of the league: John Baptista Sangus, a man of singular wilddome, went thither from the Pope, John de la Roche from the French King, and Mart Antonio Venier for the Venetians. But the King of England albeit hee seemed to bee desirous to listen to that agreement, as beinge distast of the Emperour: resolved nevertheless not to make any publick demonstration thereof, vntill hee had first of all requested the Emperour Charles to graunt the Confederates so much, as to set the children of the most Christian King at liberty, and render the State of Milan to Francis Sforza, and for want of so doing, to protest against him, and to denounce warre in the name of all the confederates.

Now because it would haue beene too long to haue proceeded after this manner, by reason of the difficulties which might haue beene made, such as it was, it was published with great solemnity, they thinking themselves strong enough to shake the Imperiall pride.

There

There was at the same time in the Venetians army, tenne thousand foot, nine hundred men at armes, and eight hundred light horse, and they daily expected great numbers of Swisses, paid partly by the Pope and the Venetians, and partly by the French King; at whose arriuall they resolved to march to the reliefe of the Castle of Milan and to trie if they could take the City. The Marquis of Salusses on the other side with the French men at armes, and tenne thousand foot, waged at the common charge of the league, was to enter the Duchy of Milan, and to assaile Nicoara and Alexandria, whilst in another place order should be taken for a nauall Army.

The number of the Army of the League.

10 The Venetians commanded their General, and Pietro Pesare their Prouidator to goe and encampe speedily at Chiari, vpon the Bresian territory, which was the rendezvous of all their troopes: and those of the Pope, commanded by Francisco Guicciardini came vpon the Parmelan, to the end they might ioyne together and then march whether it should be thought fittest for the seruice of the league. In the meane time Malet de Baillone with a band of the Venetian troopes marched to Landi, where he had intelligence with Lodouico Fiesolin a gentleman of the same City; and albeit there lay within it fiftene hundred footmen in Garrison, he did neuertheless with ease seaze on it and became master therof, and kept it in the name of Francis Sforza.

Landi is taken by the Venetians.

20 After the taking hereof the whole Venetian army passed the Po, and within two dayes after, ioynded itselfe with the Papes, and all of them together marched directly towards Milan, the Duke of Vrbin being in great hope to take the City, because it had beene told him that vpon their arriuall the People would rise, and take armes in their behalfe, and that the Imperiall Captaines fearing it, had already sent their riches and baggage forth of the City, meaning forth with to abandon it. And vpon this hope of the people rising, and of the enemies disorder, Lodouico, Earle of Belgie, requested the Duke of Vrbin to giue him two thousand footmen, with whom he offered to releaue the Castle of Milan.

The two Armies being ioynded together, march to Milan.

30 Now the Confederates Army being come very neere to the City was lodged at the Monastery of Paradis towards the Roman gate, intending to assaile that suburb, supposing to take it and to lodge there. And albeit the enemies made many sallies and hott skirmishes, they were still notwithstanding beate back by those of the league. But the night before the day that the Army should set forward, the Duke of Bourbon who not long before was come to Genoa with six Gallies and bills of Exchange for an hundred thousand Ducats, entred Milan with eight hundred Spanish foote that he had brought with him: He was very much sollicitated thereunto by the Marquis of Guasto, and Antonio de Leno. The Duke of Vrbin at these newes dispayring to take the City by assault, and fearing

The Duke of Bourbon comes to Milan.

40 some greater disorder, if he should tarry any longer there, raised his campe, and retired in good order vnto Marignan, without any losse or empeachment at all.

The Army of the League retreateth from before Milan.

The Senate, who had conceiued great hope by reason of the armies approach neere Milan, that the Castle would be releued, which was reduced to extreame want, did greatly wonder, and was sorry, when it vnderstood by the Prouidators letters that they had raised their campe, so that the Duke of Vrbin sent Lodouico Gonsaga to Venice to informe his actions, who being brought into the Senate yeelded a particular account of what had passed, and of the occasions which moued him to proceed in that manner, wherewith the Senate was well satisfied, but the Pope was not so easily appeased, complaining very much not only of this retreat but likewise of the whole course of the Duke of Vrbin's actions, who did not vouchsafe in any sort to communicate the affaires of greatest importance to his Lieutenants, the which had greatly moued him; so as

The Pope is discontented.

Oooo.

for

for to please him, the Senate commanded the Duke of Vrbin: ever after to communicate with Quiccardin all matters of importance, which should be handled in the army.

On the other side, they prepared the nauall army, to assaile the sea-townes belonging to the Emperor, and to those ends the Venetians hauing appointed Eduonico Armiero for their Prouidator, sent him to Corfou, where John Mora the other Prouidator, was with the army, of which, Armiero had commandment to take 12 Gallies, and with them to saile towards Rome, to ioyne with those of the Pope and the most Christian King, that all of them together might direct there: course according as they should iudge it to bee necessary and profitable for the confederates. Diners propositions were made concerning those places whither the nauall army was to goe. The Pope desired to haue it goe into Puglia: to breake the designs of the Colonesie, and to diuert their forces from those places, who hating at Saint Germans about seauen thousand foote, and great numbers of horse, had made them selves fearefull to the Pope: but the French King and the Venetians thought the enterprize of Genoa to be much more profitable for the Confederates, as well for the Commodiousnesse of the same city & for diuers other enterprizes, as for the great good happe of that exploit, which falling out fortunately would much encrease the reputation of the League: Pedro of Nauarre was declared General of the Confederates Nauall army, a man well experienced in Martiall affaires: who although hee was presented by the French King, was neuertheless entertained by all the associates together.

Pedro of Nauarre
General of the nauall army

The confederates suspect the
King.

The French
Kings excuses.

The Lord of Langi comes to Venice and Rome from
the King.

But the Churches Gallies, and those of the Venetians being ready, they were a long time tarrying for those of the French King and the General, a matter which did greatly weary the Pope and Senate, and gaue them iust cause of discontent, and to suspect that the French King had changed his mind: by thinking on his owne particular interest, and not caring for that of the league: adding to this suspicion other presumptions: That small store of money had beene sent to the Swisses, in comparisson of the fourty thousand Ducats, which hee was tyed to giue: for the payment of tenne thousand foot of that nation, and that hee had not begun to warre on the Emperor in the parts beyond the mounts according to the conclusion.

The King alledged for his excuses, that before hee was to renew that warre, it behoued him to denounce it to the Emperor, although there was no such mention made in the articles of the confederacy: And as concerning the delay of his army, and payment of the Swisses, hee layd all the fault vpon the Captaines and Officers, as the Lord of Langi gaue them to vnderstand at large. For, the most Christian King, fearing least the Confederates being distastied of him, should disioynly agree with the Emperor, he dispatched the said Lord of Langi into Italy, for to excuse the long stay of his army, with commission to goe first into Swisserland, to sollicite their leuy and departure, or at least wile to giue them to vnderstand that hee did procure and desire it.

The Lord of Langi being come to Venice, made the aboue mentioned excuses, assuring the Senators that the King was much disposed to warres, and that besides the Gallies hee prepared great shippes of warre in Brittain, to saile with a mighty army, to ouerthrow at sea all the enemies attempts and designs. From thence hee went to Rome where hee executed the same commission: and as for the Swisses, hee said that they had promised to hold a general assembly, where all things should be resolved on in the Kings behalfe; and aboue all things he assured the Pope and the Venetians that the King would not enter into any accord, vntill mention were made of a generall peace, and by the consent of all the other confederates. The king made like promise to John Baptista Saug & the Roman, whome whom the Pope had sent, (as hath been said) to the King of England: who by the way remained certaine dayes for the same purpose in the French court.

The Senate making shew that his arriual was most pleasing to them, and that they did wholly giue credit to his saying, answered, that it had neuer doubted of the Kings good will and affection towards the league, and peticularly towards their common wealth, and therefore it promised, that not only in that businesse, which concerned the common good, but likewise in all other, and at all times, their loue and forces should be inleperably ioyned to his: but as concerning peace, they had neuer refused it; that on the contrary, they had neuer taken armes but with an intent to procure a firme and assured peace: and therefore if they might haue it, to the honor of the league and safety of the confederates, it should alway be most acceptable to them: yet neuertheless knowing that they might at that time rather desire such a peace then hope for it, they would incite the King to a greater willingnesse to warre: wherevpon the Pope and the Venetians gaue him to vnderstand, that if they should conquer the Kingdome of Naples, it should be for one of his children the Common wealth retaining only such a portion as should be thought sufficient for the recompence of their costes, labour and trauell.

The Senate
swore to the Lord of Langi.

The offer of the Pope and Venetians to the
King.

Vpon this hope, the King promised three hundred lances more, with a surplage of twenty thousand Ducats euery moneth, for the seruice of the league, whensoever they should make any enterprize vpon the Kingdome of Naples. During these treaties Armiero the Prouidator being departed from Corfou with thirteene Gallies came to Terracina, where finding Andrew Doria with eleuen of the Popes Gallies they went altogether to Ciuitauechia, then from thence to Liurorne, where they met with Pedro of Nauarre with foure Gallions and sixteene light Gallies of the French King.

It being then there determined to beseege Genoa and to reduce it to the Kings deuotion, for the great profit and commodity of the confederates, the Army went first to Protouenere, which soone yielded, with Spetia, and all the other townes vpon the riuier euen to Monega. Then the army being deuided, Doria and the Venetian Prouidator went to Portofin, twenty miles from Genoa, and Nauarre with the French Army sailed towards Sauona, which forthwith yeeldeed to him: The first and cheefe defeigne of the Captaines of the league was, to stoppe victuals from entring by Sea into Genoa, whereof they knew it was badly provided, and that by keeping it short, they hoped quickly to reduce it vnder their obedience: and for that purpose they placed six Gallies in Gard, two of euery prince, which tooke certaine shippes with other smaller vessells loden with victuals that were going to the City: so that it soone felt great want and discommodity. But the beleeged were secretly releued by those of the riuier, who furnished them with part of the victuals, which vpon sondry pretences were suffered to bee carried to the neighbor townes, albeit it was not done without some complaint against Doria, who either for some secret enuy that he bare to Nauarre, for that vnder his authority and command his contrey should be vanquished and taken, or for any other defeigne of his owne, was suspected not to haue carried himselfe faithfully as he ought to haue done, nor after such a manner as was requisite for the speedy ending of that businesse.

The Confedrates nauall army not farre from Genoa.

Doria is suspected to re-lieue Genoa

The Genouois for the assurance of their City, had with great speed placed at the mouth of the haven certaine great ships loden with Artillery, besides which were six light Gallies, commanded by Gobba Iustinian, who comming forth at times to skirmish with the enemy, would not goe farther then within Cannon-shore of the shippes, placed at the mouth of the Haven, and of those of the Castle of the Lanthorne, whereby all the hope to take the City consisted in the seege, which still continued, the Captaines of the Pope and the Venetians

The fortification of Genoa.

Venetians, hauing intrenched themselves, to be freed from the enemies incursions and surprisles, if they should happen to come forth, as also by reason of a tempest at sea, which would not suffer them to draw the army forth of Portefin where it remained.

The Genowais are brauely repulsed in their sallies

But the Genowais perceiuing them selues dayly to be more shut in, determined to make a sallie, and to assaill and beate downe the enemies fortifications: the Captaines of the army hauing notice of the enemies desaigne, landed Philippin Doria and Iohn Baptista Grimani, with eight hundred foot-men, and two peeces of ordnance, and turned the poopees of the Gallies towards the land, so as the soldiours of the Citty comming to execute their attempts, were not onely courageously receiued, but brauely repulsed with great losse.

The Duke of Vrbin at the same time being solicited by the Venetians, and being prickt forward by a desire to recouer that reputation, which he had lost in their retreat: from before Milan, so soone as one part of the Swisses were come to the army, to the number of siue thousand determined to returne towards Milan, to the releefe of the Castle, in which Sforza still remained: and being come within a mile of the Citty with the army, hee sent two thousand foot-men to take Monce, and the mount of Briança, two places very commodious for victualls which might be brought forth of those quarters to the Campe. The residew of the army being lodged there, and the Captaines being assembled in counsell to aduise by what meanes to releue the Castle; which without was enuirowed with double trenches, and great bastions, covered with great numbers of the enemies ordnance, they were aduertized that Sforza, wholly dispayring of releefe, had yielded himselfe, and had quitted the Castle to the Imperials, on this composition: That without prejudice to his titles he should giue the Castle of Milan to the Duke of Bourbon, who receiued it in the Emperors name, suffering him to come forth in safety, with all those that were with him. That it should be lawfull for him to remaine at Coma, which should bee giuen to him for his abode, with the gouernment and reuenue of the same Citty, till such time as the Emperors determination might be knowne concerning his affaires. That a safe-conduct should bee giuen him to goe in person to the Emperor: with diuers other articles contained in the agreement, hee came forth of the Castle, and being accompanied by the Imperiall Captaines, hee went to the Barriers of the Army, where hauing continued one whole day, heeooke his iourney towards Coma; but the Imperials saying, that they had promised to lay there in Garrison to dislodge, hee would no more trust to them: And albeit hee had before determined not to doe any thing that might incense the Emperor, hee neuer-the-lesse went to the Campe of the League, being accompanied by the Count of Gajazzo with two hundred light-horse, where hauing remayned certaine daies, hee went to Lauda, the which Citty the confederates did wholly restore to him: And because of all the Captulations made with the Imperials, nothing else had bene performed to him but that hee and his people should come forth with their goods saued: Hee did by a publike instrument, whilst hee stayed in the Campe, ratifie the league made in his name by the Pope and the Venetians.

Francis Sforza
ratifieth the league.

The losse of the Castle of Milan, albeit that it was irke-some to them and of great importance for their enterprize, did not for all that drowne their hope of taking the Citty, the which they knew to bee badly provided of all things, and that there was not within it sufficient number of men for the defence thereof, in regard of the bignesse of it, and the great number of assaillants, diuers other Swisses beeing come to the Campe, besides foure thousand which were dayly expected, paid by the King, whereby they hoped that that it would shortly be reduced vnder the power of the Confederates either by force or by a seeg.

Whilst they expected these supplies the Duke of Vrbin had resolved to send part of his forces to Cremona, to attempt the taking of the Citty, which was an enterprize very pleasing to the confederats, and cheefely to the Pope. But they were to delay the execution of that desaigne, for fear left the Imperials making a sallie, as it was reported they would doe, should come and assaile the Campe. Neuer-the-lesse at the last Malatesta Barlothe went thither, but with lesse forces then was at the first determined, by reason of the afore said feare, who being come before Cremona, found the Citty to bee fortified with a double trench, and well furnished with defendants, hee neuer-the-lesse assailed it diuers times, but in vaine: whereof the Duke of Vrbin being aduertized, knowing that it was an hard matter to take it with so few forces, and on the other side how greatly it would diminish the reputation of the league, if they should giue ouer that enterprize, it was resolved to send thither the Prouidator Pesare, Camillo Vr sine, and Antonio Castello, with store of foot-men, and within a while after, new supplies of a thousand Italian foot-men were sent thither with a thousand Swisses. But for all that the businesse going neuer the more forward, the Duke of Vrbin resolved to goe thither in person, albeit it was greatly to the prejudice of the enterprize of Milan, who drawing forth of the army which lay before Milan, in a manner all the Venetian foot-men, hee left part of the men at armes there with all the Churches Companies, and the Swisses who were arriued to the number of thirteene thousand, and went before Cremona, making his account to haue it, not by the onely force of batteries and assaults, because that the enemies rampiers were too strong, but by seeking with great numbers of Pioners to approach neere to their trenches and bastions, and to become Maisters thereof, rather by the force of the pike-ax then by armes: but all this being not sufficient to take it, he proceeded to the battery and assaults, and at the last, those within it being reduced to such extreames as a trumpet beeing sent to summon the Citty to yeeld, there came forth two Captaines, the one a Lanquequer, and the other a Spaniard, with Guido Vaino who capitulated: That if they were not releued by the monthes end, they would come forth of Cremona the which they did, the time prefixed beeing expired: Whereof the Duke of Vrbin did forth-with aduertize the Senate, and the Citty was delivered to Francis Sforza.

Malatesta Barlothe found before Cremona for the league.

The Duke of Vrbin bringeth supplies to the siege of Cremona.

The Capitulation
of the Citty of Cremona.

The Colonne enter Rome abundantly.

These newes were very pleasing to the Senate, who vnderstanding that Sforza made account to reside there, sent thither the Secretary Lodouico Sabadino, to remaine there with him in the name of the Signory.

But in the meane time their hapned a great disorder at Rome to the confederates great prejudice, who after the conquest of Cremona hoped to preuaile in the enterprize of Genoa, and to be able (according to the proiects formerly made) to encampe in two seuerall places before Milan. For the Colonne hauing assembled fixe hundred horse, and siue thousand foot, marched with great speed towards the Citty of Rome, where no man thinking of their comming, they entred by night, and seized vpon three gates; then running vp and downe the Citty, they sackt diuers Prelats houses, the Pallace and Church of Saint Peter, without any respect to the Maiesly of Religion, esteeming sacred matters lesse then Turkes would haue done, so as the Pope could hardly retire, with some Cardinalls and others whome hee most trusted into the Castle Saint Angelo, the Colonne hauing determined to take him prisoner, who without any long stay did sodainly leaue the Citty; the Cardinall Colonna hauing first of all attempted in vaine to cause the people to rise in his behalfe: They carried away with them in gould, and siluer, and other commodities more then three hundred thousand crownes.

The tumult being appeased which lasted not much about three howers: D. Hugo after after that he had taken assurance of the Pope went to the Castle to talk with him, where vining termes befeeming a Conqueror, hee enforced him to grant a truce betwixt them, as well in his name as in that of the confederates and the Emperors for foure monethes, by meanes whereof the Pope promised speedily to caufe his Army to repaffe the Po, to call home his Gallies into the Churches territories, and to pardon the Colonels, and all others that had any hand in that assault and tumult. That the Imperials and Colonels with their Companies should depart from Rome, and forth of the Churches state; and should retire themselves into the Kingdome of Naples.

The Popes agreement with the Colonels.

This truce was for the time present willingly embraced by both sides: by the Pope because the Castle was not well victualled: by D. Hugo (the Colonels neuertheless making instance to the contrary) because it seemed vnto him that he had done much for the Emperor, and because that all those, in a manner, with whom he had entred Rome being laden with spoile were slipped away into diuers places. The truce did interrupt all the designs of Lombardy, and the whole fruite of the victory of Cremona. But the Pope thinking afterwards more considerately, and with a settled iudgement, vpon the agreement which he had made, and foreseeing into how many dangers he had throwne himselfe in time to come, the better to free himselfe from those perills wherevnto he was subiect if he should obserue the Articles of the truce, wrote to his Nuncios to enquire of the most Christian King and the Venetian Senate, whether he were bound to performe that which he had beene enforced to promise to D. Hugo, or wholly to reject it, and within a while after he sent the Lord of Liege into France for the same purpose; who at the same time was come to Rome.

The Popes doubt concerning the agreement.

The Pope knew very well that to obserue the truce, was nothing else but to giue the Emperor meanes and time to beginne afterwards a greater and fiercer warre, and to ouercome by that delay those difficulties wherewith he was pressed, assuring to himselfe in the end his states in Italy, to the great danger and hazard of the liberties of all the rest. But his immeasurable feare diuerted him from all good counsell, and hindred him from well discerning that truth: wherevpon the Generall of the Friars being come to Rome, by the Emperors commandement to treat of peace, he heard him attentively, and exhorted the Venetians to incline to an accord, saying, That since they were of necessity one day to lay downe armes and beeing then inuited to doe so, they ought not to contemne the occasion that was presented.

The Venetians answer to the Pope inuittng them to an agreement with the Emperor.

The Senate vpon this proposition assured him that it had neuer desired warre, but had on the contrary by warre procured an assured peace, so that it might be treated and concluded by the most Christian King, because that doing otherwise they should for euer alienate him from the affaires of Italy, and should lose a most assured refuge in their necessities and occurrences: therefore they vsed meanes to induce the Pope to temporize, and to expect an answer from France, that nothing did presse him to precipitate his affaires, and to grant the Emperors demand on such vniust conditions, as to giue him a great somme of money, and besides, to consign into his hands for the assurance of the treaty, Parma, Placentia, and Ciuita-uechia, places most important of the Churches State: That he was to consider that the Emperors forces were not so great as they were reported, and that the greatest ayde that he had forth of Germany came from George Frondberg, who at his owne charges had brought him an army, the which beeing not able to hold out long, would of necessity be shortly broken.

That the Garrison of Milan, beeing not paid, refused to obey hir commanders and would be gone. On the contrary how that they expected Rance de Cera from France with a great somme of money, and that there was great hope that the King himselfe, who was come as farre as Lyons, would in person come into Italy:

That

That the enterprize of Genoa was set forward with good successe: in a word, that all things promised an happy issue.

The Pope being vrged by these remonstrances, and most of all (perhaps) by the wrongs which he had newly received, resolved to hold in suspense the practizes of that new truce, and to treat onely of an vniuersall peace, by the aduise and consent of the most Christian King. The arrivall of the Lord Russell did much auail the resolution, who beeing sent by the King of England to offer thirty thousand crownes to the Pope for the expence of the war, came at the same time to Rome, who did greatly sollicit and exhort him to continue steadfast in the league, or else to labour to conclude an vniuersall peace betwixt the Princes of Christendome, the which being approued by the Venetian Senate, they wrote to Nonsignore their Ambassadour with the Emperour, that he should enterpose that treaty of peace, it being decreed that the agreement should be treated and concluded in France, and should afterwards, for the Emperors honour and dignity, be ratified and confirmed by him in Spaine.

The King of England offereth the Pope a great summe of money.

The chiefe pointes of the treaty were, That the children of the most Christian King should be set at liberty: that Lombardy should be left peaceable, and Francis Sforza restored to his State, and that the Emperour should pay the King of England that which he pretended to be due vnto him: but difficulties daily arising vpon these articles, each of them prepared on a sodaine for warre. The Pope sent his troups, which he had recalled from the campe of the league, before the townes which the Colonels had vsurped vpon the Churches State.

The chiefe articles of the treaty.

The Emperour on the other side hastened the prouisions of the sea-army, which was reported to be of forty ships, and sixe thousand foot that were paid, who met at the port of Cartagena to goe to the reliefe of the city of Genoa: he solicited his brother the Archduke to leaue the greatest forces hee could in his owne country, and to send them into Italy: and had besides giuen charge to the Prince of Orange to goe thorow the Duke of Sauoyes country with greater numbers of Lanfquenets into the Dutchy of Milan.

The Emperors preparations by sea & land.

The confederates resolving to stop the passage of these new supplies, made great prouisions both by sea and land. Diuers vessels were arriued for the most Christian King in Brettaigne and at Marseilles, with diuers others else-where which had beene taken neere to Genoa; to resist the passage of the Spanish army they laboured to induce the Duke of Sauoy not to suffer the Imperials to passe thorow his territories: But that which they most feared was the Almaines who were reported to be leauied by George Frondberg, an old capitaine, and much affected to the house of Austria, who assembled great numbers of souldiers, inciting them to enrole themselves in hope of booty: so that hauing received the garrison which was at Cremona, he had in all with him more then ten thousand foot.

George Frondberg leauied great numbers of Lanfquenets in the Emperors behalf.

The confederates, to stop these Lanfquenets passage did first of all gaine the capitaine of the castle of Mus by five thousand Ducats which were giuen him, the one halfe by the Pope and the other by the Venetians, as well to set at liberty the Ambassadors of the Signory, whom hee had surprized in their iourney towards France, as also to draw him to their party, wherevpon beside, they gaue him the command of foure hundred foot well paid, with a good pension for the guard of the Lake of Coma. The Venetians did likewise send for the same purpose Nicolo Sangosino their Secretary to the Marquis of Mantua to entreat him if the Almaines should passe the mounts, that he would not suffer them to passe thorow his State. But being aduertized that these Almaines had made prouision of artillery and munition at Trent, thinking that they would passe thorow the Veronois, they made a leaue of other foure thousand foot, and commanded certaine companies of men at armes and light horie to come from the campe. Then they appointed Augustine de Mulla for Prouidator Generall beyond the Riuer Mence, providing all matters to repulse them.

The confederates provide to resist the Emperor.

The Marquis
of Salusses
with his forces passe the Po.

Now these Almaines tooke their way by the vale of Sabia very neere to Pioltella. By these meanes the Venetian captaines that were on the Veronois, did speedily send Camillo Vrbino to Sales, with the light-horse and certaine companies of the ablest footmen, the rest that stayed behinde were commanded to follow them by crossing the Lake, which they being not able to doe, soone enough, by reason of a tempest that arose, was the cause that Vrbino came to late to meet with the enemies, who were already passed onwards on their way; yet neuertheless he using seized on the Pae of Corona, which is a very narrow place and strong by situation, he enforced the Almaines, who were already on their journey, going thither to take an other way thorow the tops of the mountaines, which was very difficult and dangerous, by which, at the last they came to La Garda, and from thence to Chastillon: then within a while after they entred the Marquis of Mantua his State, leaving the way of Milan, contrary to the opinion of the confederates taking that of Placentia or Pavia.

John de Medicis a great captaine.

They refused to follow them and still to hold them in allarmes, the Marquis of Salusses, on the one side with great numbers of Swisses and Grisons, and the Duke of Vrbino on the other marching towards Soncina, skirmishing continually with the enemies reuerward, to the great commendation of the captaines, and especially of John de Medicis, who notwithstanding that all the Popes captaines were departed, did neuertheless continue in the Kings pay, and retained a company of men at armes in his name, who by his great courage and valor, was a mercurious terror to the enemies, and a great comfort to the confederates.

The Popes
feare.

George Frondspere having passed the Po without anyler, and being irresolute what way to take, did hold the confederates in doubt, and especially the Pope, who fearing least the enemies might turne towards Bologna and from thence into Tuscany, did earnestly entreate the Venetians to command their army to passe speedily over the Po, for to assure the Churches territories and those of the Florentines: but their owne State being not free from the same feare, the Senate, in some sort to satisfie him, and yet not meaning to much to disurinish themselves, commanded Lodovico Pisani, who was in the Marquis of Salusses army, to gather together certaine foote-forces, to send them speedily for the guard of the Churches State: and Guicciardin making the same request, Babeni di Nalci was sent thither with a thousand foote: they did beside send word to their Generall, that when he should perceiue the dangers of the confederates to encrease, and those of the Venetians to lessen, not to make any difficulty to releue them, either with the whole body of the army, or with part thereof, as himselfe should iudge to be most necessary.

The Marquis
of Salusses
with his forces passe the Po.

At the last it was concluded, for the present that the Marquis of Salusses alone should passe the Po with his owne troupes and three hundred light-horse of the Venetians, with certaine peeces of ordnance, taken from forth their campe to amuze the enemies: But the Almaines having crossed the Riuier Nura, and that of Trebbia afterwards, without any let of their confederates were come and encamped at Fiorenzoles, hoping quickly to ioyne with the forces of Milan: and the Imperial captaines not being able to cause the other Almaines to march, because they wanted their pay, they presently dislodged, only with the Italian infantry, and certaine companies of light-horse.

The Senate in the meane time, being wholly desirous to satisfie the Pope, commanded the Providitor to draw a gallat troupe of the best foldiers forth of the army, and to send them ouer the Po, to ioyne with the Marquis of Salusses: whereupon the Providitor Fitturi, did suddenly depart with five thousand foot & certaine companies of light-horse; the Duke of Vrbino being at the same time (to the Venetians great grieve) gon to Mantua about certain particular affaires of his owne.

This marching of the enemies towards Florence, caused the confederates to feare, least the Florentines, being troubled with the danger that threatned them, should come come to an agreement with the Imperials, to the great hinderance and prejudice of the league: Upon this doubt the Venetians did speedily send Marco Foscare their Ambassadour to Florence, to exhort them in the name of the Republique not to separate themselves (by reason of that accident) from them, setting before them the great want of all necessaries that was in the Almaines campe, the weakness and distresse of the Imperials: and on the contrary the great forces of the confederates, and their desire to employ them all for them, and with them to run one selfe same fortune: and then, the hope of the happy successe of that warre, by reason of the aide which they dayly expected from France, and finally the great preparations which were made to assaile the Imperials in sundry places: Hee willed them to call to minde their ancient generosity, and in particular, sundry fortunate euents happened vnto them, being vnited with the Signory of Venice, how that the like might now befall them; hauing the selfe same constancy and magnanimity that they then had: that it was a thing most certain, that as their loue and affection towards the league did much encrease the reputation thereof, and did assure the confederates, euens so in like manner their disunion would greatly hinder and prejudice it. For, to yeeld for feare of an imaginary danger, was nothing else but to precipitate themselves into most certaine and pernicious mischiefs, and by ruining themselves to draw forthwith by their downe-fall other men into the same precipice, or at least wise by their declining to shake and put in hazard the liberty of all Italy: whereupon, for the great affection that the common-wealth did beare vnto them, and in regard of their common interest, the Senate would not faile in any point of their duty.

The Florentines declared how pleasing his comming and remonstrance had beene vnto them, and sent Alessandro de Parisi their Ambassadour to Venice to giue thanks to the Senate, promising to continue steadfast to the league, and in particular to haue found intelligence and correspondence with the Republique, perswading them to leauy sixe thousand foot more at their common charge, that they might with them resist the Duke of Bourbon with more assurance, who was reported to haue drawn forces from Milan, and with them to march into Tuscany.

In the meane time the confederates nauall army did still continue neere to Genoa, which being reduced to all extremity, diuers meanes were propounded to hinder the Spanish nauall army to the number of forty ships prepared at Carthagen, from comming to the reliefe thereof; and among others Nauarre was of opinion, to saile vnto the frontiers of Spaine, and to assaile the Emperours army which lay in an open hauen, and to burne it. This opinion was allowed by the Venetian Providitor, but Doria (al-be-it he likewise approved it) did neuertheless consider that the quality of that country was very contrary to that proposition, and the dangers of the sea much greater, where they should not finde any place of retreat to shield themselves from tempests and stormes: and setting downe sundry other difficulties, he made all the hearers to be irresolute, and himselfe constant not to goe to Carthagen: whereupon they determined to saile into Corsica or Sardinia, and nere to those Islands to waite for the Imperial fleet, intending if it came to put forth to sea and to fight with it; for the which purpose they concluded to send for some great ships from Marseilles, and to arme the Genoa ships which had beene taken at the beginning.

Whilest they dwelt on these resolute preparations, they discovered the Imperial fleet fiftene miles off from land, consisting of sixe and thirty vessels of all sorts, sayling with a faire winde directly towards Genoa, which was departed from Spaine sooner then was expected, wherein were Don Charles of Lanoy viceroy of Naples, the captaine Alarcon, and Don Ferrant of Gonzaga. So soone as the Venetian Providitor that lay at Porto-vennere to cause the vessels to bee armed, had notice of the enemies comming, he put to sea with sixteene gallies that he had ready, and gaue chase to the enemies vessels; but being overtaken with

Foscare his
ambassadour
to the Florentines.

The Florentines
answer
and resolution.

Nauarre his courageous proposition.

with a contrary winde he was enforced to returne from whence he came, and the Spanish army in the meane time pursuing their iourney, drew still neerer to land, determining to enter into the haven of Genoa, but at such time as it passed by Saint Florenzos Mount, it was descried by Nauarre, who lay at the foot of the hill with feventeene gallies, who comming with them forthwith to sea, did with great courage giue in athwart the Imperiall army, and falling soule one of an other, they fought from morning till two houres within night, where the Imperials were so roughly handled by those of the league, and their whole fleet so torne by the artillery, as had not a tempest arose, which separated them, it was certainly thought, that it would have bene wholly defeated.

The Imperiall fleet in beaten by the confederates.

The confederates fleet retired to Portofin, staying the same night for the other gallies that lay at Portouennere: and whether they did come or not their resolution that day brake to seeke the enemy. But so soone as it was day, albeit that they followed them as farre as Lioume, yet they could not ouertake them, by reason that they were already to farre. The viceroy went on his way, but so beaten by the tempest, that his vessels were scattered, part of which where in Don Ferrant of Ganzaga was, were carried into Sicily, and afterwards came to Gayetta, where they landed the Lansequenets: and as for himselfe he arrived with the rest in the haven of Saint Stephen, which belongeth to the Sienois: if Armiero the Prouidator who lay at Portouennere could haue come to the aide of his fellows, as he sought diuers times to doe, all the Spanish army had bene defeated, but hee could not come by reason of the tempest: yet neuertheless he was called home to Venice, by the counsell of Tenne, to come and yeeld an account of his actions, and in particular for suffering victuals to enter into Genoa, and for that he did not goe with the army to Carthagen, and they sodainly sent Augustine de Mulla in his stead, who was Prouidator in Friul.

The Imperiall fleet scattered by tempest.

But Armiero hauing cleared himself of all those imputations was wholly quitted, and then they knew that the fault, why Genoa was not taken, did proceed from the not sending of sufficient troupes from the campe in Lombardy, which should needly haue shut the City in by land: which the captaines of the gallies had oftentimes craued.

The Pope make arb meanes to the victory for an agreement.

Now the Pope, more then any else, was most troubled with the viceroys comming into Italy, fearing least the aide which he had brought with him would ioyne it selfe with George Frondsparg: and therefore he sent the Archbishop of Capua vnto him to treat of agreement, and to propound in the meane time a suspension of armes: but the viceroy being desirous to treat on very hard conditions, the whole matter was broken off without any conclusion, the Pope hauing taken courage, for that his army was encreased in reputation and strength by the arriual of Rance de Cera, who beeing sent by the French King into Italy was come to Saconia with the nauall army, and from thence went to ioyne with the Church-army which lay not farre from Rome for the subuersion of Colonneff.

The French King sends Rance de Cera into Italy.

The viceroy on the other side fought to enter into the Churches territories, to defend those of the Colonneff, and to enforce the Pope to disioyne himselfe from the league, and to giue him a certaine summe of money for the payment of his army: whereupon he set forward and came with twelue thousand men before Frosolona, where he encamped, which is a towne very weake, and seated in the Champaine country, the houses of particular persons seruing in stead of walles, within which neuertheless the captaines of the Church had left a strong Garrison to keepe him from any sure footing in that country. At his first comming he beganne to batter the towne, not giuing any assault to it afterwards. But the arriual of Rance de Cera and Alessandro Veselli with the Churches forces, which were much encreased by the Popes diligence, who had augmented his campe, with great numbers of foot-men paid and commanded for the reliefe of that place, was the cause that after certaine skirmishes on either side, the viceroy raised raised his campe two houres before day, and set fire to certaine munitions which were left, leaving there behind him some bullets for great ordnance, and retired to Celenna, and from thence to Cepparane.

Frosolona is besieged by the viceroy.

This fortunate successe encouraged the Pope, and at the entreaty of the confederates Ambassadors, whom he could not otherwise satisfie, he resolved to execute the enterprize of the Kingdome of Naples, notwithstanding that it was in the midst of winter, being the month of January in the yeere 1527. The Venetians for this purpose commanded Augustine de Mulla their Prouidator in the nauall army to bring it to Ciuitauecchia, and ioyning there with the Popes gallies, to saile together towards Naples. But the French army tarrying so long, that of the Venetians sailed towards Terracina to take in three thousand foot, conducted by Horatio Baillon, who was freed by the Pope from his imprisonment wherein Pope Leo had confined him.

At the same time the Earle of Vaudemont came from France to make one in the enterprize of Naples, which they resolved to enuade by sea and land, who determining to imbarke himselfe in the Venetian gallies, they re-enforced their army with two thousand foot.

The Count Vaudemont comes to the army.

Rance de Cera in an other place, against the Popes will, entred into Abruzzo with sixe thousand men, where by the meanes of the Earle of Montoria children, he did hope with ease to take Aquila, the which he forthwith did, by reason that Alesandio Colonna fled from thence: so soone as he had intelligence of their arriual. Doria likewise failed before with his gallies and went and assailed Pozzola, a place very important for the confederates, in regard of the commodiouseesse of the haven of Baja: but being at his first arriual repulsed by the artillery, he dislodged from thence without assailing it; afterwards other gallies of the league arriuing, they resolved to assaile the sea Burrow of Stabia, where Diomed Carassa lay with five hundred footmen, the which was taken by assault on the third day towards the side of the hill, and the day after the castle yeilded.

Aquila taken by Rance de Cera.

The confederates take the Burrow of Stabia.

The tenth day the souldiers tooke the Grecke tower and Surrenta by force, & diuers other places on the coast, did within a while after yeeld on composition. They had before then taken certaine ships laden with corne which were going to Naples where victuals were very scarce.

The confederates take diuers places on the sea coast.

Now the army of the league finding no resistance at sea it came so neere to the Peere of Naples, as the castle and the gallies played vpon it with their shot. It was then consulted on, whether it were necessary to beseege the city, some saying, that by the taking thereof, the warre would be ended, they hauing taken from the enemies all meanes to come by money for the entertainment of their army: as also, because their greatest hope of being able to keepe that State, consisted in the conservation of that city, the which being lost they would forth-with leaue the Kingdome, and retire to some other place. Diuers reasons might incite them to that sege. First of all, the small numbers of souldiers which were in the city, and yet that small number not well disposed to put themselves forward to dangers for the maintenance of the insolent Dominion of the Spaniards. Secondly the Nobility stood badly affected to the Spaniards, who for feare of loosing their goods durst not shew their discontent: and last of all the Viceroy's abience, who was farre from thence, and the small expectation which the Spaniards had of any speedy reliefe from their fellowes.

The confederates consult about the sege of Naples.

Others who weare of a contrary opinion, thought it best to tarry for Rance de Cera, the better to shut in that city with greater forces, on which they knew the whole end and successe of the warre depended, to the end to proceed therein more considerately and with greater hopes; the delaying of a small time could not but proue very commodious to them, because they certainly knew that there was want of bread in the city, and if succors did enter into it, the scarcity would thereby be the more augmented, and would be cause of the peoples disordered rising, ring; which would open a more easie passage to their victory: and that therefore it behoued them in waiting for such an occasion to faile towards Salerno, to seize on that city and others neere adioyning, whereby Naples it selfe would at last be brought vnder their obedience.

But these reasons being not much approued nor thought worthy to be equalled with the profit which was to be hoped for by the then taking of that City, they refused to send an Herald to summon those within it to yeeld the city to the confederates with the promises and threatnings determined in the council.

An Herald is sent to summon Naples.

Hugo de Moncada salutes forth upon the confederates.

Don Hugo of Moncada, who commanded there, and held the people in awe, determining to defend himselfe, so soone as he had notice that the army of the league was within foure miles of the City took two thousand five hundred foote, as well of the Garrison as of the people, and three hundred horse, and with them marched forth of the City, to shew that he wanted no courage to frustrate the enemies deileignes.

Those of the league had already landed diuers souldiers vnder the command of the Earle of Vaudemont and Horatio Baillone, who marching towards the City to make discouery, met with Don Hugo his troupes, and skirmishing together, they did put them to flight in such disorder as they left certaine field-peeeces behind them, which Moncada, hauing made a stand with his Spaniards, recouered, and by reason thereof hauing delaied his retreat, he was so amazed as he had not sheldure at his entry to plucke vp the draw-bridge and to shut the gate: the which standing open was on a sodaine seized by Baillone who followed him at the heeles hauing no great numbers of souldiers with him; and considering that if hee should enter he could not keepe them from the spoile, which would cause them all to be cut in peeeces, he retired to the gallies which were with in a mile off the City.

This exploit did so affright the Neapolitains, as they presently sent to entreat the capitaines of the army not to batter the city, nor to spoile the country neere adioyning: that they for their parts were ready to yeeld. But they could not make vse of this fauour of fortune: because that D. Hugo hauing intelligence of the small number of the army, shewed himselfe resolute to defend the City: so as the army for want of men remained idle, waiting for supplies out of France which were very slow in coming, and by their delay did snatch the victory forth of their hands: so as in the meane time of this expectation infinite disorders arose in the Churches army, for money and victuals sayling, therewithall martiall discipline was no more obserued, the souldiers did no more obey their capitaines, euery one disbanded, they contemned the commandements of the Legate Apostolike, and all the interest of the league and the Pope: in such sort as diuers of the best aduised and most respected capitaines, forsaking the pay of the confederates, went and serued the Imperials.

The great disorder of the army of the league.

What hindered the taking of Naples.

For these causes the Pope continuing resolute in his former determination of agreement, sought all meanes to obtaine it, saying, That since he must needs serue, he had rather to do it to the Emperour, then still to depend on the vnruely wils of capitaines, and namely of the basest souldiers.

Now in this meane time, the Duke of Bourbons determination to march into the field, and to come and ioyne with the Lansequenets of George Frondspere, did greatly trouble the Pope, and altered the confederates deileignes: for albe it he found himselfe to be without money, munition, pioneers, and vnurnished of all meanes to get victuals, hee resolved neuertheless to passe on, thorow the midst of so many enemies townes, and against such enemies as were farre greater in number then himselfe. Bourbon then being thus resolved, hauing drawne away the Garrison from Milan, and from other places, went with his troupes and crossed the Trebia, vniing himselfe with the Lansequenets that were were newly arriued, who tarried for him on the farther side of the Riuer, vncertaine as yet what course to take, albe it the common report was, that at his departure from Milan, hee had promised to his souldiers the sacke of Rome and of the greatest part of Italy; the like also did captaine George to his Lansequenets, who vpon that hope had endured very many miseries since their departure from Germany; for they had receiued but one onely Ducat for a man, and afterwarde two or three Ducats for the whole time they had bene in Italy.

The Duke of Bourbon marches to the field in despite of all difficulties.

The Pope, in regard hereof, being greatly moued, as well in particular for him selfe as for the Florentines, did reuise his practices of agreement with the viceroy, albe it he had promised before not to conclude any thing without the consent of the French King and the Venetians. That which moued him thereunto was his owne feare, and the continuall exhortations of the Generall of the Friars, of whom hee made great account, who being newlie returned from the Emperours Court, assured the Pope of the Emperours affection towards his Holinesse, and of his great inclination to peace; wherevpon, vsing this Generall in that treaty with the viceroy; hee continued in such sort as he seemed wholly to be confirmed by that agreement, not making any warlike prouisions for the safety of his owne person, saying, That as the vniuersall Father and Pastor, knowing the Emperour to be greatly desirous of peace, hee ought not for to shew himselfe lesse affected thereto, and for the effecting thereof, freely to employ all his meanes that hee could, without any sinister suspicion, that all Christendome might enjoy the peace and tranquillity which it so much desired.

What moued the Pope to such an agreement with the viceroy.

The Pope trusteth too much to the viceroy

Bourbon in the meane time being come into the Bolognia territory, spoyled all places round about, to the end that the Florentines, fearing the like damage, should compound with him, and contribute a certaine summe of money for the payment of his army, and thereby to auoide the ruine of their pallaces and goodly houses, which lie neere to their city.

These considerations did in such sort moue the Pope, as the Lord of Langi being come forth of France to perswade him not to make any agreement with the Emperour, and the rather to induce him thereto, had brought him twenty thousand Ducats, with promise of a greater summe, so soone as Cesar Fieramosca, sent by the viceroy, had told him that his Master was satisfied with the truce for eight monethes, propounded by his Holinesse, he on a sodaine without any regard to the promises and aide of the French King, made an accord with the viceroy, saying, That time might make his condition worse, if the Viceroy should but know what disorder was in the army of the league: and that the daunger of the Realme of Naples was nothing in comparison of that of Tuscanie and Rome.

The Pope accordeth with the viceroy.

Therefore passing on farther, for the better assurance of That treaty, hee procured that the Viceroy should come in person to Rome, whilst the Cardinall Triulcio, who was Legate in the Churches army should goe to Naples to assure the Viceroy from him; who coming afterwards to Rome was honourably entertained there, and ratified the suspension of armes for eight monethes, according as it had bene agreed vpon by Fieramosca, promising to cause Bourbon to withdrawe his army forth of the Churches and Florentines State.

The Pope being to credulous, thought his affaires by this meanes to be well assured, hauing promised by the agreement to giue threescore thousand Ducats for the payment of the army, and to pardon the Colonnesse, and particularly Cardinall Pompey, restoring him to the Cardinallship whereof hee had deprived him. But the greatest error hee committed was, for that thorow badde counsell hee had on a sodaine with-drawne his whole army from forth the confines of the Realme of Naples, and his nauall army to Ciuitavecchia, and had wholly disarmed himselfe, reayning for the garde and safety of his owne person but an hundred light horse, and certaine companies of black bands which had belonged to the deceased Iohn de Medicis, notwithstanding that the Colonneſi were in armes, and committed foundry insolencies.

The Pope is dissembling himselfe.

The Venetian Senate being aduertized of this agreement, would not faile to aduise the Pope not to trust ouermuch to the viceroy: for al-be-it that hee had proceeded sincerely therein, it was neuerthelesse to be feared that Bourbon, who had the like authority from the Emperour as had the viceroy, being displeased that the accord was made without his consent, would not ratifie it: Then they declared vnto him what inconuenience and disorder his so soone disarming did bring with it, seeing that the Siennesis and Colonneſi, with whom hee had not yet fullie ended, were still in armes.

But the Pope contemning all these reasons and remayning obstinate in his resolution did verifie the common saying, That good and wholeſome counsell giuen by an interreſſed and ſuſpected perſon, cauſeth rather a precipitate downefall. For the Pope thinking that the Venetians ſpake for their owne particular interreſt, because hee had forsaken them, would not harcken vnto them: wherevpon, Bourbon within a while after writing to Rome, that hee could no longer hold backe the ſouldiers for want of pay from comming to beſeage it, he then perceiving that to bee very true which they had told him: al-be-it that at the first hee thought that hee had ſaid ſo onely but for to draw ſome greater ſummes of money from him, or else in a brauado, and that hee did not meane to breake the truce.

Alſo hee was wont to ſay afterward, that though hee ſhould haue feared any ſiniſter accident, yet neuerthelesse hee would not haue changed his opinion, because hee would not haue the world to knowe that hee had bene deceived by truſting to any one. Now hee imagining that the ſame would not come to paſſe which did happen, had already appointed Matheo Guilberto his Datary to goe as Legate into Spaine, to treat particularly there on the conditions of peace.

The Venetians being aduertized of the Popes resolution did write to the Duke of Vrbin that hee ſhould aſſemble his troups, and ioyne them with thoſe of the Marquis of Saluſſes that were on the Bolognois: They afterwards ſent to Srbaſtian Iuſtinian their Ambaſſadour with the Chriſtian King, willing him to aſſure his Maieſty, that al-be-it the Pope had forsaken them that they would neuer depart from his frienſhip, and that if hee thought good to accept of the truce, they would likewiſe accept of it, and not otherwiſe. The Pope in the treaty of the accord which the Viceroy had reſerued place for the Venetians to enter into it, because they had not ſhewed themſelues much contrary to the truce, the better to pleaſe him, who being vnited with the moſt Chriſtian King were very well contented nor for to breake off wholly with him, hoping ſtill to draw him to their party: for they made more account of the frienſhip of France then of all the reſt: wherevpon perceiving that the King did not willingly giue eare to this truce, they would no more motion it.

But concerning his propoſition to them to renewe the warre in the Realme of Naples, they did very much commend the reſprall of armes but not to goe into that Kingdome, ſaying, That they had there loſt the good will of the people, and their reputation, by yeelding vp, thorow the Popes ſeparating himſelfe from them, all the townes which they had there taken: but that the ſureſt and proſpitableſt way for the preſent, was to prepare for the deſenſe and conſeruacion of that which they poſſeſſed in Lombardy, if the accord ſhould happen to bee made. An if it ſhould fall out otherwiſe, it ſhould bee for the profit of the league to haue the Cities of the Churches ſtate and the Florentines at their deuotion.

Now

Now the Imperiall army notwithstanding the agreement conceiued at Rome betwixt the Pope and the viceroy, went ſtill forward, although that Ceſar Ferra-moſes had ſignified vnto them this agreement to cauſe them to returne backe, For the Duke of Bourbon at the ſame time, either becauſe hee would not obey, or elſe it being not in his power to doe it, cauſed his army to march towards Romagna, where he beſeaged Cottignola, the which hee tooke by compoſition, then marching towards Furl, hee came and lodged at Villafranca ſiue miles off, and taking the way of Meldola, he ſhewed that his meaning was to paſſe Tuſcany by the Val di bagria: wherevnto he was much ſolicited by the Siensis who offered him great ſtore of victuals, and pioneers.

The Venetians hauing notice of the enemies determination ſent word to the Duke of Vrbin, that leauing ſtrong Garrifons in the territories belonging to their State, hee ſhould paſſe on with the reſidue of the army to aſſure the lands of the Church and the Florentines, and to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Imperials deſignes. The Duke of Vrbin according to this direction being come with part of the army neere to Bologna, and the Marquis of Saluſſes likewiſe, being lodged in ſundry places, hee paſſed on towards Imola, and encamped betwixt Rauenna, and Faenza, at the ſame time as the enemy departed from Cottignola: It was there a long time debated amongſt the captaines of the league what courſe to obſerue in that warre: and in the end it was concluded to haue two ſeuerall camps, the better and with more eaſe to cut off all victuals from the enemies, to what place ſoeuer they ſhould march. The Pope taxing this counsell did neuerthelesse make vie of it, vnder colour of his raſh agreement ſaying, That the ſlow proceeding of thoſe of the league for the preſeruacion of that which belonged vnto him had enforced him for to take an other courſe for his ſafety.

Now the Pope, who contrary to all mens opinions had ſtill thought himſelfe ſafe enough, being then ſtrangely daunted, by this new aduertizement, called before him all the Ambaſſadours of the Confederate Princes which were in his Court, and after hee had declared to them on the one ſide, how that the zeale to the publike good, but chiefly neceſſity had enforced him to accept the truce, and on the other, the malicious deceit of the Imperials towards him did earnestly entreat them to make interceſſion for him to their Princes, that they would not forſake him, nor the Florentines likewiſe in ſo manifeſt danger, to the great hurt and preiudice of the common cauſe, and hee did particularly entreat Dominico Veniero Ambaſſadour at Rome for the Signory of Venice, that hee would ſo deale with the Senate, as that they ſhould command the Duke of Vrbin to paſſe the Appenine hills with his army, promiſing to renewe the league and ſincerely to obſerue it.

The Senate vpon this propoſition, al-be-it they iudged it to bee a very dangerous matter, to ſend their troups ſo farre off from their owne State, and to aduenture them in the craggy mountaines, and that beſides, the Pope had not giuen them any cauſe to take care for his affaires, in regard hee had forſaken them, continuing neuerthelesse in their former reſolution, commanded the Duke of Vrbin and Lodouico Piſani, who was come to the army as new Pronidator to paſſe the mountes if neede ſhould require: wherevpon ſo ſoone as the Imperiall army had paſſed the mountes, that of the Confederates followed it: ſo as almoſt at one time the two armies were in Tuſcany, the Duke of Bourbon being then lodged neere to Arezzo, and the Confederates army at Barberina, the City of Florence remayning in a manner in the miſdeſt betwixt theſe two armies.

This was the cauſe of great troubles in the City, ſome crauing a popular government, and others would haue that of a few priuate perſons: wherevpon the greatneſſe of thoſe of Medicis came to controuerſie, and the popular

Pppp 2

faction

The Venetians affiance to
the King.

The Venetians anſwere to the King concerning the renewing of the warre of Naples.

Cottignola is the by the Duke of Bourbon.

The confederates army
doth ſtill follow the ſimple tried.

The Pope allowed his error and impleted the confederates aide.

The two armies at one time in Tuſcan

faction would at least haue preuailed, those of Medicis beeing driuen from the publike government; and Hippolito and Alessandro of Medicis the Popes Nephewes being declared enemies to their country; when as the Duke of Vrbin arrived opportunely at Florence during these stirs, who so soone as he perceiued the Duke of Bourbon to direct his course towards Tuscany, taking with him fourescore gentlemen forth of the army, with the Provideror Pisani and Frederico Bezola, went speedily to Florence to continue the Florentines in their fidelity towards the league.

He by his arrival did frustrate the designs of the contrary faction which was affrighted to see the army so neere, hauing no assurance of any reliefe from elsewhere, so as he reduced matters to their former state without any effusion of blood for that time: and delt besides in such sort, as the Florentines should be under the protection of the league, and should maintaine at their owne charge in the confederates campe two hundred and fifty men at armes, and five thousand foot, or a greater number if the Pope should so appoint it.

Whilst these things were done in Florence, the other confederates renewed the league at Rome, by which they promised the Venetians to contribute towards the expence of their army, provided that it did not depart forth of Tuscany or the Churches State without the Popes permission, and that it would be one of the first in the enterprize of Naples. These conditions seeming too hard to the Senate, were not accepted; Dominico Fontana their Ambassador, for being to forward in his offers was called home to Venice; and as one guilty for going beyond his commission was deliuered ouer into the hands of the Auogero to haue his processe made, and Francesco Pisare was sent Ambassador in his stead.

The Duke of Bourbon either for that hee despaird of being able to make any attempt vpon Florence, by reason that all the confederates forces were not farre from thence, or for that he was euer desirous to goe to Rome, determined to match thither, being partly prouoked, by the negligence and small care that they had in Rome to provide for the dangers which threatened it: because that the Pope relying in vaine on the people, and on a great number of husbandmen that were retired thither, of whom more then five thousand were armed, had not taken care to leauy new forces, and least of all to provide for those that he already had: namely, that hauing giuen charge to Philippin Doria to leauy three thousand foot-men, he hauing raised one thousand and brought them to Ciuitavecchia, his Holinesse did not vouchsafe to send for them to come to Rome for the gard of the City: and caused his Detary to write to Count Guy of Rangon, who lay at Ottricoli with great numbers of foot not to come to Rome, vntill hee should bee expressly commanded by him so to doe, notwithstanding that the Earle was aduertized from the Duke of Vrbin, that the Duke of Bourbon marched thitherwards, and that he might haue come thither in time: but hee durst not disobey the Popes commandement, so that diuers did blame him for it, saying, that in such a case he should haue obeyed the Duke of Vrbin, as capitaine General of the league.

The Duke of Bourbon then, departing forth of the country of Arezzo without artillery or baggage, and marching with incredible speed, not being hindered by the raine which at that season was very great, nor yet by want of victuals, he came neere to Rome before such time as the Pope had scarcely any aduertizement of his comming, and hee found no resistance neither at Viterbo, whether the Pope had not sent forces in time, nor yet in any other place, yet neuertheless, before hee would come nere to the walles, hee sent to the Pope to demand passage for his army into the Kingdome of Naples, (as hee said) beeing moued therevnto by reason of the small store of victuals which hee had, and fearing least by his long tarrying that hee might bee surprized by the army of the league who very neerely pursued him, or as others thought, by a martiall martiall arrogancy, to haue some collour for that which he had in his minde determined to doe.

The Pope would not regard his demands, nor yet heare them, as well because hee knew already the inward policies of the enemy; as for the great trust which he reposed in the people of Rome, and in the leagues small army of fixe and twenty galleies that lay at Ciuitavecchia with certaine companies of foot-men: As also for that Rance de Cera (vnto whom the Pope gaue the chiefe defense of the City of Rome) had rampired the suburbs, in the defense whereof hee so much trusted, that al-be-it they were in all mens iudgements very weake, hee would not permit the bridges vpon Tiber to be cut for the safety of Rome, if the suburbs and part of the City beyond Tiber could not be defended: and had besides, made such bad prouision of all necessaries, as it encouraged the enemies to approach the walles, and to come to the assault with ladders.

The defendants did not desery the enemies till it was almost to late, by reason of a thick mist which sodainly arose, wherewith the enemies army was covered, vntill it came to the very place where they gaue the assault, where Antonio de Montefalone was in gard with an hundred souldiers, vnto whose rescue diuers of the armed people came running, who for a certaine space sustained the enemies attempts. But the Imperials continuing the assault very fiercely, these new vnexperienced souldiers perceiuing danger hourly to encrease forsooke the defense, and committed themselves to flight.

The Duke of Bourbon at the beginning of their assault marching foremost, went before all the companies, where being shot into the body by an Harquebuz, he fell downe dead to the ground. The Prince of Orange, being very neere him when he fell, caused him forthwith to be covered with a cloake, to the end the souldiers might not be daunted by the death of their Generall, and then he did hotly pursue the victory.

The Pope, who in the palace of the Vatican attended what would bee the event thereof, hearing that the enemies had entred, did forth-with siew with diuers Cardinals and other Prelats to the castle Saint Angelo. The Lords Rance de Cera and Langey, hauing laboured in vaine to moue the people to take armes for their owne defense, and had fought valiantly with those few forces they could gather together and with them a long time kept the castle bridge, were at last enforced to retire. The City beeing thus abandoned, and all the people in confusion and flight, the enemies on all sides entred it, and became Masters thereof without any difficulty. Philippin Doria and Count Guy, so soone as they perceiued the Duke of Bourbon to march towards Rome, did on a sodaine without waiting for any other commandement set forwards to rescue the Pope with the forces of Ciuitavecchia and Oruietta: but the Duke of Bourbon by his speed hauing preuented them, and shut vp all the passages by which they were to follow him, did enforce them to returne from whence they came.

Now the Duke of Vrbin hauing set forward to follow the enemies, but very slowly, by reason of the hindrances of his campe, did at last with the whole army come as farre as Viterbo, who finding all the country to be spoiled by the enemies, hee was enforced by want of victuals to tarry there, his army beeing by sundry accidents much diminished, hauing in all but seven thousand men, in stead of thirty thousand appointed by the confederates. The army, lodging in that place, the light horse and foot-men did oftentimes scoure the whole Country, where meeting with the Imperiall souldiers, that were laden with great spoile and disbanded comming from Rome, they striped them of all they had.

Besides that, at the taking of the City all manner of crueltie was vsed:
 Pppp 3 every

Dominico Fontana put to his tryall.

Vt what caused the Duke of Bourbon to march to Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon sent speed in his march to Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon sent an assault to the suburbs of Rome.

The death of the Duke of Bourbon.

The Pope with diuers Cardinals retired to the castle Saint Angelo.

faction would at least haue preuailed, those of Medicis beinge driuen from the publike gouernment; and Hippolito and Alessandro of Medicis the Popes Nephewes beinge declared enemies to their country, when as the Duke of Vrbin arriued opportunely at Florence during these stirs, who so soone as he perceived the Duke of Bourbon to direct his course towards Tuscany, taking with him fourescore gentlemen forth of the army, with the Prouidator Pisani and Frederico Bozzola, went speedily to Florence to continue the Florentines in their fidelity towards the league.

He by his arriual did frustrate the designs of the contrary faction which was affrighted to see the army so neere, hauing no assurance of any reliefe from elsewhere, so as he reduced matters to their former state without any effusion of blood for that time: and delt besides in such sort, as the Florentines should be under the protection of the league, and should maintaine, at their owne charge in the confederates campe, two hundred and fifty men at armes, and five thousand foot, or a greater number if the Pope should so appoint it.

Whilst these things were done in Florence, the other confederates renued the league at Rome, by which they promised the Venetians to contribute towards the expence of their army, provided that it did not depart forth of Tuscany or the Churches State without the Popes permission, and that it would be one of the first in the enterprize of Naples. These conditions seeming to hard to the Senate, were not accepted; Dominico Pontero their Ambassador, for being to forward in his offers was called home to Venice, and as one guilty for going beyond his commission was deliuered ouer into the hands of the Auogario to haue his proccesse made, and Francisco Pisare was sent Ambassador in his stead.

The Duke of Bourbon either for that hee despaired of being able to make any attempt vpon Florence, by reason that all the confederates forces were not farre from thence, or for that he was euer desirous to goe to Rome, determined to march thither, being partly prouoked, by the negligence and small care that they had in Rome to provide for the daungers which threatned it: because that the Pope relying in vaine on the people, and on a great number of husbandmen that were retired thither, of whom more then five thousand were armed, had not taken care to leauy new forces, and least of all to provide for those that he already had: namely, that hauing giuen charge to Philippin Doria to leauy three thousand foot-men, he hauing raised one thousand and brought them to Ciuitauechia, his Holinesse did not vouchsafe to send for them to come to Rome for the gard of the City: and caused his Datary to write to Count Guy of Rangon, who lay at Ottricoli with great numbers of foot not to come to Rome, vntill hee should bee expressly commanded by him so to doe, notwithstanding that the Earle was aduertized from the Duke of Vrbin, that the Duke of Bourbon marched thitherwards, and that he might haue come thither in time: but hee durst not disobey the Popes commandement, so that diuers did blame him for it, saying, that in such a case he should haue obeyed the Duke of Vrbin, as capitaine General of the league.

The Duke of Bourbon then, departing forth of the country of Arezzo without artillery or baggage, and marching with incredible speed, not being hindred by the raine which at that season was very great, nor yet by want of victuals, he came neere to Rome before such time as the Pope had scarcely any aduertizement of his coming, and hee found no resistance neither at Viterbo, whether the Pope had not sent forces in time, nor yet in any other place, yet neuertheless, before hee would come nere to the walles, hee sent to the Pope to demand passage for his army into the Kingdome of Naples, (as hee said) being moued therevnto by reason of the small store of victuals which hee had, and fearing least by his long tarrying that hee might bee surprized by the army of the league who very neerely pursued him, or as others thought, by a martiall

Dominico Pontero was sent to his tryall.

What caused the Duke of Bourbon to march to Rome.

The Duke of Bourbon great speed in his march to Rome.

martiall arrogancy, to haue some collour for that which he had in his minde determined to doe.

The Pope would not regard his demands, nor yet heare them, as well because hee knew already the inward policies of the enemy, as for the great trust which hee reposed in the people of Rome, and in the leagues small army of fixe and twenty gallees that lay at Ciuitauechia with certaine companies of foot-men: As also for that Rance de Cera (vnto whom the Pope gaue the chiefe defense of the City of Rome) had rampired the suburbes, in the defense whereof hee too much trusted, that albe-it they were in all mens iudgements very weak, hee would not permit the bridges vpon Tiber to be cut for the safety of Rome, if the suburbes and part of the City beyond Tiber could not be defended: and had besides, made such bad prouision of all necessaries, as it encouraged the enemies to approach the walles, and to come to the assault with ladders.

The defendants did not desery the enemies till it was almost to late, by reason of a thicke mist which sodainely arose, wherewith the enemies army was couered, vntill it came to the very place where they gaue the assault, where Antonio de Montfalcone was in gard with an hundred souldiers, vnto whose rescue diuers of the armed people came running, who for a certaine space sustained the enemies attempts. But the Imperials continuing the assault very fiercely, these new vnexperienced souldiers perceiving daunger hourly to encrease forsooke the defense, and committed themselves to flight.

The Duke of Bourbon at the beginning of their assault marching foremost, went before all the companies, where being shot into the body by an Harquebuz, he fell downe dead to the ground. The Prince of Orange, being very neere him when he fell, caused him forthwith to be couered with a cloake, to the end the souldiers might not be daunted by the death of their Generall, and then he did hotly pursue the victory.

The Pope, who in the palace of the Vatican attended what would bee the event thereof, hearing that the enemies had entred, did forth-with fle with diuers Cardinals and other Prelats to the castle Saint Angelo. The Lords Rance de Cera and Langey, hauing laboured in vaine to moue the people to take armes for their owne defense, and had sought valiantly with those few forces they could gather together and with them a long time kept the castle bridge, were at last enforced to retire. The City being thus abandoned, and all the people in confusion and flight, the enemies on all sides entred it, and became Masters thereof without any difficulty. Philippin Doria and Count Guy, so soone as they perceived the Duke of Bourbon to march towards Rome, did on a sodaine without wayting for any other commandement set forwards to rescue the Pope with the forces of Ciuitauechia and Orvietta: but the Duke of Bourbon by his speed hauing preuented them, and shut vp all the passages by which they were to follow him, did enforce them to returne from whence they came.

Now the Duke of Vrbin hauing set forward to follow the enemies, but very slowly, by reason of the hindrances of his campe, did at last with the whole army come as farre as Viterbo, who finding all the country to be spoiled by the enemies, hee was enforced by want of victuals to tarry there, his army being by sundry accidents much diminished, hauing in all but seven thousand men, in stead of thirty thousand appointed by the confederates. The army, lodging in that place, the light horse and foot-men did oftentimes scoure the whole Country, where meeting with the Imperiall souldiers, that were laden with great spoile and disbanded coming from Rome, they striped them of all they had.

Besides that, at the taking of the City all manner of crueltie was vsed:

PPPp 3 every

The Duke of Bourbon with an assault, to the suburbs of Rome.

The death of the Duke of Bourbon.

The Pope with diuers Cardinals retireth to the Castle Saint Angelo.

The Imperials
great cruelty in Rome.

euery where infinite complaints were heard of those who were inhumanely tormented, partly to enforce them to pay their ransom, and partly to bewray the wealth that they had hidden. The cries and pittifull lamentations were heard of Roman dames, and Nunnes, who the souldiers lead away in troupes to satisfie their Luxury. All holy things, the Sacraments and Relikes of Saints, where-with the Churches were stored, being despoiled of their ornaments, were euery where trodden vnder foot; wherevnto were added infinite vilanies of the barbarous Lasciuious. The sacke and pillage lasted many monthes, which according to the common report, as well in ready money, gold, siluer, and iewels, amounted to more then a Million of Ducats, and the ransomes that were paid, did rise to a farre greater summe.

10

The end of the sixth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The

10

The Contents of the seuenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

20

30

HE Venetians sorrow and greefe for the taking of Rome and the Pope by the Imperials. The Cardinalls meete at Bologna to treat of the Popes deliuerance. The Venetians warlike preparations by Land and Sea to free the Pope from his imprisonment. The Venetians seaze on Rauennato keepe it for the Holy Sea. The Duke of Vrbin taketh Perugia to the same end. The Duke of Vrbins resolution for the Popes deliury.

40

The French King maketh great warlike prouisions to send into Italy. Andre Doria in the seruice of the French King. The army of the Confederats remaineth on the Confines of the Siemois. The Popes agreement to come forth of prison. The Venetians resolution vpon that agreement. The Lord of Lautrec commeth into the state of Milan with great forces. Bosco and Alexandria taken by him. Paui is taken and sacked by the French. Genoa is reduced vnder the French Kings obedience. The Turke being assailed by Marcello, had soone after his reuenge. The Lord Lautrec marcheth towards Rome. The demands propounded by the French King in the motion of peace. The Agreement, whereby the Duke of Ferrara and the Marquis of Mantua enter into the league. The entire enlargement of the Popes person. The Venetians send an Ambassad to the Pope, inuiring him to enter into the league. The like Ambassade of the most Christian King to the same effect. The Popes excuses not to enter into any new confederacy. The Lord Laureces iourney into the Kingdome of Naples. The Popes demand to the Venetians, with their answer. The Imperials refuse to fight. The Lord Lautrec encampeth before Naples. The Duke of Brunswick commeth with great forces into Lombardy. The Venetians preparations against the Duke of Brunswick

50

Brunswick. He returneth into Germany. The Imperialls are put to rout at Sea. The arrivall of the Generall of the Venetian Army before Naples with the discommodities which it there endured. Andre Doria reuolteth from the Kings service. The Pope resolueth to remaine neuter. The great wants of the Army before Naples. And lastly the Lord Lautrecs Death,

The Seuenth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

The Senate after the taking of Rome, determine to oppose themselves against the Emperor.

HE accident at Rome being knowne at Venice, together with the Popes imprisonment, did greatly afflict the Senate with griefe and compassion, and with a disdain for the wrong offered to the person of the holy Father, whereupon they not intending to suffer any longer the Emperors fortune to encrease to their owne perill, determined to releue the Pope with all their forces, and therein to spare for no cost: which caused them to write to the Duke of Vrbini their Generall, and to Pisani and Pitturi the Prouidators, to lay by all other designs and attempt onely, if it were possible, to free the Pope from his imprisonment: and the better to effect it to come neere to the Castle wherein hee was shutte vp, to seeke by all meanes to draw him thence; and because no other matter might hinder this enterprize, they forth-with made a new leuy of foote, to encrease their forces to the number of ten thousand foot, which lay on the confines of Crema and Lauda, to resist Antonio de Leus, who being come forth into the field, and finding no opposition, was likely every day to grow more strong by the aid which he expected forth of Germany. The Venetians were incited therunto, by the great preparations of the Kings of England and France, who hauing notice of the great inhumanity vsed towards his Holinesse, and the scandal giuen to the Church of Christendome, by detayning the head thereof in prison, determining to remedy it resolved betwixt themselves at their owne charges to send an army into Italy to free the Pope, and to put him in possession of all the Churches lands: and another mighty one into Flanders by assailing that country to enforce the Emperor to abandon Italy for the defence thereof.

These two Kings were very earnest in this businesse, whereupon the Cardinall of Yorke, who could doe more then all men with the King of England, came for the same purpose to Amiens to the French king, to procure an enteruiew of those two kings, to the end they might consult together more considerably concerning the Popes deliuey. The most Christian King seemed to be no lesse willing therein, who sent speedy word to his Captaines in Italy to procure by all meanes the the Popes freedome from imprisonment, and to assure the State Ecclesiasticall, and the better to prouide for it with more speed, he aduised those Cardinals that were at liberty, to meet at Anagnon, where, as in a safe and commodious place, they might with ease treat thereof, and from thence send their resolutions into Spaine. The Cardinalls approving this Councell of visiting themselves together did for sundry respects make choise of the City of Bologna for their meeting place.

The Cardinals meet at Bologna to treat of the Popes deliuey.

The Emperor in the meane time being aduertized of the Popes taking, by his choise Chancelles that was going into Italy, did by his speech manifest that he was highly displeased therewith, alleading diuers goodly matters for his iustification. But the effects were not answerable thereunto, resolving on nothing for his deliuey, but in his discourse did oftentimes excuse the Duke of Bourbon and his Army, he did amplify the iniuries which the Pope had done him; he accused his inconstancy and little assurance in his treaties, calling to mind the dangers whereinto the Confederates had gone about to cast him: whereby and by every of his discourses, it was easily perceived that in secret he was well pleased therewith, and that he would neuer consent to his deliuey, nor to that of the French Kings children, but by compulsion.

The Emperors dissimulation concerning the Popes taking.

The French King hauing before sent to make a leuy of tenne thousand Suisses for the enterprise of Lombardy, and his agents going therein slowly to worke, so soone as he had notice of the taking of Rome, fearing the alteration of Fortune, and the Imperialls designs, did sodainly send the money to Lyons, and solicited their speedy departure.

The Venetians on the other side did not cease by all good offices to maintain and encrease that good desire in the Kings propounding vnto him how necessary it was hotly to pursue that warre with great forces, Religion and State agreeing in one, not to suffer the dignity of the Sea Apostolick, and the liberty of Italy to be troden vnder foot: and for to incite him to haste by deeds then words, they determined to renew their nauall army, which was much weakened by the bad ayre and other discommodities at Ciuitauechia, where it had for a time remayned, & to arme besides it, foure Basterd Galleis, of which they appointed Antonio Marcello Captaine, thereby to strengthen the army that it might assaile the Sea-coasts of Puglia: They did moreover propound to the King to leuy, besides the Suisses at their common charge, other tenne thousand foot, drawing in the meane time to their pay all the best experienced Captaines in martiall affaires that they could find: among whom were the Count of Gaiazzo and the Marquis Palaniscin. And to encourage Francis Sforza, of whose freindship and readinesse they made great account, they lent him tenne thousand Ducats, with which he promised to encrease his forces, which were already more then two thousand foot, and to come in person with them to Lauda, there for to ioyne with the Venetian army. Now because that the territories of Romagna were without Garrisons, and exposed to sundry dangers in so wretched a time, no man giuing them ayde nor succour, the Senate being greatly prouoked therunto, sent a good summe of money to the Gouernor of Rauenna to leuy foot forces for the garrison of the City, encouraging him to defend it, with promise of greater ayd if need should be, as within a while after they did, by sending him three hundred foot and an hundred light horse vnder the command of Johann de Nalder, inioyning him to keepe that City for the Sea Apostolick and the league.

The Venetians preparations by Sea & Land

The Venetians place a Garrison in Rauenna for the behoof of the Sea of Rome.

But strife arising in that City betwixt the Inhabitants and the soldiers, the Venetians were entreated by them of the City to send thither one from Venice to be Prouidator there, whereupon Bartolomeo Contrren by the Senates consent went thither to supply that place: Those of Ceruia within a while after did the like where the Guelphes, hauing chased away those of the Gibelline faction, did receiue garrison and a Magistrat of the Venetians, the Legat earnestly requiring it, for

The King of France and England resolve to free the Pope.

The Duke of Vrbini takes Perusa.

for the quiet and conseruation of the same Citie.

Whilest these things were done, the Duke of Vrbini hauing received the Senates commandement, and disposing him selfe for the execution thereof, did first of all make him selfe sure of the Citie of Perusa, wherein Gentil Ballane commanded, who was suspected to hold with the enemies part, whome with threatnings hee enforced to depart thence, and hauing left a strong garrison, there, hee marched with the army to Todi, and from thence to Oruietowhere he ioyned him selfe with the French, and Ecclesiasticall troups, as he had formerly concluded to doe. And hauing there assembled all the cheefe Capitaines, to resolve on what they should afterwards doe, hee caused the Senates letter to be openly read, and then assured them, for the obeying of their command, that hee intended to march directly to Rome, to free by all meanes possible the Pope from imprisonment, resolving if the enemies should shew them selfe, to fight with them, and with others to runne one selfe-same fortune.

The Duke of Vrbini proposes.

This proposition being allowed by the Prouidator Pisani, was entertained with the Generall consent of all the rest, (the Prouidator Vitturi excepted) who being of a contrary opinion opposed him selfe against it both in word and deed, protesting by writing and detesting such an enterprize as most pernicious, and of doubtfull issue, saying that their soldiers were farre inferior both in number and valour to the Imperials, who were very many, and for the most part good soldiers and well experienced, either in fight, or in knowledge how to vanquish, and therefore more valliant and ready to sustaine all attempts how great soeuer. By meanes whereof hee cooled the Dukes former heate, who not-with standing continued in his first resolution to draw neerer to Rome, meaning neuer the lesse to lodge in a very strong and commodious place, what-so-euer should befall, then hee propounded a new inuention, to the end to trie first without danger, if hee could get the Pope from thence, which was speedily and on the sodaine to cause Fredericke of Bozzola to march towards Rome with one company of men at armes, a certaine number of light-horse, and some companies of harquebuziers on horse-backe, hoping that his sodaine and vnlookt for arriuall, might offer some meanes to the Pope to escape by that conuoy, and to come to the army of the league, but this designe succeeded not, for diuers occasions, and chiefly because that Fredericks horse falling vpon him, hee was there-with fore burt, so that hee could goe on no farther, but was enforced to returne.

Vitturi is contrary to the Duke of Vrbini

But the army in the meane time continuing their approaches, they were aduertized by certaine spies, that the trenches which the Imperials had made neere to the Castle, were very great, and hard to be forced: whereby the difficulties of the enterprize were encreased: and moreover that they at Rome expected the Spanish Infantry which was at Naples, and that Capitaine Alarcon was already arrived; wherevpon the Duke was of opinion to passe on no farther with the army, the which was allowed almost by all the other Captains: and therefore hee did speedily aduertize the Senate, saying that for to releue the Castle, it behoued him to haue greater forces then he then had, and in particularizing them, hee did affirme that to draw the Pope from thence, there ought to be in the army the number of sixteen thousand Swisses, leued by a decree of the Cantons, not accounting those that were already there, and besides the Swisses tenne thousand Italian Harquebuziers, three thousand Pioners, and fourtie peeces of ordinance.

V What great forces they were to haue to free the Pope from prison.

These newes did greatly displease the Venetians in regard of the delaying of matters, and of the Popes troubles and weariomenesse, which was much encreased by reading of a letter, written by the Pope to his Lieutenant Gauicardayne, who sent it to the Senate; by the which hee entreated, solicited, and conured the confederates, by all meanes to procure his deliuerance. The Senate

10

20 30

40

Senate therefore hauing heard of the opposition and hinderance made by the Prouidator Vitturi, concerning the approach of the army neere to Rome, discharged him of his office, and being called home to Venice hee was committed to the Auogario there to yeeld an account of his actions.

Vitturi called to account for being contrary to the Popes
deliuitiy.

The Senate in the meane time insulting more earnestly in the same resolution, to releue the Pope, and to draw him from thence, wrote to the Generall, and to the Prouidators, to vie all meanes possible for that purpose to approach neere to the Castle, the which the Generall refusing, chose rather to giue over his place, which the Senators tooke in bad part, but after that the one and the other of them were appealed, they confirmed him in the place of Generall for two yeares more.

The French on the other side greatly detesting the Popes imprisonment, and enuying the Spaniards fortunate successe, made great preparations of warre, the King making account to come to Lyons to take order for the affaires of war, hauing first commanded fiftene thousand Swisses to be leued, and tenne thousand Italian foote. And that hee might like-wile haue a nauall army for that purpose, hee tooke Andre Doria to his pay with eight Gallies, and promised to giue him a yearely entertainment of sixe and thirty thousand crownes, and appointed the Lord of Lautrec Capitaine Generall of all the troups by land; where-with the Venetians being highly pleased, did the more to honour him, appoint Pietro Pesare Procurator of Saint Marke, their Ambassador, who should meet him at his coming into Italy and waite vpon him where-soeuer hee went.

The Kings great
preparations to send into Italy.

Andre Doria
in the Kings service.

The Imperials in the meane time that were in Rome, albeit that their number was much encreased by the arriuall of the Spaniards that came from Naples, finding them selfes to bee foure and twenty thousand foote, tooke their leisure, enioying with ease the wealthy spoyle that they had gotten at the sacke of the Citie, their Capitaines being not able, neither to cause them to come fourth of the towne, nor yet to restrain their vnbridled licence: two companies alone of Lancequenets, leauing the Citie went and spoyled Terni and Narni, going on no farther, not-with standing that the Confederates army was farre enough: for those of the league hauing lost their hope of the enterprize of Rome, the Venetians following the Marquis of Salusses, and all the French went and encamped on the confines of the Siennois, to assure thereby the Florentines Territories, and to bring them to this passe, (the which they did) to ratifie the league, and to entertaine sixe thousand foote in the army at their owne charges, wherein they shewed them selfes so much the more willing and ready, by how much they were neere vnto danger, the Imperiall Capitaines threatening to turne their forces vpon them, being displeased with them; for that in the beginning of the Popes misfortune, they had made some shew to follow the Emperors party, and yet after-wards had cleaued to his enemies.

The Venetian forces did at that time consist of sixe thousand Italian foote-men, two thousand Lancequenets, thirce hundred light horse, and two thousand men at armes, and the French Infantry was not aboute seauen thousand foote-men, albeit the King paid a greater number. But the great dearth of victuall and the sharpe diseases which did dayly decrease the army, did hinder them from enterprizing any matter. By reason whereof the enemies forces being encreased and those of the league diminished, the Pope hauing lost all hope of speedy releef, did wholly incline to practizes of agreement and hoping to haue a better composition of the Viceroy, who was at Sienna, he sent for him, and by the same meanes entreated the Duke of Vrbini to suffer him safely to come to Rome.

The number of
the Venetians
army.

The Popes desire to an agreement.

The Viceroy went willingly and in great hast to the army, not so much for the Popes profit, as for the hope hee had to be made General therof. But being arriued at Rome, whither he came by a safe conduct of the Captains of the league, he had notice

10

20 30

40

50

notice that the Lancequenets and Spaniards wisht him no good, who after the Duke of Bourbons death had chosen the Prince of Orange for their Generall, so as he had not the courage to speake of any agreement with the Pope, but much lesse to tarry there: for being not gracious in the eyes of the army, he had no more authority, neither in the affaires of warre, nor in the treaty of agreement with the Pope, who at the last being bankrupt of all hope, did on the sixth day of Iune make an agreement with the Imperialls, on the same conditions, in a manner, as he might before then haue decreed vpon with them.

Articles of agreement betwixt the Pope and Emperour.

That the Pope should pay vnto the army foure hundred thousand Ducats: should deliuer to the Emperour to keepe so long as he should thinke good the Castle of Saint Angelo, the Forts of Ostia, Ciuitauechia, and Ciuitacastellane, with the Citties of Placentia, Parma and Modena. For the accomplishment of which matters, the Pope, being not yet wholly set at liberty, was to remaine prisoner in the Castle, with the Cardinalls that were with him, who were thirteene in number, vntill the army had receiued the first payment, which was of one hundred and fifty thousand Ducats, and that afterwards they should goe to Naples or Gayetta to expect in that place how the Emperour would determine of them.

How the Persecutions behaued themselves vpon this agreement.

This manner of proceeding did greatly displease the Venetians: but the Pope, fearing his owne life, because of the Colonesi and the Lancequenets, was enforced to allow of this agreement, albeit that it was very preiudicial to him: wherevpon the Venetians, hoping that time might bring them better fortune, determined to keepe the City of Cremona, and to that end caused the army, which they had in Lombardy, neere to Crema, to crosse forthwith the river Adda, to put a Garrison in to that City, and to hinder the consignment of the others, by breaking the condition agreed vpon, and by spoyling the Countrey neere to Milan and Pavia to molest and weaken the Imperialls.

Now the Castle of Saint Angelo was by this accord forthwith yeilded to Capitaine Alarcon, who entred it with three companies of Spanish footmen, and three companies of Lancequenets, appointed to guard the Castle and the Pope: But the other townes and Castles, that were promised, were not so easily consigned, by reason that the Castle of Ciuita-Chastellane was guarded by the Confederates, and Andrew Doris refused to deliuer vp that of Ciuitauechia, vnlesse he were first paid foureene thousand Ducats, which he said was due vnto him for his entertainment: Parma and Placentia on the other-side, abhorring the Spanish gouernment, refused to receiue them, and those of Modena were reduced vnder the obedience of the Duke of Ferrara, who making vse of the Popes calamity, threatening the Modenoi to spoile their corne, which was almost ripe, did enforce them to deliuer vp the city into his hands.

The Confederates army remained quiet without attempting any thing, expecting the arriuall of the Lord of Lautrec, who was said to be already in Piedmont, with great forces, both of horse and foot, albeit the Captaines in the meane time were of sondry opinions, some thinking that being vnited with the French, it would be best for them to march directly to Rome, where they should find the Imperiall army in such disorder as they might easily set the Pope at liberty, by reason that it was much diminished, as well by the contagious sicknesse which was in the City, as by the ouer-much licence which the Soldiers had taken for certaine monethes space, liuing without all order, and without any martiall discipline, some of them being lodged in the City, and others heere and there abroad, and that diuers of them being disbanded went their waies daily without any leaue: whereby they might with ease driue those few from Rome that remayned behind.

Sondry opinions in the Confederates army about the Popes deliuey.

Those of the contrary opinion thought, that for the effecting of that designe it were better to scour the state of Milan, being neere thereunto, to enforce the

the Imperialls to leaue Rome, and to come to the defense thereof, which might prouee either to slow or insufficient to stoppe the current of the victory, wherby they might at one time execute diuers fortunate exploits, and perhaps giue an end to the warre.

This being allowed by all men, and propounded to the Lord of Lautrec at his arriuall, he entred into the state of Milan with eight thousand Suisses, three thousand Gascons, and tenne thousand footmen conducted by Pedro of Nauarre, and went and encamped before the towne of Bolco, on the marches of Alexandria, where was a Garrison of a thousand footmen, the most of whom were Lancequenets, who after they had for the space of tenne dayes sustained the battery and sundry assaults, did at the last yeeld themselves at the discretion of the Victor.

Lautrec entred into the City of St. Iulian with great force.

Bolco and Alexandria are taken by Lautrec.

This conquest was followed by that of Alexandria, whither the Lord Lautrec came afterwards and encamped; wherein lay fiftene hundred footmen, who being molested at one time, both by the Artillery and the mynes, were enforced to yeeld: their liues and goods being saued.

But the taking of Alexandria was cause of the beginning of some contention betwixt the confederates. For the Lord of Lautrec being desirous to leaue fiftene hundred footmen in Garrison there, to the end that at all euents his owne companies might haue one place of retreat, and those which should come from France finde some comodiousnesse of meeting there the Duke of Milans Ambassador, fearing that it would be the beginning of an occasion to possesse that State for his King, opposed him-selfe against it, the like did the Ambassadors of England and Venice, wherevpon Lautrec agreed (not without indignation) to leaue it freely to the Duke of Milan: a matter which did afterwards greatly preiudice the league.

Strife betwixt the confederates concerning the taking of Alexandria.

Now Lautrec, after the conquest of Alexandria propounded that he would march to Rome to free the Pope from imprisonment, who, although he had agreed (as hath bene said) with the Almuzins and Spaniards, did neuertheless still remaine a prisoner vnder their guard, vntill that he had accomplished the articles of the agreement, as wel for payment of the money, as for the consignment of the aboue mentioned townes, where-in were found sundry difficulties: wherevpon the Emperour did not there-in shew him-selfe well-disposed nor resolute, although by his speech he sought to haue all men to beleue the contrary.

But the Venetians did wholly dislike of Lautrecs proposition: not that they stood lesse affected to the Popes enlargement then did the King, but because they thought the enterprife of Rome lesse profitable for the common cause then that of Milan, as it had bene debated before his coming, and afterwards confirmed by him-selfe, that there was at the same time great hope of being able to conquer Pavia and Milan, where there were weak Garrison, and that Antonio de Leus, who by his diligence and skill, more then by force, did gouerne that State, lay greuously sicke; and was vnable to provide remedies: that losing this opportunity the affaires of the league would euer afterwards decline, in regard of the huge number of Lancequenets that were ready to come down from the Countie of Tiroll, into Lombardy, But by taking Milan from them, which was their only retreat, and hauing neither euallery nor victuals, they would be enforced to change their mindes, and to tarry at home in their houses: that in the meane space it would giue time and leisure to tenne thousand Almuzins, payd by the King of England, to come to the campe of the league; and afterwards they might with those forces march to Rome, and driue the enemies before them, assuring together with the Churches State, the liberty of all Italy.

The Venetians oppose themselves against the Lord Lautrecs proposition, who goe to Rome and to take the State of Milan.

Pauiā is taken by Lautrec.

The Lord of Lautrec inclining to their request, determined to march towards Pauiā, before which with great speed he went and encamped (the reliefe which Antonio de Lens sent, not being able to enter it) the which being battered for the space of foure daies, and a great part of the wall beaten downe, the soldiours making their approches, did enter it by the breach. The City was sackt, and the French for eight daies together vsed all sorts of cruelty vpon the inhabitants, who had vanted that they had bene the vanquishers of the French King, because that King Francis was taken prisoner lying at the siege of the same City.

Genoa reduced vnder the King's obedience.

The Genowais at the same time being afflicted with sundry losses and calamities, and chiefly with famine, sent Ambassadors to the Lord Lautrec for to capitulate. The Cities Duke, whose name was Antonio Adorni, retired him-self into the Castell, and the tumult being appeased by Phillip Doris, who was prisoner there, the City returned vnder the Kings obedience, who appointed Theodorio Triunulcio gouernor thereof: and the Venetians, because they would not leaue their Captaines vnrecompenced, who had valiantly behaued themselves in the reduction of Genoa, they encreased to Cesar Fregoso the conduct of other thirty men at armes, and doubled his pay; they did like-wise acknowledge the valour and prowesse of Guy Nalda, Augustin Clusone, Haniball Fregoso, Cesar Martinega, and diuers others whose valour did greatly apcare in that action.

The French and Venetian fleet are scattered by tempest.

The businesse of Genoa being ended, and John Mora, the Prouidator of the Venetians nauall army being come with fixteene Gallies to Liurorne, where hee found Doria who tarried for him, with fixteene Gallies, they resolved together to giue in vpon the Isle of Sardinia, hoping easily to winne it, and that it would bee very commodious for them, for the conquest of Sicily; but this enterprize proved infortunate, for the fleet being come neere to the Island, and hauing taken certaine Sea townes, it hapned, as it went from one place to another, that it was assailed by a furious tempest, which did scatter it into sundry places, certaine Venetian Gallies being a long time beaten in it, did at last arriue safely at Liurorne. The rest after-wards hauing runne the same fortune, came to Corsica, whether the French Gallies had already escaped, (two excepted) which were broken vpon the rockes of Sardinia. And not being able at that time to enterprize any thing at Sea, by reason that winter approached, John Mora retired with his Gallies to Corsou: Petro Lande was at the same time Generall of the Venetians nauall army, who was commanded to scoure the Seas neere to the Islands, and places of their dominions, to assure and comfort their subiects, and that saying into Sicily hee should take all the ships that were fould to bee loden with corne, and send them to Venice where was great scarcity of victualls.

But the Generall hauing for the assurance of the Seas sent Augustine de Mula the Prouidator with two light Gallies, to scoure on the one side, and Antonio Marcello with foure Bastard Gallies whereof hee was Capitaine on the other, it fell out that Marcello being come to Candy into the Hauē of La Suda, had intelligence that a Turkish Gally was to passe neere vnto the Island, he supposing that it was Cortugall, a famous Pirate, who not long before in the same Seas, had taken and spoyled a Venetian shippe; and then burnt it, killing all the Mariners and passengers that were in it, did speedily come forth of the Hauē, and being desirous to revenge that iniury came on a sodaine to assaile it, the which hee tooke, and then retired with his owne and this Gally to La Bicorna: Where the Gallies ryding with their Poopes towards the land, hee desired within a while after seauen Turkish Gallies to passe along one after another, which belonged to the Moore of Alexandria, (as the same

did

did which he had taken) Marcello remaining firme in that place, without any feare at all was amazed when he saw himselfe assailed on the sodaine by the Barbarian, who hauing re-assembled his owne, did furiously assaile him, where-vpon Marcello was enforced to escape by flight; the like did his fellows, who not departing to loose as he, but one alone escaped, the other two being taken were carned to Alexandria.

The Venetian Capitaine being to yeeld an account for this deed, the Auogares of the Republick were commanded to take notice thereof, and for this purpose he was sent for from the army as a prisoner; but greefe by the way killed him. Soliman being aduertized of the indiscretion of the Capitaine, and of the Senates good will, not like a barbarous Prince, vsing curtesie, and liberality towards the Senate, sent back their Gallies which were taken, being loden with salt-peeter, which they greatly needed, and bestowed them vpon the Venetians as his gift. For this cause and for diuers other signes of friendship, the Senate thought good to send an expresse Ambassade to him to giue him thanks in the common-wealths name for all his curtesies and demonstrations of Friendship towards it, and to continew and encrease that good will in him.

Thomas Contaren was chosen for this purpose, vnto whom were giuen diuers rich garments and other presents of great value to present to the Bassas of the Port, and chiefly to Ibrahim, who for the friendship and affection which the great Turke did beare vnto him, was at the same time in great credit and reputation.

Whilst these things were done in the Leuant, the Lord of Lautrec returning to his former designs, at such time as all men expected, that following the course of his victory he would haue marched towards Milan to beseege it, he turned another way, and hauing with his army passed the Po, he marched towards Placentia, intending (as he said) to lay by all other enterprizes, and to thinke on nothing, but how to sette the Pope at liberty. All men wondered at this sodaine change, seeing the faire occasion which was offered, if he had continued to giue an end vnto the warre of Lombardy by taking the City of Milan.

It was not knowne whether Lautrec was moued thereunto, rather by some particular affection, or for some interest of his King, then for any care he had of the Popes liberty. It is certaine that in his heart he did beare a secret grudge to the Venetians, and Francis Sforza, for their oppositions concerning the matter of Alexandria. These suspicions were confirmed by his manner of proceeding, who speedily departing, with such ill promise as hee had, forth of the state of the Dutchy of Milan, did afterwards pursue his journey very slowly, and for that after hee had ioynd him-selfe with the Almaine foote-men, vpon the expecting of whom hee had at the first excused his delay, he remained at Parma without doing any thing.

The Army of the league, had no better successe, who being lodged neere to Montefalcone did spend the time vnprofitably, notwithstanding that the weakness of the enemies army did sufficiently afford them meanes to execute somme enterprize. This gaue occasion to the Venetians to suspect, that the Duke of Vrbin, for his owne perticular interest, did not proceed with such fidelity as he ought, therefore they placed guardes ouer his wife and children who lay at that time at Murana. The Duke of Vrbin hauing intelligence that the Venetians did distrust him, sent Horacio Florida, one of his Gentlemen to Venice, to procure leaue for him to come thither, that he might iustifie himselfe and yeeld an account of his actions.

The Senate, either for that they were better informed, or else being very desirous to fite them-selues vnto time and necessity, would not permit him to depart from the army, but hauing remoued the guardes from his wife and children

The Turke being assailed by Marcello had his speedy reuenge.

Marcello dieth by the way for greefe.

Soliman's liberality to the Venetians

Lautrec leueth Milan and marcheth towards Rome.

*Vrbin moued
the Lord Lautrece to change his determination.*

*The Venetians
do suspect the Duke of Vrbin.*

made a shew that they were well satisfied and contented with his seruice to the Republike.

And perceiving after-wards that they could not alter the Lord of Lautrecs resolution, they placed their forces which they had in Lombardy, which were fiftene thousand foote in garrison in sundry places, for the gard of those townes which they had recovered in the state of Milan, and gave to the said Lord Lautrec fiftene hundred light horse for the enterprize of Rome.

What moved the Venetians to a active charge of the warre in Lombardy.

All the care and meanes to keepe the conquered townes in the Dutchy of Milan, fell vpon the signory, Francis Sforza being not able to doe it, who of himselfe could not entertaine the ordinary Garisons, not-with-standing that he was obliged by the treaty of agreement, to send forces into the field to resist the attempts of Antonio de Lena: besides this, the Venetians feare to lose their owne, did incite them therevnto, who stood in doubt like-wile that the warre would light on their owne state, hauing intelligence of the great forces which were leuiued in Tiroll, and in other places neere adioyning, with the great preparations of victuals and other munitions which was made at Trent to send into Italy. By meane whereof, the Senate imagining that it behooued them to encrease their army, to the number of twenty thousand foote, and to make a very great provision to maintayne, in a manner, an other very difficult and dangerous warre, sent to entreat the King of England, that in so great a necessity hee would be pleased to releuee the Common-wealth, by contributing a part of the payment of the army, where-with they were to conserue and maintaine the liberty of Italy, whereof hee had so often said that hee would be the Protector.

A notable excuse of the King of England to the Venetians request.

But the King of England, continuing that which hee had at other times spoken, that hee would beginne to make warre on the Emperor in Flanders, and by that meane enforcing him to diuert his forces else-where, hee might free Italy from that danger, made a shew, that for the common good of them all, hee himselfe was to make greates preparations, and necessary provisions for such a designe. In regard whereof, the Signory, being constrained alone to vndergoe all the charges of the warre, was faine to haue recourse to extraordinary meanes, the publike treasure being in a manner exhausted, by reason of the continuall warres.

The French king and Venetians demands

Among all these stirres and great warlike preparations, the treaty of peace was not altogether broken of, the Emperor making shew to desire it, both with the French King and the Venetians: where-vpon sundry pratizes were set on foote to that end. The Demands of the most Christian King, and the Venetians, were in effect these, that the Emperor should restore to the French King his children; That hee should set the Pope at liberty, giue ouer all that which hee held from the Church, re-establish Francis Sforza in the state of Milan, and withdraw his forces forth of Lombardy and from Rome.

What was the Emperors intention concerning peace.

The Emperor did not altogether reiect these demands, neither yet would wholly accept of them, but in seeking, not without difficulty, to make some certaine resolution, hee demanded of the Venetians a great summe of mony, holding by that meane the treaty in suspence, being desirous to make vse of time, and to behaue him-selfe according to the euent of the affaires of Italy, and the new stirres which his brothers preparations would procure: hoping in the meane time, still to be able, with better aduantage, to conclude an agreement with the French King alone, determining to exclude all the other Confederates, and to appropriat vnto him-selfe the Dutchy of Milan.

This was easily discerned by his owne words, persisting euer in all morions of agreement, that he would haue Francis Sforzas cause debared and censured by Iudges there-vnto appoynted, and that in the meane time the City of Milan, and the whole state should be kept and garded in his name, and by his owne owne Garrisons, his cheefe ayme tending wholly to become absolute maister thereof, hauing first broken all the forces of the Confederates. Where vpon all these motions of peace being laid aside, warre was againe denounced to him by the Confederates: who hoping therein to make good vse of the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua, in regard of the neere neighbour-hood of their states, both the one and the other were founded, and it was at last concluded with the Duke of Ferrara, that hee should be receiued into the league, on condition to send to the Confederates army, two hundred men at armes, paid by him-selfe, and monthely to contribute, for the space of fixe moneths, tenne thousand Ducats toward the payment of the infantry: and on the other side, the Confederates promised to take him and his State like-wile into their protection and safeguard, where-vpon within a while after a great and Magnificent Pallace was restored to him which was his owne in Venice.

An accord made with the Duke of Ferrara.

As concerning the agreement with the Marquis, there was greater difficulty in the conclusion thereof, because he craued to be made Generall of the League in the absence of the Lord of Lautrec: wherevnto the Venetians would not consent, for the respect they did beare to the Duke of Vrbin. But in the end, Jerónimo Lene, Gouvernor of Verona, being sent by the Senates commandement vnto Mantua, to end that businesse, hee did conclude it without the aboue-mentioned condition, the Confederates taking the person of the Marquis, and his State into their protection.

The marquis of Mantua, joyne to the league.

Now the Emperor perceiving that he was to deale with so many enemies, determined first of all to publish the iustice of his cause, and by that meane to draw away the King of England from them, and for this purpose hee resolved to set the Pope at liberty, for which hee sent an ample commission to the Viceroi, and to D. Hugo de Moncada, (who being newly deceased,) the Viceroi did execute it, the Pope making ouer to the Emperor, according to the agreement, Ostia, Ciuitauaccchia, and Ciuito Castellane, and paying likewise, (but more commoiously) the summe of mony promised, and promising in speciall, not to haue any dealing in the affaires of Naples nor Milan against the Emperor.

The Emperor committeth that the Pope should be liberated.

The Confederates resolving to make warre both by sea and land, in the beginning of the yeare 1528. prepared great forces for to passe into the Kingdome of Naples, as it had beene determined according to the desire and intention of the French King, not-with-standing that they were well assured, that the Imperiall army, at their departure from Rome, would take their iourne into Naples. But the Confederates thinking it a matter of great importance, to draw the Pope into the Confederacy, were in great hope thereof, because that his Holinesse hauing aduertized the French King and the Venetians of the passed agreement, and his owne liberty, entreated them to excuse him, if necessity had enforced him to do so, confessing that he was greatly bound to the Princes of the League, and to haue receiued a very rigorous and cruell entertainment of the Imperials.

The Pope commaunders the imperiall dealings.

So soone as the Venetians vnderstood that the Pope was set at liberty, and that he was newly gonne to Oruicta, they speedily sent Lodouico Pisani the Prouidator to his Holinesse, to lament with him in the Common-wealths name, for his passed fortunes, and to acquaint him with the great greefe that the Signory had conceiued thereat, and with what care they had labored his enlargement, whereof they were now wonderfull ioyfull, to see that to be effected which they had so much desired. That the Republike had willingly employed all her forces and meanes, bene at great charge and expence to entertaine an army in Tuscany, at the same time as it behooued it to haue an other in Lombardy: had not refused to expose it selfe to all dangers for the conseruation of the Sea Apostolicke, and for the particular profit of his Holynesse Person, as it was yet still ready to doe, and to reuenge the notorious iniuries done vnto him; that the Kings of France and England, the Florentines, the Duke of Milan and the Venetians were of the same mind, not to leave such an Infoleny unpunished: how that cursed nation had incurred the wrath of God and men, that they did not doubt but that Iustice and Innocency would preuaile, and that his Holinesse being restored to his former state, all matters would redound to his honour and glory. And that therefore all the Confederats did greatly desire and likewise hope that his Holinesse to releue their sincere and entire intention with his authority, would confirme the Confederacy as Cheefe thereof, by newly ratifying, that which before had beene agreed vpon by them, seeing that the first agreement ought to be of more force, then the latter, as being concluded by himselfe in quality of Pope, and with his pure and freewill, and this latter being extorted by force and violence, as from a prisoner that was desirous of his liberty.

The Venetians answer a: to the Pope.

The French King caused the same congratulation to be made to him by the Lord of Longueuall his Ambassador whom he sent to Rome, to testifie the great desire he euer had to constrain the Emperor by force to doe that which at last he had done, and that the praetizes of peace betwixt the Emperor and him, had beene to none other end but to amuze him and make him cold in the preparations for warre, and not with an intention to conclude any thing with him, helping himselfe with the same cunning, wherewith he had sundry times praetized in his behalfe.

These Ambassadors were very pleasing to the Pope, and by him attentively heard, wherevpon, he gaue thanks to the King and the Venetians, with demonstration of great loue towards them, saying, that for his deliuerance, he felt himselfe no lesse bound to the French King and the Venetians then if he had beene freed by their armes: but yet neuertheless all this was without any resolution, for vpon their entreaty that he would confederate himselfe with the rest, he beganne to make them sundry answers: at one time putting them in hope presently to doe it, at another, excusing himselfe, that hauing neither men, money, nor authority, it would not greatly profit them if he should declare himselfe, and yet neuertheless it might hurt him, because it would giue an occasion to the Imperials to molest him in sundry places: besides his Pontificall dignity, the condition of the times and the greuous and sharpe miseries that he had sustained, did very much incite him to a neutrality, and to become a fit Instrument to treat with the French King, and the other Christian Princes concerning an vniuersall peace and quiet: and that therefore he would no more commit himselfe to the hazards of warre.

It may be that being carried away by the Emperors faire promises, (who with his owne hand wrote a gentle and courteous letter to him, how that he would hence forward follow his counsell and commit vnto him the whole negotiation of the peace) he might speake thus, or else that which is most likely and which was afterwards discovered, he was content to forget all the wrong which he had received by his imprisonment to haue better means to reuenge the iniuries done to himselfe and his house by the Florentines.

His intent then was with sundry excuses to couer this desire of his: for being discovered, it would haue bred such a distrust in the Lord of Lautrec, as it would easily haue caused him to alter his purpose from passing on any farther in the enterprize of Naples which was a thing the Pope desired, to the end that the Lancesquens might be enforced to depart from Rome, who mutining often-times among themselves would not get them thence, demanding new payments of money.

The Lord of Lautrec being ignorant of the Popes designe, and vpon the assurance of his ayd and fauor, did in the meane time pursue the enterprize of Naples, albeit it was against the opinion and consent of the Venetians who by reason

The French Kings Ambassador to the Pope.

The Popes excuse because he would not enter into any new confederacy.

What the Popes intention was.

reason of that new leauy of Lancesquens for the enemies, could haue wished that hee might not goe so farre off, to the end they might the better and with more conueniency be releued.

Lautrec then, being resolute in his opinion, tooke his way thorow Romagna and La Marca, thinking it to be best and most conuenient for the commodity of victuals, and for the carriage of the ordnance, determining to enter into the Realme of Naples by the way of Ottonte, which diuideth the Churches State from the Kingdome of Naples, thorow which at one time were gonne before, the Venetian troupes, diuided into two bands, in the first were Valerio Frisino and the Prouidator Pisani: and in the other, followed Camillo Frisino and Pietro Pefare. These being gonne before, seized on Cimitella, and afterwards on Sulmona, and on diuers others in Abruzzo, which yielded voluntarily. But the whole troupes did afterwards meet altogether neere to Saint Fermo, to the number of thirty thousand foot, and great numbers of Caulletry, as well men at armes as light-horse, a preparation without all doubt sufficient for any enterprize whatsoever, the Lord Lautrec hauing taken the longest way into Puglia by the sea side, in regard of the difficulty to carry the ordnance, if in those mountainous places hee should haue met with any encombrance of the enemies.

The Prince of Orange and the Marquis of Guasto being greatly mouued for the danger, wherevnto they perceived the affaires of Naples to be brought, did not without great difficulty draw away their troupes from Rome, which was greatly furthered by the summe of twenty thousand Ducats which the Pope gaue to the Imperiall captaines, vnder colour of some old claimes, whereof they gaue some pay to the Lancesquens, who more then the rest seemed most loath to depart. But the number of their whole army did not amount to aboue foureteene thousand, and yet so fore weakened, as well by the contagious sicknesse which was in Rome, as for that many souldiers were disbanded and gonne home to their country laden with spoile.

But the Pope by this meanes being freed of that which did most presse him, and for the which he had till then kept himselfe a loose from the confederates, so soone as these enemies troupes were departed from Rome, hee sent the Archbishop Sipontyne to Venice, to demand of the Senate that it should forthwith render vnto him the Cities of Ceruia and Rauenna: and on the other side he dispatched the Bishop of Pistoya into France to excuse him to the King (whom till then hee had entertained with sundry hopes that he would declare himselfe for the league) for that he could not according to his desire make a new confederacy, because that wanting both money and forces, his declaration would nothing profit the Confederates; that all he could doe was to treat of peace, and for that purpose hee had giuen commission to the said Bishop to goe to the Emperour, to exhort him with vehement speeces thereto, mixing neuertheless with that discourse, some complaint against the Venetians, for that they had possessed and did still detain certain of the Churches lands.

The Popes demand was much displeasing to the Senate, not so much for the matter in question, as because it was made in an vnseasonable time, perceiving very well that the Pope sought onely some occasion to breake off from them, as also for that it was a matter vnreasonable rashly to yield vp thefe townes, in so disordered a time, and in which the Imperials did still hold many townes of the Churches State: yet neuertheless sundry were of opinion that it was not good to breake with the Pope for any occasion whatsoever, but that they ought by all meanes to gratifie him, and for the rest to depend on his promise and good will, reposing so much trust in him, as that he would not forsake them.

This businesse being debated in the Senate, Dominico Trevisan, Procurator of Saint Marke, a man of great reputation for his long experience and knowledge in affaires of importance, declared by found and pregnant reasons: how that it

Lautrec entered into Puglia.

The number of the Imperial army.

The Popes demand to the Venetians.

The Popes excuses to the French King.

Sundry opinions of the Senate concerning the Popes demand.

The Senate answers to the Pope.

was best to obseue the Pope, and to render those Cities which he demanded: On the contrary, Lodouico Mocenigo Knight, one of the chiefe Senators, and who had bene of opinion to send backe the Nuncio with a refusal of his demand, rose vp, and hauing propounded the inconueniences which might redound to the Signory, by furrenning, in so miserable a season, those Cities which the Pope craved, the Senators grew to be diuided, some of them inclining to one side and some to another. But at last they resolved to answer the Pope, That the Senate had euer bene very desirous of peace, which might be for the good and safety of the Commonweal, and particularly to the glory and advancement of the Church, and that therefore it would willingly embrace any kinde of agreement, but that it behoued them first to consult together to moderate the other difficulties, and that for the same end they would shortly send an expresse Ambassador to treat in his presence of the businesse propounded by the Archbishop Sipontine, and of all other matters, to let him know their sincere and entire loue towards him.

According to this answer, they on a sodaine appointed Casparo Contaren their Ambassadour for Rome: but the Pope being displeased therewith, shewed himselfe more sharpe and earnest in his demand; whereupon the Lord Lautrec hauing sent to his Holinesse the Count Gaydo Rangone, and the Knight Casall, to vse all meanes they could to appease him, they did not only loose their labour, but he told them besides that if those Cities were not surrendered to him, in stead of declaring himselfe for the league (wherevnto they did daily sollicite him) hee would vnite himselfe with the Imperials, causing his Nuncio to say as much to the King: and indeed he declared by euident signes that he inclined thereto, hauing expressely sent a Nuncio into Spaine to treat with the Emperour, al-be-it he affirmed, that hee had giuen him commission but to treat of an vniuersall peace, wherevnto if the Emperour should refuse to harken, that he should denounce warre, as the other Confederates had done.

During all these practizes, the Imperiall captaines, who were already passed into the Kingdome of Naples, beganne to be of different opinions: For the Marquis of Gualto on the one side counselled them to march whither the Lord Lautrec lay with his army, to trie if they could draw him to the fight, this he did for diuers occasions which moued him to hazard the whole, on the yncertaine event of a battaile.

First, because that the Confederates were diuided amongst themselves (their infantery being greater then Lautrecs) for that the people of the Kingdome did daily rise in the behalfe of the French, the difficulty of receiving any money from the Emperour, and the mutines which vpon that occasion the Almaine foot-men made, in regard whereof it being to bee feared that the entire losse of that State would ensue, he thought it much more profitablie to hazard all on the event of battaile, wherein lay as great hope of good successe as of danger: and the French army being broken, at the townes, which they had taken, would returne vnder their obedience, and the Kingdome of Naples might thereby bee assured.

Others maintained the contrary, saying, That the safest way for them was to lodge in some place strong by situation, and commodious for victuals, from whence the enemies could not easily drine them, where they might obserue and narrowly mark the behavior of the army of the league, and according thereto to order their owne enterprizes: and if that they should perceiue the enemies to encrease in prosperous successe, then to take vpon them the defense of the City of Naples, because that vpon the conseruation or losse of the same did wholly depend the successe of that warre: That they had receiued newes how that the Prince of Melphi, and Fabrizio Maramani were on wards on their way, with great forces for their reliefe, & that their army being therewith strengthened, they needed no more to feare the enemies attempts, but should be able to breake

10

20 30

40

50

all

all their designs. That it was the part of him that had charge to defend a State enuaded by a mighty army, to temporize, because that time doth very often bring with it great and vnlooked for commodities: that without all doubt there were disorders in the enemies army, and by so much the greater, by how much the interests of the Confederates were different: that there was nothing which could lesse be gouerned by discretion and good counsell, then the successe of battailes: that there was none so safe and ready a way to victory, nor any thing more worthy the reputation of a great captaine, then to entertaine the enemy with sundry cunninges, and consume him by little and little, with time and discommodity, the which vndoubtedly might happen to the French campe: That they needed not likewise to feare, but that the Neapolitans would prouide money for the necessary payment of the Lansequens, till such time as the pay from Spaine should arriue.

This opinion being accompanied with the authority of Alarcon who did constantly maine it, was receiued for the best, wherevpon they resolved to passe forward, with an easie march, euer lodging in stronge and safe places, and in this manner to enter into the Terra di Lauor, to come neere to the City of Naples. But the Imperials being retired into Troy to make prouision of victuals and to enquire after the enemy, Lautrec (as the French are more hardy and resolute) embraced that designe which the enemy had quited, and determined to seeke them out and to offer them battaile, moued chiefly thereto (as hee said afterwards) for feare least his army should on a sodaine dissolue it selfe and deprive him of the fruite of other fortunate successes till then obtained, for want of pay.

For payment being to come from France, he perceiued that the King did openly shew himselfe to be weary of so great expences, and his officers to be negligent in appointing necessary prouisions: hee had besides great hope to winne the victory, the Marquis of Salustes being ioyned with him, and daylie expecting the Venetian and Florentine troupes, consisting of very choice footmen.

On the contrary, notwithstanding that the number of souldiers in the Imperiall campe was not inferiour to the French, their valour neuertheless was much diminished, as well by the great sicknesse, as by the disorder and excess which they had for the space of many monthes committed, whereby their bodies and mindes being become weake and effeminate, had in a manner lost all their vsuall brauery: and besides, those souldiers being wont to liue at pleasure, with an extraordinary liberty, did no more obseue as they ought martiall discipline. Moreouer, Lautrec was much stronger then the enemy in caualery and prouision of ordnance, whereby it seemeth that he did not without cause perswade himselfe to obtaine the victory, and to conquer that whole State.

The Imperiall army hauing intelligence that Lautrec approached, came forth of Troy, and hauing posselt a little hill which riseth towards the plaine, did their encampe and fortifie it selfe. Lautrec being come neere thereto, placed his souldiers in order of battaile, determining (notwithstanding that the Venetian and Florentine troupes were not arriued) to fight with them and to offer battaile, desying and prouoking them by his ordnance which plaied vpon their campe. But the Imperials receiuing small hurt by the shot, in regard of the situation of the place wherein they were, and resolving not to fight, keeping themselves within their rampiers and fortifications, sent forth onely some light-horse and a few Harguebuziers to skirmish with the French, who marching still forward came and lodged hard by the enemies campe, which they did in danger by their artillery, those that were come forth to skirmish not being able to hinder Lautrec from coming forwards, wherevpon the enemies determined to dislodge, and to goe and encampe on the farther side of Troy towards Nocera: where hauing within a while after intelligence that Horacio Baillone with the Florentine troupes was come to the campe of the league, and that Camillo Pysino and

The Imperials embrace the opinion of Alarcon.

Lautrec resolved to fight with the enemy.

Lautrec distinguished and prouoked the Imperiall army to battaile.

Sundry opinions of the Imperiall army.

The Imperial's retire towards Naples.

and the Prouidator Pisani, would arrive there the morrow after; they refused to depart forth of Abruzzo, and to march directly towards Naples, according to their first designe; chiefly to defend that City as the principall of the whole State.

The confidence take Melfi.

The Lord Lautrec being out of hope to enforce the enemies to fight, who had already so openly refused it, converted all his designes to make himselfe Master of the country, and not to leave any enemy towne behinde him; before that he would march to Naples. Whereupon having intelligence that the Prince of Melfi, had entred Melfi with great numbers of souldiers, he sent Pedro of Navarre thither with his Gascon companies, and Ballone with the blacke bands and two Cannons, who having battered it, they tooke and sacked it.

Alcoli, Barlet-ta, Trani, and diuers other townes, yield to the confidence.

At the same time the Prouidator Pisani with two thousand Venetian footmen tooke the towne of Alcoli, and then he came and ioyned with Lautrec, vnto whom were yeelded Barletta, Trani, and diuers others townes neere adioyning, some of them being moued therevnto by the feare of the disaster of Melfi, and others by a particular affection which they did beare to the French, being weary of the Spanish gouernment, so as there was no other towne in all Puglia that held for the Emperour but only Manfredonia. Whereupon Lautrec having left for the besieging of that City and for the gard of those that he had conquered, the Venetian troupes, which were in all two thousand footmen, an hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horse, he marched in great speed with the residue of the army towards Naples, all places thorow which he passed, yeelding vnto him.

Lautrec marcheth with his army towards Naples.

Lautrec en-campeth with in two miles
of Naples.

Being come to Caforia, three miles from Naples vpon the high way to Aversa, hee determined to encampe there, as the onely meane to make himselfe Master thereof, and for that purpose caused his army to march directly towards the City, betwixt Poggio Royall and Saint Martins Mount, the companies extending themselves within halfe a mile of Naples, and the Lord Lautrec in person was gone somewhat farther then Poggio Royall, to the Duke of Montalto his Farme, where he fortified himselfe.

At the same time, the Venetians naual army hauing beene refreshed and restored at Corfou, after the losse that it sustained by tempest neere to the Isle of Sardinia, was come along the coast of Puglia, being sixteene Gallies in number, vnder the conduct of Iohn Mora the Prouidator, because that Petro Landi General of the Venetian gallies was gone into Candy, to appease certaine troubles of the country men in the streight of La Canea.

Six Cities appointed to the Venetians by the agreement of the league.

Now by the agreement and convention of the league, fixe cities of Puglia were appointed to the Signory of Venice, namely, Otranto, Brundisium, Monopoli, Pouignane, Mola, and Trani, which it had in times past enioyed, and therefore the Venetians hauing, besides the Gallies; diuers other armed vessels, did with greater courage pursue the conquest of those townes, being assured, besides their owne strength, of the loue and good will of the Inhabitants, who did infinitely wish for them, wherevpon so soone as the army approached, Monopoli and Trani yeelded to them, the rest making shew to doe the like, so soone as occasion should be offered.

Almopoli and Trani yeelded to the Veneti-
ans.

But the Lord Lautrec hauing solicited the Venetian captaines to come and ioine their gallies with Philippine Doria at the seege of Naples, they were enforced to giue ouer their enterprize, they being enioyned to follow his commandements: for Philippine Doria was come before Naples with eight gallies onely, to keepe victuals from entering into the City by sea, but fearing least the besieged falling forth vpon him, he might be defeated, in regard he had no greater forces, the arrivall of the Venetian gallies would assure him and more straightly shut in those of the City.

At this stay stood the affaires of the Kingdom of Naples whilest the Venetians were were elsewhere busied with alarmes, because that Henry Duke of Brunswich, after a great report of his coming, being solicited by the Emperour and his brother Ferdinand to passe into Italy, had entred Lombardy to diuert the Confederate forces from the enterprize of the Realme of Naples, the which being reduced to great extremity, hee could not so speedily releue as by this meanes. The Duke of Brunswich then being come to Trent, he entred Lombardy by the Veronois territory, leading along with him about twelue thousand footmen, saying that he would ioine with Antonio de Leua, who was already come forth into the field with eight thousand footmen, that they two beeing ioyned together might goe and assaile the Cities belonging to the State of Venice, against whom Brunswich had denounced warre, and had with a vaine and ridiculous proposition challenged Andre Gritti Duke of Venice to a single fight, who was a man of fourefcore yeres of age.

The Duke of Brunswich commeth into Italy with great forces.

The Venetians, resolving to defend themselves, concluded to raise twelue thousand footmen, amongst whom were foure thousand Swisses, vnto whom they speedily sent money into Swisserland, and intreated the French King by his authority to fauour that leauy: they had besides, great numbers of light horse from Greece and Dalmatia: then they recalled the Duke of Vrbino from the Marches of Ancona, and commanded him to visit all their townes and fortes of most importance, to provide them of strong garisons, and to take order for whatsoeuer hee should thinke necessary for their seruice, safety, and defence: they appointed afterwards, diuers Gentlemen, to command their principall cities. Ieronimo Diece was sent to Treuifo with an hundred and fifty footmen, Pedro Sagreda with like number to Padua, to Verona went Zachary Doria, Philippo Corrierio, Alessandro Donato, Ambrosio Contaren, Iosepho Badoario, Lo renza Sanuto, Augustino Canall, and Almore Barbaro, each of them with fiftie and twenty souldiers with them to looke to the gates and other important places of the city.

A vaine and ridiculous challenge.

In the meane time, vpon these newes great warlike preparations were made in France to send into Italy, of whom the Count of Saint Pol was made General, who was of the house of Bourbon, to the end to follow the Duke of Brunswich, if hee should passe on into the Realme of Naples, if not, to make warre on the Dutchy of Milan, together with the companies of the Venetians & those of Francis Sforza. But all these preparations did little auale by reason of their late coming. For the Duke of Brunswich beeing followed with his owne forces determined to assaile certaine cities belonging to the Venetians, being the rather moued therevnto, because that at his arrivall, Pescara, Reuotella, and certaine other townes vpon the Lake of La Garda, had yeelded to him. The Duke of Vrbino, who had put himselfe into Verona, hauing still an eye vpon Brunswich, did prevent his designes, and went sodainly to Bressia, where hee strengthened the Garrison, then from thence hee went to Bergamo, into which hee caused great numbers of the people of those Vallies to enter, who were very faithfull and trusty to the Venetians, and with a wonderfull celerity, hee caused the city to be encompassed with great trenches, making it thereby defensible, then giuing very many traueses and molestations to the enemies, by cutting off victuals and many other commodities from them, the Duke of Brunswich despairing of beeing able to execute any notable enterprize, after that hee had (according to their barbarous custome) spoiled the country, and burned sundry faire buildings to leave some memory of himselfe behinde, hee departed without any other great exploit forth of the Venetian State, and came vpon that of Milan, where he met with Antonio de Leua, who vpon report of his coming had passed ouer the Riuer Adda to ioine with him, that they might afterwards execute some great enterprize, and hauing repassed the Adda, they went and encamped before Landa, forth of which the Duke of Milan was

The Venetians
preparations
against the Duke of Brunswich.

The Duke of Brunswich, being ioyned with Antonio de Leua doth come and besiege Landi.

newly departed, being aduertized of the enemies comming, and was come to Brestia, by the consent of the Senate, hauing left a sufficient number of souldiers in Lauda, with Iohn Paul Sforza, his naturall brother, to command there, who being assailed by the enemies, did valiantly receiue and repulse them.

By means whereof, Brunswick finding himself without means to entertain such an army any long time, and being frustrate of his hope to returne home laden with glory and spoile, not determining to go on any farther towards Naples, (as at the beginning hee had purposed, hee tooke his iourney towards the Lake of Coma, to returne into Germany: hee was pursued at the heeles by the Count Gaiazzo and Mercurio But, who comming forth of Bergamo gaue in vpon his reerward.

The report of the Lansequenets departure did greatly afflict the beleeged Neapolitans, loosing thereby all hope of succours, on whom it seemed that their whole safety did depend: because that not long before they had with bad successe assailed the Gallies of Phillippine Doria, supposing to open to themselves the passage by sea, seeing that by land was wholly shut from them, Lantree hauing taken Pozzuolo and the places neere adioyning, by which great abundance of victuals came to Naples; which was the cause that before the Venetians Gallies arrived, they were desirous to tempt fortune, and to free themselves of the stumbling block by sea, by breaking Phillippine Doria, who with the 20 Gallies lay in the Gulph of Salerno.

They manned fixe Gallies, foure Fusts, and two Brigantines, with a thousand Spanishe Harquebuziers of the choicest and most valliant of the army, with whom went along Don Hugo the Viceroy, and almost all the chiefe captaines and men of authority. To these vessels were added diuers fisher-boates, to amaze the enemies a farre off, by the shew of a greater number of vessels. All these Lords being ioyfully embaiked, as if they had bene going to a triumph, came to the Isle of Capri: from thence, leauing the Cape of Minerva, on their left hand, they came into the maine sea and sent two Gallies before; who were commanded, that so soone as they should come neere the enemies, to make shew of flight, to the end to draw them forth to fight at sea, for Phillippine Doria being aduertized the day before by trusty spies of the enemies determination, had with great speed and secrecy drawne three hundred Harquebuziers from Lantree, then so soone as hee discovered the enemies fleet a farre off, making towards it, he was at the first somewhat doubtfull, in regard of the great number of vessels that hee discovered, but being soone freed of that scruple, when he perceived that there were but fixe vessels onely; hee caused three gallies of his owne to keepe aloofe, as though they had ment to flie, to the end that by returning, with a very faire winde, they might giue in vpon the enemies broad sides, and himselfe with five Gallies went forward to meet them, who were commanded to discharge their ordnance vpon him, to take away, by the smoake, both his sight and aime: but Phillippine being quicker then they, gaue fire to a very great Basilisk in his owne Galley, which strooke the Admirall Galley wherein the Viceroy was, who with diuers others were therewith slaine, then hee discharged all his other shott, which did hurt and kill diuers.

The enemies shot on the other side slue some, but not very many: then comming neere to one another, they beganne with Harquebuzes and other weapons a very fierce fight, which lasted along while, till such time as the three first Gallies, which seemed to flie towards the maine sea, returning vpon the enemies, strooke the Admirall Galley vpon the broad side, and sunke two others, two were taken by Doria, and two others, which had bene sore beaten, committed themselves to flight, perceiving that the enemies were victorious.

There

There dyed at this encounter of cheefe Commanders, Don Hugo the Viceroy, and Cesar Hieramosca, with more then a thousand men of the ordinary companies: there were taken prisoners, the Marquis of Guasto, Afcanio Colonna, the Prince of Salerno, Santa Cruz, Camillo Colonna, Gobba Sereanon, and diuerse other Captaines and Gentlemen; whereby the City of Naples was bereft of her best and brauest defendants.

During these exploits at sea, Petro Lande, Generall of the Venetians sea-army, arrived before Naples with twenty Gallies, who came from Puglia, where hee had taken the fixe Citties belonging to the Venetians. His arriuall did greatly profit the French, and annoy the enemies, because that hauing left fixe Gallies at Gayetta, and as many at Cumes: hee with the residue, scowred all places neere to Naples, did shutte the sea from the besieged, suffering nothing to enter into the City, and stoppt their passage, who were come soorth of the Towne to runne vp and downe along the Sea side, who durst not returne for feare of the shoate of the Venetian Galleis, he did beside seaze on diuers places where their mills stood, whither those of the City did vieto send their corne to be ground, whereby they were enforced to vse hand-mills, or to eate their graine being vn-ground, which was distributed vnto them soorth of the munition.

Besides, it did greatly serue for the safe and more easie bringing of victuals to the Army, which came from sea, whereof there was great scarcity, as well by reason of the great number of vnprofitable eaters that were there, as of the great dearth which was then generally ouer all Italy, and likewise in regard of the small care of the Captaines.

At the same time, the Lord of Barbezicuz, being come from France to Sauona with money for to pay the Army, and hauing sent it by sea into the kingdome, great difficulties were made for the bringing it to the Campe: the Lord Lantree sendeth forces to the sea-side to receiue the money, but the Gallies being not able to come to land, by reason of the working of the Sea, the Marquis of Salusses returned the day following with his Lances, and a strong band of Gascons, Suisses, Lansequenets, and of the black-bands: Wherevpon at their returne they mette with the Imperials, who were come soorth of Naples in great troopes to assaile them, and to take away the money, who were valiantly repulsed by Valerio Vrsino with the Venetian troopes, and by Hugo de Pepoli Captaine of the Florentines, to their great losse and hurt, but Hugo de Pepoli having too farre pursued the runne-awayes, was within an Harquebuz shotte of the Battailion of the black-bands taken prisoner by the Imperiall horse-men.

Hithervnto had the affaires of the league prospered, with hope of giuing a speedy end to the warre, by the conquest of the Realme of Naples: but within a while after, euident signes began to appeare, not of the declination of their good fortune, but of their entire ruine, fortune in a manner declaring that hee could no longer fauour the affaires of the French in Italy. For the Armie was afflicted with diuerse sodaine diseases, sundry occasions occurring, as first of all, the celestiall influence, which the same yeare had in diuerse places caused contagious sicknesses: next, their aboade therein in the month of August, when as the Soldiours living carelesly, did greedily and in abundance eate of all manner of fruites: but that which did most hurt them, was the waters, which being for diuerse moneths turned soorth of their ordinary channells, and so courtes, had well neere drowned the whole Countrey round about, and infected the ayre.

The Lord Lantree being greatly troubled by these difficulties, & either enforced to continue the siege with these difcomodities, or else to enlarge his troopes

Rrrr

farther

The great fury of the Lord Lautrec.

farther of, was counselled by all the Captaines, to send the soldiers into the territories neere at hand, and by separating them in that manner, to take from the disease, which was already become contagious, the cause of any greater progression, and giue meanes to the diseased to heale and to looke to themselves. But that which did most of all torment the Lord Lautrec, was, for that hee perceived the victory, which hee had almost obtained, to be snatched forth of his hands, and that by enlarging his troopes, hee knew very well that the Imperials, who had great numbers of horse to send abroad, and finding no resistance at all, would haue meanes to prouide for all their discomforts. Hee understood daily how that Simon Roman, whom hee had sent into Calabria, had fortunate success, that all those people hauing a particular inclination to the French, did yeeld vnto him: that the townes and Hauens of Puglia, were in the hands of the Venetians: that Abruzzo was from the beginning at the deuotion of the French: that the Spaniards were already in a manner driuen forth of the whole kingdom: and yet neuertheless, that all these happy conquests should turne to nothing, if by temporising they should giue any relaxation to those of Naples, who were already reduced to great extremity, and lose the occasion of taking that Citie, whereon depended, the good or bad success of that enterprise.

The Lord
Lautrecs
fury.

Besides, hee was ashamed to see the Spaniards, who were afflicted with greivous diseases and discomforts, should constantly beare them, without enduring any speech of yielding; whereas the French at the first touch of aduerser fortune did strike sayle, and seemed to bee ouercome by the vanquished. Hauing afterwards receiued a farre lesse summe of money out of France then hee expected, or was needfull for the payment of the Army, hee dispaired of being able any longer to entertaine it. But that which did most of all torment him was, to see himselfe to bee constrained to enforce his owne nature, being not wont willingly to heare nor esteeme an other mans opinion, and least of all to giue ouer a resolution which hee had once taken: Whereupon notwithstanding that occasion was daily offered to change his minde, and to sette himselfe to time, yet for all that hee would neuer consent to dis campe, nor suffer any man to depart thence, vntill that extreame necessitie enforced him to doe that which reason might haue perswaded him to; because that meane soldiers alone did not daily dye, but the very cheefe of the Army, and among others, Lodouico Pisani, and Petro Pescara the Venetian Prouidators, and the Earle of Vandemont within a while after: diuerse being stricken with the contagion, retired to Gayetta and to other places.

Great sickness in the French Campe.

André Doris remitteth from the Kings
service.

The cause of André Doris
his reuolt.

In the meane time, a new accident did more trouble him then all the rest, and caused him wholly to despair of any fortunate enterprise, which was, the determination of André Doris, who being male-content with the French, had forsaken the Kings seruice, and entred into the Emperours pay. The cause thereof was attributed, as well by himselfe as by others, to diuerse subiects, and chiefly to a disdaine which hee conceived in his minde, because that the King did not esteeme of him according to his meritts, nor granting vnto him the office of Admirall, which was then vacant, and giuen to the Lord of Barbezieu: That the King would not satisfie his iust request, to yeeld vnto the Genowais the accustomed soueraignty of Saونا.

Sundry signes appearing of this discontent, the Pope had some suspicion thereof; Whereupon hee aduertised the King of it, perswading him to make more deere account of such a man then hee had done, who was able to doe much for the furtherance of the seruice of the league, and not to suffer him to depart mal-content with such forces, to the Emperours seruice. But the French King suspecting at the same time all the Popes actions, his councill could no thing preuaile with him. Yet neuertheless finding it to bee true afterwards, and perceiving perceiving the matter to be of importance, knowing no meane how to preuent it, or else being peraduenture willing to be freed from such expence, hee counselled the Pope to giue him entertainment, in regard of his great desire to serue the Church, rather then to suffer him to go to the Emperours side. The Pope seeming to be desirous of it, and yet not willing to displease the Emperour, excused himselfe by reason of his owne small meane, adding that so soone as by the Kings helpe hee should recouer Rauenna and Ceruià, hee might then more freely, be at greater expence.

The Popes answer to the King, concerning the entertainment of André Doris.

Doris in the meane time, without longer dissembling that which hee had determined to do, sent one of his Gentlemen to the Emperour, in whose Court the Articles of agreement betwixt them were resolved on: which were, The Liberty of Genoa vnder the Emperours protection: The Subiection of Saونا to the Genowais, and the entering of the said Doris into the Emperours pay with twelue Gallies; and a yeerely pension of threescore thousand Ducats.

Articles of agreement betwixt the Emperour, and Doris.

This reuolt of Doris did greatly hinder the Confederates, and mightily prejudice the enterprise of Naples, because that the Venetian Gallies, remaining alone, were enforced to retire their Rowers or Gally-slaves, which wrought in the trenches, to looke to the businesse at Sea: and the Admirall Barbezieu on the other side being come from France with sixteene Gallies, tarried at Saونا, (not daring to faile to Naples) where hee landed a great part of the footmen to send them for the gard of Genoa, albeit they were appointed to goe to the succour of the Lord Lautrec: so as from this accident proceeded all the mishap of the siege of Naples, and the losse of the French reputation.

The great discomfort which the reuolt of Doris did procure.

As also because that the Lord Lautrec could neuer make vse in time of those forces which Ranc d' Cera had at Ciuitauechia, by reason of the Popes different and vncertaine resolutions, who (being solicited by the Lord Lautrec with huge and in a manner menacing speeches, and afterwards with gentle and courteous language to declare himselfe, promising to restore those of his family in Florence) would neuer make any certaine resolution: neuer saying, that as one zealous of the common good, peace was his chiefe ayme and object, the which, with more safety, and lesse suspicion to treat of, hee would remaine neuter, although the contrary appeared by sundry apparent signes, that hee did more incline to the Emperours side, then to any other: but because hee would not vrge the Lord Lautrec to prouoe an open enemy, hee answered, that to declare himselfe, would nothing auile them, in regard (as hee had oftentimes said) that hee had not sufficient forces for any great enterprise.

That the most Christian King might neuertheless make vse of the Churches State, and of the commodities thereof, without renewing vpon that occasion the Confederacy. By this meane the French forces were daily weakened, and disorders and discomforts increased in the Campe: and the besieged on the contrary, were in hope of good success.

The aid from France, which had been so often craved of the King, and which his maiesty had so often promised, did not arriue, and the troopes raised in the Kingdom of Naples were not sufficient to fill vpp the army, nor to supply the want of the military factions, the Campe standing in need of all things, because that the enemies Caualtery fallying forth many times to surpris the victuals, which was brought to the Campe from the neighbor townes, the Army in steed of besieging was little better then besieged.

The want of the army besieged.

In a word discomforts did so increase, as there was not one company in the whole army, but had great store of sicke persons in it. The soldiers were become lazie and idle, and throwing their armes from them, obserued no order, discipline, nor any obedience, especially the men at armes who being disbanded without their Captaines leaue, did forsake the Campe: the Captaines likewise, were partly absent farre from thence, to cause themselves to be healed, and to recouer Disorders in the army.

reouer their healths, and part of them also liued vnprofitably in the Campe, beeing weake and ill disposed of their persons. But among others, the Lord Lautrec was very sick, beeing spent as well in minde as body, for the great danger that hee perceiued the Armie to bee in: Wherevpon, his owne fault encreasing the sorrow and griefe of his heart, made him for the space of many dayes vnable to giue order for the affaires of the warre.

The Lord Lautrec grievously sick.

But beeing come to himselfe, and a little recovering his spirits, hee began to visit the whole Campe, to preserue order and the Guardes, fearing to be assailed. Matters did dayly decline, so as by reason of the strength of the Imperials horsemen, there was no more commerce betwixt the Campe and the Gallies, and those of the Campe, because they had no horse, could not runne forth of the wayes: But that which did aggrauate all the disorders, was the death of the Lord Lautrec, vpon whose valour and authoritie all matters relied, and it was certainly thought, that his disease encreased by too much trauaile.

The Lord Lautrecs death.

The end of the seventh Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the eight Booke of the fifth Decade.

THE Marquis of Salusses beeing made Generall of the French Army, by the death of the Lord Lautrec, raiseth his Campe, from before Naples, and retireth to Aversa. The taking of Aversa, and the Marquis by the Imperials. The City of Genoa reuoluerh from the French King, by the meanes of Andre Doria. The determination of the Confederates to goe and besiege Milan is broken. Pavia is taken by the Confederates. Nouara with diuerse other places, are yellded to the Confederates. The Lord of Saint Paul his iourney to recouer Genoa, is in vaine. The Castle of Genoa is rased by the people. The Genowais fill vpon the Hauens of Sauona with grauell. The Pope demandeth the Citties of Rauenna and Ceruia of the Venetians. A treaty of peace held at Rome, but to no purpose. The great warlike preparations of the Archduke of Austria to send into Italy to the Emperors ayde. The Venetians lend money to the French, and to the Duke of Milan. The French King resoluerh to make warre vpon the Emperour on the frontiers of Spaine. The Venetians solicit the King to come in person into Italy. The Imperials recouer Aquila and Marricia. The Marquis of Guasto besiegeth Monopoli. Brindisium is yellded to the Venetians. An allarme beeing giuento the Duke of Vrbin, hee runneth to the defence of his owne state. An enter view of the French and Venetian Armies. The defeate and taking of the Count Saint Paul by Antonio de Leua. The Duke of Vrbins retreateth to Cassan. The Duke of Vrbin defeateeth a part of the enemies at the passage of a River. Antonio de Leua retireth to Milan. The Venetian Senate are male-content.

tent with the King. The Emperors arrivall at Genoa. The Emperors great forces in Italy. The Florentines send Ambassadors to the Emperor. The great warlike preparations of the Venetians. Peace concluded at Cambray betwixt the Emperor and the King. The King is very earnest with the Emperor to make an accord with the Venetians. And lastly, a new confederacie betwixt the Venetians and Francis Sforza Duke of Milan.

The Eight Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

The Marquis
of Salusses Generall of the Army of the Lanterns death

The Marquis
with the army retireth to Auerfa.

The Capitulation about the yielding of Auerfa

Genoa by means of André Doria rescued from the King to
the Emperor.

THE Lord Lautrec being dead, Michael Antonio Matquis of Salusses a courageous Lord, and well beloued of the Soldiers, tooke vpon him the charge of the Armie in a manner ruined, who being counselled to dis campe, not so much for the present state of their affaires, as for the danger and necessity that pressed him, gathered together those forces that remained, and retired with small losse to Auerfa, expecting succours from Rance de Cera. Vpon his retreat, the Imperials comming forth of Naples, gaue in vpon his reuerward: but by reason of his good order, the losse was not great. Certaine French troopes were broken, and Pedro of Nauarre being taken prisoner was ledde to Naples, where hee dyed.

The Marquis being come to Auerfa, was neuerly pursued by the Imperials, and being not able to make defence, hee sent the Count Guy de Rangone to parley with the Prince of Orange the Imperials Generall, with whom it was capitulated, That the Marquis should quit Auerfa, with the Castle, Artillery, and Munition: That as well himselfe, as the other Captaines, should remaine prisoners, except the Count Guy, who treated particularly for himselfe: That the Marquis should doe his utmost to cause the French and Venetians to render vp the kingdom, with diuerse other conuentions which made this French Armie miserable, who of vanquishers became vanquished, to the Venetians great griefe and discontent, whose fortune for the kingdom of Naples, was, to depend on that of the French their friends and confederates.

This losse was accompanied by a very greuous and most preiudicious accident to the league, and of great importance to the French, which caused great strife betwixt them: for, the plague being very great in Genoa, and by reason thereof in a manner forsaken by all men, and likewise by the soldiers, and namely

10

20 30

40

50

by Theodore Triulcio the Gouvernor, who retired into the Castle: Anare Doria making vse of this occasion, came nere to the City with certaine Gallies, and those few soldiers that hee had, which did not exceed the number of five hundred footmen, not hoping neuertheless to performe that which hee afterward did, and entering it without any great resistance, by the fauour of the people, who were greatly delighted with the name of liberty, which hee promised them, became master thereof, where on a sodaine hee changed the manner of gouernment vnder the Emperors protection.

It lay not in Triulcio his power to hinder it, who being come to the City but a while before, had much to doe to escape into the Castle, hoping, (as hee said) vpon the arrivall of succours to bee able at his pleasure to enter the City, and to reduce it to the Kings deuotion, as it had beene in time before. For hee sent to the Lord Saint Paul, to send him speedily three thousand footmen, by whose ayde hee hoped to recouer the City: Wherevpon the Captaines of the Confederates did determine, That the Lord of Montilian should turne to Genoa with three thousand Lansquenets and Suisses, which came from France, and were already arrived at Alexandria.

The Senate in the meane time, did not cease to giue order for necessary provisions, for the speedy renewing of the warre in Lombardy, and for that they would not giue Antonio de Leua any time to make preparations they solicited one another speedily to take armes: they sent the Secretary André Rossi into France, to hasten the forces which were to come into Italy: they did besides, command the Duke of Vrbin to receiue all those Almaines into their pay, which had forsaken the Duke of Brunswick, hauing moreouer sent to Iuree, money for the payment of five thousand Lansquenets: so as the Republick had in a very short space, more then tenne thousand footmen of sundry nations, Almaines, Suisses, and Italians, fifteene hundred light horse, and eight hundred men at armes, with which forces, and those of the French being ioyned together, they did hope to driue Antonio de Leua forth of Italy.

The Duke of Vrbins chiefe purpose was to place a strong Garrison in Lauda, being a place of great importance for the Duke of Milan, and for the Venetians likewise, because the keeping thereof did greatly auail for the assurance of Bergamo and Crema: and then to passe the Po so soone as the French succours should beginne to come vpon the Alpes to ioine with the French, and afterwards to goe and assaile Antonio de Leua. For the supplies of five thousand footmen, and five hundred Lances, &c as many light horse, which were expected, being arrived, the Duke of Vrbin talked with the Count Saint Paul at Monticella on the Po, to consult in what manner they were to proceed in this warre for the profit and commodity of the common cause.

The Duke of Vrbin by the aduise of the Senate, propounded to employ their whole forces in Lombardy, to driue Antonio de Leua, if it were possible, forth of the State of Milan, to the end to cut off all meanes from the Imperials of sending downe any ayde by that way into Italy forth of Germany, and of hauing victuals from thence for the feeding of their Armie as they were wont. The Lord Saint Paul, and the other French Captaines were of a contrary opinion, saying, That it was not fite to abandon the affaires of Naples, vnlesse they should loose their honour and reputation both with the people and the enemies, propounding besides, how important a matter it was to keepe the Imperials busied in the kingdom of Naples, who by that meanes could not come and ioine with Antonio de Leua.

In this diuersitie of opinions, a way was found to content both parties: namely, not altogether to abandon the affaires of Naples, and yet to make the cheefe attempts in Lombardy.

The Venetians
great preparations.

The number of
the Venetians
forces.

The Duke of Vrbin determinations.

The proposition of the count
Saint Paul.

For,

For, the Confederates, possessing diuerse and sundry places in Puglia, where the people did greatly affect the French and Venetians; it was resolved to re-enforce those troops that they had there, to trie if they could aduance the businesse any better, and keepe the Imperiall Capitaines amuzed and in feare: and for that purpose the Senate wrote to the Prouidour of their nauall Armie, that he should carry his vessels into Puglia, and to place strong garrisons in those townes which held for the Signory and for the French, and then to besiege the Castle of Brundisium: and that on the other side, the Prince of Melfi, and Rance de Cera, should passe ouer into those parts with five thousand footmen, whom the Venetians should furnish with vessels for their passage.

But as concerning Lombardy, and the state of Milan, they resolved, (the forces there beeing compleate) to goe and besiege the city of Milan, and to this end all the troopes beeing come as farre as Landriane, the Capitaines were of an other opinion, hee that was sent to discover the City hauing told them, that such an enterprize could haue no fortunate successe: Wherevpon they determined to goe and encampe before Paulia, the which they hoped to take with ease, because there were no more then two hundred Lanquenets, and eight hundred Italians in it, and both the armies beeing by sundry wayes come neere to Paulia, they encamped round about it, and hauing planted on the higher side of the River Thesisin, in the plaine on the lower side of the City, nine Cannons, they plaid in such fort vpon a bastion neere to the Arsenall, that in a short space it was halfe ruined, and on the farther side of Thesisin, three Cannons to batter, (when they should goe to the assault,) a Flanquer right opposite to the Arsenall, and vpon a little hill on the higher side Thesisin five Cannons, which did batter two other bastions, and at the foote of the hill three others which plaid vpon the wall, all which ordnance belonged to the Venetians: and that of the Lord Saint Paul serued for the beating downe of the fortifications.

After a sufficient battery in sundry places, and so soone as they had drawne the water forth of the Dikes, they went to the assault, where for two houres space those within the towne did valiantly defend it, but their number beeing too small to susteine such an assault, those of the league did at the last enter it with very small losse, and with great honor to the Duke of Vrbin: seauen hundred souldiors of the towne were slaine, the residue escaped into the Castle with Gales de Biraga the Citties Governour, and diuerse of the inhabitants, who yeelded soone after vpon composition, the City was wholly sackt, but of no great valew; in regard of the two former.

The taking of Paulia did procure to the league great contentment and notable reputation, not onely in regarde of that City, but because that Nouara, and diuerse other neighbour townes did within a while after, yeeld, to the great losse and discomfort of the enemies, who from thence had abundance of victuals for the reliefe of their Army in Milan. The Venetian Senate beeing wonderfull ioyfull of such happy successe, promised to it selfe, that it might bee able to recouer all those disastrous mishaps sustained before Naples, and in regard hereof it did infinitely thanke and extoll the Lord Saint Paul, intreating and exhorting him to goe forward as hee had begunne, hoping that vnder his conduct they should bee able to recouer not onely the State of Milan, but the kingdome of Naples.

The newes of the losse of Genoa beeing in the meane time brought into France, did greatly greeue the King, who speedily sent commandement to the Lord Saint Paul, that all other Commissions beeing layde apart, hee should march to Genoa, to attempt the reducing thereof vnder his obedience: For the three thousand footmen appointed for the reliefe thereof not going thither, because they wanted their pay, Trimalcio was in great distresse, protest-

The enterprize
of Milan
breigh.

The Confederates besiege Paulia.

The Confederates take Paulia.

Nouara and diuerse other townes yeeld to the Confederates.

protesting that if he were not speedily releued he must of force yeeld himselfe: whereby, the affaires of the league, which beganne to prosper, did afterwards fall into great difficulties: because that as the commoditie of conquering Milan did present it selfe by the reputation of the taking of Paulia, and by the discomfort which Antonio de Lena his army endured, where for the effecting thereof it beehooded all the forces to be brought together, with two Camps to assaile and shut in so great a City, they were constrained to giue ouer all, the Lord Saint Paul hauing bent all his thoughtes and designs to releue Genoa, wherevpon, he did not only refuse to goe to the enterprize of Milan, but did sollicite the Duke of Vrbin to goe along with him thither with the Venetian forces for the recovery of it; wherevnto the Senate would not consent, because that by sending their forces so farre off, they should not only loose all the fruit of the Victory, and put the Duke of Milan into dispaire, but expose the City of Bergamo and other townes of their owne State to great dangers.

Perfisting then both the one and the other in their opinion, the French Army seperated it selfe, and passed ouer the Po at Stella, to march through Tuscany to Genoa, and the Venetians Campe, by the Senates aduise, retired to Paulia, to fauor, with the reputation thereof, the affaires of Genoa, (it beeing in the meane time in safety), and to execute like-wise what so-euer occasion would present.

But the enterprize of the Lord Saint Paul had no fortunate successe, who finding Genoa to be mand with a strong garrison, and hauing in his owne army but two thousand footmen, beeing out of hope to obtaine that which he desired by tarrying any longer there, notwithstanding that he had made his approaches neere to the City, determined to returne into Lombardy to spend the winter time, where by the consent of Sforza he did put himselfe into the City of Alexandria.

Now Trimalcio in the meane time hauing notice of his departure, and expecting ayd from no place else, resolved to yeeld the Castle, as he did, the which was forthwith raced to the ground by the People to take away that hinderance of their liberty.

The City of Sauona like-wise, where into the Lord of Montecian (sent thither with his forces to releue it) could not enter, returned vnder the Genowaies Gouernment, who on a sodaine filled the hauen thereof with stones and grauell to make it vserviceable.

The Venetians perceiuing that the French King did openly shew himselfe to be displeased with them, because that the Duke of Vrbin, with their forces, did not goe to the reliefe of Trimalcio, were very desirous for his satisfaction to reuiue the enterprize of Genoa, as also for their owne commodity, because they accounted that City to be very conuenient for the affaires of the league, beeing as it were the only Gate of Italy through which the Spaniards might enter by Sea to molest them, and therefore they wished that it were at the deuotion of the French King their friend, and especially at that time, when the report was that the Emperor was in person coming into Italy, wherevpon they secretly exhorted the Genowaies, to returne againe vnder the protection of the most Christian King, as of a most mighty and meeke Prince: For they could not at that time execute their desire by open force, as well for the place where they wintered, the which was very sharpe and difficult in Winter, as for the small number of their army which was much diminished by sundry accidents: and albeit they were aduertized of the great scarcity of victuals in Milan, how that Antonio de Lena lay sick, and his Army much weakened, all which were goodly occasions where on to enterprize some great and notable exploit, they durst not for all that in regard of the smalnesse of their forces goe forth into the field to execute

The Lord
Saint Paul lea-ues Milan to go to the reliefe of Genoa.

The Lord Sa-
Paul's arrives to re-leue Genoa proceeds vaine

Castle of Genoa raced by the People.

The Genowaies fill the Hauen of Sauona with grauell.

The Venetian forces much diminished.

any thing, beeing in feare likewise of the discomforts that commonly grow in winter.

The Venetians
keepe the cit-ties in Puglia.

The Venetians were elsewhere in great care for the townes which they possessed in Puglia, which at all times both in peace and waire were very commodious for them: they held Trani and Monopoli, and the French Barletta: the others beeing abandoned, these were kept, and yet not without great difficulty, since the route of the French Army, by the diligence of the Prouidator Vitturi, who beeing advertised at the siege of Manfredonia where hee lay, of the disaster before Naples, hee sent speedily by Sea a certaine number of footmen into garrison into those townes, to keepe them in their duty. Camilla Vrsino lay in Trani, and Gionanni Contrado Vrsino in Monopoli, and Rance de Cera, who was the Kings Lieutenant in the Prouince, was retired to Barletta.

The Venetians then being very careful to keepe those places, and hoping to be able not only to resist the enemy, and to keepe the warre farre from their owne State, but likewise to make some progression, in regard of the enemies letts, determined to send reliefe thither, as well of victuals, and all sorts of munitions, as of Soldiers, by encreasing the Garrison with fixe hundred footmen leuied in Dalmatia in the midst of Winter by the Prouidator Mula, who having brought them into Puglia, went back on a sodaine with his Gallies to Corfou, there to repaire and encrease the nauall Army, to the end afterwards to ioine it with that of the French King, which was making ready at Marceilles, that both of them together might oppose themselues against the Imperials sea-forces, which were reported to be very great at Barcelona, and were coming to ioine with those of Doria.

The French
Kings influence to the Venetians in the Pope's behalf.

The Pope in the meane time continuing his former pursutes, concerning the rendering of the Citties of Rauenna and Ceruia, caused the French King to send the Vicount Turenne to Venice, to intreate them in some sort to satisfy the Pope, by yeelding vp those Citties which hee demanded. The Senate making shew of nothing more then to please the King, did represent to the Ambassador their iustitudes to them, having receiued Rauenna of Obizzo Polente Lord thereof more then foure hundred yeares since, and that Ceruia was fallen to the Republick, by the testament of Dominico Malatesta, by the payment of certaine godly Legacies, which they yecrely continued by accomplishing the Testators will.

The Venetians
answer to the Kings Ambassador.

How that if they had beene desirous to possesse Townes belonging to other men, they would not haue refused the offers of those of Fuly and of other Citties of Romagna, who were desirous to be vnder their obedience; they would not besides haue defended nor maintained with great cost and danger, the City of Bologna, and others belonging to the Pope, nor haue kept them for him: that those Citties had beene taken at such time as the Pope had quitted the League, and that they might now for the same occasion iustly detain them.

Moreover, that they had spent a great masse of treasure in that warre, which those Citties were not able to recompence.

That the King was to consider, how much it might import him, if those so commodious Citties should be quitted by his friends and confederates to be given to the Pope, who stood badly affected towards the Crowne of France, nay euen into the very hands of the Imperials, seeing that it was apparent that the Pope, cyther by his owne proper motion, or through feare, did wholly depend vpon the Emperour: that hee was beside, to consider of their interest, and the wrong which would be offered to the other Confederates, to the Florentines, and to the Duke of Ferrara, who vndoubtedly would be greatly distastled thereby, and would coole that heate which

puseth

puseth them forward to the affaires of the league, and moreover how that those townes, did presently serue for a bridle to containe the Pope in his duty, seeing that without them, he would already haue openly shewed himselfe, a friend to the Emperour.

The Vicount giuing place to all these reasons, went to Rome to the Pope, were for to compose the businesse, he propounded sundry offers to his Holinesse, namely, that those townes might be enfeofed to the Signory of Venice, with a certaine annuall acknowledgment, as diuers others belonging to the Church had beene, or that they might be sequestred by the French King to dispose thereof as he should thinke fitt.

The Vicount offers to the
Pope.

These propositions beeing made to the Senate, were neither accepted, nor wholly reiected: but calling to mynde the Republicks benefits to the Church, and what it had done for the seruice of Popes, they seemed to repose great trust in his Holinesse wisdom, how that himselfe might find some honest remedy for that difficulty, and in this vncertainty of businesse ended the yeare one thousand five hundred twenty and eight.

The beginning of the yeare following did shew great signes of beeing disposed to peace, and of feare likewise of new troubles: but the discontent and wearinesse of Princes caused the Confederates to proceed slowly in their promitions of warre: wherevpon as well by reason of the speech of peace, as for the sharpnesse of the winter, all military factions ceased.

The Emperour spake openly that he desired nothing more then an yniuersall peace, and especially to fit himselfe to the Princes of Italy, and to these ends had sent the Cardinall of Santa Cruz (for this was the Generall of the Friars title) to Rome to treat of peace, and to cause Hostia and Ciuitauechia to be surrendered to the Pope. The French King, who wished nothing more, sent a commission to his Ambassadors, and the King of England sent Ambassadors to Rome for the same purpose, as vnto whom it alone appertained to conclude this treaty. The Venetians did the like, by giuing ample power to Gaspardo Contaren, their Ambassador in the court of Rome, whereby he was inioyned to follow the aduise and councill of the most Christian King, and his proper inclination to peace and to the common good of all Christendome, and to giue vnto him all power and liberty to promise in the common-wealths name, whatsoeuer should be concluded and determined in the particular conuentions: they did moreover entreat the Pope to take vpon him the burthen of that businesse, to bring it to such a good end, as all men hoped for by his authority and wisdom: promising that if hee should procure an yniuersall peace in respect of the strife betwixt the Sea Apostolicke and the Signory, concerning the Citties of Rauenna and Ceruia, they would then shew their good meaning therein.

The Venetians
offers to the Pope, so that peace might be procured.

But on the other side, there were diuers presumptions why they wereto doubt of his intention, and whether he would sincerely acquit himselfe of that charge: For it was very well knowne that the French King did suspect him, and that he gaue no credit to his wordes, nor did repose to much trust in him, holding whatsoeuer he propounded for doubtfull and incertaine: and therefore did secretly exhort the Venetians to renew their forces both by sea and land, declaring how that he was in no sort troubled for the vnfortunate successe before Naples, as proceeding from a certaine maleuolent fortune, and not from the want of courage of his soldiers, and therefore that he was more ready and desirous then euer, to renew the warre in Italy.

Secret practises betwixt the King and the
Venetians.

The Emperour on the other side, albeit that he did promise to come into Italy to take the Imperiall Crowne, and to establish peace there, yet neuertheless the great preparations of warre that hee made, was the cause why men thought that hee had an other designe in his minde, cleane contrary to his speeches,

The Emperours
great preparations to come into Italy.

toge-

The Pope
intention.

together with his great desire to appropriate to himselfe the State of Milan. The Pope likewise had a great desire to recover, not only the territories of Romagna, but Modena and Regio, and likewise to haue satisfaction for the wrongs and greeuances which hee had receiued of the Florentines, with a will to restore his Nephewes, of the house of Medici, into Florence to their ancient greatnesse and dignity: the which was very hard to bee accomplished without comming to strokes.

The Venetians
intention.

The Venetians in like manner, albeit that for many yeares they had bene intangled in warre, hauing spent therein more then six Millions of gold, and that therefore it behoued them to desire peace, to giue some rest and relaxation of their fore-past troubles, as well to themselves as to their subiects, did neuertheless, with great resolution, constantly persist in the protection and defence of the Duke of Milan, meaning not to suffer, in any sort, that his State should fall into the Emperours hands: but as concerning the restitution of the Cities of Puglia and Romagna, they were ready to hearken vnto it, provided that an vniuersall peace, for the generall good and quiet of all Italy, might bee well established.

Such at the same time were the desseignes and propositions of the confederate Princes, and such likewise were all mens discourses, concerning cyther warre or peace. The report, in the meane time, of the Emperours comming into Italy, did dayly increase, and for that end sundry great preparations were made at Barcelona, and the Archduke Ferdinand being come to Ispruch, gathered together certaine summes of money, to pay the footmen which hee leuyed, to send them into Italy to his brothers ayde, giuing out, that it was to assaile the Venetians State.

André Doris, neuertheless, at the same time, and some other of the Imperials, propounded to the Senate sundry meanes of agreement, saying, That the Emperour did beare a great and singular affection towards their Republick, offering themselves freely (if so it pleased the Republike) to mediate a peace betwixt them. The Venetians behaued themselves modestly in these offers and treaties, fearing that it was some cunning to separate them by these ialousies from the friendship and allyance of the French, their ancient allies and confederates: So as for all that they did not discontinue their preparations for warre, the Senate meaning to depend on none but it selfe, and that whensoever a treaty of peace should bee, it should bee made by them being armed with the honor of the Commonwealt.

By this time, the terme of the Duke of Vrbins seruice was expired: They confirmed him againe for three yeares more in the same office of Generall of their Army, and augmented his pay with tenne thousand Ducats every yeare, and his company of men at armes to the number of two hundred, and besides, they gaue to Guy Pbaldo his sonne, a company of fifty men at armes in their Army, and a yeerely pension of a thousand Ducats. They afterwards made Iano Frigosa Generall Superintendent of the affaires of warre, with good entertainment, for the acknowledgement of his valour and fidelitie, and for that they would euer haue in their army some one of authority and command, whom they might trust in the Duke of Vrbins absence, (as hee then was,) whereupon they sent for him, being then at Brescia, commanding him to come with speed to the Armie, to execute his charge.

Diuers other were in like manner honoured with sundry grades of honour in their Armie. The Count Gajazzo was made Generall of the light-horse, and Antonio de Castello Capitaine of the Artillery: They did afterwards, send to the Campe to the Provider Nani a great summe of money for the leuie of a number of new footmen to make the companies compleat. And to shew that they had likewise a care of their Sea-affaires, they made Ieronimo Pefare

General

The Venetians
great preparations by sea and land.

Generall of their Nauall army, and Alessandro Pefare, and Vincenzo Iustiniano, Providerators commanding them to be in readinesse to depart: they did chose moreouer tenne captaines for the Gallies, who should cause those tenne to bee armed which at the beginning of winter had bene disarmed, to the end that the Signory might haue aboue fifty gallies ready to set saile: and although that by the Confederacy they were bound to furnish but sixteene gallies, they neuertheless, promised to adde foure more, to make vp the number of twenty for the leagues seruice, of which Ieronimo Contarini was made Generall.

Now the Duke of Milan, and the Lord Saint Paul being solicited by them to augment the number of their infantry (as they were bound to doe) and they excusing themselves, for want of money, the Senate resolved to lend the French twelve thousand Ducats, and eight thousand to the Duke of Milan. But aboue all things they entreated the French King not to abandon the Confederates at such a time, in regard of the great affection which they had euer borne to him, and for their constancy in pursuing the warre. Without this supply, the Lord Saint Paul would haue bene brought to an extreame want of men, money, and all other things necessarie for the maintenance of the warre in Italy, for there was not any preparation at all scene to bee made beyond the mounts for the execution of any enterprize, which the King had often promised should bee done, and especially at that time when there was more need then euer, to stoppe the Emperours passage into Italy, by offering him great resistance at his entry, or by enforcing him to looke to the defense of Spaine, as failed by the way of the Pirenean mountaines (as was resolved) which the Venetians did most of all pursue, thinking thereby to breake the Emperours desseigne of comming into Italy.

But they perceiuing that the King did rather encline to the warre of Italy, they were in great hope that at one time the warre might be renued in Lombardy and in the Realme of Naples, and before that the Emperours aide should arrive, to make some notable progression.

Vpon these hopes, the Senate sent for the Duke of Vrbins to come to Venice, where, in the presence of the Ambassadors of France, and the Duke of Milan, and of one of the Lord Saint Pauls Gentlemen, they might consult and aduise on meanes to make warre, where in the end was concluded, before all other matters to pursue the enterprize of Milan, by siege rather then by assault, by surprizing all the neighbour townes and places to reduce the army of Antonio de Leua to want of victuals. And for this purpose it was likewise decreed for to haue twenty thousand foot-men in their army, namely, about some eight thousand in the French troups, and as many in those of the Venetians, two thousand from the Duke of Milan, and two thousand Lanesque. quences which they daylie expected from Lyons, leauied already at the common charge: and as for the enterprize of Genoa, they determined for to pursue it, according vnto the aptnesse of time, and the successe of Lombardie.

Now because that the whole safety of the affaires of Italy did depend vpon the stopping of the Emperours comming thither, they resolved to augment, they most that might bee, the French and Venetian nauall armies, and especially of great vessels, which might easily resist that of the Emperours which was composed of the like, to the end that the Emperour vnderstanding the difficulty of his journey, might abstaine from comming.

In the meane time they had notice that the King had changed his purpose, meaning for to make warre on the Emperour on the higher side of the mounts, vpon the Confinnes of Spaine, as had bene before determined: at which newes the Senate being assembled to dispatch André Nouageira

newly

The Venetians
love to the French and
the Duke of Milan.

The resolution of the assembly held at Venice by the Confederates.

The King determineth to make warre in Spaine.

newly chosen Ambassadour to the French King: the Senators were divided in opinion, whether to perswade the King to come in person into Italy, or to send his army towards the Pirenean mountaines to enuade Spaine.

The resolution of the Venetian council upon the Kings coming into Italy.

The matter being debated in open counsell, where Moceniga on the one side, a man of authority and well acquainted with affaires of State, and Mark-Antonio Cornare, a man of great vnderstanding, on the other, being heard, diuerly to maintaine the one and other opinion, that of Cornare prevailed, whereby they decreed to enioyne the Ambassadour Nouagera to perswade the King, or if he were already enclined therevnto, to incite him more, to depart forthwith and to come into Italy.

10

Nouagera being come into France did not faile to doe that which had bene resolued in the counsell, whereof there had bene sundry opinions, hoping to obtaine that which he had propounded, because the King had heard him with good attention, and greatly commended his counsell, as determining to put it in practise: and for that purpose the King did meane within a while after to come into Languedoc, to reduce all the forces that were there into the next and neereft placeto Italy, whether he promised to goe, being followed (besides twenty thousand foot-men) with tenne thousand Lanqueneets, and tenne thousand Pioners. The Kings departure, being in this manner held for assured, the Senate resolued that Nouagera should remaine in France nere to the Lady Regent, the Kings mother, and that Sebastian Iustinsano, whom Nouagera was sent to succceed, should follow the King into Italy.

20

The Senate in the meane time did with speed make all necessary preparations for the renewing of the warre; making account that at the latter end of Aprill, the Republiques army should goe before, and being ioyned with that of the Lord Saint Paul, should march to the enterprize of Milan, which being executed, the Emperours comming would seeme to be wholly broken: and by meanes of this victory, and by the helpe of the army, and the Kings presence, they supposed to be afterwards able to take the city of Genoa with ease, and any other designe that they pleased to execute,

30

The Venetians at the same time were very carefull to provide for the garde of the places which they held in Puglia, by sending for that purpose into the same country great numbers of foot-men, to persueue whatsoeuer they there possessed, and to attempt to make some farther progression; if occasion should be offered, and also for to keepe the Imperiall forces busied and diuided farre from Lombardy.

The Venetians care to preserve the places which they held in Puglia.

This great heate of the Kings begonne by little and little without any apparent cause to coole, and the prouisions for warre to goe slowly forward, wherevpon money was sent very sparingly from France to the Lord Saint Paul, who delpayring in a manner of being able to entertaine the army, protested that hee would gette him gonnes and leaue all, seeing that of tenne thousand men, whom hee ought to haue, hee had scarce the one halfe, by reason that being badly paid, they left the campe in troupes. At the last, the Lord Chastillon, who had bene long expected, came to the campe, with lesse store of money then was needfull, and within a few daies after, he left the campe, and went to Venice, saying that hee would goe into Puglia to assure the troupes that were there, and to carry them a certaine summe of money: for which journey, the Senate hauing speedily commanded some vessels to be made ready, according vnto his request, hee did daily with many excuses, delay his departure, which gaue a suspition that hee had neither money, nor any good will for to goe into Puglia, but that hee gaue out that hee would goe thither, because hee would not breake off the prouisions which the Venetians had already made.

50

The

The Lord Chastillon cometh to Venice and makes a shew that hee would goe into Puglia.

The King, doubting the matter, and knowing how great cause hee gaue them to suspect, did within a while after send John Iaquin his Ambassadour to Venice to sollicite the departure of the army with the other prouisions for war, without making any mention at all of the Kings so much desired comming, which did so highly import them. This did greatly encrease the Venetians suspition, and did infinitely trouble them, in regard of the dangers which threatened them from the Emperour, and also for that this delay did cause them to loose the fruite of so many hopes, their army remayning vnprofitable on the shore of the Riuier Adda, because that it was not able alone to execute the enterprize of Milan.

The Senate suspition encreasing the Kings comming.

The Venetians sollicite the King to come into Italy.

The Senate neuerthelesse did not cease still to arme, soliciting the King for that, wherewith hee causelesly did presse them, and for this end they chose Gaspardo Pinelli Secretary to the Signory, to goe speedily into France to giue the King to vnderstand, that for their part all things were in readinesse to renewe the warre, and that there was nothing wanting but his presence, promising to send forthwith their troupes to meet him: to the end that with greater safety and speed they might execute some notable enterprize.

At the same time the Bandetti of the Realme of Naples came into the field in sundry places of the Kingdome, and did extremely presse the Imperials, whereby Rauce de Cera did promise to himselfe some good successe, being supplied with money, and with certaine foot companies; he had by sundry messengers acquainted the King therewith, who from him did represent vnto his Maiesty the State of the affaires, that he might obtaine the supplies that he craved, the which, albe it they were promised to be sent with the army, were neuerthelesse delayed from day to day, to the great prejudice of their league, by giuing time to the Imperials to renewe and augment their forces: for the report of the Emperours comming had caused diuers Barons and people of the Kingdome to change their purposes, diuers of them being desirous to insinuate themselves into his fauour, some to obtaine pardon, and others to get offices and immunities in the Realme, so that the Prince of Orange being gonne into Abruzzo, recovered Aquila by composition, by drawing forth of the city and the whole country nere adioyning an hundred thousand Ducats for the payment of his army: from thence he sent forces to Matrica, where Camillo Parde lay in Garrison with foure hundred foot-men, who being gon forth thereof a little before, promising to returne so soone as the Imperials should approach it, the foot-men that were within it, went ouer the walls and left it, whereby the towne was yielded.

The bandetti of Naples come into the field.

Aquila is recovered of the Imperials.

Matrica taken by them.

This notwithstanding, the successe of the Imperials was not so good in Puglia, where treason being secretly practized in Barletta, and discouered, Iulio of Naples, captaine of certaine foot forces, and some of the townesmen as authors and complices of the Rebellion were put to death.

Treason discouered in Barletta.

Besides, the Venetians hauing drawne horse-men forth of Greece into the same Prouince, they ioyned with those Simon Romano, and all of them together scouring the Country, did assure it, and kept the waies open to victuals, hauing diuised Pignatello Count of Borella forth of the whole Prouince.

Now the Marquis of Guasto beeing come into Puglia, would not deal with Barletta, a very strong and well fortified city, but went and encamped before Monopoli, with foure thousand Spaniards, and two thousand Italians, and lodged in a small bottome covered by the mountaine, so as he could not be hurt with the towne ordnance, wherein lay Camillo Visino, Andre Gritti gouernour of the city and John Vitturi the Prouidator, vnto whom Rauce de Cera forthwith sent three hundred foot-men by the Gallies.

Monopoli besieged by the Marquis of Guasto.

The Marquis then caused a great Bastion to be made right ouer against the walles within Harguebuze shot, and two others vpon the sea shore, on each side one, Then hauing battered the towne, and made a breach hee gaue an assault,

Ssss a

The Marquis giveth an ef-fault to the city in his lift.

assault, where he lost about five hundred men, and great numbers of Pioners, with three peeces of ordnance that were broken, whereupon he retired a mile and halfe further off, because that the cities ordnance did him much hurt in the place where he was lodged, which caused the Venetians to sally forth, and to assault the bastions that he had made, where they slue about an hundred men, and then they assured the Haven by a bastion made upon their shore, opposite to that of the enemies.

The Marquis
retireth from before Mono-poli.

The Marquis being newly returned before Monopoli, and having made two Cavaliers, with two trenches, two hundred foot men sallied forth of the towne and burned his workes. After that, the Marquis making an other approach on the right side of the battery, and causing a bastion to be made behind, he planted the ordnance upon it, and did beate downe three score fathome of the wall, within foure fathome of the ground: but having intelligence, that new companies had entred the towne the same night, sent by Rance de Cera, he withdrew his ordnance, and at last discamped, whereupon being come to Conversa, he afterwards retired to Naples. The braue resistance of Monopoli and the retreat of the Marquis, did greatly encourage the Confederates, so that diuers Barons and others, repenting that they had gonne to the Imperial party, shewed themselves very ready for a new rebellion: the which emboldened the souldiers and captaines of the league, to vndertake some enterprize.

The city of Brundisium
yeldeth to the Venetians.

This being reported to the Senate, perceiving that their nauall army remained idle at Corfou, expecting the arrival of the French army, they commaunded their Generall to saile into Puglia, where being arrived, he cast anchor nere to Brundisium, hoping, (as it came to passe) that those of the towne, prouoked by a particular affection towards the Venetians, would forthwith yeeld. The city being yeelded on conditions was preferred from spoile, and from all wrongs of the souldiers, and Iohn Francisco Lusignan was made gouernour thereof, as Magistrate for the Signory, and presently afterwards they beganne to batter the castles, the charge thereof was committed to Camillo Vrsino, who hauing in short space brought them to a streight passe, could not for all that enforce them to yeeld, by reason of their hope, ere long to see the Imperiall navy vpon that sea.

The Prince of Orange determineth to goe to Perusia.

The Venetian army in the meane time did from the Cape of Otranto molest the whole country, to the great hurt of the Imperials: Simon Romano died at that exploit, who was a valiant and courageous person. The affaires standing at this stay, the Prince of Orange knowing that the Confederates forces were not so meane and weake, as they could easily bee driuen forth of the Realme, neither yet so mighty as they were able to make any progression of great importance, Or perhaps, because that the Emperour would haue the Popes content preferred before all other matters, that hee might haue him for his friend and confederate at his coming into Italy, after that he had put strong garrisons into the most important places, he turned with the residue of his forces towards Perusia, to drue Malateste Ballone thence, and from thence to enter into Tuscany, to restore those of Medicis to their country.

The Duke of Vrbino runneth to the defense of his owne
State.

The behaviour and approaches of the Prince, did cause the Duke of Vrbino to suspect, that he went about to enuade his State, whereupon he departed suddenly from the army, to goe and provide for his owne territories: The Venetians were not well pleased with their Generalls departure, in so troublesome a season, as well for their owne interests, as for feare of the suspicion of the French, who by that accident, taking some occasion of a feigned suspicion, might grow slow in the provisions for warre. Therefore the Senate determined with all speed to send Nicolas Tepulo to him, who had bene already before appointed to goe to him to the camp, to aduertize him of the new conduct, & by forcible reasons to exhort him, in the name of the Common-wealth, to returne speedily to the army army, and to induce him the more willingly thereto, they sent him a good summe of money for the payment of three thousand foot men appointed for the guard of his State: but for that time there was no great need thereof. For the Prince of Orange having intelligence that the Count of Aquila, and Camillo Vrsino called Parde, having ioyned their forces together, were come to Canosa, and their troupes dayly encreasing, it was to bee feared that they would cause some commotion of consequence, having changed his determination, would not at that time depart forth of the Kingdome, fearing some great insurrection of the people in regard of the great extortion that was there committed, by means whereof the Spanish name was very odious to them, whereupon hee thought it fit, first of all to appease those stirres, and to make prouision of victuals, referring the execution of his former designe to a more commodious season (the which hee did) so that the Duke of Vrbino being thereby freed of his suspicion, did forthwith come to the army, determining for to march towards Milan with all his troupes, the Lord Saint Paul having sent him word, that hee would take the same way, being inuited thereto by the difficulties wherein the Imperials then were, and by the fortunate successe of the French, because that notwithstanding that two thousand Spanish foot-men were arrived at Milan, whom the Genowais would not entertaine, al-be it that they expressly came to rescue them, discommodities, neuertheless, by their coming were as much augmented as their forces, seeing that in so great a dearth and want of money they were to feed and pay them.

The Prince of Orange changeth his determination.

The Duke of Vrbino being come backe to the army determineth to be-sege Adrian.

Enterprize of
the French & Venetian armies.

On the contrary diuers towne on the hether side thesine were at the same time yeelded to the Lord Saint Paul, so as the whole country, in a manner, to his great gain and reputation, was reduced vnder his power.

Both the armies then advancing forwards, they met together at Saint Martias Burrow, five miles from Milan, where after a long consultation, concerning the means how to execute that enterprize they resolved with both the armies to encampe round about the towne, to encompassse and take in as much of the walles as they could, thereby to weaken the enemies defense by busying them in sundry places: But there was not discerned in the captaines such readinesse and speed as was befitting the execution of such a designe, because that the French said: That in the Venetians campe the number of souldiers was farre lesse then they supposed, and not so many as ought to bee, and that by separating themselves, they should, being alone, be weake and in great danger. The Venetians on the other side, declared that they better accomplished that whereunto they were tied then had the French, and that therefore they would see them encampe first, and they afterwards would doe the like, and vpon these distrusts one of the other they departed, their former resolution being broken.

The two armies distrust one another.

The Lord Saint Paul marched towards Landriana, the Duke of Vrbino tooke the way towards Monce, and the Duke of Milan departed with a determination to enter into Paugia with all his forces: making account by this separation, to scoure the waies, molest the country, and keepe victuals from Antonio de Leus, hoping thereby to ouerthrow him, and to obtaine at last their common desire, which was, to possesse Milan and Coma, the two onely Cities of importance which held out in that whole State for the Emperour: But so soone as the French were arrived at Landriana, they suffered themselves to bee carried away (as it was thought they would) with the enterprize of Genoa, being very vehemently solicted thereto by Cesar Fregosa, who measuring matters according to his own desire, made the euent very facile & easie, whereupon, they promised to themselves that they would soone returne to their quarter, and therefore they requested the Duke of Vrbino in staying for the, not to stir from thence where he was with the Venetian forces & the Duke of Milan, for the execution of their

The Lord S.
Paul resolued to execute the enterprize of Genoa.

former designs, suffering nothing whatsoever in the meane time to enter into those cities.

Now the French army departing in this resolution to goe to Genoa, tooke the way of Paia, the Lord Saint Paul, sending the ordinance before, with the waggons and the vanguard, and himselfe somewhat late, followed with the battaile and the rereward. Antonio de Leua being aduertized by his spies, how that he staid behind, farre from the vanguard, determined to follow and assaile him if occasion were offered: whereupon in the night he came forth of Milan with his souldiers wearing white shirts vpon their armor, &c. marching without sound of drum in good order he met with them in the plaine, before they had any knowledge of his coming, the first Squadron of the French being gonne on so far, as it could not in any time arrive to the rescue of the rest, as also because that the Lord Saint Pauls selfe, did stay behinde, by reason that a peece of ordinance did sticke fast in the mire at the passage of a Riuer, where whilst he was busied with those few men at armes that were there with him, and some fiftene hundred Lansquenets vnder the command of capitaine Boffa, he found vnlookt for, the Spanish shot at his backe, who were at the first brauely repulst by men at armes, euen into the battailions of the Almains; but there being a deepe streame betwixt the French and Spaniards, their shot retired behind that streame, where was a pace of the breadth of thirty or forty foote. The Lansquenets on the French side did fight valiantly, and with them the Lord Saint Paul, who was alighted from his horse, as were Iohn Ieronimo Castillon, and Claudio Rangone, capitaines of two thousand Italians, who did gallantly defend themselves. But at the last the Imperials comming to the charge with a great battaillon of Almains, the horse-men and Lansquenets turning their backs, the Italians did the like; and the Lord Saint Paul being remounted was taken as he would haue leaped ouer a dike, and there were taken prisoners with him, Ieronimo Castillane, Claudio Rangone, Lignach Carbon, and other captains of great note.

The Count Guy de Rangone being gonne before with the vanguard early in the morning, as it was concluded the night before, had not any notice of the fight till he was safely come to Paia: all the Lansquenets in a manner escaped, and Antonio de Leua went backe with his prisoners to Milan. Those that escaped, part of them retired themselves to the Venetians territories; where they were kindly entertained, and others into other places. The Duke of Vrbin hauing intelligence of this defeat, forsooke his abode at Monce, where he lay, and retired to Cassan, a place of more safety, for which the Senate did highly commend him: he had with him about fise thousand foot-men, foure hundred men at armes, and seuen hundred light horse, with great store of carriage. But come to Cassan, which is a place nere to the Riuer Adda, he did then fortifie himselfe with strong Rampiers, leauing but one way open which was fenced and garded with all necessaries, supposing that place to be most commodious, to be able with ease to releue, if neede were, Paia and Landa, to offend the enemies, and to defend the State of the Signory; and besides, to fauour, if occasion were offered, the enterprize of Genoa by sea. Whereupon thinking himselfe to be very safe in that place, he would not follow the opinion of Iano Maria Fregosa, who counselled him to retire with his army to Bressia, for feare of any inconuenience, being not equall in forces to Antonio de Leua. He being emboldned by this victory, and more desirous to breake the Confederate forces, had followed the Duke of Vrbin as farre as Vauiry, two miles from Cassan, which caused some doubt in the Venetians, least hee would haue passed the Adda to haue made wast of the Bressian, Bergamasque and Creman territories: But the Duke reposed great trust in his light Caualery, the which surpassed that of the enemies, both in number and valour, who by scouring all the neighbour Countreies round about, did not onlie cut off all the victuals from the Imperials campe, but had Antonio de Leua assailed the Lord Saint Paul.

The number of the Venetians army.

Antonio de Leua followed the Duke of Vrbin in his retreat to Cassan.

had so affrighted them as none of them durst any more come forth of the trenches: therefore the Duke remaying firme in his resolution, to continue in that place, would not raise his Campe, as well in regard of his reputation, as for the victuals that were brought to him from the country, neere adioyning, which would other-wise haue releued the enemies, and if hee should haue retired to the City, hee would haue spent those which were appoynted for their friends.

Now the two armies being so neere one to another, they did continually goe forth to skirmish on both sides, where the Imperials were still beaten. Antonio de Leua supposing to haue some satisfaction for his losses, by some other means, sent Caesar of Naples on the farther side of the riuer Adda, to scoure the Territories of Bressia and Crema, whereof the Duke of Vrbin being aduertised, leauing the Count Gajazzo for the gard of the Campe, he tooke with him a good troope of soldiers and went and ambusht him selfe, neere to the place where he knew the enemies would passe the riuer, from whence, part of them being gone ouer, hee came forth vnlookt for, with great fury, vpon those who staid behind vpon the riuer shoare, ready to passe ouer, hauing first of all sent his light Caualery, to intercept their way, if so bee that they would haue fled towards their campe. But Caesar of Naples being troubled with this vnlookt for accident, did speedily cause the bridge to bee broken, fearing least the Duke, for his part, would haue come ouer and fought with him, whereupon, all those that staid behind, to the number of fiftene hundred, were either cut in peeces or taken prisoners by the Duke, and among others, it fell out, that a braue Spanish Capitaine was taken by a woman of big stature, who in mans attire receiued pay of the Count Gajazzo, and the Count hauing, for mirths sake, called before him on a time, the Capitaine that was prisoner, shewing him Marguerite (for so the soldiers called her) told him that the same was the soldier that had taken him prisoner, the Spaniard looking vpon her, answered, that he did comfort him selfe in his mishap, for that he had bene taken by so braue a man as hee seemed to bee, but when hee told him that it was a woman, shame and disdain did so seaze vpon him, as within few daies after he dyed with griefe.

Afterwards the two armies kept them selues in their quarters, for the space of many daies: but the Duke of Vrbin calling the Capitaines sundrie times to counsell, and propounding diuers things vnto them, did sufficiently manifest his desire to assaile the enemies, and to cause them to dislodge. At the last he resolved to goe forth with all his forces, and to vse means by cunning to come to stroakes with Antonio de Leua, vpon some aduantage: hee called all the ordinance of the Campe to bee brought into one place, and then hee began to march with all the troups, both foote and horse, and with three peeces of ordinance, meaning to leaue them behind him, by retiring so soone as hee had begunne the skirmish, fayning flight both for feare and vpon necessity: whereby the enemies comming forward to get those three peeces, should bee put to rout by the ordinance of the Campe, and being so disordered he would againe returne vpon them with greater violence. But this designe fell not out according to his expectation; because that the Count Gajazzo comming forth sooner then he should, with a part of his Infantry, and beginning the skirmish too far off from the Campe, being not able with those hee had brought with him long to sustaine the enemies fury, was enforced, notwithstanding that hee fought valiantly, to retire in some disorder. Whereupon, the Duke perceiving him to bee in danger did on a foddaine make haft to his reskew, and gaue in with such fury athwart the Imperiall Infantry, which neuerly pursued the Count Gajazzo, as hee caused them to make a stand, and to turne their backs, still pursuing and beating them euen into their Campe.

Antonio de Leua lost in this action more then fiftene hundred foote, part of them being slaine, and the rest taken prisoners: where vpon hee durst no more

Part of the enemies are defeated by the Duke of Vrbin.

Great valor of a woman in mans attire.

The Duke of Vrbin enterprize to defeat the enemies.

The enemies are beaten by the Duke of Vrbin.

after

The doubts and feare of Antonio de
Leua.

Antonio de Leua retired to Milan.

The report of the Lancesques mills comming causeth the Venetian Army to retire to the Cities.

The City of Cambray: chosen for the re-ty of peace.

The Venetian
Senate are made content with the
French King.

after that suffer his soldiers to sallie forth of the Campe, nor attempt any enterprize, continuing in great feare and doubt, what hee were best to doe, being afflicted with sundry cares and difficulties. For, on the one side, hee could tarry no longer there for want of victuals, and then hee perceived that his aboad there could in no sort profit him: on the other side, to dislodge, and to returne to Milan, he thought it would greatly blemish his reputation, and that of the whole army, as if he should confesse, that hee retired for feare, being chased by a number of enemies, farre lesse then him-selfe: That it was to no purpose to enter into the Venetians state, but very dangerous, all their townes beeing mand with strong Garrisons well fortified and on the other side the people of Milan, were beyond measure discontented, and in manner desperat, by reason of the extortion and wrongs which they had sustayned by the soldiers, were ready to make an insurrection, and to alter the state, calling without controulement, for their Duke, who lay then with his troopes in Cremona, for he doubted not but that the Venetians being desirous to see him instaled in his State, would hazard all their forces, when hope of obtaining that which they so much desired should bee offered them.

But not-withstanding all these reasons, Antonio de Leua being enforced by necessity to dislodge, retired to Milan. After his departure, the Duke of Vrbini was desirous to come neerer to Monce: but the Senate hauing some suspicion that Sforza did treat of an agreement with the Emperor, which if it should come to passe, their army would be inclosed, and all the passages shut vp from releueing Bergamo, caused him to goe with the Army towards Lauda, to discover the Duke of Milans intent, and to bee assured of him: But since then, the report of the Lancesques comming, daily encreasing, and how they did meane to come downe thorow the Verona Territory, to ioyne them-selues after ward with Antonio de Leua, the Senate decreed to place all their troupes in the townes and cities of their owne state: Wherevpon, the Duke of Vrbini, according to this resolution, retired to Bressia, with one part of the army, and the Count Gajazzo went with the residue to Bergamo.

At the same time as these things hapned, the French King tending altogether to peace, that hee might haue home his children, and the Emperor like-wise enclining therevnto, the Lady Marguerite, the Emperors Aunt, was by him deputed to conclude this treaty on his part, hauing for this purpose sent her a large commission, which was imparted to a Secretary, whome the King had to that end sent into Flanders: Wherevpon, the King likewise did speedily appoynt the Lady Regent his mother, with like commission, which was like-wise communicated to the Emperors Agents. The commissions being viewed on both sides, the Citie of Cambray was appointed, where these two Ladies should meet, and talke together, to treat of the particularities of peace.

The King did in no sort aduertize the Senate of this treaty till it was very late, at such time as the Lady Regent departed to the Treaty of Cambray, when the matter could be no longer dissembled, neither did hee so much as communicate vnto them any particularities of the Treaty, but hee onely promised the Ambassadors of the Confederates in generall, that hee would make none agreement what-so euer with the Emperor, without their consent and satisfaction; then shewing his great affection towards the Republike, hee did greatly exhort them to a generall peace, (which assuring them should be mentioned in that diet) he entreated all the Considerats to send ample power and authority to their Ambassadors, which were at his Court, to bee present thereat in their names, and to conclude the peace.

The Senate found this manner of proceeding by the King to bee very strange, who wonderfull cunningly had a long time entetayned them with hope of his comming into Italy, or to send great forces thither both by land and sea, and for that that he had done neither of them, and had euer fed them with words, for feare of breaking of the treaty, yet for all that being desirous to shew that they had still the same mind, and inclination to peace, which they had before, they determined to send to their two Ambassadors Iustinian and Nouagera, who were at the same time in the french Court, commission and authority to be present at that Treaty, and to promise in the Common-wealths name, what-so euer should bee necessary and convenient for the conclusion of peace. But Nouagera falling sicke before the arrivall of this commission in France, died, to the great grieefe of his Country-men.

Now the whole burthen of this charge lay alone vpon Iustinian, who had particular instructions of the Senates meaning and resolution: the which in effect was, That in any case, that which had beene agreed vpon on the three and twentieth of the precedent month, might be observed, and likewise, that the same which had beene concluded and resolved on before, at the Diet of Wormes, might take effect: because that all the strife betwixt the Republike and the house of Austria, did onely proceed from not observing the precedent accords: but that about all other things, they would haue the state of Milan to be rendered, and restored to Francis Sforza: of which charge and commission the Venetian Ambassador had no great cause to make vse, For not-withstanding that hee had followed the Lady Regent to Cambray, hee neuer-thelesse remayned the most part of the time at Saint Quintins, certaine miles distant from Cambray, none of the most important particularities, nor truest articles of the treaty, being communicated vnto him.

The Senate by this meanes did doubt, that the King was desirous to conclude an agreement for him-selfe alone, without any regard to their particular interest, nor to the other Confederates; and that as concerning that which hee had promised, to conclude nothing with the Emperor without them, proceeded from feare, least they suspecting his intent, should prevent him, by making an accord with the Emperor, and hee by that meanes should bee excluded from all their friendshipships, and his accord made thereby more difficult, and with lesse advantage. Therefore the King had sent the Bishoppe of Tarbi into Italy, with commission to goe to Venice, to the Duke of Milan, to Ferrara, and to Florence, to treat of matters belonging to the warres, albeit it was the least part of his meaning: And within a while after Theodore Triunccio came to Venice, where in the Kings name he required the Senate, to deliuer ouer vnto him in Deposito, the Cities of Rauenna, and Ceruia, till such time as that businesse were ended, assuring them that hee did it to giue occasion to the Pope to declare him-selfe, it being a matter of great importance to haue his fauour.

Answer was made to this request, that as concerning his comming, the Republike would not faile him of all aide and succor, which it had before times promised, and to giue him a more euident prooffe thereof they were content to send to Suza, or to Ast, twenty thousand Ducats, before hand towards the first payment. But for the sequestration of the Cities of Romagna, an vniuersall peace being to bee treated of at the Treaty of Cambray, that difficulty, among others, was there to bee resolved; how the Senate ought not to consent to that sequestering, till such time as it perceived al their affaires quiet and all other contentions seiled.

But in this, the Kings cunning, and sundry ententions, being discovered, they did except, with great deuotion, the resolution at Cambray. Therefore the Senate commanded Lodouico Faliere their Ambassador in England, to treat with that king, who had euer shewed himselfe a great friend to the Republike, to be pleased, (as hee had at other times bin) to take it into his protection; and to procure, that in those affaires which were handled at Cambray, nothing might bee concluded to the hurt and preiudice thereof, nor to the liberty of Italy, whereof, many years

The Venetians
give authority to their Ambassadors to be present at the Treaty of Cam-
bray.

The Venetians
meanings concerning the Articles of
peace.

The Venetians
suspect the Kings carriage

Triunccio his request to the Venetians
from the King.

The Venetians
answers to Tri-unccio.

The Venetians
reconsent to the King of England.

yeares before, he had to his immortall prayse, taken vpon him the defense while the preparations were made on all sides, the Emperour, who for all the treaty of peace had not ceased to pursue his designs, nor to make his preparations for his journey into Italy came to Genoa, with many shippes and Gallies, within which were a thousand horse, and nine thousand footmen the which he caused to be landed at Sauona, for their more easie passage into Lombardy. His designs for that present, could not be truly discovered, because he affirmed that his comming into Italy was to establish peace there, and to compose all his variations with the Potentates of Italy: yet neuertheless, he did with all speed, and from all parts assemble the greatest forces he could; Antonio de Leua came and ioyned with him with twelue thousand footmen, the Prince of Orange with seauen thousand, the Lanceque nets which had beene leui'd in the connty of Tiroll to the number of tenne thousand came through the Verona territory to meet him so as all his forces being ioyned together, amounted to forty thousand footmen, beside the caualery, which was great, the Almaines being folowed by tenne thousand Bourguinian horse-men.

The Emperours arriual, and with such prouision, did greatly amaze the minds of all Italy, together with the rumor that was spread abroad, how that the accord betwixt the Emperour and the most Christian King was already concluded, the Confederates being not therein comprehended, notwithstanding that the King had promised the contrary: so that there was not any, but the Pope alone, which was free from this feare in all Italy, (according to the particular treaty which he had before concluded with the Emperour at Barcelona), which till then had beene kept secret, whereby he made account to make vse of the Imperiall forces for the execution of his designs, and chiefly to restore his nephewes into Florence, and to place them in their ancient dignity and greatnesse, as had beene concluded betwixt them.

Therefore, the more to honor his comming, so soone as he vnderstood that he was landed at Genoa, he sent thither three of the cheefest Cardinals of the Colledge for to congratulate his arriual, and to accompany him euery where.

The Florentines vpon these newes, whom it first of all concerned to purchase his fauor, and to be assured of his meaning, did within a while after likewise send their Ambassadors vnto him, who after the congratulation, were to excuse them for entering into confederacy against him, hauing therein beene enforced by the Popes authority and commandement, and for that they had since then continued therein by necessity: and they proceeded no farther because they had not any commission, especially concerning the strife betwixt the Pope and them: but the Emperour seeming to be desirous to satisfie the Pope in that which he had promised him, their Ambassadors was to no purpose.

The other Potentates of Italy, did likewise send their Ambassadors to his Imperiall Maiesty, requesting his friendship and peace. The Venetians alone remaining constant in their determination, resolu'd to enter into no agreement with the Emperour but vpon extremity: not, but that they were desirous of peace, but because he feared that the Emperour had a meaning contrary to the liberty of Italy, and that he would to handle the matter as all the whole state thereof should depend only vpon him: wherevpon, they thought, that to shew themselves humble and low-minded, was nothing else but to encourage him, and to confirme him in his desire and hope of being able to command all Italy. So that they did then wisely by not sending their Ambassadors to him: but they gaue their consent that the Duke of milan, (who as being ryed vnto them, had therevpon, craued the Senates aduise) might send his Ambassadors, as a vassall of the Empire: and as for themselves, being in a manner left alone, they did with speed make great prouisions for warre, to assure (as much as might bee) their owne state, they leaui'd new troupes of foot to augment their army, and to strengthen the garrisons

The Emperour
arriual on Ge noa.

Num'ers of the Emperours for ces in Ita'y

Italy amazed at the Emperours arriual.

Florentines
sent Ambassa dors to the Em
perour.

What kept
the Venetians from sending Ambassadors to
the Emperour

Great prepara tions of the Venetians.

of other Citties: they chose Francisco Pascale, Prouidator Generall for the firme land, whose principall charge was to visit their forces, and to furnish them with all necessaries: they rooke diuers Captaines into their pay, and among others Sigismond Malaseste, with a thousand foote, and two hundred light horse; and because great numbers of Lancequenets, departing from Bologna, were already passed by, they caused John Cantares the Prouidator, and Ceser Frangosa with a strong garrison to enter into Verona.

Now because it did greatly import them to keepe the other Italian Confederate princes in breath, The Senate did not faile to encourage the Florentines, and to commend their constancie, exhorting them to defend their country and liberty, promising to giue them all aide and succour that the time would permit, and particularly to cause their forces to enter vpon the Parmesan, and Placentine Confines, so soone as the Emperour should dislodge, to draw into those quarters, for the defence of his Citties, the Imperiall forces which were in Tuscany.

They did the like to the Duke of Ferrara, vnto whom they sent Marke Antonio Renier their Ambassador, to declare vnto him the Republickes good meaning, for the common defence of the liberty of Italy, and the particular affection which they did beare to the Duke, and to his whole state, for which, being conioyned by neere neighbour-hood, and by sundry other respects, they would neuer refuse to runne one selfe same fortune with him: and therefore they desired to be acquainted with his intent and meaning. The Duke shewed that hee was highly pleased with his Ambassade, and promised to doe much, and particularly to leuy great numbers of men of warre, which hee assembled neere to Modena, to serue, not alone for the defence of his owne state, but in all places where the Confederates should haue neede.

The Treaty of Cambray was at the same time published, which already by a Common rumor was knowne to all men, namely, how that none of the Confederates were comprehended in it. There was onely, place reserved for the Venetians to enter into it, so as within the space of foure moneths they would end their controversies with the Emperour, which was nothing else but a silent exclusion in regard the greatest difficulties remayned vndecided.

The King by the same treaty was among other things bound to cause those townes which the Venetians held in Puglia to bee rendred to the Emperour, and vpon their refusal to declare himselfe their enemy, and to helpe him to recouer them by force. For the execution of which article, the King did on a suddaine send his Ambassadors to Venice, to entreat them to render to the Emperour whatsoever they held in Puglia, being bound to make that request by the Treaty of Cambray, and that, according to the forme of the Capitulations at Coignac: adding therunto, that he did so much rely on the affection which they had euer made shew to beare vnto himselfe, and to the Crowne of France, as albeit that there were not any Treaty that did oblige him to demand that of them, hee did neuertheless perswade him selfe that hee should obtaine it, at his owne priuatre request, it importing him so highly, as hee could not otherwise redeeme his children from the Emperour, who were one day to succeed him in the Kingdome.

The Senate answered that it did still continue, in that good will and affection which it had euer borne to the King and Crowne of France, the Republique being in a manner ioyned to that Kingdome by an indissoluable band, in regard of sundry faire reciprocal offices, and common interests: that they could not deny but that they had greatly desired to haue beene comprehended in that accord made with the Emperour, not so much for the prouiding for their owne safety as for to take away all suspicion that they were in any fault, or that the Common-wealth had not found intelligence, and correspondence with the Crowne of France. Yet neuertheless, they did so much rely vpon the Kings goodnesse and wisdom, as they hoped by his interposing of his authoritie with the Emperour, to obtaine

The Venetians
exhortation to the confederates

The Venetians
efforts to the Duke of Ferr ara.

Publication of the treaty of Cambray.

The Kings re quest to the Ve
netians.

The Venetians
answer to the King.

peace

peace and assurance which they so much desired. But concerning the restitution of the Citties of Puglia, it was euident, that they were nottyed to doe it by any bond, seeing that the King had concluded peace; without comprehending them therein, hauing thereby absolved them from the bond of the Confederacy, by which was expressly mentioned, that the King could not make any accord without them: Yet they neuer the lesse desired to giue him therein some satisfaction; but hee was to tarry for some opportunity how to doe it, seeing that the deliuey of my Lords his children was to bee made within two moneths, by which time, they hoped to finde some meanes to compose the strife betwixt the Emperors and them, whereby the same businesse might in like manner by the same meanes be finished to the Kings content.

*The King en-treatheth the Emperor to make an accord with the Ve-
netians.*

Vpon this answer the King dispatcht the Admirall into Italy, to exhort him to vniuersall peace, and chieefely to make an accord with the Venetians, by meanes whercof, hee hoped to bee able to accomplish the conditions of the Treaty of Cambray, by causing the Citties of Puglia to be rendered to him, hauing already for his part begun that which belonged vnto him to execute, by commanding Raner de Cera with all his companies, to depart forth of Puglia, hauing consigned into the hands of the Emperors commissioners, all the places which hee held in his name in the Realme of Naples, by perswading like-wise the Venetian officers to doe the like: But they being before aduertized of the Senates intention, had refused so to doe.

At this stay stood the affaires of Italy at that time. The Emperor being in armes, and very mighty; the Pope his friend and Confederate, the other Potentates of Italy being in a manner ready to obay him, and the French wholly chased forth of Italy; for albeit they had not as yet layde downe their armes, it was neuer the lesse mentioned in the Treaty, that the King should no more medle with the affaires of Italy nor Germany, in the behalfe of any Potentates, to the preiudice of the Emperor. The Venetians alone, in the midst of so many difficulties, made preparations to resist the Emperor, if so be that he were desirous, (as it was thought he would bee) to seaze vpon the State of Milan: therefore their confederacy being broken with all others, they did newly reuiue it with Francis Sforza, exhorting him to take courage, and to hope well, meaning in his behalfe to employ all their forces.

The end of the eighth Booke of the fifth Decade.

40

50

10 The Contents of the ninth Booke of the fifth Decade.

10 IRST, Soliman taketh Armes to restore Iohn Vayuode into the kingdome of Hungary, with the taking of Belgrade. The insurrection of the Hereticks in Germany. A motion of peace betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. The enteruiew of the Pope and the Emperor at Bologna. Accord betwixt the Emperor and the Duke of Milan. Accord made betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians. Warre against the Florentines. Pope Clement crowneth the Emperor at Bologna. Confederacy betwixt the Pope, the Emperor, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan. The Marquis of Mantua is made a Dutchy. The Venetians send Ambassadors to Constantinople to be 30 present at the Circumcision of Solimans children, being by him entreated to that end. The Almaines demand a counsell, and the Popes answer therevnto.
The Emperor grauntheth the Interim in Germany concerning religion, until a counsell were called. Solimans great designs against Christendome. The Venetians make great preparations and stand vpon their guard. The Venetians re-solue to remaine neuer in the warre, betwixt the Emperor and Soli-man. The Kings of France and England determine to make warre vpon the 40 Emperor. Soliman returneth into Hungary with a great army. The Emperor commeth likewise with a great Army neere to the City of Vienna, there to tarry for the Turke. The Nauall Armies of the Emperor, and Soliman.
Coron and Patras, are taken by the Imperial army. The Duke of Ferrara reco-uereth Modena & Regio. A second enteruiew of the Pope and Emperor at Bolognia. The Venetians refuse to renew the league, being satisfied with the former, and not meaning to adde anything to it. And lastly a new league con-50 cluded, betwixt the Pope, the Emperor and all the Potentates of Italy, (the Venetians excepted.)

Tttt

The

The Ninth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

Soliman taketh Buda.

VHILEST Italy was in alarme by reason of the Emperors arruall with such great provisions, Soliman the Turkish Emperour resolved to restore John Vaynode King of Hungary to his Kingdome, from whence, Fernand had expelled him, and being entired to this end with a mighty army vpon the Confinnes of Hungary, he came and encamped before Buda, which he tooke with ease, then hee caused his Cavallery to scour the Cham-paine Country of Austria, spoiling all places that were subiect to the Arch-duke, threatening him that hee would within a while after encampe with all his forces before Vienna: Wherevpon hee caused great preparations, of victuals and warlike engins to be made, to send them thither by Danubie. These newes did greatly trouble the Emperour, perceiving that it concerned his reputation and the safety of the States of the Empire, not to suffer so mighty an enemy to come so neere him, besides the trouble and care whereto his brother was reduced, whilst hee busied him-selfe in matters of meaner consequence, as spectator of the eminent dangers of his whole house, and subiects.

The Hereticks begin to stirre in Germany.

This mischeefe was followed by an other as great, for his brother aduertized him, that the Sect of Hereticks did very much encrease in Germany, that they were assembled in great troupes, and made shew of great innouation, and that if they were not speedily preuented by rooting them wholly out, it was to bee feared that some great hurt would redound to the Catholike Religion, which would preiudice the temporall States of Princes, and chiefly those of the Empire. These occasions being well weighed, caused the Emperour to condescend to peace, and to pursue it in effect, the which desire at the first, men thought that he had but feigned; For the Emperour thinking it not only dangerous, but small for his honour, to depart forth of Italy, and to leave matters imperfect, without establishing a sure peace there for a time, he beganne to shew that his mind enclined therevnto.

*The Emperour is desirous of an accord with
the Venetians.*

But because hee plainly perceived that hee could not effect it without making an accord with the Venetians, on whome, (during these troubles) the State of all Italy seemed to depend, being yet doubtful whether the French king would ioyne with them, who were so much distast of him, by reason that hee did no more care to obseue the Treaty of Cambray, now that hee had home his children, then hee had done that of Madril, after that hee was set at liberty: Hee resolved with him-selfe to make an accord with the Venetians, and made this his desire knowne

knowne to his owne Councillours, the better to finde some meanes to end this businessse, in which diuers men of authority did employ themselves.

Andrew Doria sent Frederico Grimaldi to Venice to offer them freely to employ himselfe in this treaty, assuring them that he knew for certaine that the Emperour was desirous of an agreement with them, and that if the Senate would be pleased to haue him to meddle in the businessse, he did hope speedily to dispatch it. The Senate neither accepting nor refusing this offer, answered that it had cuer desired peace, and highly esteemed (as it became them) the Emperours freindship, being at the same present of that mind, but that they were very desirous to see some e-uident signe v hereby they might perceiue the Emperours intention to be such as as he spake of, for, the keeping of the Lancesquens in hostile manner vpon their State, spoiling and wasting the Bressan territory, was a token of a contrary affection.

The Venetian answers to those that speak to them of Peace with the Emperour.

Soone after, Sigismond de la Tour, Chamberlaine and Ambassador to the Marquis of Mantoa came to Venice, to exhort the Senate in like manner to an agreement with the Emperour, affirming the very same that Doria had done, how that the Imperiall Maiesty was desirous of an atonement with them, entreating them to giue consent to suffer the treaty thereof to bee concluded in the City of Mantoa, whether he knew that the Emperour would forth-with send his Agents, with commissions to that end.

During these treaties the Emperour prepared for his comming to Bologna to speake with the Pope, according as it had bene concluded at Barcelona.

All men had greathope of this enteriue, wherein, matters of importance were to be decided: of which, men greatly doubted, remaining with attention to see what would be the end thereof, especially the Venetians, because their affaires were very much intermingled and of great difficulty. The Pope seemed greatly to affect them, seeking, (by the meanes of Cardinall Cornare) to induce them to lay downe their armes, and to come to some honourable composition: and therefore hee had already before then sent the Bishop of Vaisfon his Nuncio to the Emperour at Placentia, who was thought to haue greatly preuailed in disposing him vnto peace with all men, and chiefly with the Venetians.

*Expellation of the enteriue
at Bologna.*

This was the cause why diuers Senators shewed themselves more strict in this negociation, some of them being desirous to tarry, till it were called vpon in the assembly at Bologna: others, of a contrary opinion, propounded that it behoou-ed them to accept of the offer of the Marquis of Mantoa, and make present choyce of Ambassadors to send thither to treat of agreement: And why should we (say they) deferre it any longer? The Emperour hath a mighty army, the forces of the league, being broken and dissolued, are weak, nay rather defeated: the Florentines alone, the Duke of Milan, and We, are left to vndergoe the burthen of such a warre: which is indeed a matter very vncleane, by reason of our smal meanes after so great expences that we haue bene at, and in regard of the great forces that the Emperour hath at this present in Italy: and yet neuertheless in such an inequality of things, whilst he daily increaseth in hope, and we wax weak, he is content to treat with vs vpon equall termes, and (as I may say) to humble himselfe and to be the formost in inuiting vs to peace and freindship and we refuse it and make small account thereof.

*Sundry opin-ons in the Senate concerning the most on of peace with the Em-
perour.*

*A Discourse made in Senate concerning peace with the Em-
perour.*

And besides, it is not to be doubted, but that which Doria first of all; and then the Marquis of Mantoa haue so freely offered and promised, hath not only proceeded from his owne consent, but hath bene done by his expresse commandement, for with such an assurance of their mindes, were they not more then certaine thereof, and is it then a part of wisdom to let such an occasion to escape which offereth it selfe to doe that which wee haue so often-times desired, and which at this present more then euer is to be wisht for? Wee haue had for many yeares, continuall warre, wherein wee haue spent more then fise Millions of gold, so, as this City, and our whole State, which did scarcely beginne a little to breath after the forepassed warres, is now wholly ruined, and all mens meanes consumed, and yet for all that, a way being opened vnto vs, to settle vs hence-forward in rest and quietnesse to our honor and reputation, by providing (as there is hope) for our safety and comfort, we will hold the matter doubtfull, and expose our peace to the hazard of fortune, which may, (as it hath often done) produce such an accident, as will change the Emperors mind and will, or else, by his remaying armed here in Italy, may encrease our discommodities and dangers, or by his departure, leaving matters in trouble and confusion, keepe vs yet for as many yeares more at as great expence in warre: and then, God knoweth, what will be the end thereof.

THE 2 which

Those which haue hithervnto praised the constancy of this Senate, for that without sparing cost, and without feare of any danger, it hath defended, with such great affection, the common cause, and the liberty of Italy, perceiuing now, (accidents being changed, and how needfull it is to change opinions) that it doth continue in the same way and desire, to dwell in armes, and to make warre, hauing meanes to auoide it, will perhaps change their minds, and deeme vs to obstinate, and others will repute vs foolish and ill-aduised, for that wee will not handle matters, not onely by reason, but according to our owne will, without applying our selues to time and occasion, by temporizing and expecting better fortune: It is without doubt good and commendable to deliberate maturely on matters which present themselves, but we must not exceed the limmits of reason, least wee come to extremity, which is euer dangerous, but follow as most profitable, the middle way; because it often happeneth, that a long delay of this, which holdeth matters in perpetuall irresolution and length, causeth as much, and more danger, then an ouer hasty and precipitate counsell: From this, vntill now, we haue sufficiently kept our selues, hauing for so many yeares maintayned warre, and tried all possible meanes to reduce this Estate to a settled quiet and safety: Let vs now take heede, least we runne into the other extremity, for feare least by seeking to much our owne aduantage, and crauing too much assurance, we come to hinder our selues, and to expose our affaires to greater dangers.

A Discourse
in Senate contrary to the former.

Others were not of this opinion, thinking it more honorable and more profitable to temporize, not letting the Emperor know, that they were desirous of an agreement. These men did consider the small assurance, that was in the Emperors Army, which wanted money and victuals, whereby, these two failing, it was of necessity to breake: That their Cities were fenced with strong garrisons, That the Emperor could not in any sort assaile them vpon hope of sodaine taking of them: That he was besides, called away else where, and enforced to depart ere long forth of Italy: That the Turke had besieged Vienna, and reduced it to great danger: That all his brothers country was spoiled and ruined, by the Turkish Caualery. That the Heretickes had raised great troubles, and of great importance in sundry places of Germany, if they were not speedily suppressed by his presence: That hee, being once gone forth of Italy, and his army broken, or at least much decayed, there was no doubt, but that they might with ease seaze on the whole Dutchy of Milan, and mainteyne the Cities of Puglia vnder their obedience, and in a word, become victors in that warre, and purchase in all places an immortal glory and reputation: and where as at this present they treated of receauing an other mans lawes and conditions, the Emperor should bee enforced to sue for and accept the Republickes friendship, on conditions to their aduantage for feare least the French, euer ready to armes, should attempt to contract a new league with them, and being afterwards ioyned together should come and trouble him, whilst he were busied in some other war: That no man was to perswade him selfe, that the Emperor distasting

distasting this Republick, because it had bene for many yeares vnited with the French, would come at this time for any loue thereto, to propound conditions of agreement: but that they were rather certainly to beleue that it was his own profit that moued him thereto, knowing the State of his owne affaires to be badly assured, and the impossibility of being able to hold together his army and to make any long aboad in Italy: That it was a general rule, that whatsoever pleased the enemy, and is by him esteemed necessary and profitable, ought to be rejected, as a thing which on the other side may beget contrary effects. His shew of humanity, and his desire of peace and quiet, was a cunning of the Imperials to court their owne weaknesse, and to make men beleue that by truly procuring their owne aduantage, their only aime was the common good.

But let vs yet presuppose (said these men) that it were good at this present to make an accord with the Emperor. It is at the least more then reasonable to tarry till the assembly at Bologna, where the Emperors will and intention may be better discovered, especially in the accord which shal be treated of, concerning the Dutchy of Milan, wheron in the end, as well by reason of the ancient and new confederacy, as for sundry great interests of the Commonwealth, the most assured resolution of peace ought to depend.

These reasons did greatly moue many of those that were there present, who were of opinion not to lay downe armes, but with honor and safety to the Commonwealth, deferring for that time, the nomination of Commissioners which were to goe to Mantoa to treat of peace.

The Senate
resolution.

They resolved to send the Secretary Andrew Rossi to the Marquis, to thanke him for his offer and kind affection which he did beare to the Signory, and to excuse them for that they could not as yet resolve vpon any treaty of agreement, by reason that the Pope and the Emperor were shortly to meet together at Bologna, to compose the affaires of Italy, that the Bishop of Faenza, the Popes Nuncio, had already a hand in that negotiation and particularly in that which concerned the Common-wealth.

The Pope in the meane time being gonne from Rome came to Spoleta, and from thence to Bologna, there to expect the Emperor, who after that the Pope had made his entry, came thither within few dayes after, so, as sondry welcomes and reciprocall careses being made, they beganne to treat of the affaires of Italy, and how to establish a firme peace there, either of these Princes seeming to be very desirous thereof.

The Pope and
the Emperor
come to Bologna.

But the first and most important, was, the accord with the Duke of Milan, who after sundry goings, to and fro of the Prothonotary Carracciola, and of D. Garcia de Padiglia from Placentia to Cremona, being aduised by the Venetians, who the more to honour him, caused Marc Antonio Venier their Ambassador, to accompany him, determined to go in person to the Emperor to Bologna, hauing receiued a safe conduct from his maiesty, vnder coulor of coming to him to iustifie himselfe because the difficultest point of his businesse seemed to bee, for that the Emperor was distasted of him because that being farre off, the Duke had refused to humble himselfe, and to doe that duty which did belong to a vassall of the Empire, or else for that he would haue debated his businesse with to great arrogancy, or at the least with too much distrust of the Emperours iustice and Clemency.

This matter being almost finished, was interrupted by the Imperialists, who demanded, for the assurance of that which should be agreed vpon, that Francis Sforza should deliuer vnto them, the Cities of Pavia and Alexandria, the which by the Venetians aduice hee flatly refused to doe, the State hauing mand them with strong Garrison, and lent the Duke tenne thousand Ducats for their enterrainment. This demand of the Imperiall officers did reuiue both in the Duke and the Venetians their former suspicions, that

The Imperiall demand concerning the accord for Milan.

the Emperialls were desirous to appropriate to them-selves the State of Milan: The Pope vpon this refusall, demanded to haue these Citties consigned into his hands, whereof the Duke like-wise crauing to bee excused, because hee could not doe it without the Venetians consent, and that it would bee best to referre the matter to the deciding of his cause in the assembly at Bologna, it was referd thither without any resolution.

The Duke of Milans great humilitie, to
the Emperour.

The Duke then being come to Bologna, and brought in to the Emperors presence, hee did very humbly thanke him for his curtesie, in that he had suffered him to come before him: then hee told him, that hee did so much rely vpon his iustice, at hee desired none other assurance or support then his owne innocency, and in so saying, hee laid downe at the Emperors feet the letters of safeconduct, which he had in his hand, where-with the Emperour was highly pleased: A moneth was spent in the handling of the difficulties, as well of his accord as of that of the Venetians, and at last the Pope hauing greatly employed him-selſe therein, both the one and other were concluded.

Francis Sforza promised to pay vnto the Emperour within a yeare foure hundred thousand Ducats; and other five hundred thousand within tenne yeare, namely fifty thousand yearly; Coma, and the Castle of Milan remayning in the Emperors hands, who promised to surrender them so soone as the first yeares payment were made, and gaue him the inuestiture, or rather the confirmation of that, which hee had before giuen him.

The Articles of peace betwixt the Em-perour and the
Venetians.

As for the Venetians, they did like-wise consent to surrender Rauenna, and Ceruia, with their Territories to the Pope (their clames saued) the Pope pardoning those who had practized or done any thing against him. They did like-wise agree to render to the Emperour, in the moneth of January next ensuing, all that which they possessed in the Kingdome of Naples, and to pay him the residue of the two hundred thousand Ducats due at the last peace contracted betwixt them, namely, twenty thousand Ducats within a moneth, and five and twenty thousand yearly after-wards till the end of the payment, and to pay him another hundred thousand Ducats besides, the one halfe within tenne moneths, and the other within a yeare after, and that the Duke of Vrbin should be comprized in that peace, as being vnder the Venetians protection. Diuers other Articles were added, concerning particular persons, and the generall commerce, so as by this peace and confederacy, Italy was freed from the tumults and dangers of armes, where-with it had bene afflicted the space of more then eight yeares, with infinite horrible accidents.

The Floren-
tines great groules.

Florence alone was exempted from this good hap, vnto whome other mens peace had procured a worse and more dangerous war, by reason of the Florentines contention with the Pope. The Imperiall army leauing the Venetian State, and being come neere to the confines of Tuscany, went on very slowly by the Popes commandement, who desired to preferue the city of Florence and her whole territory from the souldiers spoile and oppression, which gaue the Florentines time and occasion to fortifie them-selves, and to make strong rampiers about their walles, and to receiue two thousand foot-men into it which Malateste Baillone brought thither: after that he had by composition yielded the City of Perugia to the Marquis of Gualto, which made them more vnwilling to grant the Popes demands: As also because that their delay to make their approaches, had begotten an opinion in the Florentines, that the Emperour would rather in shew then in effect, satisfie the Popes desire. But the Pope on the other side being extremely incensed against them, because they would not referre them-selves to his iudgement; wherein he promised to proceed with all meekenesse, and being in great hope to obtaine his desire by freely disposing of the Emperours forces, seeing that he had no more need of them, by reason that he had made an agreement with the Venetians and the Duke of Milan, he determined rather to come to the extreamest point of all then to giue place in any thing.

The Venetians were greatly grieved for the Florentines troubles and vexations, as their friends and confederates, and ioyned together in one selfe same cause, for the tuition and defense of the liberty of Italy: but the Republike was charged with such excessive expences, as al-be it that all her forces were still whole, yet neuertheless it could not giue them that aide and assistance which was needfull: and therefore the Senate exhorted the Florentines to make an accord, if it were possible, with the Pope, vpon any honourable condition which might not preiudice their liberty.

The Emperour in the meane time commanded the Marquis of Gualto to set forward with the army, and to goe and encampe before the walles of Florence, being moued therevnto by his owne particular interests, besides the Popes, greatly desiring to haue those of Medici to returne into the city, because that he had promised to giue the Lady Marguerite his naturall daughter in marriage to Alexander the Popes Nephew, to the end that his sonne in law might hold an estate answerable to the greatnesse of so high a marriage: thinking moreover that it would greatly profit him, for the encrease and assurance of his power in Italy to haue the government of that City, which had euer shewed it selfe much inclined to the French, to depend wholly in time to come vpon him.

What moued
the Emperour to enforce the Florentines to accuse the Pope.

All the warre being in this manner brought into Tuscany and neere to the walles of Florence, all the remainder of Italy, and Christendome, were at peace, the which hapned very opportunely at the same time, that all of them being vnited together might march against Soliman, who desyring there to purchase glory and reputation by armes, being the more emboldened therevnto by the quarrells and contentions of Christian Princes, did menace their Realmes and Dominions for notwithstanding that winter approached, and that he wanted great ordnance, he was constrained to dis campe from before Vienna, the which was defended by a number of braue men, he neuertheless caused it to giuen forth abroad that he would returne againe at the spring, and beseege it with greater forces, or else some other City of Germany.

Soliman dilodging from those quarters, did establish Iohn in the Kingdome of Hungary, shewing thereby that his principall aime was to purchase the fame of a valiant and generous Prince: he did moreover create high Treasurer of the Kingdome Lodouico Gritti, sonne to Andre Gritti Duke of Venice, borne of a Concubine at Constantinople, whilest being young he remained there about businesse. The conditions of peace being thus accomplished, the Venetian Senate being very carefull so to establish it, and to purchase and keepe the sauiour and friendship of these Princes, determined to send Ambassadors to the Pope and the Emperour to tellifie both to the one & other, the great contentment which they had receiued by such an accord and reconciliation, and how desirous they were to haue that peace and friendship long to continue betwixt them. Some of the chiefeest Senators were appointed for this Ambassage, namely Marco Dandolo, Lodouico Gradonico, Lodouico Aluerniga, and Lorenzo Bragadino, vnto whom, to make the Ambassage more honorable, were added Antonio Suriano, chosen at the first for successor to Gaspard Contarini Ambassador with the Pope, and Nicolas Tepulo who was to be resident with the Emperour.

Soliman re-
steth Iohn King of Hungary to his Kingdome.

The Venetians
send Ambassadors to the Pope and the Emperour.

These fixe then came to Bologna at the beginning of the yeare 1530. where the Pope and Emperour lay, who honorably entertained them; where they executed the tenor of their commission a part, first of all to the Pope and then to the Emperour. They did highly extoll the Pope, for that as the common Father, embracing with Piety and wisdom, the cause of Christendome, hee had ended so many troubles and calamities, and the Republike did particularly thanke him, for his care of the wealth and commoditie thereof, by composing in friendly manner manner their strifes with the Emperour, and thereby freed them from the expence and trouble of warre.

The Ambassadors discharge their duties to the Princes.

They declared to the Emperour the necessity which had enforced them to take armes, and to continue the warre, their sorrow and griefe for matters past: but about all their firme resolution to obseue and maintain the accord made betwixt them, and their desire of a perpetuall and an dissoluable friendship betwixt the house of Austria and the Republike.

The Emperour is crowned at Bologna.

The Ambassadors hauing in this manner fully executed their commission, so as nothing was left for them to negotiate, they were neuerthelesse commanded not to stirre from Bologna, that they might be present at the Emperours Coronation, which was to be done in that City: because that Charles, meaning at the first to be crowned at Rome, according to the ancient custome of other Emperours, being called home by the Germans, for matters of great importance, resolved to haue the ceremony performed at Bologna, by reason whereof great numbers of people comming thither from all parts, and Princes Ambassadors, they thought that such an Ambassage as theirs would become the pompe and solemnity of such a day, which was vpon the foure and twenty of February, which being ended, the Ambassadors returned to Venice, being honoured by the Emperour with a giuft of five hundred Portiguze worth ten crownes a peece, the which, according to their custome, were laied vp in the publike treasury: The ancient fathers of the State hauing wisely decreed, that if those citizens that were sent in Ambassage to Princes, did receiue any thing of them in giuft, they were to deliuer it vp in publike; they, thinking it vnreasonable to refuse that which was giuen in honour to him that did represent the Common-wealth, nor likewise to suffer that which was giuen to publike persons, to be conuerted to priuate vses, and if at times they were permitted to enioy them, it passed by the common suffrages of the Senate, wherevpon he vnto whom it was giuen, held it afterwards of the Senates grace and liberality: and by this meanes, they did cut off all occasion from bad Citizens of being partiall for any Prince whatsoever, vpon hope of gain, to the detriment of the Common-wealth: Within a while after, three Ambassadors came to Venice from the Emperour, to render a reciprocal office of friendship, and in particular to resolve vpon the execution of certaine Articles of peace, who were entertained with all honour and sumptuousnesse, and at their departure they were presented with cuppes of gold, of the value of a thousand crownes a peece; and touching the Emperours demand, for his sake diuers of the Republikes subiects were pardoned, and others raised to great honours and dignities.

The Marquis of Mantua is crowned in a Dutey.

The Emperour after his coronation went to Mantua, where he was received with all royall magnificence by Frederico Gonzaga Marquis of that place, who by him was recompensed with the degree and title of Duke, to himselfe and his posterity: from thence, being to passe thorow the Republikes State, in his journey by Trent into Germany, the Senate commanded Paulo Nani and Giovanni Drifino, Generall Prouidators in the firme land, and likewise Giovanni Mora, gouernor of Padua, and Pedro Grimani gouernor of Vincenza, to meet him at Villafraanca with great company of Gentlemen, which lieth vpon the Mantuan and Verona confines, and to waite vpon him so long as he should make his abode vpon their territories: they commanded likewise the officers of Verona, to make speedy provision of victuals, and other necessaries for those of his Court, and for the souldiers: and they did in particular, in the Republikes name, present him, with wine, venison, fish, sweet meats, and all other exquisite delicacies fit for entertainment.

The great entertainment given to the Emperour on the Venetian territory.

The Emperour then passed along with all his forces, being attended on by great numbers of Lords and Princes Ambassadors, and amongst others by Nicolas Tepulo, appointed (as hath bene said) ordinary Ambassador with his Maiefty, and in passing by Verona, without entering the city, where, and in the castles the guards guards were doubled, he came to Chiufa, being still accompanied by the Commissioners that represented the common-wealth, and being thorow all their State entertained with great honor, he seemed to be highly pleased and satisfied therewith, and protested great loue to the Republike.

As these things seemed to encrease these Princes confidence, and to confirme peace and friendship, euen so was it to be feared that they would in Soliman (great States being euer filled with ieałosie) beget summe suspition, that the Signory would enter into league against him with the Christian Princes, and that which made him to doubt it, was the common report that was spread abroad, that peace was established amongst those Princes, that they might afterwards, being vniited together, make warre vpon the Turke, and oppose themselves against Soliman's great designs, who hauing once already beleegged the city of Vicenza, did threaten to returne thither againe with a mightier army. Certaine Cardinals, appointed for that end, did meet at Bologna with the assistance of the Ambassadors of other Princes to treat of necessary preparations to beginne the warre with the Turke, and though the Common-wealths Ambassadors were not present at that assembly where there was nothing concluded on, the report neuerthelesse encreasing the matter (as the manner is) and being bruted at Constantinople for otherwise then the truth, was the cause that diuers did blame that councill, who thinking to remedy a mischief, fell into a greater and a more dangerous.

Soliman's distrust of the Princes by reason of a report that was current in Constantinople.

Now, the Senate being aduertized by Lodouico Grizzi, who as Ambassador to John King of Hungary had followed Soliman to Constantinople, of the Turks suspition, resolved to dispatch an Ambassador to the great Lord, to acquaint him with the peace made with the Emperour, and with the reasons that moued them thereto: and also to assure him of the Senates firme and constant desire, euer to continue friends to the Ottomans: and if he should perceiue Soliman to be well inclined towards them, then to renew the Articles of peace. The Senate did not without cause vse all these respects and demonstrations of friendship to Soliman, because that not long before, at his returne from Belgrade, he had sent Ibrahim Besh his Ambassador to Venice, to acquaint them with that which had passed in Hungary, and particularly how that he had restored King Iohn their friend and Confederate to his Kingdome: he did besides, send an other Chiaus to the Senate, to entreate them to send their Ambassador to Constantinople to be present at the solemnity of the circumcision of two of his sonnes; and at the same time he vsed great liberality towards them, by giuing them for a present a thousand Canthars of Salt-peter, brought from Alexandria hauing heard that the Venetians did need it.

The Princes (and an Ambassage to Soliman).

Thomaso Moceniga was chosen for this commission, who within few daies after did set forwards on his journey with Francisco Barbaro, who was chosen Bayliff, to succede Pedro Zene, who being sent as Ambassador to the Porte of the great Lord, had borne himselfe as Vice-bailiffe for the space of seuen yeeres. This Ambassage came in a very opportune season to Constantinople, for the respects aboue mentioned: for the Croizade hauing bene published, and the report and expectation thereof being very great, by reason that the preachers in their pulpits had exhorted all the people to contribute towards the enterprise against the Infidels, Soliman had conceiued a certaine opinion in his minde, that the Venetians, after the accord made at Bologna, had with the other Christian Princes conspired against him: whereby measuring all their actions past, he did among other matters complaine, for that by the peace they had giuen a great summe of money to the Princes of the house of Austria his enemies which had the more enabled them to make warre vpon him, adding besides thereto, that because they had not acquainted him therewith, till the conclusion of the business, they had not performed the part of a State that was his friend, such an one as the Signory made shew to be.

Soliman's neglect of the Venetians.

The circumcision of Sulomans children.

But all these rumours beeing already spread abroad amongst the Bashas, and other men of note, did at the arrivall of the Ambassadors, vanish, whereupon, was speedily renewed and confirmed the league, on the same conditions as it was before. Then the Ambassadors were present at the feast and solemnity of the circumcision of his children, which was done with great pompe, coit and royall magnificence, in all which shewes, the Venetians did still hold a very honorable ranke.

The incursions of the Knights of Malta as gainst the Turkes.

During these great feasts and solemnities, Soliman being in deed invited to great attempts, did in his minde ruminate on affaires of consequence, he did oftentimes discourse with his Bashas concerning the raising of an army wherewith to returne into Hungary and Germany, to overthrow the power of the Austrian Princes; by reason whereof he dispatched matters of great importance: he determined to send a great Navy to sea, intending vpon occasion, to execute some braue exploit, but especially to assure the sea by all means, which the Gallies of the Knights of Rhodes did continually scour, who having planted themselves in the Isle of Malta, giuen vnto them by the Emperour, did nothing but scour and molest all the seas, and chiefly those which belonged to the Turkes.

Soliman purpose to enrich Constantinople

Soliman at the same time, thought on the affaires of peace by determining to cause all marchandizes to be brought to Constantinople, with the spices which were brought from the Leuant to Alexandria, and to other markets of his Empire, meaning (as he said) to make that city, the seate of the Empire, to abound in all things, and chiefly in gold, and therefore he had commanded all strangers not to buy silkes or spices any where but at Constantinople, whither he caused them to be brought; with great store of such commodities which he had bought with his owne money.

The Venetians
pursueth to divert Soliman's designes.

These things did greatly discontent the Venetians, as well in regard of the warre he determined to make, as for the change of the trafficke: for al-be it his meaning was to assaile others and not them, yet neuertheless, growing mighty by the ruine of other Princes, his power was fearefull to the Venetians, and the diuiding of his army, did still giue trouble and molestation to the Republike, and did likewise put them to expence, by taking away trafficke from the vsuall and ordinary places, which did much disturbe the businesse of Marchants. These considerations did moue the Venetians to entreate the King of Hungary, who already did treat of an agreement with Ferdinand, to embrace this businesse, thereby to deliuer Christendome from so many mischiefs. They made the same request to the King of Poland, who was already a mediator in that agreement, to pursue it to the end. They did likewise sollicite Lodouico Grizzi at Constantinople, whose fauour and authority did daily encrease at the Port of the great Lord, to coole, by means of the Basha, that great heate of Solimans, to cause his army to depart, by shewing vnto him how carefull the Republike was to keepe the nauigation free and safe from Pirates: and for the other likewise, to hinder the transportation of the commerce to Constantinople, which could not be done but with the great hurt and losse of all forraigne nations.

The Venetians
forbid the Knights of Malta to come no more vpon their Gulph.

Now, wholly to keepe the Turkes from arming themselves and entring into the Venetian Gulphe, The Senate commanded the Prouidator of the army, to aduertize the Gallies of Malta, no more to come vpon their Gulphe, nor to hurt those vessels which sailed on the Leuant seas which they held, and that he should threaten to disarme them if they did otherwise. The Turkes held this for a greuous wrong; and complaying of the Venetians, said, that it did not be- seeme the friendship which they made shew to beare to the great Lord, to suffer them in their country before their faces to be so badly deliued, because that they presuming vpon the forces and prouisions of the Republike, had not entertained any armed vessels.

The Turkes
complaine against the Venetians.

The

The Emperour being in the meane time come to Ausbourg, did there conuoke an assembly, where he caused his brother, Ferdinand to be elected King of the Romaines: then treating of affaires concerning religion, the Protestants craued the celebration of a generall councill, where their opinions, touching faith, might be examined and concluded, which was a pretence to collour their cause with the authority of Religion: The Catholics likewise for other respects, desired a councill, hoping that the authority of the decrees that would there be made, should suffice, if not to diuert the mindes of the chiefe of the Heretikes from their errors, yet at least to reduce part of the multitude to the soundest opinion; so as the one and other of them required one selfe same thing, namely: to haue a General Councell called.

The Aimaies desire to haue a General
councell.

The Emperour being desirous to satisfie this earnest request of all Germany, as also, because it fell que very opportunely for his affaires, to appease the causes of tumults, and contumacy of the people in that Prouince, did very much presse the Pope to conuoke the councill and promised him, to the end he should not feare to haue his authority and dignity endangered, to be there in person, and to haue a particular care of him. The Pope, perceiving the small hope that was in it of any great good, and fearing rather some occasion of other disorders, without making any open refusal, he answered, That for diuers respects, it was not yet time to treat thereof, because that peace was not yet well established amongst the Princes of Christendome, which ought first of al to be looked vnto, to the end that all of them being vnited together, might meete there, to aide and fauour the Councell.

The Pope excuses concerning the conuocation of a councell.

The Protestants therevpon being more earnest, and the Pope fearing that it would breed some greater inconuenience, beganne to detest that Nation, and to propound, that they were to be chastised with temporall armes, whereof, he often discouraged by letters, not only with the Emperour, but likewise with the Venetian Senate, to whom of purpose he sent his Nuncio, to exhort them, therein to interpose their councill, authority, and forces, by intreating the Emperour toarken therevnto, and the easier to draw him to it, to offer him a summe of money.

The Pope hath recourse to the Venetians, to gainst the influences of the Germains.

But the Senate being of a contrary minde, sought to dissuade him from it, and in praying his good meaning they shewed him, how that to take armes at such a time, and without vrgent necessity, was nothing else but to shew that he was afraide of a most iust cause (whereof all men were desirous to be assured) by preuenting with force, the power which the concourse and fauour of the people might bring to the aduerser party: That it did not becom him, who maintained reason and truth, to flie from the triall thereof, especially by the Scriptures and by the same reason; and not to impose a necessity vpon the Protestant Princes to raise their forces, and thereby to make their cause to be more fauoured by the people, and accounted to haue some shew of honesty, by opposing themselves against the violence which would be done to them by coming in armes: That the Princes of Italy were whole drawne drie of money by reason of the late wars: The Electors of the Empire were doubtfull in such a case, what part to take, and more desirous of peace then warre, as their Ambassadors doe affirme, who for the same purpose were sent to the Emperour at Bruxells: The free cities of Germany, are resolute in no sort to aide or fauour the Emperour if hee should seeke rather to preuaile by force then reason: and the Emperour is to weak of himselfe to leaue sufficient forces to overthrow the Princes and people being risen.

The Venetians
answer to the
Pope.

The Pope being moued by these reasons, or by the authority of the Senate, to whom he much referred himselfe, hauing changed his minde, desisted from sending his Nuncio to the Emperour as hee had determined: whereby this treatie was broken off. And to speake truly, it was then thought most fit to consider consider rather how to resist the Turkes designs, and to keepe (as much as might be) the forces of Christendome vnitē together, and chiefly thole of Germany who were to susteine the first attempts of the Barbarians, by reason that it was held for certaine, that Soliman, being proud and haughty, could not digest his shamefull discompe from before Vienna which he could not take, & that he was desirous to returne thither with a mightie army, the which, according to the common report, he was already preparing.

The Emperour in this regard, did rather encline to peace then warre, and without making any solid resolution, was content for that time to set downe certain rules, concerning religion, until the next future counsell. He likewise desired, the better to reduce all matters to peace and quiet, to end the controuersies which remained vndecided betwixt the Archduke Ferdinand and the Republike of Venice: whereupon, he commanded to choise vmpires according to that which they had concluded: wherevnto al be it that the Senate did not onely consent, but did likewise seeme greatly to desire it, by soliciting the deciding of the controuersie; yet neuertheless nothing succeeded thereof, contrary to the desire of both parties, by reason of the difficulty they had to name a third person, if it were so that the vmpires could not agree amongst themselves. The Archduke chose the Duke of Mantua, the Bishop of Ausbourg, and the Popes Nuncio residing with himselfe; And the Venetians made choice of the Bishop Theatine, the Archbishop of Salerne, who was of the family of the Adorni and the Popes Nuncio residing at Venice; but those which pleased one of the parties, displeased the other, whereby matters remained still in controuersie, to the great prejudice and hurt of the subjects on the frontiers, and caused an alteration amongst the Princes.

Besides this, the Emperour had not yet surrendered (which was the very latter end of the yeere) the castle of Milan nor the city of Coma to Francis Sforza, as he was bound to doe: wherevpon the Venetians being desirous to haue it performed as soone as might be, for feare lest time might produce some sinister accident, and Francis Sforza having not altogether meanes of his owne to furnish so great a sum of money, as was to be paid to the Emperour, they did lend him fifty thousand Ducats to make vp the payment, the which they re-embursed, vpon a bargain of sale they made with him, by which meanes the castle of Milan and the city of Coma, were rendered to Sforza, to the Venetians great content, whose only end was to assure the Duchy of Milan to the Duke.

The Venetians great desire to conferre that State for Sforza, was the cause, that he seeming to haue some distrust of the French, entreated the Senate to interpose their authority with that King, that he might desist from his great warlike preparations, which he was reported to make to renew his old claime to Milan: and notwithstanding that they gaue small credit to that report, yet neuertheless, to shew their constant desire of the preseruatiō and defense of that State, and to take from the French all suspicion that they would euersperate themselves from the Emperour and the other Confederates, they determined to make it knowne to all men, as well in France, as in the Courts of other Princes. But the Emperour being displeased with this declaration, did summon them besides, to arme the number of souldiers which the Signory was bound to leauy by the treaty of Confederacy. The Venetians therevpon supposing that he aimed at some particular designe of his owne, and would draw them to more then they were tied vnto by the league, answered, that the affaires of Italy standing at such a stay, as there was nothing to be more hoped for then an assured peace, they were not to be vrged to so great expences.

Now at the same time, the Venetians supposing that King Francis, beeing newly married, and hauing recovered his children, should rather thinke on feasting and pleasure, then on the trauails of warre, to make it knowne that they desired desired to partake some part of his content, sent into France, John Pisani, Procurator of Saint Marke, their extraordinary Ambassadour to reioyce with him in the name of the Republike. But he hauing discovered some true likelihoods, said boldly, that they would not suffer the peace and publike quiet to be troubled or interrupted, and they would neuer faile in ought wherevnto they were tied by their confederacy.

In the interim of these negotiations, the Republike enioying an assured peace, the Senate tooke care to re-establishe it in her ancient preheminences, which it had enioyed before the last warres, and amongst others, to appoint all the Bishops belonging to their owne State: for which hauing made many requests to the Pope, without receiving any certaine resolution they seized on the temporalities of diuers Bishopricks which the Pope had giuen: whereat his Holinesse being incensed, made shew that he would resent it, and to those ends sought all occasions to breake off from them.

The Senate considering the difficulty of the matter, did consult therevpon in open Councell, where the opinions were very different, some affirming that it was not good at that time to prouoke the Pope, but to deferre the matter till some other time, and to quit the seizure: Others of the contrary opinion counselled to pursue the businesse, and that the Pope would at the last be enforced to grant their demands, so as in this diuersity of opinions the matter remayned vndecided. The Senate hauing at last found a meane of agreement, it was decreed, that in fauour of the Pope, the temporalities of those that had been promoted by his Holinesse, should be surrendered to them, in the cities of their obedience: and yet neuertheless they did not giue ouer their demand, saying, that what they had done was onely for the respect and reuerence which they did beare to Pope Clement, hoping that he would grant them more then they craued: the Pope neuertheless, who at first made shew that hee demaunded nothing else but that, as a signe of obedience, without being satisfied, stood vpon farre greater difficulties. But other matters of greater importance happening, caused them to sue to the Pope, and to haue good correspondence with him.

Soliman hauing made peace with the King of Persia in the beginning of the yeere 1531. determined to assaile Christendome on all sides both by sea and land, and for that purpose had sent his Standard of Generall to Caradine surname Barbarossa, a famous Pirate, for his great experience in marine matters, who was renowned for the infinite mischiefs which he had done to Christians, and hauing thus receiued him into the number of his captains, had aduertized the Venetians thereof, to the end they should no more vse him as a Pirate, but as one of his owne Porte.

And although the Basbas did oftentimes affirme that Soliman would continue in league and friendship with the Republike, yet neuertheless, it seemed neither safe nor honourable to leaue the possession of the sea, to the discretion of that barbarous Nation, who was mighty, and armed: wherevpon it behooued them to make an extraordinary prouision of Gallies and souldiers: a matter which came to them in an ill time, by reason that their publike treasure being exhausted by the late warres, could not furnish them with money to suffice so great expences: therefore it was necessary to haue recourse to other meanes, and amongst others, it seemed vnto them that the Tenthies leauied vpon the Clergy of their Dominions would bee sufficient for that businesse.

Now they sought in all humility to obtaine it of the Pope, but they could not thereby surmount the difficulties wherewith hee drew the matter forth in length: but to the double discommodity and grieue of the Venetians, he made account to leauy two Tenthies vpon all the goods of the Italian Clergie, for to

John Pisani
(an extraordinary) Ambassadour
into France.

The Venetians
create the nomination of Bishops vnder their nominatus.

Soliman declares against the Christians.

The Venetians
create the Tenthies leauied vpon the Clergy to helpe them against
the Turkes.

The Emperour
dissuades
the Venetians from doing the business in religion.

Popiers chose for arbitrators
the Duke of Mantua, the Archbishop, and the Popes Nuncio.

The castle of Milan and the city of Coma are rendered to Duke Sforza.

employ them (as he said) on the releefe of the Cantons of the Catholike Swisses, against the other protestant Cantons, who threatned them with warre; and by this meanes the Republike was frustrate of the commodity which it hoped for by the Tenths, which beeing raised vpon their State, seemed to belong vnto them vpon so iust a cause: as also because the said leauy of Tenths, gaue some supliation to the Turke, that it was done for some league practized against him.

The Venetians
preparations to stand upon their gard.

The Senate neuertheless, al-be it they were depriued of that helpe, and out of hope to obtaine it, did not cease to make prouision of all things necessary, but surmounting all difficulties that were offered, they determined presently to arme fifty Gallies, they which they sent to sea well furnished with all necessaries: But these great warlike preparations did by little and little vanish of themselves: because that Soliman being come to Andrinople, intending (as it was said) to take order for his preparations, beeing carried away with the pleasure of hunting, did daily delay the affaires of warre, so as that yeere remained peaceable and quiet on his part.

The Venetians
by chasing a way the Pirats make the sea safe.

The Venetians nauall army in the meane time was not idle, for the sea being full of Pirates, who beeing ioyned together in great numbers did scoure all the Seas, and hindred the nauigation and commerce, they were all of them chased, broken, or taken prisoners, to the great profit of all men, and to the Venetians praise.

The King of Hungary (seeketh peace of the Emperour and of Ferdinand,

The King of Hungary at the same time, notwithstanding that he had all his warlike preparations well ordered and in readinesse, and that hee was stronger then Ferdinand, yet neuertheless whilest he expected the Turkish aide for his better safety, fearing the great forces which the Emperour was reported to leauy for his brothers aide, or desyring rather to end the matter in friendly sort, then to come to strokes, and namely destrusting his owne people, did not enterprize any thing: so as both parties being quiet, he sent John Masio his Ambassadour to the Emperour, of whom obteyning no certaine resolution, he went to Ferdinand, where finding likewise as great difficulties, hee determined to goe to the other Princes of Germany, to treat with them of his Kings businesse, but Ferdinand taking his safe conduct from him, hee was enforced to returne into Hungary.

King John neuertheless, did not cease by other messengers to aduertize those Princes that were assembled in the Diets held in sundry places of Germany, and chiefly the Protestants, to diuert them from aiding Ferdinand, that Soliman accounted those his owne friends or enemies, who shewed themselves friends or enemies to the Realme of Hungary.

The Venetians
doe in vaine
solicite the Pope for the King of Hun-
gary.

This King, not to omit any thing, did likewise send his Ambassadours to Venice, to entreat the Senate, to be a meanes, as well to the Emperour, as to the Pope, that embracing his cause, they might reduce matters to some honourable agreement. The Senate perceiving that King Johns intent was to trie all meanes euen to extremity, that he might keepe the Realme of Hungary to himselfe, al-be it that he had the Turkish army at his command for his defense, to take away the cause of new troubles in Christendome, they did willingly harken to this request, and were desirous to further it to the Pope, but all their remonstrances were to small purpose, because that his Holinesse, fauouring more the cause of Ferdinand, then that of King John, seemed to consent that the matter should rather be determined by armes then by accord.

Now within a while after, the rumor of warre being blowne abroad every where, how that Soliman resolved with a mighty army to come downe into Hungary to beseege the City of Strigonium which Ferdinand kept, the Pope sent the Bishop of Verona his Nuncio to Venice, to know of the Senate, their determination, & what they would do, if the Turke should return with his army into Hungary, and and if all Christian Princes would vnite themselves together against that common enemy.

The Senators vpon this proposition were very doubtfull and perplexed. For zeale to Religion on the one side did moue them, and the feare likewise for their owne State, the Turke waxing so mighty a neighbour: on the other side, their doubt not to finde in the Christian Princes such steadfast constancy as to expose themselves to necessary traualles and dangers, held them backe: so as in this diuersity of opinions, they answered the Pope, that the Venetian Senate had euer desired and fought the good of Christendome: but as the same did todainely incite them to vndertake all matters for the seruice thereof, euen so they were fory, that the condition of the times, and the particular estate of their affaires would not permit them to shew it in effect. That the greatest Princes of Christendome were at the same time at discord and dissention amongst themselves, so as it could not be promised, that they would vnite themselves against that common enemy, that the forces alone of the Signory were to weak to march against him: besides, that their State, for the space of two thousand miles, from the Ile of Cyprus unto the end of Dalmatia was neere neighbour to the Turkes, where there were ordinarily great numbers of Citizens, and much wealth, a matter with indeed did enforce them to temporize with them, and kept them from so easily declaring themselves their enemies: That they did therefore much commend the Popes goodnesse and wisdom, for that he did so well foresee and prouide for the perills of Christendome: And that they did hope that their excuses would bee entertained of all men as most iust and reasonable.

The Venetians
answer to the Popes demand,

Ferdinand in the meane time, al-be it he perceived that all these treaties of league would come to nothing, yet neuertheless, promising vnto himselfe to be able to obtaine by armes a more aduantageous peace then that which King John had propounded vnto him, contemned all treaties that were offered, by reason that hee had beene declared King of Romaines in the assembly at Colein, and thereby successor to his brother Charles in the Empire, and had moreover obtained sundry aides in the Diets held at Lins and at Prague, beside the great help which he hoped to haue from his brother.

*Ferdinands designes against
the Turkes,*

The Venetians neuertheless without giuing ouer their former proposition of peace, having sent their Ambassadours vnto Ferdinand, for to congratulate in the common wealths name his new dignity, caused him to entertaine the motion of peace, exhorting him to embrace it, and to answer the hope which men had conceiued of him, that as a wife and vertuous Prince he would haue the peace and quiet of Christendome in singular recommendation.

The Venetians
exhort Ferdinand to peace.

All those that had regard to the publike good, and did neerey consider the conditions of those times, desired peace, because they did fore-see that great warres and calamities would arise in other places, by reason that the Kings of France and England perceiving a goodly occasion offered to enuade the Emperours dominions, who was enforced to turne his forces against the Turkes, to defend the Estates of his house and the Empire, did practice sundry waies to make warre vpon him, the one beeing prouoked with an antient desire to recover the State of Milan, and the other for a didaine newly conceiued against Charles for defending his Aunts cause, wife to the King, whom he had put away that hee might marry with an other, therefore they had ioynly practiced the German Princes who did not greatly affect the Emperour, and in the meane time they armed: so as it seemed that they tarried for nothing else to make warre vpon him, but till the Turke should beginne, and thereby draw the Emperours forces into another place, according to their common report.

What moued
the Kings of France and England to make warre on
the Emperour,

Soliman, who had dayly intelligence of the Christian Princes designs, much esteeming the selfe same occasions to see the Emperour at one time busied in diuers and sundry places, seemed every day to be more resolute to defend and maintaine maintaine the Realme of Hungary for King Iohn his friend and Confederate, desiring to recover his reputation which he supposed he had lost at his retreat from before Vienna.

1532. At the beginning then of the yeere 1532. the Turke being come to Andrinople, acquainted all men what way he ment to take: but before his departure, shewing both in word and deed, what great account he made of the Venetians friendship, he called home the great Gallies which he kept in Soria and Alexandria, for the aboue mentioned causes, and freely suffered them to traffick in all places as they were wont to doe, caring no more to reduce the trade to Constantinople. Then being carefull to raise his army, he sent for all the Spaches from Greece (these are horse-men, vnto whom the Prince giueth for wages, the possession of certaine lands during their liues) to come to him with their armes and horse; he demanded likewise of the Tartarians, Valachians and Transiluanians, the aide which by their confederacies they were bound to fend him, so as marching into the field, and being come vpon the confines of Hungary he found that there were a hundred and fifty thousand fighting men in his army, amongst whom, the most esteemed, were twenty thousand lanissaries, who fight on foote, being brought vp from their youth in the exercize of martiall discipline.

The number of the Turkish
army.

Soliman with his army commeth into Hungary.

The Emperor
with a mighty army encampeth before Vienna.

Soliman then being arrived with his whole army before Belgrade, a City seated in low Hungary, he caused it to be published that he would enforce the Emperour to come to battaile with him, promising to himselfe easily to vanquish him, threatening with insolent speeches to driue him forth of Germany, and to make himselfe Lord of all the States of the Westerne Empire, which (as he said) belonged vnto him, as true Emperour and Lord of Constantinople.

Vpon the report of the Turkes arrivall, the Emperour Charles likewise hauing assembled a mighty army from all parts of Christendome, and such an one as in the memory of man, the like had not bene seene, went and encamped before the city of Vienna: determining there to attend the enemy.

All men were attentive to see what would be the issue of this warre, especially the Venetians, who vnder-hand fauored the Christian party, hauing suffered their subiects to goe, as of themselves to the Emperors army.

The effects neuerthelesse of these two great armies were farre otherweise, then were the expectation and feare which men had, because that Soliman entering very late into Hungary, being not able to come sooner, as well in regard of the greatnesse of his preparations, as for the distance of the way, did not directly march towards the Emperours army, but hauing onely made a shew of warre, and some few incursions, hee returned to Constantinople. The Emperour (who had not stirred from before the walles of Vienna, nor going forth to meet the Turkes, notwithstanding that he had intelligence of their approaches) being assured of their retreat, did on a sodaine breake vp his army, and buning with an extreme desire to returne into Spaine, after that he had left certaine Italian foot-men with his brother, and some numbers of Lanquents hee tooke his iourney into Italy, from thence to saile into Spaine.

Soliman stay-eth at Belgrade.

The Emperors
retreat.

But both the Emperour and the Turke, hauing at one time great nauiies at sea, the Venetians thought that it behooued them for the safety of their owne State, to arme likewise, because they would not by any meanes bee taken vnprovided, and to these ends determined to augment their navy with a good number of Gallies: wherevpon, by the Senates command, twenty gallies were speedily armed in the Isles of Candy, Zant, and Corfou, and in the Cities of Dalmatia, so as their nauall army amounted to the number of threecore Gallies, of which Vincenzo Capel was made General, with expresse commission to take great heed that no hurt might be done to the townes and subiects of the

the Signory; and that the Imperials and the Turkes might bee vset alike as friends, by furnishing them with Hauens and victuals, but not with armes, nor warlike munitions, the Senate resolving to haue firme friendship and correspondence with both of them.

Now the Turkish Armie being come vpon the Levant seas, conducted by Imerrall, to the number of fourecore saile, reckoning with the Gallies twenty lesser vessels, and that of the Imperials vpon the Westerne seas, which consisted of forty light Gallies, with certaine great shippes of warre, vnder the command of André Doria, being yet vncertaine what the Capitaines desseignes were, and what way they would take: the Generall Capel went and spent the time betwixt Zante and Corfou, giuing order, according to his commission, that the subiects of the Signory might haue no harme, and to auoid likewise the occasion to meete with these armies, that no suspicion might bee giuen of fauouring one more then another.

The Emperors
and Soliman
usually drinke

Imerrall being at last come to Preuesa, Capello remained still at Corfou, from whence he sent one of his Gallies to visit him; which the Barbarian taking in good part, promised him that no harme should be done to the subiects of the Signory; and the Turkish fleet arriving afterwards in the Isle of Zante, and in other places belonging to the Republick, tooke nothing away from them by force.

As for Doria, hee departed from Sicily where hee had made long aboade and sailed towards Greece; and vnderstanding that the Venetian fleet lay at Zante, hee was desirous to saile thither with all his Gallies, to haue some occasion to talke with the Generall Capello, intending, as it was thought, and as himselfe hath since then affirmed, that by causing the Turkes to suspect the vnion of their Armies, to enforce the Venetians to ioyne with him, of which vnion hee had before writen to the Senate, with great offers and hopes: and the Emperors Ambassador, resident at Venice, hauing earnestly intreated that it might be so, demanded of them; that if vpon occasion the two fleets of the Emperour and the Turke should fight one with another, whether they would haue their Generall to ayde and fauour the Turkes: wherevnto the Senate readily replied, that they did greatly esteeme the Emperors friendship, and were well disposed to entertaine and keepe it, but they were not determined vpon his occasion, or for any other vaine hope, to breake the league with so mighty an enemy.

Doria his sub-tile meaning.

The Senates
answer to the Emperors Ambassador.

These two Armies then, Imperiall and Turkish, remaining quiet for feare one of another, did in a manner spend that whole summer without dooing any thing. At the last, the Turkish fleet being much weakened by the Pestilence, began to retire towards Negrepont, to goe afterwards (as it was thought) to winter at Constantinople: Doria being emboldened by this retreat, sailed with his Army towards Morea, resolving to besiege Coron, which hee tooke after some small resistance of the Turkish garrison that lay there, hee did the like to Patras, but it was by composition, then winter drawing on, hee retired into Sicily without executing any other notable action.

The retreat of the Turkish
army.

Coron and Patras, taken by Doria.

Both these Armies being retired, the Venetians meaning to bee no longer at such great expence in vaine, did disarme the Gallies of encrease, with some other old ones which were in the Army. These things were done forth of Italy, the which in the meane time was quiet in all places; but that the Duke of Milan resolved to send his forces against the Capitaine of the Castle of Mus, who being desirous to aduance himselfe by some nouely, and vpon hope that the Lanquents would assist him, had taken certaine places from the Grisons, and did fore threaten the city of Coma. The Duke of Milan vpon this report, sent Iohn Baptista Speciano, one of his household Gentlemen to Venice, to entreat the Senate to aide him to prevent the Capitains desseignes; the Senate answered that the Duke ought therein to beare himselfe modestly for feare of altering the quiet of Italy, & giuing occasion occasion to those that were desirous of troubles to praetize other nouelties: but when need should be; he should find in them the same readines to helpe him, which he had at other times experience of. This caused that small stirre soone to be appeased, which would haue fallen out otherwise, if the Venetians had taken armes: For the Grifons hauing by the aid of certayne Cantons of the Suisses leuied certayne numbers of soldiers, did enforce the Captaine of the Castle to an agreement, whereunto the Duke willingly consented, so soone as he vnderstood the Venetians resolution, and had at last, by meanes of a summe of money, the towne of Locquaca and the Castle of Mus restored to him.

The Duke of Ferrara receiues Modena and Regio by the Emperors sentence.

The Duke of Ferrara did at the same time, by the Emperors sentence, obtaine Modena and Regio, the which imported likewise, that the Pope receiuing an hundred thousand Ducats of him by a certaine time, and reducing the reuenue thereof to the ancient forme, should againe newly inuest him in the iurisdiction of Ferrara, albeit it was against the Popes will, who demanding caution and assurance for the summer, fiftene Venetian Gentlemen were giuen vnto him, whom the Senate did promise should be answerable for it, wherupon he accepted it. This Duke was not long before reconciled to the Venetians, who restored vnto him a goodly and magnificent Pallace, which hee had in Venice, it being taken from him by reason of the last warres, and had beene giuen vnto his Predecessors by the Signory.

20

According then to this sentence the Emperour consigned Modena to the Duke of Ferrara, which till then he had kept in deposito, by reason whereof there had beene, for a long time, betwixt the Pope and that Duke, neither open warre or an assured peace, for it vexed the Pope to quit those two Citties, which he had so much sought after.

The Emperour is againe desirous to talk with the Pope at Bologna.

The Emperour being speedily come into Italy, sent word to the Pope how desirous he was to talke with him againe at Bologna, for diuers great considerations, and chiefly to renew the Confederacy, made before betwixt them, to the end to comprehend therein all the Italians, and so take the summe of money, which euery one ought to contribute, if the French should inuade Italy: for hee had intelligence that the French had some desaigne vpon Genoa, pretending by reason of their particular claimes and interests, that they might doe it without breaking the agreement made at Madril or Cambray: as also because that Genoa was not mentioned in their treaty of the last league, but only the state of Milan and the Realme of Naples.

30

What was the cause of the emperours desire.

The Pope seemed to be highly pleased with this enterview, for hauing propounded to marry his Neece to the second sonne of France, and fearing least the Emperour disasting it, would refuse to passe on any further in the marriage already determined and concluded betwixt Alexandro de Medicis his nephew, and the Lady Marguerite his naturall daughter, sought all meanes to entertaine the Emperour and to satisfie him in all things; therefore he sent word to all the Potentates of Italy, to send their Commissioners to Bologna, where the meeting should be, there for to renew the Confederacy according to the Emperors desire.

40

This proposition did for diuers reasons displease the Venetians: First for feare least the Turke should suspect that the renewing of the league was rather made against him, then for the defense of Italy, with whom they were to deale with great respect. Next they thought it to be against reason, so to condemne the interests and desaignes of the French King, which might beget great discontent in him, which might turne to the losse and detriment of the Signory. And then, that the Emperors intention, to renew this first league, being only to comprehend Genoa therein, the same might displease the Turke and the French: The Turke, for that he hated that City and Nation, from whom that fleet came which had taken Coron, and done him so much harme; the French because that the assurance of Genoa would enforce them to take armes against them, by reason of the report which was already currant, how that they had an enterprise vpon it. And lastly, they were in doubt that this renewing of the league was a cunning of the Emperors, to cause the French King and Soliman to suspect the Republick, and for to reduce it to this point, not only strictly to ioyne and confederate it selfe with him, but likewise to depend wholly vpon him and his pleasure, and altogether to follow his fortune, by declaring it selfe a friend to his friends, and enemy to his enemies.

of

The Venetians made answer to the Emperors Agents which came from Rome for that purpose, that they were willing to maintaine and keepe the confederacy which they had made with the Emperour, and the other Confederates, being desirous of the peace and quiet of Italy. The Emperour in the meane time came forth of Germany into Italy, vnto whom the Senate sent foure Ambassadors, Mario Admisio, Ieronimo Pefare, Lorenzo Bragadino, and Alares Fofcare, who found him at Pontiebe, and waited vpon him thorow their State with all the honor that might bee, presenting him with confitures and other sweet meares, wherin they spent about ten thousand crownes.

The Emperour returneth into Italy.

The Emperour being come to Bologna, about the latter end of the yeare, the Pope speedily arrived there, where were shewed the selfe same demonstrations of friendship and familiarity as at the former time. Then coming together at the beginning of January of the next yeare 1533, to treat of important affaires, and chiefly to renew the last league made in the selfe same place, by reason whereof all the other Princes of Italy had sent their Commissioners thither: Marc Antonio Veniero, and Marc Antonio Contaren, Ambassadors of the Republick, the one with the Pope, and the other with the Emperour, were called, and earnestly intreated by these Princes, to perswade the Senate to hearken to that businesse, which concerned the safety of all men, and the quiet of Italy, which they so much desired. The Pope, besides these exhortations made to the Ambassadors, sent Roberto Magio, his Nuncio, to Venice, albeit it was more, (according to the common report) to satisfie the Emperour, then for any desire hee had there vnto.

The Venetians are requested to consent to the renewing of the league.

The Venetians had vsed all meanes possible to keepe themselves from being called into it, by promising carefully to obseue that which had beene agreed betwixt them, but being at last enforced to deliuer their resolution, they refused to renew the confederacie, or to amplifie the obligations therein contained, alledging for their excuses (not mentioning the French) how that the Turke had notice of the former made at Bologna for the safety of Italy, so that comming now to renew it, in regarde all the desaignes of Christendome were presently meant against him, hee would distrust it, and vndoubtedly suspect that the Venetians had a hand in it. Besides, it was sufficiently knowne to all men, that for the safety of Italy, there was no need to renew the league, in regard of the meanes they had to resist all attempts which should bee made against it: for if they came by Sea, the Emperors fleet was mighty enough to hinder their approaches: as for any enterprises by land, the league had provided for it, and among others, for the matter of Genoa, whither they could not come but thorow the State of Milan, which was comprehended in the league; the which experience did sufficiently manifest, no man hauing since three yeares (that the league was contracted) dared to raise any stirres in Italy, no nor those who were desirous to trouble the peace thereof.

The Venetians answer concerning the renewing of the league.

The Emperour being not satisfied with this answer, and desirous speedily to returne into Spaine, hauing already remained two moneths at Bologna, was more earnest with the Pope to conclude one betwixt themselves, refusing all the reasons which hee for his part could alledge to the contrary: so as they began to treat

A new league betwixt the Pope, Emperour and all the Italian Potentates (the Venetians excepted).

treatie of the Articles of the Confederacie, which beeing determined and concluded betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, and the other Potentates of Italy, namely the Dukes of Milan and Ferrara, the Cities of Genoa, Sienna, Luca, and Florence; notwithstanding that the latter was comprehended in the promises made by the Pope, it was published at the latter end of February; and by the same, each of those that were therein named, were bound to contribute to the warres, according to his strength and meanes, by gathering together in the meane time a stock of one hundred and ten thousand crownes, and monethly to furnish the like summe, if warre should happen; and in time of peace five and twenty thousand, for the entertainment of the Captaines and other soldiers: and at the same instant, Antonio de Leua, by a generall consent, was declared Generall of the league, with a decree, that he should remaine in the Dutchy of Milan. 16

But it was a matter truly worthy of note, that albeit the Common-wealth would not consent to this treaty, nor in any sort deale therein, yet neuertheless it was named in the publication thereof, and in the impression that was made of it, either to make that action to bee of more account, or else to cause the Common-wealth to bee suspected, and to become odious to other Princes, as it came to passe: for, that impression being carried to Constantinople and into England, it gaue occasion to those Princes (both of them beeing the Emperours sworn enemies) to complaine thereof to the Senate, and to distrust them. 20
This league being concluded and published, the Emperour departed from Bologna, and went to take shipping at Genoa, where five and twenty Gallies attended him, vnder the command of Andrè Doria, to saile to Barcelona.

The end of the ninth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

VMPIERS are in vaine appointed to end the controuersie, betwixt the Venetians and Ferdinand. The Emperours and the Turkes Nauall armies, are at one time at Sea without meeting one another. Francisco Dandulo is taken by Pirates and banished at his returne to Venice. The Venetians take the Moore of Alexandria by night, and presently set him at liberty. Soliman calleth Cariadin Barbarossa the Pirate to his seruice. Henry Duke of Orleance second Sonne to Francis the French King marieth Katherine de Medicis the Popes Neece. Great troubles in Germany by meanes of the Duke of Witttemberg. Sundry great fleets at one time vpon the Seas. The Turkes recover Coron. The Turkijs fleet vpon the Coasts of Calabria. Cariadine Barbarossa taketh Tunis. The Death of Pope Clement the seauenth, and the Creation of Pope Paul the third. The Pope taketh armes for the Dutchy of Cameryne. Solimans great friendship towards the Venetians. The Emperours iourney into Affricke where hee taketh Goletta and Tunis. The death of Francis Sforza Duke of Milan. The French King seeketh by all meanes to draw the Venetians to his side. The Duke of Sawoy deniecth the kings passage thorow his country. The French take Thurin, Fossan, and Pigneroll. The Emperor commeth with his army into Prouence. The Kings enterprise vpon Genoa. Antonio de Leua dyeth in Prouence. The Kings desaigne to make vse of the Turke against the Emperor. Diuers wrongs and outrages done to the Venetians in Solimans countries. And lastly the Bascha excuseth all these wrongs as done without Solimans knowledge.

The Tenth Booke of the fifth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

Emperors appointed a third man, to end the controversy between Ferdinand and the Venetians.

The assembly brake up, without any resolution.

The Venetians make preparations for their safety.

He Emperor departing from Bologna to go into Spaine, being come to Crenona, wrote very louingly to the Senate, giving them to vnderstand that hee had willingly admitted their excuses, in that they would not consent to the renewing of the league; and how that hee was desirous to doe any thing that might content them. And signes of friendship thus continuing betwixt those of Austria, & the Republike, both of them seeming to bee very desirous to end the controuersie which was yet vndeclared betwixt Ferdinand King of the Romans and the Signory, concerning the restitution of certaine townes held by Ferdinand, which did belong to the Venetians, the Emperor dealing therein, they agreed at last vpon a third man, which was Lodouico Porro a Senator of Milan, Ferdinand hauing chosen for Vmpiers, Ierome Bulfarch a German Doctor, and the Venetians Mattheo Auogadre of Brescia, a Doctor and Knight; who being come to Trent, the Senate likewise sent thither Andre Rose the Secretary, that he might be present there, and acquaint the Senate with the whole businesse: But the Senate hoping afterwards to compose this controuersie by friendly meanes, and by disbursing a summe of money, to recouer their fortes of Maran and Gradisca, they commanded Giouani Delfino gouernor of Verona to goe to Trent about that businesse. Yet neuer thelesse, both in this and other matters, so many difficulties were presented, as the assembly brake vp, without any resolution at all.

Whilest the Christian Princes were busied about these affaires, the Turke determining to recouer Coron, had prepared a mighty fleet for that purpose, which was sent towards those quarters. Doria to giue counterpoize to this Turkish army, caused great numbers of vessells to be armed in sundry places, that he might ioyne together the greatest forces he could.

These preparations caused the Venetians like wife to arme the Gallies which they had disarmed at the beginning of winter: continuing neuer the lesse in their first resolution, not to meddle betwixt those Princes, where vpon, they sent word to the Generall Capello, who was still in commission, to keepe the same order, and manner of proceeding as hee had done the yeare before, by reason whereof hee sent Francesco Dandulo Captaine of the Gulphe with certaine Gallies into the Gulphe, to gard it against Pirates, who being assembled in great numbers did much harme: and for the same purpose hee dispatched foure Gallies to Zante, and to the Promontory of Mailla the Gallion which was a greater shipp of a merueilous building well stored with ordnance and soldiers, that place being very commodious for the Nauigation of the Venetian vessells which sailed into the Leuant, and him selfe with the residue of the fleet remained neere to Corfou, satysfying himselfe, according to the Senates meaning, to assure their owne State, and keepe that

10

20 30

40

50

which belonged to the Republick from being spoiled and molested, but yet hee could not so well handle the matter, but that the subiects of the Signory did sustaine much harme and many losses, as it often happeneth in such cases. Now Francesco Dandulo being come into the Gulph, towards the coast of Dalmatia with six Gallies desiered from farre twelue Gallies of the Barbarians, and supposing at first, that they were the Gallies of the Prouidator Canalis, he held on his course, but beeing come within kenning, he perceived that they were Pirates, wherevpon hauing changed his mind hee did put himselfe more to Seaward, determining (as hee after wards said) to come and incompasse them that hee might fight with them and keepe them from escaping by flight, but, not acquainting the Captaines of the other Gallies with his determination, they supposed that hee did put to Sea, not for to fight, but to escape thence, and therefore, tarrying behind, hee was only followed by Marco Cornaro who commanded a bastard Galley.

The Pirates beeing come very neere them, and perceiuing their owne aduantage, by reason of the retreat of the other Venetian Gallies, fell vpon them and tooke them, and carried both the men and the vessells into Barbary, and among others, the Captaine and Cornaro. These newes being brought to Venice, did much trouble the Senate, as well in regard of the audacitiously of those theues, as for the Captaines indiscretion, who thorough his owne fault had caused the Gallies of the Signory which were very famous at Sea, to receive such an affront wherevpon, some propounded that it was necessary to send a sufficient number of Gallies towards the Sea-coasts of Affrick, and chiefly to Gazbes and to Argier, there for to burne all the shipping they could find, and to doe other harmes in reuenge of the wrongs they had sustained of sharration: but others considering that it would not be well done to hurt all the inhabitants of that Countrey with whom they traded, and thereby cut off from the Venetians their traffick and nauigations, caused this Councell to be reiected, yet neuerthelesse, to free the common wealth from disgrace, happened by the default or ignorance of one particular person, Dandulo being returned to Venice, hauing first beene carried to Constantinople, and then by the meanes of Critti, set at liberty, was confined to Zara, for not well behauing himselfe in this place.

There happened besides within a while after a more notable accident, whose beginning was much more dangerous, but the end farre more fortunate: Ieronimo Canalis, prouidator of the Army, departed from Corfou with twelue Gallies, to conuoy the great Gallies which were appointed for traffick into Syria and Alexandria, and to safe conduct them from Pirates, who did vsually scoure those Seas; and all of them beeing come together neere to the Ile of Candy not farre from the firme land, resolved to stay and cast anchor there, where the great Gallies lay, some miles distant from the light ones, lying in this sort, about sunne set, vpon the Feast day of all Saints, the sentinells which were in the caiges of the great Gallies, desiered certaine vessells which held their course directly towards them, whereof Dantele Bragadino Captaine of the great Gallies hauing speedily aduertized the Prouidator, he supposed that they were Pirates, wherevpon hee forthwith brauely refused to goe meet them, and that which confirmed him in this opinion, was the aduertizement which hee had receiued: what course the Turkish army held, the which departing from Modon to goe and winter at Constantinople, the Pirates had beene discharged.

Departing then with speed, and beeing come forth a good way to sea, hee found that hee had no more then seauen Gallies with him; because that the others remained behind, the Rowers perhaps beeing not so strong or skillfull in sea matters as were the first, or else the Captaines were not so hardy and valiant: but the Prouidator seeming not greatly to care for that, and performing the part of a good Captaine and skillfull manner, commanded all the Gallies that were with him

Francesco Dandulo is taken by Pirates.

Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning the reuenge of that wrong.

Dandulo is banished at his owne request to Venice.

him, each of them like two Lanthornes to deceaue the enemies, by making them to thinke that the number of his vessells, were farre greater then they were: then making a stand in their view, he suffered them to come forward, him selfe keeping still before the wind to incompass them at his aduantage. They were twelue Turkish Gallies conducted by the Moores Sonne of Alexandria, Soliman Captaine, who, (the army being dissolved) returned to his quarter into Barbary. This young Moore then hauing defied the Venetian Gallies, keeping on his way with full sailes, was already passed beyond the Prouidators Gallies, either because his intent was not to come any neerer to the Island, or else perceiuing so many Lanthornes he was affraide, and had not the boldnesse to doe so:

A fight at Sea between the Venetians
and Turkes.

The Prouidator then enforcing the bankes of Rowers went and assailed them on their backs, and discharged the ordnance, and bearing some of them in flanke, others in poepe, hee did greatly hurt them, himselfe receauing no harme by the Turkish shot, by reason of the place where hee lay. The chiefe meaning of the Venetian Gallies was to inuest the Moores Admirall Galley, where-vpon the Prouidator hauing assailed it, there was a fierce fight, by reason of the great number of Ianissaries that were in it, who valiantly sustayned the assault a long time, but the Prouidator had neere him a Galley of supplies, which did continually furnish him with soldiers in their stead that were slaine or hurt, to sustaine the fight: where-vpon the Moore being sore hurt, dispayring of being any longer able to defend his Gallies, and meaning to cast him selfe into the Sea to escape to some other of his Gallies, was taken by the Christian Rowers, and making him selfe knowne, his life was saved, but his Galley was altogether spoyled, and four other were taken, and two were sunke, the rest escaped by flight. So soone as the Turke perceiued the Venetian Gallies to come towards him, hee had determined to fly, but artificiall fire was throwne from the Prouidators Galley which burnt his sailes; and afterwards the Helme of the same Galley was broken by a Cannon shot, whereby hee was enforced to tarry and to come to stroakes.

The wisest remedy at Sea committed by night.

This fortunate successe did highly content the foldiors, and people of Candy, but the Magistrates and other men of note were sorry for it, in regard that the vessells did not belong to Pirates but to Soliman, a very mighty Lord, fearing that hee would take it ill, and imagine that affront to bee done to him selfe, by reason hee was at peace with the Republique: Where-vpon it was thought fit by the Magistrates of Candy, and the Captaines of the Gallies, speedily to send home these Gallies into Barbary, and in the meane time, respectiue to entertaine this young Turkish Captaine, and to giue him kind and courteous language, excusing that fault by the error of the Night.

The Venetian
ships are saved by the Turkish officers.

The report hereof being brought to Venice, the Senate was extremely greeued thereat, for the selfe same reasons and doubts, and so much the more, for that the same yeares store being very smal, the city was to be furnished with victuals from the Turkes country, where they had not onely obtayned licence to doe it, but had like-wise laden diuers shippes, where-vpon they feared that the same iniurie would bee badly digested at that time, as indeed it came to passe. For so soone as the Turkes officers were aduertized thereof, without tarrying for any speciall commandement from the Port, they made a stay of the Venetian ships which were come thither for corn. In regard whereof, some propounded to elect a new Prouidator in Canalis sted, and being thus dismissed of his place, to call him home to yeeld an account for what he had done, thereby in some sort to appease discontented Soliman: Diuers others maintaining Canalis cause, did defend it as a matter done by right of warre, and worthy rather of recompence then of punishment, saying that it was a deed unworthy the Common-wealth to chastise, or at least to make shew so to doe, their officers, that had well and valiantly behaued themselves in their place.

This reply overcame the former proposition, and caused them to determine

Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning Canalis cause.

to send Daniele Federico Secretary of the Preguails to Constantinople, who was a wife and discreet person, to the end to iustifie by speech, as well before the Sacches as Solimans selfe, what had hapned, by declaring how that their Captaine was enforced to fight, perceiuing in the night so many armed vessells neere to him, not knowing whether they were friends or enemies: and besides, how that the sodaine restitution of the Gallies, done the very next morrow, and the kind entertainment giuen since then to their Captaine could sufficiently witness their good and sincere meaning towards all those that did belong vnto him. Abraham recounts of the Bischa and Gritti, stood them in great stead to cause Soliman to allow of these excuses, but yet much more the new warre with Persia, where-vnto Soliman directing the ayme of all his designs, would attempt nothing that might diuert him from it: and thereby all matters being appealed at Constantinople, Canalis was with greater praise honored by all men, who dying within a while after in executing the same office for the Republick, the Senate in acknowledgment of his good seruice decreed that Antonio his sonne should during his life enjoy the reuenew of the Ile of Corfu.

*Soliman acknowledges the Venetians
excuses.*

The Senate
acknowledge Canalis seruice by recompensing his sonne.

These things happened in the Venetians Army; but, that of the Emperor hauing a long time stayed at Naples and at Messina, did at the last boldly aduenture to releue Coron, which was reduced to all extremity, where at the first, hauing had some hope of Victory, by reason of the flight and shamefull retreat of the Turkish army, it returned afterwards without any honor at all, either by the Captaines fault, or by a destined plague to Christians, seeing that the baseness of the Turkish Captaines, did afterwards procure great hurt to Christendome. For Soliman being displeased with those vnto whom hee had committed the charge of his fleet, taxing their small experience, determined to call Caradine surnamed Barbarossa his roffe, who of a Pirate being become a Prince, commanded at the same time in Argier, to giue him, (as hee did) the whole superintendence of sea matters.

Caradine har-bours his great experience at sea.

Hee being most expert in marine matters, and hauing of a long exercised the trade of a Pirate in Barbary, had gotten a perfect knowledge of all the Christians sea plaes of retreat, and in Affrick likewise making incursions vpon the Moores, but particularly by his defeating of the Spanish Gallies, whereby hee purchased great reputation, at such time as foure yeares before, they comming vnder the command of Don Hugo de Moncada to meet Doria at Genoa, hee did assaile and defeat them. Wee may iustly say that this man was the first which taught the Turkes the means of well ordering a nauall Armie, being before then finally experienced in sea matters, as those who till then had encreased their power by armes on land: hee likewise was the first that began to vse slaues in galleys, whereas before they were wont to man them with the first vnexperienced commers, which hath ever since made the Turkish fleets more mighty, and more fearefull to Christians. Soliman then resolving to make vse of this man, would sodainly aduertise the Venetians thereof, to the end that if they should meet him at sea, they might vse him as one of his Porte, knowing very well that they hated him for the great harme which hee had done them. And of a certaine, this man was afterwards an instrument of great calamities to Christendome, and of sundry losses to the Signory of Venice, as heere-after shall be scene. At the same time, albeit that the Pope seemed to bee carefull for the imminent dangers that threatened Christendom, being neuertheless more ardent then euer in his visuall thoughts, to aduance his Nephewes and his house, had vsed some secret meanes with the French King, concerning the marriage of Catherine, daughter to Lorenzo de Medici his Niece, with Henry Duke of Orleans his second sonne: for the which treaty it was concluded, that the Pope and the King should meet together at Nice, a towne belonging to the Duke of Sauoy, and seated neere the riuer of Var, which separateth Italy from Prouence.

The report of this enteruiue, the occasion thereof being vnkowne, had X x x greatly

The Pope acquainted the Venetians with all his designs.

The Pope presses to conclude his marriage.

Great troubles in Germany concerning the Duke of Wirtemberg.

German great preparations for warre.

greatly troubled the Venetians, and especially because it was added that the Emperor would be there: whereupon they carefully obserued these Princes actions, because they would not be out-taken as they had bene at the assembly of Cambray, saying that by reason of Princes ambition they were to beware of all things, and to suspect all things, but this meeting, which should haue bene in the month of July, being deferred to September following, the true occasion of that enter-view was in the meane time discarded; for which there mette together at Nice, the Bishop of Faenza for the Pope; and the Lord great Maister of France for the King, which did free the Venetians from all suspicion.

The Pope did afterwards aduertise them of his departure, and of the occasion thereof, and concealing those nuptials no longer, he sought to couer it with some other shadow, saying that in this treaty, hee had not so much respected his owne particular interest, as the common good and safety of all Italy, wherein nothing did so much auaille (as the Senate had often told him) as to hold the forces of two most mighty Princes in equall ballance, to the end that the power of the one might giue counterpoize to the other: in regard whereof, fearing least the French King, being wholly out of hope, by reason of the treaty of Bologna, of the friendship of the Italian Princes, would presently breake off from him, and that the Emperor thereby might come to command all, according to his owne pleasure, hee thought it fit to draw him vnto him by the bond of kindred; as hee had likewise done by the Emperor.

Now these nuptials, which all the Princes of Italy did suspect, were celebrated, not at Nice, by reason of the difficulty which the Duke of Sauoy made (because hee would not displease the Emperor) to grant the Castle vnto the Pope; but at Marseilles, according to the Kings desire, who thought it more honorable for himselfe, to haue the meeting in his owne Realme, wherewith the Pope was pleased, being desirous to giue the King all content: but that which men feared came not to passe, by reason of sturdy accidents, and then by the Popes death, which happened loone after, so as Italy continued quiet, and the Venetians freed from all obligations of taking Armes againe.

That which did greatly helpe to moderate the Popes great desseignes, were (as it was reported) the stirres in Germany, because that the Landgraue of Hesse hauing with other protestant Princes leui'd great numbers of soldiours, to restore Philrick Duke of Wittenberg to his Estate, it was reported that they would afterwards march into Austria against Ferdinand, and that from thence they would come into Italy, the which the Germanes did very much desire: but all these troubles were soone appeased; by an accord made with the King of Romaines, against whom their principall quarrell was about the Duke of Wittenbergs lands which hee possessed.

In this manner were the affaires of Italy quiet in the firme land, whereby the Common-wealth was on that side freed from care and trouble; but for the Sea, it beuomed them dayly to bee at new expences, being very ielous of their State: so as the Republick might iustly say, that it was depriv'd of the benefit of a perfect peace.

It was no more freed the yeare following, one thousand, five hundred, thirty and foure, from troubles and suspicions, then it had bene before, because that a great fleet was prepared at Constantinople, which was to bee commanded by Caradine, surnamed Barbarossa, and the like was expected in the West; for the Emperor supposing that the Turkish forces would fall vpon his States, vied all meanes to encrease his fleet, and to make it fitte and able to resist them. The French King on the other side, being prouoked by discontent, caused thirty Gallies to bee armed at Marseilles, his intent therein being not knowne. It was likewise reported, that great numbers of vessels of all sorts were armed and prepared in Barbary, not to scoure and robbe at sea, but to ioine with the Turkish Armie conducted by Caradine, and among other Capitaines there was a very famous Pirate called Sinam Cifus, surnamed the Lew, a man very valiant and well experienced in marine businesse. The Pope in like manner to assure his Sea townes from all incursions and inuasions; or for some other desseigne (as it was supposed) had armed ten Gallies.

All these fleets begat ialousie in the Venetians, and enforced them to expences by augmenting the number of their Gallies, and the soldiours of the garriſons in their sea townes: whereby being in extreame need of helpe in these extraordinary expences, it was propounded in the Councell to acquaint the Pope againe therewith, to the end to obtraine leaue of him for that purpose to raise the summe of an hundred thousand Ducats vpon the Clergie of their owne State. Some others of those of the Councell, who had already in this businesse tried the Popes rigor, were of opinion that the Senate, without tarrying for that leaue, should bee in to leuie that summe of money, or else to proceed therein more earnestly with the Pope, declaring how that the wealth dedicated to the Churches of their State, was very great and ample, which being freed from all publick contribution, their other subiects were oppressed with subsidies and intolerable charges, for the payment of their fleets and soldiours leuyed for the conservation of their liberty, and publick faculties. That it was not credible, that the holy intent of those who had enriched the Churches; was, that the Republick being ruined and destroyed, should be depriv'd of making vse of that which they had giuen to those Churches, in case of necessity: That the Pope stood badly affected to their State, and to whatsoever concerned them, so as hee made difficulties vpon all their requests, or else vied long delays therein.

But notwithstanding these prepositions, the zeale of Religion, and the respect to the Sea Apostolick, were of such force with the Senators, as preferring it before all other profit and commodity, this proposition was reiect'd, constantly affirming that it did not beleeue the Republick, which was founded & encreased in Christianity, vnder a continuall obedience and vnion to the Church and Pope of Rome, whereby it had purchased an immortal glory and commendation to lay her hands on Church goods, or therein to force the Popes will. That they in times past had great and urgent affaires, for which they had prouided without that aid, and without enterprizing scandalous matters: that they were not to doubt but that he which knoweth the inward thoughtes of men, and can doe all things, would raise them vp aid and succor by meanes to them vnknowne, much greater, and farre more profitable then that whereunto they were counsell'd by an euill example, and if the Pope did still continew his vsuall rigor, by so much the more would appeare before God and the world, the deuout and holy intent, and accustomed wisdom of the Venetian Senate.

This opinion being allowed, they pursued with all honor and reuerence the expedition of their request in the Court of Rome, the which at last they obtained. By this means the Senate hauing raised money, they began to augment the number of their galleys, whereof Capello was still General, and to leuy footmen to send to the Islands, and other sea places vnder their obedience, to the end to assure them, expecting what would become of the preparations of so many fleets. Now the Turkes whilst their nauall army was preparing, were come by land to besiege Coron, & did so strictly shut it in, as the Spaniards that were within it, being impatient, and in a manner desperate, by reason of the miseries they there endured, made a sally vpon the Turkes, which succeeding vnfortunately, they were enforced to retire into the castle with great losse of their soldiours: when vpon, finding themselves by that losse, & likewise by pestilence, to be reduced to a very small number, so soone as the Sicilian ships arrived which brought supplies, the Spanish Capitaines being out of hope to keepe that towne, embarked themselves in the same ships, and leit it to the Turkes discretion. Yet neuertheless, it was supposed, as a Great Fleet prepared at Constantinople.

The Senate's holy resolution.

The Venetians preparations for their safe.

The Turkes recover Coron.

matter more likely, that the same happened by the Emperors expresse commandement, who perceiving that hee would not but with great expences defend that place enuironed on all sides with enemies, and being out of hope of any farther progression, determined to quit it. Cariadine in the meane time hauing put to sea with an hundred saile, and being come nere to the Venerian Gulphe, the Generall, who narrowly obserued his actions, prepared, according as the Senate had willed him at the beginning, to retire farther in, and not to abandon the defence and safety of the Gulphe: but the Turkish fleet directing their course towards the Tirrhene sea, sailed to the sea coasts of Calabria, where on a suddaine hauing landed great numbers of soldiers, they did not onely spoile the countrey, but tooke two townes vpon the sea shore, though of small consequence. The feare of the inhabitants of Naples and Rome at the report of the arriuall of these Barbarians was very great, so as if Cariadine had marched thither, he might easily haue taken them, there being no forces to hinder him: but the Turke hauin scoured and spoiled the whole Prouince, went vnto the Isle of Ponze to take in fresh water, and then sailed towards the coast of Affrick, chiefly to execute his designe, for which hee was come from Constantinople, albeit that hee had cunningly made shew to saile towards the coast of Spaine, that hee might on a sodaine, and ynlookt for, assaile his enemy Amulasse King of Tunis.

Cariadine was sufficiently enformed of the whole State of that Countrey, of the situation and strong townes, and of the Kings forces, and what affection his subiects did beare vnto him: Wherevpon, adding to all these things which hee well knew, force, and cunning, hee hoped that his enrererprise would fall out prosperously, as it did. For hee gaue forth, that hee brought Rossetta with him the Kings brother, knowing how pleasing that name was to the people, where after sundry exploits hee did at last take the City of Tunis.

The other fleets at the same time did nothing worthy of memory, except that of the Venetians, which was enforced to come to strokes with certaine vessels of Malta to chastise their Captaine. It was Philippo Mazzeo a Knight of Malta, who hauing very audaciously, with certaine vessels, scoured not onely the Leuant seas, but came into the Venetian Gulph, spoiling & robbing both Christians and Turkes indifferently, was taken by the Generall and sent to Venice, where his proceesse being by the Senate referred to the criminall Councell of the Forts, to consider thereof, and himselfe in the meane time walking at liberty in the City, not tarrying for his iudgement, escaped thence: then hauing againe armed three Fufts, hee continued with great arrogancy and contempt of the Commonwealth, his former courses: wherevpon the Prouidator hauing narrowly watched him, did in the end surpriue him, and hauing disarmed his vessels, caused Philippor head to bee stricken off as author of all those mischiefs, setting all the Turkish slauas at liberty, whom hee sent to Constantinople.

It was supposed that this execution would haue incensed the Emperour, who had that Religion vnder his protection, and the great maister of Malta; but they being aduertised how the matter stood, both of them were appeased.

In the midst of these affaires, the Pope who was fallen sick at the beginning of summer, hauing a long time endured sundry accidents, departed forth of this present life, at such time as he was at the height of all his happinesse. Hee being dead, the Cardinals, who according to the vsuall ceremonies had shutt themselves vp into the conclaue, did with a generall consent, elect in his steed, Alexander of the family of Farneses, a Romaine by nation, and the eldest Cardinall of the Court of Rome, who tooke vpon him the name of Paul the third. All men thought that hee would haue behaued himselfe as Neuter, as hee had euer done, for the space of fifty yeares or there-about that hee had bene Cardinall, and would thereby maintaine Italy in peace and quiet a long time after:

The

the which was very pleasing to the Venetians, as they who greatly desired to see all matters brought to a settled quiet, and who did besides perswade themselves, by reason of the loue which he had euer seemed to beare vnto them before hee was Pope, that if he should leaue his neutrality hee would rather confirme the league which they were at with Clement his Predecessor, then pradtize any noueltie; therefore they sent eight Ambassadors to him, namely Marcio Adinio, Tomaso Mocemiga, Nicolas Tepulo, Ieromino Pefare, Giuon Badoaria, Lorenzo Bragadino, Gaspato Costaren, and Federico Reniero, not giuing them any other commission; then to present to the new Pope their accustomed obedience, thinking it not fit to sue vnto him for any thing, vntil they had better discovered his designs in his new fortune.

But the Emperour being desirous to know his meaning from himselfe, being therevnto moued by his feare, lest the French would stirre, hee did forth with found him concerning the renewing of his league with the late Pope: And the more easily to indute him therevnto, hee made the same request to the Venetians, that they would againe confirme betwixt them the former Articles of their confederacy, exhorting them therevnto for the quiet of Italy, which hee knew they so much wisht for, and they being vnited together, would bee able to maintaine and defend themselves from all the attempts of the French, although the new Pope would not ioyne himselfe with them: and yet neuertheless the true meanes to draw him to them, at the beginning of the Papacie, was, to see a firme vnion and correspondence, betwixt the Republick and him, on whom the wills of other potentates of Italy were to depend.

The Venetians did not altogether approue, nor yet reiect the Emperors motion, for they being in no sort desirous of inuouation, said some times; That there was no need to haue it renewed, and at other times seemed to be ready to doe, when need should bee. And in these practises ended the yeare one thousand five hundred thirty foure.

The Pope who did maturely consider all these matters, not dooing anything rashly, did at the beginning of the yeare following, shew how desirous hee was to establish a firme peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King, (vnto whom hee speedily sent his Legates for that purpose), and likewise in what singular recommendation hee had the affaires of Italy; about all other matters, with a particular affection to the Signory of Venice. Yet neuertheless, as Princes actions are different and subiect to change, an occasion was offered, which had like to haue altered this good disposition of the Popes, to the great danger of all Italy.

Whilest the Sea Apostolick was vacant, the nuptials had bene solemnized betwixt Guido Vbaldo, sonne to Francesco Maria Duke of Vrbin, and Iulia the onely daughter to Iohn Farn Duke of Camerine, who succeeded in her Fathers State. This marriage was at the first allowed by the Pope, and all men thought that matters would haue gone forward peaceably, but within a while after, the Pope being otherwise perswaded by some, or else aspiring of himselfe, (as it often happeneth to those that are at the height of their felicity) to greater and higher designs, thought this a very fitt occasion for the advancement of his owne house, by conferring therevnto this enfeofment of the Church for a beginning: Wherevpon hee openly declared, That hee would neuer suffer that the Duke of Vrbin should, against all law and right, possesse (as hee sayd) the Dutchie of Camerine, belonging to himselfe alone, to dispose thereof, hauing to this end rayled great forces to hinder the fortifications which the Duke intended to make at Camerine, and the Garrison which hee purposed to place there.

This declaration of the Pope did greatly discontent the Venetians, vnder whose

XXXX 3

The Turkish fleet scoured the Sea coast of Calabria.

Cariadine taketh
Tunis.

Philippo Mazzeo
a Knight of Malta loseth his head for his many robberyes.

The death of Pope Clement
the seventh.

The Creation of Pope Paul
the third.

The Senate
sendeth eight Ambassadors
to the Pope.

The Emperour
sends to the
Venetians.

The Venetians
answer to the Emperour.

The Pope taketh Armes for the Dutchie of Camerine.

The Venetians
seek to appease the strife between the Pope and the Duke of Vrbin.

whose protection the Duke of Vrbin was, vnto whom, and his whole house, they did beare singular affection, for the good seruices which hee had done to the common wealth; and therefore they vsed all possible meanes to appease the Pope; as also because that the Duke of Vrbin did freely offer to haue the matter consulted and debated on by reason: but the Pope giuing no eare to their entreaties or messages, said that hee could doe no otherwise therein then hee was counsell'd and aduised by affaires of State, and that hee did determine without any more dissembling to recover by force, that which had beene detained from that State: the which all men did account very strange, in regard of those times, Christendom beeing infinitely molested, both by the armes of the Infidels, and by heresies newly sprung vp in diuerse and sundry Prouinces. The Venetians therefore not to omit ought which might quench this small sparke, which was likely to burst forth into a great flame, did aduertise the Emperor thereof, earnestly entreating him therein to interpose his authoritie, to preserve and maintaine ouer all Italy the same peace and quiet which to his honor and renoune hee had so well established.

The Emperor
for the Venetians sake doth maintaine the Duke of Vrbin
his cause.

The Emperor did willingly embrace this businesse, and hauing hotly pursued it with the Pope, did greatly moderate his former heate: But it was supposed that the same which did most of all appease him, was a proposition made vnto him by those who managed the affaires of the Duke and the Venetians, which was, to 20 giue to his sonne Pietro Lodouico, some honorable estate in Romagna, and to render Rauenna and Ceruia to the Venetians, to the end thereby to oblige them to take the person of Pietro Lodouico and his State into their protection and safeguard, because it was not to bee doubted, but that the Venetians, in acknowledgment of such a benefit, and for their owne proper interest, desiring rather to haue a particular Lord of that State to bee their neighbour, then the Church, would employ all their forces for the maintenance and preleration of the greatness of the Farnesia family: wherevnto the Pope hearkning very willingly, and hoping for some greater matter, the pursues for the Dutchy of Camerine was for the Venetians sakes smothered, of whom hee then seemed to make 30 great account.

The Emperors
preparations for Affricke

All the Princes of Italy at the same time, and especially the Venetians were in feare, and stood vpon their guard, by reason of a mighty Army which the Emperor prepared, vntill such time as they were aduertised, that it was for Affricke to recover Thunis, and thereby to assure the kingdome of Naples, a neere neighbour to it, which Carladine did daily threaten to invade. The Emperor did particularly aduertise the Venetian Senate of all his designs, seeming to bee very zealous for the common good of Christendom, and in particular for that of their Republick, desiring to continue the same friendship and good correspondence which was betwixt them.

This demonstration of friendship was the cause of the renewing the confederacie betwixt them, according to the same conditions which had beene concluded at Bologna, onely to shew that by the Popes death, it was neither finished nor broken off; Wherevpon they commanded Marc-Antonio Contaren their Ambassador, that in signe of continuance of amitie, hee should follow, (which he did) the Emperor whether sooner hee went. After that generall processions and publick prayer were made in Venice by the Cleargie, that it might please God to fauour that enterprise.

This great preparation of the Emperors Army had caused the Turkes to suspect diuerse matters, and this suspicion was most of all increased in them (as it was reported) by Iohn Ferrest the French Ambassador at Constantinople, thorow his reports made to the Baschaes, seeking to make them beleue, that the Venetians did perswade the Emperour to turne his great forces vpon Greece

Greece against Solimans state, and yet neuerthe lesse the French Ambassador resident at Venice, did offer to the Senate, in his Kings behalfe all fauour and curtesie that might bee; he did likewise entreat them to take speciall heed to the Emperors actions, and that such great preparations ought verily to cause them to suspect, and that the common rumors abroad were so many signes of the imminent dangers and preiudices which threatened the Common wealth. These offers and aduertisements did greatly trouble the Senate, who did well perceiue that they tended only to cause the Republick to suspect and distrust all men, and to thrust it into open warre, either against the Emperor or Soliman, to enforce them thereby 10 to haue recourse to the French King to make vse of his fauour toward the Turke, or of his forces against the Emperor. Yet neuerthelesse, partly dissembling these suspicions, they thanked the King for his offers and good-will, for which, though at that present they had no need of them, the Common wealth should neuerthelesse remaine much obliged to that Crowne: they did after-wards complaine of the bad offers which his Ambassador at Constantinople had done vnto them, cleane contrary to truth: wherupon the King did disauow it, and assured them that he had neuer giuen him any such commissions.

Howsoever it was, it is certaine that notwithstanding all these reports and bad offices done to the Venetians towards Soliman, he did still loue and highly respect 20 them: for at his returne from Persia he failed not particularly to acquaint them with the prosperous successe of his iourney, how he had chased away his enemies, entred Persia, spoiled and sackt the City of Tauris, the Royal seate of that Kingdome, had bene at Babilon, from whence hauing expelled the Garrison, he became Maister thereof, and lastly that he was returned victorious to Constantinople: The report was, that, soone after his returne home, he was desirous to leuy a mighty army: wherupon he called for the same purpose Carladine and diuers other Captaines before him to consult with them about the affaires of warre, thereby shewing that his meaning was, not to suffer his Army long to continue idle.

The Emperor in the meane time, (the winter season beeing past, and all things 30 in readinesse for the Voyages of Affricke) tooke shipping at Barcelona, where all the fleet lay to the number of three hundred saile of all sortes, vnder the conduct of Prince Doria, with forty thousand fighting men, not accounting the Marriners and Rowers, who were very many, being attended on by all the Spanish Nobility, together with the Infant of Portugall who met him at Barcelona with fourescore saile of shippes of warre. The first landing of the army was in Sardinia in the Hauen of Caliers, and hauing there taken order for all warlike necessities, it failed to Carthage: then being come nere to the land, not farre from Goletta, the army was forthwith landed, which encamped not farre from thence, knowing 40 very well that on the taking thereof depended that of Thunis: because that Go-Calaia before letta is a Tower enuironed with diuers Bastions, and seated almost vpon the mouth of a Channell, through which the Sea entring in a good way, it maketh a Lake right ouer against it, vpon which the City of Thunis is seated, some twelue miles from Sea.

At their first arriuall the Turkes Garrison in Goletta did valiantly defend themselves; but the Emperors ordnance hauing (almost) ruined the Fort, it fell into the Spaniards possession, who entring afterwards into the Lake, did without any difficulty or fight take fifty three vessells, as Gallies, Galliois, and Fusts, which Carladine had left there as in a place of most safety.

This losse did so daunt Carladine, as notwithstanding that at the beginning coming forth of Thunis with his army, hee made a shew as if he would giue the Emperour Battaille. yet neuerthe-lesse giuing place on a sudaine, he retired into the City of Bonna, where finding himselfe in no great safety, and vnderstanding that Doria followed him, he went to Argiers.

The taking of Thunis and Bona.

The Citties of Thunis and Bonna being forsaken by their Captaine, notwithstanding that there were strong Garrisons in them, did very quickly and with ease fall into the Spaniards hands. Cariadine escaping all these dangers, went within a while after to Constantinople, whither he was sent for, and being come into Soliman's presence, who was newly returned from Persia, he did in the best manner he could excuse all that which happened, and the losse of the Kingdom: Soliman being ioyfull for his victories obtained in Persia, did pardon and receive him to fauour, and after-wards gaue him the super-intendence of his Army by Sea.

The Emperor
returneth to Naples.

The Emperor on the other side hauing with royall bounty rendred the Kingdom of Tunis, which he had conquered, to Amulcasse, on condition to pay vnto him as his feodatory, an Annuall tribute of six Barbery horles, twelue falcons, and twelue thousand crownes for the payment of a thousand Spanish footmen, whom he left in Garrison at Goletta; departed victorious from Africk, and sailed with his whole army into Sicily; where hauing made some abode in the Citties of Palermo and Messina, he dismissed the greatest part of his fleet, and cased his army, retaining no more then two thousand Almaine footmen for his guard, and afterwards went to spend the winter at Naples.

Sundry Princes, and Princes Ambassadors went thither to him: the Signory likewise, according to their ancient custome, sent foure Ambassadors thither to him, namely, Marco Foscare, Giovann Delphino, Vincenzo Grimani, and Tomazou Comaren, to reioyce with him in the Republicks name for his victories obtained in Africke.

The death of
Francis Sforza
Duke of Milan.

Whilest the Emperor was on his iourney, Francisco Sforza, Duke of Milan, deceased, without any Children of his owne to succeed him. The Senate after his death requested Antonio de Lema to haue an eye vpon that State, and to gouerne it in the name of his widow, vntill that the Emperors pleasure were therein knowne. The Dutchesse went to Naples to the Emperor, where being honorablelie entertained by him, he seemed to be very sorry for the Death of the Duke his husband; either for some particular friendship which he had borne vnto him, or else for feare least his death would breed some new troubles in Italy, or rather, by dissembling it, to seeke thereby means to make all men beleue, that for his owne part, he would lay no claime to that State.

The Emperors
captiue answer to the Venetians concerning the State of Milan.

But the Venetians were extremely sory for his death, who hauing so long a time with great expence and discomodity maintained warre, to the end that the same State might be possessed by a particular Italian Lord, perceiued themselves, by the Dukes death, to be throwne into new doubts and difficulties, and being deprived of their hopes, to be peradventure enforced to renew the warre. Therefore so soone as the Emperor was come to Naples, the Venetian Ambassadors that followed him, did represent vnto him the Senates desire, together with the State of the affaires of Italy; Earnestly entreating him to find a means if it were possible, to maintaine that peace which himselfe had there established, and the which he seemed so much to desire. The Emperor made answer, that in regard it belonged to him as chiefe Lord to provide for that State, he did likewise therein desire to giue content to the Princes of Italy, and chiefly to the Venetians: therefore he would very willingly learne of them what were best to be done for the safe establishing of the quiet of Italy, and also what their meaning therein was.

The Venetians, notwithstanding they desired to haue the State of Milan fall into the hands of some particular Lord, yet neuertheless being therein ignorant of the Emperors pleasure, being not willing (and it may be, not in vaine) to offend him, or any other, they continued constant in this proposition, to haue some one inuested therein, who should be esteemed fit and sufficient to maintaine peace and quiet in Italy, without proceeding any farther: where-upon the the foure departed Ambassadors had no commission at all for this buisnesse when they departed towards Naples, whereat the Emperor wondering, and being desirous to draw the Venetians to his party, (occasion now being offered), he beganne againe to discourse of that matter, concluding in the end, (as hee had at other times done) that being not yet well resolved on whom to bestow the State of Milan, hee would willingly know their opinions, the which hee would greatly esteeme and respect in that buisnesse.

Within a while after, there being some suspition that the French did meane to stirre vp new troubles, the Emperor fought to the Venetians, that as by the Popes death they had renewed the league betwixt themselves, euen so to renew it now againe, by reason of the Duke of Milans death: that he did desire it, the better to assure the affaires of Italy, and to take away all occasion from those that were desirous to trouble it.

The Venetians being of the same mind did therein giue consent to satisfie the Emperor, by confirming the league on the selfe same former conditions, reseruing therein, place for the Pope, and for him also that should bee chosen Duke of Milan.

The Confederacy confirmed betwixt the Emperor and
Venetians.

It was well aduised, sodainly and freely to grant the Emperors first entreaties, to shew by that readinesse how much they did affect him, and to auoid besides, the occasion of handling that buisnesse at Rome, whither he determined speedily to goe, whereof the Turkes would haue conceiued some sinister opinion in regard of the leagues which Popes were wont to propound against Infidells: although of a long time they haue bene to no purpose.

The Pope not well considering all these occasions, or else being ignorant of them, made shew to be displeased with the Venetians, for that they had so readily granted the Emperors demand, saying, that they ought to haue tarried for his presence, and vntill the Emperour had bene come to Rome. The Duke of Milans death had reuiued in the French King, his former claimes, and his earnest desire to conquer that State; wherein being resolute, knowing how greatly the Venetians might aid him in that enterprize, he determined first of all to sound their meaning, and to this end sent the Lord of Beauuais, one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber to Venice, to vnderstand how they stood affected to the occasion which did now offer it self, to assure, (as he said) and augment their State, declaring vnto them how that his King had great store of money, friends and all other necessaries for such an enterprize, whereby they could not but hope for a good and prosperous successe: and if that they shew themselves to behis friends and Confederates, he would very nobly recompence them.

The French
Kings Ambassador to the Venetians concerning the buis-nesse of Milan.

The Senate supposing it to bee no fitt time to giue an eare to these propositions, made answer in generall termes, that the Republick had bene euer desirous of peace, and neuer more then now, as well by reason of the great discommodities of the late warres, as for that Christendome was in sundry places afflicted with many heresies, the which ought to bee rooted out, before any new warre were to begin: yet neuertheless they did highly thanke the King for his offers, and for his confident communicating them vnto them, whereof they would fill be mindfull, and perhaps in time make vse.

The Venetians
answer to the Ambassador.

The French King for all this, not giuing ouer his desaigne of sending his Army into Italy to conquer that State, did leuie as great forces as hee could to enuade it on the sodaine, and to that end sent to the Duke of Sauoy, to craue passage thorow his country, which the Duke denying, by the perswasion (as it was reported) of the Dutchesse his wife, the King tooke it very strangely, in regard of the ancient alliance and neere kindred that was betwixt them, by meanes whereof, he determined first to enuade it.

The Duke of Sauoy denieth
the Kings request.

The King had sundry occasions to bee displeased with the Duke of Sauoy, which Canes of the Kings dissontance with the Duke of Sauoy.

which did the more heate and hasten him on: for, the loane of money made by the same Duke to the Duke of Bourbon, a traitor to the King: his gratulatory letters written to the Emperor when he was taken prisoner: his practises to alienate the Swisses from the alliance with France: the purchase of the County of Ast: his refusal to lend Nice for the enterview of Pope Clement and himselfe: the Kings claimes to the dowrie of the Lady Loisa of Sauoy his mother, sister to Duke Philibert, who died without children, the King affirming th it a great part of the succession of Sauoy did belong vnto himselfe, by reason that his mother was borne of the first wife, and sole sister and heire to Duke Philibert, together with his fresh refusal to giue him passage thorow his countrey, to march to the conquest of the Duchy of Milan, all these things were euident signes of the Dukes small affection towards the King: wherevpon the King, knowing very well that he had greatly offended him, and being out of hope to be reconciled to him, so soone as the Emperor was come to Palermo in Sicily, beeing returned from his journey of Tunis, hee did secretly lend vnto him, to craue his ayde against his mightie enemy.

The French
take Turin, Fossan and Pigneroll.

This businesse could not bee so secretly caried, but that the King had speedie intelligence thereof, which caused him on a sodaine to send his forces beyond the mounts, vnder the conduct of Philip Chabot Admiral of France his Lieutenant Generall, whom he sent to enuade Piedmont, about the beginning of the year 1536, where finding the country badly provided of defence, hee easily rooke the cities of Turin, Fossan & Pigneroll, and was besides like to haue taken the city of Vercell, had not Antonio de Lema who was in the Duchy of Milan come thither to the speedy rescue thereof, staying by his triuall the designs and progression of the French. The Emperor seemed to bee extremely displeased and incensed against the French King, for making warre in Piedmont, and causing speedily a mighty Army to bee leuied, hee did soone hope to ouer-runne him, affirming boldly that hee would goe in person to assaile him in his owne kingdom, and within a while after coming to Rome, hee came into the Consistory, where in the presence of the Pope and Cardinalls, and great numbers of Ambassadors and Prelates, Dukes, Earles, Barons, and other noble personages, hee began to complaine of the French King, so as beeing transported with choller, hee proceeded to farre, as for the auoyding of greater effusion of blood, hee would end all controuersies by fighting with him hand to hand, and that hee would challenge him for that purpose.

Emperour
challengeth the French King
to single fight.

The Pope did all hee might to appease him, and had already employed himselfe to make them friends, but all in vaine. The greatest difficulty was, to finde a meanes which might content both the one and other, concerning the Duchy of Milan, in which treaty, although the Venetians had an hand, (the Emperours pleasure beeing to haue them acquainted therewith,) yet neuertheless they did very slowly proceed in it, in regard of the aboue mentioned reasons, which were much encreased by these new accidents of Piedmont. For the Duke of Sauoy beeing driven from his State, went to Naples to the Emperor, to beseech him to haue pity vpon him, and to helpe to restore him to his Duchie. The Emperor beeing moued with pity, was ready to make an agreement with the French King to free himselfe from that war, and to restore the Duke of Sauoy to his state, but not agreeing together vpon the persons of the Duke of Orleans, or the Duke of Angoulême, for the Duchy of Milan, the Emperor beeing desirous to giue it to the Duke of Angoulême, and the French King to the Duke of Orleans, the matter remained vndecided, and the Emperor departing from Rome, after some small stay in Tuscany went, without tarrying any where, to Ast. Having there assembled all his cheefe Captaines, among whom were D. Fernand of Toledo Duke of Alua, the Marquis of Guasto and D. Fernand de Gonzaga, he conferred with them concerning the meanes to make warres, where of his owne proper motion, he propounded against all reason & the opinions of the best experienced into Prouence, wherevpon to that end the rendezuous for all his troopes was at Nice whither Doria likewise came with fifty Gallies, to second the land army. The Emperor came thither in person; from thence, entering into the French Kings countrey, he encamped not farre from the City of Aix, beeing not well resolved what to attempt first, chiefly desiring to assaile either Marcellis, or Adles, and having spent much time in this irresolution, he gaue the King leisuere to assemble a mighty army, who beeing come to Lyons for that purpose, did practise with sondry Italian Captaines, who in his behalfe hauing raised forces neere to Mirandola, made an attempt to surprise Genoa, and to reduce it to the French Kings deuotion.

Captaine

The Emperor
entreats with his army into Prouence.

The Kings cousin prince upon Genoa.

The Emperor beeing by this meanes called away to defend his owne, perceiving likewise that his army sustained diuers discomforts, by reason of the bad disposition of the ayre where it was encamped, was enforced to retire, without doing any thing, but only making a shew of his great desire to hurt the King. But before hee came into Prouence, hee sent Roderico D'Analos to Venice to acquaint the Senate with his great preparations of warre, and with his deaigne to inuade France, and to entreat them by the same meanes to make ready those forces, which they were tyed to furnish by their Confederacy, for the defence of the state of Milan: if need should be.

The Emperor enforced to retire forth of Prouence.

The Senate therevpon detemined to leuy six thousand footmen, vnder the command of Antonio de Castelle, Generall of the artillery, and did in the meane time answer the Emperor, that as it had beene ready to renew the league, it was likewise as diligent to maintaine that whereunto it was bound, and that for their parts they would in no sort faile to defend the State of Milan: they did afterwards add to these foot-forces five hundred light horse armed after the Burgonian manner, commanding all those forces of foot and horse to meet by a certaine day at Azola, vpon the Bressan territory, to passe from thence when need should be vpon that of Cremona: The Duke of Vrbino was likewise sent for, to come in person to the Army: but truce beeing granted by the arriuall of the Cardinall of Lorraine, this former heate of the French seemed to be quenched, whereby the Venetians had no cause to march forth of their owne confines: yet neuertheless the French king made shew openly to be distast of them, although he very well knew that he had no iust cause, by reason they did not exceed the bounds of their Confederacy, but hoping by his complaints to cause them to proceed more slowly in that wherein they were bound to the Emperor, and to abstaine from entering into any new league or confederacy with him, he complained of all these matters.

The Senate
answer to the Emperor.

Cesar Fregoza, Captaine of a company of light horse in Verona, departing without leave and going to Genoa to fauour the Kings partie, was deprived of his pay, and rancke which he held, and was wholly banished from their State. The King complained thereof, and of diuers other matters, and sometimes with very bitter speeches, because that the Venetians went about (as he said) to mar his deaignes and enterprizes: The Emperours agents on the other side seeming to be displeased, if they should casse certaine vnprofitable soldiers, said, that they did it to augment the enemies army, whither they retired themselves, which was assembled at Mirandola: so jealous were these two Princes one of another, which of them should haue the Republick for his friend and Confederate.

The Emperour departing (as hath beene said) from Prouence went to Genoa, meaning to passe (as hee did) into Spaine, leauing the Marquis of Guasto for his Lieutenant Generall in Italy in Antonio de Lemaes stead, who dyed in Prouence, with twenty thousand foote-men, both of Almaines, Spaniards, and Italians.

Antonio de Lema dyeth in Prouence.

Other Ambassadors from the Republicke, came vnto him to Genoa, namely namely, Nicolaso Tepalo, Marc-Antonio Veniero, Marc-Antonio Cornaro, and Antonio Capello, and at their arrivall, he dispatched Don Pedro Gonzales de Mendoza to Venice, to acquaint them with his successe in warre, and with the cause of his returne, together with his great loue to peace, particularly rehearsing unto them, whatsoever had beene treated of with the King, the first practises being againe renewed, where the King had taken time for three moneths to resolve him selfe, whether hee should accept the Duchy of Milan for his sonne the Duke of Angoulesme, and thereby haue him to marry with Duke Sforzas widow. And if within the time prefixed, the King did not resolve thereon, hee did intend to give that State to Don Luigi Infant of Portugall, or to Emanuel sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, wherein he desired to know their mindes; but he added, that for the better establishing of all these matters, it was necessary to contract a new league betwixt the Princes of Italy, for otherwise it was impossible that himselfe alone could beare such a burthen, wherevnto if they would not give their consent, they should have no cause to complaine of him, if hee were enforced to do that which would not greatly please them. The Senate being constant in their former resolution, not to declare their meaning concerning the Duchy of Milan, untill they had more particular notice of the Emperors intent therein, nor yet to make any new confederacie, other then that of Bologna so oftentimes renewed: answered, that concerning the new Duke of Milan, when the Emperor should directly name any one, the Senate would afterwards better consider of their particular & common interests, and make a more certaine resolution: as for the new league, they alledged the selfe same reasons as at other times, that there was no need thereof, with the same regard to the Turke, who euery day grew great, and (according to common report) prepared a mighty Army for the yeare following.

The Venetians did aduertise the Pope of what had passed, still assuring him of their great affection to the peace, and safety of Italy, for which they intreated his Holynesse readily to employ himselfe, because that hauing resumed the matter concerning the Duchy of Camerine, he seemed to neglect this other important business, iustifying himselfe only for that hee had declared himselfe as neuter: but being at last earnestly solicited by the Venetians, and by the imminent dangers which threatened them from the Turke, which did dayly encrease, as also for that he had vndertaken to conuoke a generall Councell, which was published to be held at Vincenza instead of Mantua, where it had beene first appointed, hee did expressly resolve to send his Legates to both these Princes, to treat particularly of this business, namely, of an vniuersall peace betwixt the Christian Princes of the league against the Turke, and of the celebration of the Councell.

The Cardinall Trinulcio went to the French King, and the Cardinall Carraccisla to the Emperor: but these Legations were fruitlesse, because none of these three points did take effect, by reason of fondry difficulties which happened. War by this meanes did in such sort kindle betwixt the Emperor and the French King; as enemies and most barbarous nations were there-in vied to the hurt and ruine of Christendome: where-in the Venetians like-wise had an hand, notwithstanding that they had determined to remaine neuters, and to be at peace and friendship with both parties.

Now by that which hath beene said, the designses of Francis the French King may be sufficiently discerned, who determining to trie all meanes to abate the Emperors greatness, and to reuenge all those wrongs which he said he had receiued from him, hee did at sondry times sound the Venetians meaning, and did by diuers meanes seeke to separate them from the Emperor: at the last, the Lord of Rhodes coming from him to Venice, propounded sundry faire hopes and promises to the Senate, and vsed all meanes to change their former determination to continue the league with the Emperour, but it was in vaine.

For

The Emperor
acquainteth
the Venetians with that which he had treated with
the King.

The Venetians
answer to the ambassador.

The three chiefe points with the Pope handed vnto the Christian Princes.

The King
sends an Ambassador to Venice, to draw them from the Em-perors

For the Venetians were as firme and constant in keeping their promise with the Emperor, as they were hard to be drawne to doe any thing which might disturbe the quiet of Italy. The kings hope herein being frustrate, and himselfe being mightily animated against the Emperor for comming to assaile him in his owne Kingdome, knowing likewise that he was to weake of him selfe alone to finish the enterprize of the Duchy of Milan, which was defended by the entire forces of the Emperour and the Venetians, supposed that there was nothing which would sooner cause him to obtaine his desire, then to purchase the friendship of Soliman (which he had already practized) whereby he did hope to enforce the Venetians, either to take his part, or at least to abstaine from following that of the Emperour, the causes being very great and many which did moue the Venetians to make high account of Soliman's authority, and on the other side, by causing the Turkish army to passe ouer into Puglia, or to other places of the Emperors obedience, hee did thinke to diuert his forces and greatly to weaken his defence for the State of Milan.

The King then turned all his designses towards the Port of the great Turke, where not-withstanding that Iohn Ferriol was his Ambassador, hee did besides, send thither Dom Zeraphin de Gozi of Ragusa, with new and more important instructions, and great promises. These two, being often in company of the Bascha of most authority, propounded diuers matters, which being reported to Soliman, might easily induce him to grant the Kings demands: as the Emperors greatness the which if it were not moderated, would become fearefull, or at least to bee suspected of all other Potentates, with diminuation, if not of their States, yet certainly of their reputation and greatness: the facility of the enterprize, there being but a small space of Sea for the transportation of the Turkish army from Albiana to Otranto, and at one time to scoure the Sea coast of that country: The great discontent of the inhabitants of that country with the Spanish government and especially of the chiefeest of them, who as desperate persons would embrace all occasions to open the way to higher enterprizes which might abate the Emperors authority. Alex Lisibei was at the same time in great authority in the Port of the great Turke, holding the place and gard of first Bascha, a mighty enemy to Christians, and who since the death of Ibrahim had often perswaded Soliman to turne his forces vpon Christendome. This man because hee would not lose the occasion, and praying the ouertures, and propositions of the French Ambassadors, propounded them with much amplification to Soliman, vsing all meanes to incite him to the enterprize of Italy, laying before him the example of Mabomet, a discreet and valliant Prince, who with fortunate successe did easily take the city of Otranto, and by his arrivall did bring that whole country to extreame confusion opening him selfe a way for the conquest of Italy, one of the excellentest countries of Europe, had he not beene prevented by death.

These things being represented to Soliman, did greatly preuaill with him, who did couet glory, and was full of pride, supposing him selfe to be highly honored, in that so great a King did send to craue his aide and assistance, against another most mighty Prince his enemy, and hee was like-wise glad that so faire an occasion was offered to diuert him from the enterprizes of India and Persia, where hee vnprofitably consumed his army: where vpon hee did on a suddaine consent to promise the French Ambassador, that the next sommer hee would raise great forces both by Sea and Land, to enuade the Emperors dominions.

But about all other things, supposing it to be most necessary to separate the Venetians from the Emperor, hee resolved to send Iannashei one of the Dragomans or interpreters of his Port, to exhort the Senate, that hee being to march with a mighty army, it would shew it selfe a friend to his friends, and enemy to his enemies, promising them, that he would take order that nothing should be hurt which did belong vnto them.

The King
sends an Ambassador to Venice, to draw them
from the Em-perors

The King
sends to the Turke against the Em-perors

The manner which the French Ambassadors propounded to Soliman against
the Emperor.

Alex Bascha
perswades Soliman to make warre in Italy.

Soliman consents to make warre vpon
the Emperor.

Soliman ad-uerteth the Venetians of his determination.

The Venetian
answers to Soli-man.

The Senate did forthwith answer this proposition. That the republike had ever made great account and deere reckoning of peace with al Princes, and especially with the Lords of the Ottomans family, with whom having of a long time contracted peace and frendship, with a free commerce betwixt each others subiects they did at this present retaine the same desire to continue it more then euer, whereof there was no need to make any more ample declaration.

It seemed that Soliman was wel content and satisfied with this answer, who was a Prince (if these qualities may be found in a Barbarian) of a goodly vnderstanding, and a friend to iustice and honour: but diuers of his seruants being desirous for their owne interest and particular affection to disturbe this quiet, and to break this peace, setting forward by a false complaint, the actions of sundry officers of the Common-wealth, who, (as they affirmed) had borne small respect to the maiesty and profit of his Empire, did perswade him to permit his officers likewise to vse some practises against the Common wealth of Venice; that at last the matter might be brought to an open warre; this being permitted diuers Venetian Marchants that were at Constantinople and other places of his Empire by reason of their particular affaires, were vnder sundry false pretences committed to prison and their goods confiscate: after that, two Venetian shippes vpon diuers occasions were stayed, the one belonging to Andrew Contarent taken vpon the Sea of Cyprus, by the Gallies of the Garrison of Rhodes as a man of warre, and the other in the haue of Alexandria, Soliman saying that he would vse them in his most important affaires: The marchandize besides which the Venetians were wont to bring forth of Syria had an imposition layd on them of tenne in the hundred: the Baillies letters to the Senate were oftentimes intercepted, and without further dissembling their meaning, Mustapha, one of the cheefe Baschas complaining of them told them, that because they were so streightly allied to the Emperor their enemy, they had incurred the hatred and indignation of Soliman.

Why thus doe
the Venetians
in Solimans Dominions.

This gaue him some iust occasion to resent it, and some colour of a lawfull warre, if he had beene disposed thereunto, notwithstanding that diuers other reasons and coniectures did testifie vnto them the contrary, for it was not likely that the Turke being able to make warre vpon the Emperor alone, (who was not very strong at Sea), and easily to breake his forces, would enforce the Venetians to ioyne with the Imperialls and to vnite their forces with theirs, which being mighty at Sea, would not only hinder his enterprizes against the states of other men, but likewise greatly endanger his owne, knowing very well that for the space of eight and thirty yeares, the friendship and peace betwixt them had beene on both sides so carefully obserued, and namely that Soliman had euer made shew, both in his wordes and actions, to desire nothing so much as the Venetians friendship: That since then nothing had happened on the Venetians part, that might alter that quiet, or enforce them to take armes, seeing that the Senate discreetly measuring the forces of the Ottoman Empire, and fitting their desseignes and actions to the condition of the times, did with great honor and respect proceed in the Turkes behalfe, provided that the dignity of the Common-wealth might not therein receiue any preiudice, temporising the best they could with so mighty an enemy, whom being not able to assaile, they thought it wisely done to keepe him for their friend, and to expect the commodity of time, or some better fortune of the Common-wealth. At the same time Tomazo Moceniga, Ambassador for the Common-wealth arrived at Constantinople being sent according to the manner to reioyce with Soliman in the name of the Senate for the happy successe of his warres in Persia, and for his safe returne home to the City. He hauing kissed Solimans hands, and presented his viuall gifts of rich garments, he was well receiued and entertained of all those of the Port, and particularly of Alix the Visier Bascha, whose did often-times assure him that their Lord did beare great good-will the Republike, and was very desirous to maintaine that ancient peace peace and friendship with it, so long as the Venetians should beare them-selues in his behalfe with the like offices of friendship: That Soliman had euer vled to keepe his word and promise, and thought they ought not feare that hee would euer doe other wise. Therefore hee began modestly to excuse the matter concerning Contarens shippe, and other things done to the Venetian Marchants and their marchandize, as matters happened without the great Turkes expresse commandement, and which should be speedily remedied.

The B. thus excuses.

There was then a report at that time, how that the Sophy of Persia had taken armes, and that hee would shortly be in the field whereby the Turkes would be enforced to turne their forces vpon Persia: And that the rumor which was current, how that the Turkes had an enterprize vpon Christendome, was rather to maintaine their reputation among Christian Princes, then for any desire they had at that time to employ their forces against them.

The end of the tenth Booke of the fifth Decade.

The Contents of the first Booke of the sixth Decade.

30 THE Turke maketh great preparations both by Sea and land to enuade Christendome. The Venetians are enforced to arme, and to stand vpon their guard. The French Kings desseigns vpon Italy. The Imperialls are afraid of the Turkish Army. Count Guy de Rancon commeth to Venice, being sent thither by the French King, and is answered quite contrary to his expectation.

Three sundry accidents are cause of warre betwixt the Venetians and Soliman. The Venetians flee by force of wind cast vpon the Coast of Puglia, where that of the turkes lay. The Venetian fleet being retired from Puglia, Soliman declareth himselfe their enemy. Doria his pollicy to enforce the Venetians to ioyne with him. The Bailly Canalis aduisech the Senat to reconcile them-selues to Soliman. The Venetian Marchants are stayed, and their goods seized on ouer all Solimans Empire. Barbarotia wasteth the Isle of Corfu. The description of the Isle of Corfu. The Venetians determine to fight with the Turke. A league contracted betwixt the Emperor, the Pope, and the Venetians. Doria his delays, and in the end his refusal to ioyne with the Venetians against the Turkes. The Venetians are constant to assaile the Turkes, notwithstanding that Doria had forsaken them. The Visier Bascha counelleth Soliman to raise his campe from before Corfu hauing viewed the place. Soliman seeketh the Venetians friendship.

The seeger raised from before Corfou. Soliman determineth to assaile Naples of Romagna, and Maluesia. Barbarossa his incursions vpon the Venetians Islands. The Venetians take the Isle of Scardonā. The Emperor although hee affirmed that hee would make warre vpon the Turkes, is suspected of the contrary. The Popes diligence to atone the Emperor and the French King. Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning either warre or peace with Soliman. And lastly the Emperors Ambassador goeth about to breake the Venetians Neutrality, but in vaine.

10

20

The First Booke of the sixth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

Sund. reports concerning the Turkish army.

HE Venetians by the Salbas speech, remayning irresolute and in doubt either of warre or peace, were greatly troubled, wherein the French Ambassador did by a maruelous cunning entertaine them, hoping thereby to cause them to condescend to his Kings desires, to ioyne them-selues with the French, and to abandon the Imperials friendship, assuring them that if they would so doe, to shield them from all danger on the Turkes behalfe.

30

In the meane time sundry rumors were bruted in Constantinople, some affirming that those great preparations for the fleet, was to passe into Puglia, and others said that it was to enter into the Venetian Gulph, there to assaile what-so-euer it could finde to belong vnto the Emperor: others thought that it was for Barbary, according to the aduise of Cariadine Barbarossa, and others like-wise did threaten the Venetians, naming particularly the Isle of Corfou.

40

These preparations were as great by land as by sea, and made with great speed, so as it was certainly thought, that hee would set forth more then three hundred saile, with great store of ordnance, war like engines, and great quantity of all fortes of munition.

The Venetians being troubled with these preparations, and for diuers occasions suspecting the Turkes faith, nor with standing that the league made of a long time with Soliman did still continue, resolved likewise to arme as fast as they could, supposing that there was no safer meane to assure their affaires, then to stand vpon their gard for feare of being surprized. Therefore they beganne to make great prouisions for warre, and leauied on a sodaine eight thousand footemen to re-enforce their garrisons: they did trimme their old Gallies, and gaue order to build fifty new ones, they stayed some Venetians, and strangers that were bound for sondry voyages, to make vse of them for the carriage of the munitions and other necessaries for the fleet determining if dangers did increase to arme the number of an hundred Gallies, and for that purpose, they chose for Generall according to their vsual manner, by way of lotte, in the Councell of the Preguais Ieronimo Pefare, a man very skilfull in the affaires of the common-wealth, and chiefly in sea businesse, who was afterwards allowed by the great Councell. But that which among other matters did most trouble them was the care from whence to haue meanes to furnish the expences which they were to make, their 10 treasure being wholly exhausted by the late warres, whereby they were to inuent sundry extraordinary deuises, to get money speedily. They created three Procurators of Saint Marke, which is one of the chiefe dignities in the common-wealth next to the Duke, namely Andrew Capello, Ieronimo Bragadino, Iacomo Cornaro who did each of them aide the Republike with twelue thousand crowns, they did afterwards entreat the Pope to permit them to raise two hundred thousand Ducats vpon the Clergy of their state, which the Pope making great difficulty to graunt, alleging sometimes the Clergies poverty, and then that he could not beleue that Soliman did intend to march against Christendome, they were enforced to raise it some where else, and amid these troubles and perplexities of 20 mind, they did not forget following the holy and religious institution of their Forefathers, to haue recourse chiefly to diuine assistance, whereupon sollemne prayers were commanded to be made in all Churches & foure hundred measures of wheate were giuen to the poore Friars, to pray to God that it would please him to fauour the good and deuout affection of the Councillors of the State.

50

The Venetians
preparations to stand vpon their guard against the Turke.

The Senates
curie furnish meanes for the expences of warre.

The Imperials were in no lesse care and trouble to be assured of the Turkish forces, wherevpon they caused great numbers of Spanish footmen to passe into Italy, to lye in Garrison in the Realmes of Sicill and Naples, and in other places exposed to the enemies artuall; they sent word to Andrew Doria Prince of Melfi, who at the same time was Admiral for the Emperor on the Mediterranean 30 seas, that he should speedily make ready his Gallies, and come into the kingdome to ioyne with those of Naples Sicilly, and the religion of Malta, to command there. But these prouisions being weake were not sufficient to resist the Turkish forces. For the Emperor was at the same time enforced to looke to the defense of his other Estates which the French King determined to invade, who for that purpose was come to Lyons, from whence he had sent before him into Italy fifteen thousand Almaine and Gascon footmen, wherupon the Emperor, to diuert these desires, raised in his Countrey of Flanders an army of twenty thousand footmen, and eight thousand horse, to enter vpon the Frontiers of France.

Imperial's
affaid of the Turkish army

The King
with so Lyons to go into France.

Now that which most hindered them from providing for the imminent dangers threatened by the Turkes, were the rumors which were spread abroad, how that the French had an enterprize vpon Genoa, where the Genowaies, being affrighted, did boldly tell Doria that they could not suffer him to abandon his countrey, nor to carry the Gallies from thence, which were the sinewes of the Imperiall army, because that the two and twenty spanish Gallies that lay at Barcelona were in bad equippage to put to Sea. During these contentions betwixt the Princes of Christendome, the Turke taking his aduantage thereby (as hee had done at sundry times to molest Christendome, departed with his land army about the beginning of March and came to Andrinople, where hauing remained a while, and spent some small time in hunting whilst other prouisions were 50 made for his journey, he went from thence about the latter end of Iune, and came to Scopia a City of Macedon, and then tooke his way through the confines of Albania. His naual army departed at the same time forth of the Streight of Galipolis, to the number of more then three hundred saile, (as hath beene said) whereof, two hundred were Gallies, and the residue, Galeots, Fusts, and

The Genoese forbid Doria to carry the Galleys out of Genoa.

other lesser vessels, vnder the command of Lusti Bascha Captaine Generall, who represented the great Turke person: it was not certainly knowne what commission he had, nor whether he would bend his course: some said that hee was commanded to assaile the Venetians, if occasions were offered: others affirmed the contrary, saying, That hee was commanded in no sort to touch any thing that belonged vnto them: but the common report was, that he went to inuade Puglia.

Doria in the meane time, being come to Ciuitauechia, and finding the Popes Gallies to be ready there wen to the Ear of Messina, there to make a fleet of the Gallies of Naples, Sicill, and other places and perceiuing, that when they were all ioyned together, they were to weak to resist the Turkish forces, determined, (after that he had left the greatest part of the Gallies in places of safety) to saile towards the Lenant with a few light Gallies, which he made choise of, to molest in some fort, (occasion being offered) any thing that did belong to the Turkes, auoyding by all means to meet with their fleet. The Venetians hauing notice of the arrivall of the Turkish fleet at Modon, being yet vncertaine whether, or with what commission it sailed, did, not without great doubt consult in the Senate what the Generall Pessare were best to doe, who was already arrived at Corfou with threescore and tenne Gallies.

The Generall had not till then received any other commissions then generall, and comfortable to the Senates intention, still to remaine neuter, namely to hold amity with the Imperials, and with the Turkes, to preserve whatsoever did belong to the Common-wealth from wrong, to giue victuals freely to both of them: to auoyd all occasions of suspition, and to keepe themselves farre off from the Fleets: wherevnto they added, that he should still keepe his fleet together, and not, if it were possible, leaue the Gulph to the discretion of the Turkes, lest they should hinder the Dalmatian Gallies, and others which were making ready at Venice, from ioyning with them, if need should bee.

The opinions in this Councell were very different (as it often happeneth in such consultations) what he had more to doe, but at last they resolved to referre the whole matter to the diligence and discretion of the Generall, because it was an hard matter well to provide for the sundry accidents which might happen, according to which, Captaines did for the most part vse to gouerne themselves. They only concluded to diuide the Army, and to create another Generall, of lesse authority then Pessare, so as both of them being together Pessare, should haue the sole command, and the other was to remaine in the Gulph, whilst Pessare should be at Corfou, or any where else.

Giovann Vituri was by the common consent of euery one appointed for this place, who was in great account both for his wisdom and valour. This man hauing taken speedy order for his voyage, departed from Venice with some armed Gallies of the latter Gouernours, and sailed into Dalmatia, where there came vnto him, Francesco Pascalic the Prouidator, with certaine Gallies which were at Corfou, Nicholas Bonidimiero Captaine of the Gulph, and Dominico Contaren Captaine of the Fusts, so that Vituri had six and forty Gallies vnder his command, besides six Fusts, and the Generall Pessare had foure and fifty Gallies, one Gallion commanded by Bertucci Contaren, and a great shippe of warre gouerned by Iacomo Armisero.

Now within a while after there arose among the Senators a doubt almost like the former, by reason of the report that was spread abroad how that the Turkish Fleet was comming into the Ile of Corfou, and that they had already desiered it from the Ile of Zante, sailing thitherwards amayne, some thinking it fit thereupon to keepe the fleet diuided, others refusing this opinion, said that they ought to permit the Generall Pessare, if he should find it expedient for the Common-wealth, to make a fleet of all the Gallies; and to Command Vituri, that if Pessare should send to him for that purpose, to obey him without expecting any other expresse com-

The vncertaine course of the Turkish fleet, doubtlesse the Venetians in doubt.

The Venetians remaine neuter betwixt the Imperials and the Turkes

A second Generall created at Venice.

John Vituri created second Generall.

Member of the Venetian senate at Sea.

commandement from the Senate. Diuers did likewise reiect this opinion, for many reasons, and propounded for the safest course (if that the peace with Soliman were broken) to ioyn their forces with the Imperials (who had already sought it at their hands) and that, as soone as might bee; for the more easie defense of Corfou. This proposition being reiected like the rest, they at last concluded to referre the whole matter to Pessare, who might ioyn with Doria if need should be.

The French being aduertized of all these difficulties, and hoping to be able by new practices to induce the Venetians to consent to that, wherevnto till then they would neuer harken, did forthwith send the Count Guy de Rangone to Venice, who being brought in before the councill of Tenne (the French Ambasadour not being present) who afterwards did the like a part by himselfe, hauing presented his letters of credit from the King, beganne with great eloquence to declare the great good will which King Francis did beare to their Republike, and how highly he did esteeme it, then he did put them in minde of diuers and sundry things which the French Kings had done, for the maintenance and stay of that common wealth; from thence falling vpon the sundry and particular accidents of those times, he did perswade them to abandon the Emperours alliance, and to embrace that of the French King, offering them from him and by his commandement the city of Cremona, and all the country of Gyracade, so, as by their common armies the State of Milan might be conquered, promising them besides, all aide and assistance to reduce the Cities of Rauenna and Cerua vnder their obedience, with the territories of Puglia, Otranto, Brundisium, Monopoli, Polignan, and Trani, by which means they should be restored to all that which they had enioyed before the last warres. But hee did especially insift very much vpon the miserable condition of the time, which was to bee considered, promising to defend and shield them, by his Kings meanes and authority, from all those perills and dangers which threatned them from the Turkes to their owne honour and reputation.

This proposition being vttered with great vehemency did greatly trouble the mindes of the Auditors, for on the one side, great and faire hopes were propounded with equall recompences, and yet not without warre, and great trauaile; on the other side an incertenty of peace, with as many difficulties, did present it selfe before them, the selfe same dangers remayning still in force, made far greater by the French Kings indignation, if he should perceiue his friendship, with such goodly offers to be so often contemned and set as nought.

The Senate being assembled therevpon, the Collodge of the wise men, hauing determined to tell the Count Rangone, that the Senate did first of all thanke him for his great and notable offers made vnto them, then, concerning the vinton which he propounded, that the King might haue perceiued by their actions past, what account they had euer made, and now more then euer of the Councill of France, to the which they had neuer bene wanting, nor would euer faile when occasion should be offered, earnestly requesting the King so to hold and beleue it: one onely person, Marke Antonio Cornare, a man, at that time highly esteemed, for his eloquence and great reputation, though he were not very old, being of a contrary opinion, would haue them freely to answer the Count Rangone, That the common-wealth had euer vied to keepe her promise inuolably, which was a matter worthy and becomming a Prince, and that therefore the same being vnited with the Emperour by a new confederacy, could not harken to any other contrary therevnto: but they did hope that the King, as a wise and most Christian Prince, and their friend, would not for all that discontinue the good offices which he had already begunne in their behalfe towards the Turke: and he did constantly maintaine this opinion by a vehement and perswasive oration; wherevpon he was attentiuely heard, and commended of all men. So soone as he had ended,

The French King sendeth Count Guy de Rangone to Venice.

The Councill of the Count Ran on his oration to the Senate.

Proposition in the Senate for the answering of the Count Rangone.

Antonio Cornare repugneth the former proposition.

Rancon is answered according to the opinion of Cornare.

Leonardo Eme one of the wise men of the council, a man of authority, and well experienced in matters of importance both at home and abroad, rose vp, and began to answer to euery point of Cornares speech: But neither his authority nor all the reasons which he alledged to the contrary, could keepe them from answering Rancon in the same manner as Cornare had propounded.

In the meane time newes were brought to Venice how that the Turkish fleet was arriued at Valona, and that passing along thorow the Channel of Corfou, it had saluted the castle with ordnance shot in signe of friendship, according to the vse and manner of warre, that the castle had in friendly sort giuen them the like salutation: and how that Soliman had neither in that Island nor else where committed any hostile action; but that certaine things, being forcibly taken from some of the Republikes subiects, had bene restored to them, and the Robbers, for terror to the rest, had bene hanged vpon the saile yardes of his galley. Some Senators were of opinion, that the Generall Pesare, in acknowledgement thereof, and vnder pretence of peace and friendship, should send some captaine of his Gallies to Soliman, to vse meanes to discover some of his designs; but it was reiected, for feare least the Turkes would interpret it sinisterly to their advantage, and least the reputation of the Venetian forces should thereby be diminished with them, or else giue them some occasion to make some great and vnreasonable demand: but they were within a while after freed off that care, by newes that they receiued, how that Iacomo Canalis, going to Constantinople to execute the office of Baili in steed of Nicola Iustinian, and being come to Nouobazar, was by Solimans commandment brought backe to the campe who could satisfie them in all things. At this day stood the Venetians affaires at that time, neither at open warre, nor assured peace, all matters being full of feare and suspition, when as vnluckily and vnlooked for, three sundry accidents happened which did cast the Republike head-long into warre with Soliman. The first was that of Simon Nassef the Zaratine, who commanding a Dalmatian Galley, did vnfortunatly meet with a small Turkish vessell laden with victuals which was going to Valona, against which (because it would not obey a certaine signall according to the manner of navigation, nor strike her sailes) he discharged a cannon and sunke it. Although this fact did greatly trouble Solimans haughty courage, and all his Bashas, yet neuerthelesse making shew to beare it patiently because he would not perhaps at that time interrupt his other designs, he determined to send Iannusbei the Dragoman to Corfou to complain to the Generall Pesare, how that thorow the insolency of a meane captaine of a Galley, the peace betwixt them had bene violated and infringed, and to demand to haue the author thereof punished, and the damages, amounting to more then thirty thousand Ducats, to be repaired. Vpon the neck thereof the second accident happened. There were foure captains of gallies at the same time at the garge of the channel of Corfou, to wit, Iusto Gradonico, Micacle Grimali, Iacomo de Mezza, and Ieremino Micacle: these men so soone as they perceiued those armed vessels to come towards them, which were two Gallies and one Fust, conducting the Turkish Ambassador, without taking any farther notice of them, they fiercely charged them, so as the Turkes being amazed betooke themselves to flight, and supposing that they could not so one enough escape from them, failed as fast as they could to Cimera, a barbarous nation and enemy to the Turkes: wherevpon, they were badly entreated there, and all of them committed to prison, and among the rest this Iannusbei. This exploit did greatly discontent the Generall Pesare who in some sort to moderate the fact, did sodainly send Francisco Zene captaine of a Galley to Cimera, to vse meanes with a good sum of money to redeeme Iannusbei, the which for the Republikes sake he soone obtained without money. This being likewise brought to Solimans knowledge, he was provoked by some of his seruants to take speedy reuenge thereof, yet neuerthelesse hee would not for that time harken thereunto, but sent for the Baili Canalis to come before him, vnto whom he greatly complained

Three sundry accidents caused war betwixt Soliman and the Venetians.

Soliman discontent for the first accident.

The second accident worse then the first.

complained of the officers of the Republike, who did not dayly cease to commit deeds cleare contrary to the desire of peace and good will, which he had at his arriual assured him that the Common-wealth did beare vnto him, at the last he seemed to be content that the Baylife should expressly send some of his seruants to Corfou, truly and particularly to vnderstand how matters had passed, wherevpon he sodainly sent Alessandro Pisino thither who was then with him.

Soliman in the meane time continuing his purpose to assaile the coast of Puglia, caused great number of horse to be landed on the territory of Ottanto, who scouring the whole country brought away men, women, and all sort of cattail, with other moueables, filling the whole country with feare and terror.

Doria in the mean time having manned eight and twenty light gallies with soldiers and mariners, comming to scour the seas neare to Zante and Zeffalonia, rooke diuers Turkish vessels, which being laden with victuals, were going to Valona, then sayling towards the Gulphe he arriued vpon the sea of Corfou, at the very same instant in a manner, that Iannusbei being chased by the Venetian Gallies, landed at Cimera, whereby he had his part in the booty, and carried away the empty Turkish vessels, which did much encrease the Turkes hatred to the Venetians, and made them to suspect that they had some secret intelligence with the Imperials.

The Generall Pesare being aduertized of Barbarossas departure from the confines of Zant, where he had remayned to assure the victuals which came from Constantinople to the campe, and of his sayling towards Corfou, did thinke it a very fit occasion for himselfe to make vse of the liberty which the Senate had giuen him, to ioyne both the fleets together, wherevpon he resolved to enter into the Gulphe and to ioyne with the Generall Vitturi, meaning neuerthelesse by all meanes to auoid meeting with the Turkish gallies: But being on his way, and driven by a contrary winde, he was carried to sea-ward before the winde, to those quarters where he was to meet with that which he had most of all auoided: for hauing failed a long time with the whole fleet, and about night being come neere to land, he was counselled to anchor there, to passe the rest of the night, which was so darke, as they could not discover a farre off, which gaue occasion to the third accident. For it fell out, that the vanguard consisting of fiteene Gallies, conducted by Alessandro Contaren the Prouditor, did vnawares strike vpon a Turkish galley (this was an Imperial galley, prepared for the great Turke, if hee should desire to come to sea, and was commanded by Bassan Rais) those within it hauing, in the Italian tongue, demanded of the Venetians, whose vessel that was which was so neere them, and they replying that it belonged to the Venetians, did aske them the selfe same question, who they were, but they making no answer, vsed all meanes to escape thence, and then on a sodaine shot off a peece of ordnance: Contaren being then moued with disdain, and spurred forward by a zeale to honour and reputation, notwithstanding that the darkenesse of the night would not suffer him to discern any thing, did neuerthelesse redouble the banks of Rowers, and followed that Turkish galley, which had plaid an enemies part, and after a long fight, there being more then three hundred souldiers in it, he became Master thereof, by the death of all the Turkes, some few excepted who had hid themselves.

Contaren was by some reprehended for this deed as though being carried away by a particular desire of reuenge, he had enterprized that which he knew to be against the commodity and seruice of the common-wealth, by executing that hostile act vpon the Turkes: yet neuerthelesse others in excusing him said, That he had more then any man else foreseene all those disorders; by meanes whereof, to auoid all occasions, he demanded to haue the army conducted into Candy, seeing that the Turkes had passed as friends thorow the Channell of Corfou.

The Generall after this exploit passing forwards on his way, came very nere

Doria his incursions caused the Turkes to suspect the Venetians.

The winde carried Pesare with all the Venetian forces neere to those of the Turkes.

The third accident occasioned by the taking of Solimans Gallies.

The Venetian fleet upon the coast of Puglia.

The confusion of the Venetians
as they were in law that of the Turkes to be nere them.

The Venetian fleet lo-sets four Gallies taken by the Turkes.

Soliman resolveth to make warre on the Venetians.

Doria his policy to enforce the Venetians to signe with him.

Cavalie commanded by Soliman to sent to the Venetian
Senate.

to the coast of Puglia, where they defied an infinite number of fiers, and heard at the same time sundry shot of ordnance. I hey thought at the first that it had bene those of the country, who having defied the Venetian fleet, and not knowing what vessels they were, did give warning to the inhabitants round about to retire themselves into the strong townes: but they soone found the contrary, for it was a warning to the Turkes that were there, speedily to embarke themselves (as they did) and to fall into order of battaile before the Venetian fleet.

Then was there great confusion in the Venetian army for the vnhopd for arrivall of the Turkish gallies; on the one side danger was very nere, and their doubt very great, whether they were best to escape by flight, or dispose themselves to battaile. Flight seemed dishonorable, and of small profit: to fight, was against the Senates expresse command, the which they were to observe, and not on the vncertaine event of a battaile, and to their owne disadvantage hazard the gallies, on which depended the whole defense and safety of their Estate by sea.

Matters remaying in this confusion by reason of these irresolutions, either to abide, or to be gonne, it happened that when the Generall commanded to turne the Prowes, and to returne towards Corfou, it was done in a manner in disorder, so as all of them preparing with speed to get forth of that danger, fiew Venetian gallies tarried behind, either because they had not soone enough turned their Prowes, or for that they were not so light as the others, foure of them fell into the Turkes hands, who soone after, by declaring himselfe their enemy, did inhumainely put the foure captaines to death which commanded them, as for the fifth which was commanded by Giovann Baptista Mirrhonich of Pago, al-be it it was farther behinde then any of the rest, did neuertheless by chance escape that danger, for carrying in her flag the crescent or half moone, they thought it to be a Turkish galley, and thereby, being not medled with, it found meanes afterward to escape to Otranto.

Now this latter exploit caused Soliman wholly to resolve to make warre vpon the Signory of Venice, who was before that time halfe-minded so to doe by reason of the precedent actions, whereby he perceived the small affection that the Venetians did beare vnto him: his seruants likewise the more to animate him therewith, did agravaite the matter; and afterwards, a letter of Doria written to Pesare coming to his hands, assured him of that which he most doubted: Doria had (as it was thought) forged that letter, and found meanes to haue it fall into the Turkes hands, to make them beleue that he had some secret intelligence with the Venetians, and by that means to set them at odds, thereby enforcing them for their safety to ioyne with him, for the which purpose, passing along at the same time almost nere to Corfou, he had craued conference with the Generall Pesare, meaning expressly more then once to hold long discourse, that he might cause the Turkes to enter into some suspicion.

All these exploits being knowne at Venice did greatly trouble the Senate, where the opinions neuertheless were different, some blaming the indiscretion of those who by their rashnesse had throwne the common-wealth head-long into a great and dangerous warre, contrary to the Senates intentions, others, publickly affirming the contrary said, that they had done wel and discreetly, according to the rule and discipline of sea affaires, and the reputation of their army, and after sundry other reasons propounded on both sides, they concluded to tarry for advertizements from the Bailly, to vnderstand particularly in what manner the Turke had taken those things which were past: and all their determinations against those who had offended, were deferred till then.

The Bailly within a while after, by Solimans commandement sent Alessandro Pr-sino, who did wholly resolve them of all that they desired to know, and sent them word, sharply to punish those who had violated and broken the peace, and to make it apparent that whatsoever had bene done was not by the Senates will

or

or consent, and that by so doing, Alex the Visir Basha, did put them in hope of the continuance of the peace. Vpon this aduertisement they resolved to write to the Generall to send the Zaratine captaine, Iusto Gradonico who commanded those Gallies that were for the gard of the Channell of Corfou when Ianusius was pursued, with all the rest whom he should thinke had offended in that action, with their legs and hands bound to Venice: as for the Prouidator Contaren they commanded him to saile with his Galley to Zara, where leaving both it and his office, he should come to Venice and present himselfe before the Magistrate of the Auogario. Some of the Senators were of opinion to call home the General Pesare likewise, for to purge himselfe of that matter, because that all errors committed in warre are to be attributed to the Generall who holdeth the soueraine authority, they supposing, that if the Generall had punished the Zaratine, all the other inconueniences would not afterwards haue happened, and that therefore he was guilty thereof: that the peace with the Turke was of such importance to the Common-wealth, that all other respects were not to be compared to it besides, in regard that the whole fleet was to remaine still together, there was no need to haue so many Generals, who for the most part doe cause disorder in affaires of importance, rather then any good government.

The Senate not consenting to call home the Generall did send backe Pr-sino to the Bailly, and yet they would not haue Soliman at that time to be acquainted with that which had bene concluded against the Prouidator, and the captaines of the gallies, because they would not haue the Turkes to thinke that what they had decreed, was done rather to satisfie them, then for their loue to iustice. Therefore they enioyned the Bailly to demonstrate the Senates found and sincere affection, and how desirous the Venetians were to continue their friendship and peace with Soliman; and that for the better testimony thereof, they would shortly send an expresse messenger vnto him with particular instructions of what had passed, and within a while after, Vincenzo Grimani, Procurator of Saint Mark, was chosen for that purpose.

But before Pr-sino came backe with his instructions to Valona, Soliman, who after the taking of Castro had beleegged Otranto, being spurred forward by disdain and by Barbarossas pursutes, notwithstanding that he had promised the Bailly to attempt nothing til Pr-sinos returne, did neuertheless determin to returne to Valona, and to turne all his forces both by sea and land against the Venetians, and especially to assaile the Island and fort of Corfou, it being at the same time very commodious for him.

It is reported that Alex the visir Basha, sought by soundry reasons to diuert Soliman from this resolution, by shewing him that in so doing he would encrease the Imperials forces, who were deadly enemies to the Ottomans, with whom the Venetians should be enforced to ioyne for their owne defense and safety: besides, that the yeere being already very farre spent (for it was the latter end of August) would not suffer him to beginne any long or difficult enterprize: that the campe did already want victuals, by reason that Doria had taken so many small vessels laden with victuals: But Barbarossa being greatly incensed for that Doria had taken and sunke twelue of his Gallies at the Merleres, sought to reuenge himselfe vpon the Venetians, saying that it was They, who had giuen meanes, and aduised the Imperials to assaile his Gallies nere to the Channell of Corfou, and in their fight almost, hauing secret intelligence with their enemies, furnishing them with hauens, victuals and all other commodities, so as by these reasons he caused Soliman to condiscend to his counsell.

Now so soone as he had resolved to make warre vpon the Venetians, he wrote to all places of the Ottoman Empire, where the Venetians had most trafficke, that they should imprison their persons, and seize vpon their goods, and especially at Alexandria, whither three great Gallies were come vpon his word.

Soliman

The Senates
resolution vpon the Bailles advertisment

The Senates
answer to the Bailly.

Soliman resolveth to make warre vpon the Venetians.

The visir
Basha in reusion to diuert him from his resolution.

The Venetians
are imprisoned & their goods seize vpon all the Turkish Empire.

Soliman came in the meane time from La Valona to Butrintotto, right ouer against Corfou, the more commodiously to passe ouer his forces from thence into the Island. Barbareffa was already gon thither with part of the flecte and some thousand horse to spoile and scoure the country (which he did.)

Description of the Isle of Corfu.

The newes thereof being brought to Venice (which they had before that time suspected) did greatly trouble all men: for notwithstanding that the castle of Corfou was thought to be strong enough to sustaine all the furious attempts of the Turkes, they neuerthelesse feared, that they should not long be able to resist so mighty an enemy, and defend their owne State exposed in so many sundry places to his mercy. The Isle of Corfou lieth right ouer against the Venetian Gulphe betwixt the Ionian and Adriatick sea, on the North side thereof lieth the coast of Albania, from whence it is some two miles distant, and stretcheth it selfe from the West to the East in manner of a Cressent or halfe Moone, fauing that in the midst, the inward part thereof breaking betwixt the great arch maketh it like two Semicircles, it being in circuit a hundred and twenty miles; that space of sea which lieth betwixt the Island and the firme land, is commonly called the Channell of Corfou. The aire there is very good, and soile fertile enough, there being diuers goodly plaines on the Northside. The towne is seated almost in the midst of the Island, within it, vpon the sea, at the foote of an hil which in a manner doth wholly enuiron it, it is of a sufficient bignesse, and inhabited, and there were in it at the same time aboute eight thousand persons: but the castle is of no great circuit, nor capable of containyng great store of people, but for the situation thereof, most safe against all the assaults of enemies; it hath two fortes in a very high place vpon the point of the hill, which doe not alone beate vpon all sides of the towne walles, and castle, but discouraging likewise the sea, and the vallies and neighbour Mountaines, can with their ordnance keepe any army from encamping there, but with great danger. There is no other towne or castle in the whole Island, but diuers country houses scattered here and there in the Champaine: yet neuerthelesse on the South side thereof, vpon an hill, there is a castle called Saint Angelo, stronger by situation then by art.

The number of souldiers and munition in the Island.

This Island had belonged to the Venetians more then an hundred and fifty yceres, and they did carefully keepe it, as most fit for the conseruation of their dominion at sea, it being accounted the Bulwarke of Italy against the forces of Barbarians: Babon di Nalda was gouernor thereof, being accompanied with diuers Venetian Gentlemen. There was a strong garrison of Italian souldiers in the castle to the number of two thousand, and as many of those of the Island all good souldiers: and besides the Rowers of foure Gallies which were left there for the gard of the Island, great store of artillery and munition; and for the auoiding of all confusion, euery man knew what he had to doe, which made them without any feare at all to attend the arriuall of the enemies army.

*The Senate
determineth to fight with the enemy.*

The Senate fearing a long seerge, and the sinister accidents which do commonly accompany it, did resolute to fight with the enemy to cause him to raise his campe, being invited thereunto by sundry reasons, because they knew first, that so long as the Turkish fleet should remaine whole, furnishing the campe with men, of whom they had great numbers, that the Isle of Corfou and all the rest should remaine exposed to infinite dangers, not for any other cause then the long continuance of the warre, all the forces of the Republike being consumed and they in danger besides, to loose some portion of their dominions: next, that which did incite them to hazard the fortune of a battaile, was, their owne great fleet of an hundred strong gallies, with the meanes to encrease it, because they would not vnprofitably consume the great expences of such a warlike preparation: but that which did most animate them to this resolution, was their hope to be speedily releued by the other Christian Princes, according to their offers and promises so often reiterated at what time they should enterprize any thing thing against the Turke, especially of the Pope and the Emperour; and not to accept of them at that time, the Commonwealth should seeme wholly to haue forgotten her owne safety, and that of all Christendome.

*The forces of the Imperialls,
and the Pope.*

The Imperialls had fifty light gallies at sea, with as many other great armed vessels, the Pope had foure gallies there, and the Knights of Malta some other. These forces being ioyned to theirs, they hoped to chase away the Turkish fleet, and if they could not free Corfou from the seerge, yet at least to open a way to some great and notable exploit, wherevpon, hauing certaine notice that the enemies army was come to Corfou, and thereby warre declared against them, they determined to write to Marke Antonio Contareu their Ambassadour in the Court of Rome, that in speaking particularly of this businesse to the Pope, together with the Senates resolution, he should declare vnto him the greatnesse of the danger, in the common cause of Christendome, and the speed which it behoued them to vse, against the common enemy.

*The Venetians
remonstrance
to the Pope.*

The Pope hauing vnderstood the Senates resolution seemed to be highly pleased therewith, saying that he did desire nothing so much, as during his Papacy, to see all Christian Princes vnited together against those Infidels, who in the meane time that the Christians had particular quarrells one with an other, were so mightily encreased, as they now did threaten to ruine them.

The Popes answer to the Venetian Am-bassadour.

Therevpon, he did not only confirme the offers and promises that were made before, but did likewise augment them, and as a most discret and well aduised person, he motioned the making of an vnion and league together against that common enemy, wherevnto, his exhortation to all other Princes, and especially to the Emperour, was of great force.

This league being resolved on, it was concluded by a Generall consent of all men to arme two hundred light Gallies, and the greatest number of ships of warre and other great vessels that they could, and in them to embarke fifty thousand foot-men, and foure thousand horse; But because some difficulties seemed to arise concerning the distribution of that expence, and vpon other Articles, and that the time in the meane space did vrge them speedily to send away the army to the releefe of Corfou; the Pope by confirming that which had beene concluded, would presently haue the league to bee published, to giue it more force and reputation, and to inuite the other Christian Princes to embrace and follow it, referring the conclusion of certaine points, till he could receiue newes from Spaine.

*A league betwixt the Pope
the Emperour
and the Venetians
against the Turke.*

It was sollemnly published in Saint Peters Church, where Gaspere Contareu, the Venetian Cardinal, celebrated masse in the presence of the Pope, and the whole Colledge of Cardinals: the like was afterwards done at Venice, with prayers in all Churches, to giue thanks vnto God for that he had vnited the Christian Princes against the Infidels: and for the execution of that which had beene concluded, the Senate sent word to the Generalls, that leaving the Capitaine of the Gulphe with foure Gallies for the guard of Dalmatia, they should saile with the whole flecte to Brandiza: they did afterwards make a great leauy of foot forces for to fill vp the promised number, then they appointed capitaines for the great Gallies, and for the bastard ones, who did very speedily cause them to be made ready, which sailed all of them vnder the conduct of Boudamiero, capitaine of the Gallion: so as in a short space, all things were ready on the Venetians part.

The league is published at Rome, and at Venice.

*The Venetians
preparations
for the army.*

Andrew Doria, who lay at Naples, hauing intelligence of that which had beene concluded at Rome and Venice, that he should meet at Brandiza to ioyne with the Venetians fleet, alleading sundry excuses, some times that he would saile towards Marseilles against the French nauall army, then, that he would go to Genoa, to new man his gallies, and to make provision of other necessaries, did by all meanes prolonge his departure, notwithstanding that Gaspere Bassalu the

*Doria delays to ioyne with
the Venetians.*

Venetians Counsell at Naples did earnestly vrge it, by declaring vnto him the importance of the Isle of Corfou, which was to be preferred and defended from the danger wherein it was, in doing whereof, notwithstanding that he was to doe the Emperour seruice, he should neuerthelesse purchase great glory and reputation, the enterprize being executed vnder his conduct and command as Generall of the army: As also, for that he was obliged thereto by his promise often made to the Venetians, vpon which they had not feared to commit into his hands all their forces, which were very great, and such, as the assurance of their Estate by sea, did wholly depend vpon them.

Doria began sweat and disparture towards Genoa.

Doria, not being moued with all these reasons, answered that they should haue accepted his offers at that time when occasion was offered of ouerthrowing Barbarossa, when with a part of his army he passed thorow the Channel of Corfou, as neither the Popes letters which he wrote vnto him with his owne hand, nor the arriuall of the Emperours Ambassadors at Naples, who for that purpose came thither expressly from Rome in post, could in any sort alter his determination, but he speedily departed from Naples to goe to Genoa, saying that he would acquaint the Emperour with what had passed, and there attend his commandment. The departure of Doria, and his manner of proceeding did greatly trouble the Venetians, not so much for that their hope was frustrate of being able to breakethe Turkish army, as for to see themselves vnder vaine promises, deceived by the Imperial: yet neuerthelesse al-be-it that Doria his departure, and the report that Barbarossa was comming into the Gulphe with an hundred gallies might haue perswaded them to countermand their Generalls not to goe to Brandiza; the Senate notwithstanding, to shew their constancy in matters determined and resolved vpon, and to preserve the reputation of their army, which would haue begne much blemished, if they should haue seemed to depend wholly vpon Doria as counsels and actions, after sundry opinions, resolved to alter nothing of that which had beene determined, but made a new request to the Pope, that he would command the Count of Anguillare to saile with the Churches gallies and those of Malta to Brandiza according to their former resolution.

How Doria departure did trouble the Venetians.

*The Venetians
constancy.*

The Turkes in the meane time had landed fife and twenty thousand men and thirty peeces of ordnance in the Isle of Corfou, & builded foure Caualliers round about the castle, to make them equal to those within it, and to beate downe their defenses, hauing first wasted the whole Island, cut downe the fruite trees, burned the country houses, and led away as prisoners al those whom they found in the Island which had not saued themselves in the castle, many neuerthelesse escaped into Saint Angelos castle, the sytuation of the place being able to gard them: Then hauing begunne the battery and perceiuing, that by reason of the long distance of the place, where they had beene enforced to build their Caualliers, for feare of the ordnance within, their cannon shot was of no great force, they were desirous to approach neerer, but they were beaten backe with cannon shot to their great harme & losse. The Visier Basha came twice from Butrintor into the Island, and being come vpon the brinke of the castle dike to view the place, reported to Soliman that the sytuation of the place, and the fortifications were such as their was no hope in a long time to doe any good there, wherevpon he counselled Soliman to raise the sege, and to retire his armies, which beganne already to seele great discommodities, as well by sicknesse, as by the small store of victuals that was brought thither: as also because that winter drew nere, a very vnfit season for such an enterprize, and that the longer he tarried there, the more he should loose his reputation; being afterwards enforced to dis campe without any prosperous successe: that hee had by a sodaine alteration turned his forces vpon that enterprize which had beene prepared for other more easie purposes against the Emperour, and therefore that hee was not to wonder if the event of a rash and head-long action, had not answered the fortunate

*The Visier
Bashas counsell to raise his sege.*

fortunate successe which was wont to follow the wise and discret counsels of the Ottomans: that he should send away his two armies by sea and land to Constantinople, there to refresh them which were much weakened by sundry accidents, to the end they might the yeere following with better successe enterprize some exploit more assured and generous.

Such was the opinion and counsell of Aiax the Visier Basha, yet neuerthelesse to preserve their reputation, feigning some other designes contrary to that which he spake; or rather enuying Barbarossa his greatnesse, and seeking to disgrace him by reconciling the Venetian Common-wealth to Soliman, he called to the Venetian Bailly, who had still followed the campe, and told him, that if his countrymen would satisfie the harmes and dammages, as well of men as other matters, which Soliman had susteined at that sege, and make a demonstration, how that whatsoeuer had happened, was not by the consent or appointment of the common-wealth, he had so handled the matter, that the sege should be raised from before Corfou, and his countrymen should recouer peace and friendship, as in times before with Soliman: Iannusbet the first Dragoman did afterwards affirme that the same came from Solimans selfe, as that did manifest which soone after ensued, the Bailly hauing leaue giuen him to send one of his followers to Venice for that purpose, who was conducted in safety by two Chiaus to Castel-nouo.

But Soliman almost at the same time not tarrying for any answer raised his campe, and hauing shipped his ordnance and al his souldiers, sailed towards Constantinople after that he had continued his sege for ten daies space, and carried away with him more then threene thousand soules into bondage. The Isle of Passu very nere to Corfou, with Butrintor, seated on the firme land on Albanias side a nere neighbour to it, rafted the like harme and losse.

*Soliman
souldiers before Co*

Barbarossa departing with the army from before Corfou, sailed towards Preueze, Soliman not permitting him to remaine vpon those seas with an hundred gallies to scoure the coastes of Puglia and Sicily.

It was supposed at that time, that the chieft cause that moued Soliman so suddenly to raise his campe, was certaine newes from Persia: because, that two daies before this resolution, some Olaches were speedily come to the campe, and the cause of their comming not being diuulged, it was certainly thought that they had brought bad newes, that nation being wont to publish euery where anything that did concerne their glory or reputation, and to keepe secret and conceale that which might procure them any contrary effect: but vndoubtedly, the true cause of his dislodging, proceeded from the great difficulties which Aiax had discouered in that enterprize of Corfou.

The newes of the enemies discamping did infinitely reioyce the Venetians, and generall processions were made for it, with praiers in Churches, and sundry almes giuen to the poore Monasteries and other deuout places of the city. But Soliman seeking to molest the Venetians in sandry places, had at the same time commanded Casim the Sangiack of Morea, that assembling all the souldiers round about, he should beseege Naples of Romagna and Malucfia.

*Soliman
minish to Lile Xap in Romag and Malu*

The Republike had held vnder her dominion diuers of the principall townes of Morea, the fruitfulest country of al Grecia, and the most renowned for the great number of vertuous men that are issued from thence: it had lost in the former wars against Baiazet Ottoman, grand-father to this Soliman, Adodon and Coron; it still possessed these two, being seated in a moist thorough place, and filled with inhabitants that did greatly affect the Venetians.

Naples is seated on a small Promontory, the which comming forth from the land maketh a great and safe haven, and is in such fort encompassed by the sea, as of the foure parts thereof, the therd is enuironed therewith, and the land side hath a very high and difficult going vp, so as there is but one little narrow way to goe vnto the towne, which lieth betwixt the hilles side and the sea; and the outward

*The discri-
of Naples
Romagnia*

bankes are so high and vnease, as it is impossible for the gallies to batter the walles, or to land those that are within them: the entry likewise of the Hauen hath a very narrow mouth, so as but one galley at once can enter into it, which may be easily defended by the ordinance of a little castle, seated on a small rock, in the middle of the sea, right opposite to the entry, some three hundred paces off, which can on all sides beate vpon the vessels that will come nere to the hauen, and yet it selfe not to be battered from the land, nor by the gallies, none but smal boats being able to come nere it, by reason of fundry points of rocks which lie round about it.

Description of Malutia.

Malutia is likewise seated in the same Prouince, and more nere to the Cape of Mailla, vpon a mountaine, or rather a small rock of eight hundred paces, which being diuided from the firme land, extendeth it selfe in a long and narrow forme to sea wards: so as this towne being seated on an high place is enuironed on all sides by the sea, there being none other entrance into it but by a bridge, the waters nere thereunto not being in any sort foordable by reason of their exceeding depth, and as nature hath furnished that place with such strength and naturall safety, it hath likewise giuen it whole some fountaines, with a good and fertile soile, and a goodly plaine on the top of the mountaine, from whence victuals may be provided for fifty or three score men, who are sufficient for the guard thereof.

Vittore de Garonz gouernor of Malutia.

Vittore de Garonz, in quality of Bailly, commanded Naples, a man of ripe yeers, and of great experience, by reason of the great offices which he had borne both by sea and land. This man by his valor and good counsell, and by the rustinesse of the inhabitants did not only defend the place from all perill and danger, but likewise by the sallies of his caualery, did assure the country nere adioyning, and greatly molested the enemies.

Cassim, who for to obey Soliman was come into those quarters with as great forces as hee could raise, hauing founded those of Malutia both by promises and threats, returned towards Naples, and hauing perceiued the difficulty of the enterprise, and being without sufficient means to take it by seige or by assault, hee dislodged thence, and dismissed part of his army, placing the residue in garrison in the nereest townes thereunto within fixe miles of the city.

Barbarossa on the other side with three score and ten gallies, and thirty as well Galeons as Fusts giuen him by Lusimbei, hauing scoured the Islands of the Archipelago belonging to the Republike, tooke some of them which had not meanes of defense, either for want of souldiers, or for that their sytuation was not strong enough to susteine his attempts, such as were the Islands of Scyro, Patmos, Ligna, and some likewise belonging to particular persons, as Nia, proper to the family of the Pisani, Stampallea to the Quirni, Paros very famous for marble, subiect to the family of the Penieri, with diuers others, Barbarossa pursuing his victory to the content of his souldiers vnto whom he gaue the pillage, reseruing neuertheless the best of the spoile as presents, for the chiefe of the Port, to purchase to himselfe new fauours, to the end that the yeere following hee might be permitted to scour the seas with greater forces and more authority.

The Islands taken from the Venetians
by Barbarossa.

Diuers Venetian captaines after that the enemies had raised their campe from before Corfou, propounded, that the Venetian fleet should follow them to stop these incursions and disorders which euery man did already foresee, by that means to preserve those Islands, from whence they received many commodities, and chiefly great numbers of men for to man their gallies, yet neuertheless, they had respect to the time, and to the enemies forces, from whom they feared some sinister accident: and above all they especially considered the Senates intention, which was to vnite the Confederates forces, so which nothing was more contrary, then to bee farre off with the army, whertvpon they resolved (quitting this proposition) that the Generall Pesare taking with him him a great number of souldiers from the garrisons of Dalmatia, should with certaine gallies goe and beseege Scardona, and Vitturi with other some should saille to Obrouazza.

Scardona, lieth nere to Sebenic, and therefore they thought it fit to take it, for the safety of that sort, and to take away the great difcommodities which all those of the country round about might receiue from thence, it being possessed by the enemy: it was circled with very weak walles, and had two small castles: wherevpon, so loone as the Venetian troupes drew nere, the Turkes that were within it, after some small resistance, did yield to the discretion of the generall Pesare, who notwithstanding that he had determined to receiue them, on condition to giue them their liues and goods, yet neuertheless, his commandement being neither heard nor obeyed in that fury, the first that entred it beganne forthwith to waste and spoile, and the Turkes which were gon forth to escape into their Confinnes being encountered by a troupe of armed men of the country of Sebenic, were all of them cut in peeces. The generall left Francisco Salomone for the guard and gouernment of that place, determining at that time to fortifie it, yet neuertheless hauing afterwards considered the great difficulty of so doing, and the expences of entertrayning a garrison amongst so many of the enemies fortes, with the hurt which would redound if it were againe recovered by the Turkes, he thought it fittest and most profitable to raze the castles, and to satisfie himselfe, for hauing taken such a place of great treaue from the enemies.

As for those of Obrouazza, the Turkes that were within it, though they were but few in number, did valiantly for a time defend the place, afterwards, being enforced to quit it, they retired into the castle, the which whilst the Venetians made all things ready to beseege, the gallies were countermanded by the General, hauing had a new commandement from the Senate to saille with the army to Corfou, as resoluing about all things to guard that place, which was of so great importance for them. The winter season being much spent, the exploits of warre did for that yeere cease, all men expecting what would be the beginning of the yeere following 1537. Soliman seemed to be desirous of peace with the Venetians, wherof the Visier Basha by his commandement made a motion to the Bailly Canalis, perswading him to cause the Ambassadour to come to Constantinople who had bene already appointed for that purpose, vnto whom he promised to giue a passport, and good entertainment: But by how much the Turkes did vse gentleness and curtesy, contrary to their fierce and haughty nature, by so much the more did the Venetians suspect their speech and actions, doubting that vnder these treaties, they sought not a firme peace, but how to separate them from the Emperours friendship, and to breake the practices of the league.

The Emperour Charles on the other side made shew that all his thoughts were bent to makewarres vpon the Turkes, so as he often times said, that he greatly desired to march against them in person, to haue a share in that glory, causing none other recompence then that, being willing to haue whatsoever should be conquered from them, to be ioyned and vnited to the dominions of the Venetian common-wealth, the which he termed the very bulwarke against the Turkish forces, and that he might the better intend that enterprise, he had consented to a truce with the French King in Flanders. Such in outward apparence were the discourtesies of the Emperour and his officers in Italy, who made a shew to be very careful of preparing all things for the warres. Doria promised to haue his gallies ready in a short space, & to ioyn them with the Venetian fleet, assuring them that he would in that war do some notable seruice to Christendome, and to the profit of the Signory. The Marquis of Guasto gouernor of Milan did the like, both of the seeking to make all men beleue, that the Emperour in that business did proceed with great zeale & affection, yet neuertheless, many were of opinion that these exterior shews of the Emperour were only to hide some other of his designs, & to provoke Scardona taken by the Venetians.

The Turkes of Obrouazza retreat into the castle.

An. 1537.

Soliman seemeth to desire peace with the Venetians.

The Venetians suspect him.

The Emperour in shew desires to make warre on the Turkes.

His offers confirm his desire.

the Venetians in the meane time to war, who by altogether intending the league, might wholly breake it with Soliman, and thereby be enforced to ioyne with him, who was more desirous to make war vpon the French, to assure vnto himselfe the State of Milan, then vpon the e Turkes.

The great signes why men did suspect the Emperour.

Sundry signes of the Emperours secret purposes were discerned: his long delay to answer the Senate concerning that which it had written to him about the league, then his refusal to make a generall truce with the French, and lastly the report which was current how that by meanes of a Spaniard, nephew to the viceroy of Sicill, and prisoner to the Turkes, he made meanes by faise promises to purchase the friendship of Barbarossa, and namely, that Barbarossa passing by the Far of Messina, at such a time as there were none to make resistance, had in no sort touched any thing that did belong vnto the Emperour.

The French
Kings desire and end.

As for the French King, all men did perceiue how desirous he was of peace, and that the Venetians should be in league and amity with Soliman, that he might see them freed from all constraint of being vnto the Emperour, to the end that if he should happen to make warre vpon the Emperour he might easily draw them to his party; although he did greatly desire to be friends with him, hoping thereby to obtaine the Dutchy of Milan for the Duke of Orleans his second sonne, perceiving very well that he could not get it by force; wherevpon he did willingly harken to all motions of peace that were propounded to him.

The Pope
sendeth to the Emperour and
the French
King to make them friends.

Erasmus Iustimanio by the Senates command went to him, not in quality of an Ambassador, but only as a Gentleman of Venice, who was honorably entertained and welcomed by the King. The Pope likewise to this end sent both to the Emperour and the King, to euery of whom the King answered that he desired nothing so much as peace: and whereas he vnderstood that the Emperour propounded a meeting at Narbona, there to consult thereon, he speedily sent the Cardinal of Lorraine & the great Master of France thither, with ample instructions to conclude a peace. But all these assemblies prouing vaine and to none effect, the Venetians were greatly perplexed. For some, reiecting that which did makethem to doubt and feare, did promise to themselves that being ioynd with the other Christian Princes, they should be able not only to defend their State from the Turkes, but likewise to daunt and ouerthrow their pride, wherevpon they were of opinion to embrace the league, and to continue the war. Wherevnto they were the more prouoked by an opinion that al Germany was wholly ready to take armes against those Barbarians, being incited thereto by Ferdinand King of the Romans to reuenge himselfe on Soliman, who had a long time molested him in Hungary. Vpon this hope, time hastened away, they not answering the Baillies letters, for that they could not resolue on the motions of peace made by the Turke, and vpon the Balthas particular discourse to the Bailly, the which did greatly displease the other Senators who opposed themselves against all propositions that were made of sending new commissions to Rome concerning the league, saying that it was not expedient for the Common-wealth to reiect all propositions of peace, and altogether to intend the practises of the league: that they ought first, well to examine the conditions and State of the present affaires, and afterwards to see how they could make warre, with what forces and meanes they could continue it: that the publike treasure was so exhausted by the last warres on the firme land, as the Republike had more need of long quiet; then to enter into a new warre, more dangerous then all the former; and for to shew that their hope vpon the aide of other Princes was badly grounded, they were to call to minde, that the Isle of Corfou by Doria means, who derided their desseignes, had bene almost lost, had not their owne forces and the situation of the place defended it: that they ought not stil to contemne the great interests of so many citizens, who were to vnderge the burthen of so many subsidies, whose meanes were in the Turkes hands, and who were in hope by that treaty to recouer them from them.

Sundry opinions of the Senate.

The reasons of those who desired peace with Soliman.

Diuers

Diuers other reasons were propounded to direct them from war, which were answered by those of the contrary opinion; how that they did not abhorre peace, but that they did in some sort seek to prouide for the necessities of the times, if they should happen to maintain warre, and that which kept them from writing to Constantinople, was because they would not give any cause of calozie and suspicion to the Christian Princes, fearing least they should after-wards grow could in their propositions for warre: that to make fugate haist to send an answer, was to discover their weakens to the Turke, and to make him become more insolent in the conditions of the agreement: that they were not to make account of expences, in regard that they were to see how to recover, and being armed to treat of peace, and not rashly to rely vpon the faith and discretion of those perfidious enemies.

The reason of those that were desirous to ioint with the league and to make warre vpon
the Turkes.

In this manner did the practise of the league continue, by delaying the affaires of Constantinople. But at the last, by meanes of diuers, who did not cease to solicit them to send an answer, and not wholly to give over that treaty, and to take armes, it was propounded in the Senate to write to the Bailly, still to entertaine the Bascha Aiaz, and to tell him how that the common-wealth had great cause to complaine of Soliman, who without being prouoked had broken the peace, and came like an enemy to enuade the Isle of Corfou, not tarring for Vrsinos returne, who by his expresse command was sent to Venice, with promise to attempt nothing till his returne, that the Senate had bene euer very carefull to continue the peace and friendship with Soliman, whose enterprizes it had neuer sought to hinder, but had inviolably kept their promise with him, euer behauing themselves as newters. If the General Agas had met with his forces vpon the coast of Puglia where the Turkish army lay, it was by meere chance, hauing bene driuen thither by force of the windes. The Cardinal that propounded this was, to haue the Bailly by this discourse to use meanes to discover the Turkes meaning concerning peace, and if he should see any good likelihood there-vnto, then to beginne to motion it.

What the Senate propounded to write to the Bailly.

This being thus propounded in the Senate, three daies were spent in the resolution thereof, after-which, the matter hauing bene long debated by the cheefe Senators, two voyces wanting for the ending of it, the whole matter remayned unresolved; the promises of Princes hauing made such an impression in all men, as they wholly relied thereon.

The proposition
toke none effect.

Don Lopes the Emperours Ambassador hauing notice of this irresolution, hoping that the Common-wealth would make a more strict alliance, with the Emperour, beganne to solicit the Senate (as Doria had already done) to Vnite and ioyne their nauall Armies, and to bee no longer newters, but openly to declare themselves enemies to the Turkes. But the wisest and best aduised among them, meaning not to bee carried away by words abused by vaine and idle promises, did continue in their former proposition, not to take armes but vpon constraint against so mighty an enemy, who was able in so many sundry places to enuade the State of the Common-wealth, which was not alone of it selfe sufficient to make defence against him, and ought not to rely ouer-much on the others helpe. Therefore they determined to answer the Ambassadors offers in generall termes, and by the same meanes to thanke the Emperour as author thereof, assuring him that for diuers respects they could not passe on any farther, and namely because that the French and the Turkes seeking their friendship, they had answered them, that they would not therein giue them satisfaction, by reason that the Senats meaning was by shewing them selves newters, to keepe their promise with all men, intending neuer the lesse to remaine armed what-so-euer should befall, setting all waies before their eyes, with their owne proper interest, the commodity of all Christendome.

The Emperours
Ambassador
offereth meanes to vnto the Venetians new treaty.

At this answer the Ambassador held his peace, not making any farther reply:

The Senate
answer to the Em-
perour.

but within a while after comming into the Senate, he made another request vnto them; which was, that for feare least the French should come downe into the State of Milan, they would raise the six thousand foote-men to defend it, which they were bound to furnish by their last accord, for which the Duke of Verbin hauing taken speedie order, who was their Capitaine Generall, they replied, that there was no need so cause those troupees to march any further, which were appointed onely for the defense of the State of Milan; seeing that the French were still making warre in Piedmont, and that so loone as they should passe the theriuer Sesia, it would be the time to engage them, and then they would performe their promise, which they would not in fact breake.

The end of the first Booke of the sixth Decade.

The Contents of the second Booke of the sixth Decade.

THE Venetians doe hasten the fortification of the Islands and Sea townes of their iurisdiction. Andre Doria is chosen General of the Army of the league. Solimans great preparations against the Venetians. The Venetian Senate resolue to make warre vpon Soliman. The league concluded and resolved on betwixt the Pope, the Emperor and the Venetians against Soliman. The French King refuseth to enter into the league. The treaty of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King, is broken. The Pope commeth to Nice to atone them, where truce was onely graunted. Barbarossa wasteth the Islands of the Archipelago; Hee commeth into Candy, with his retreat there. The Senate sendeth supplies into Candy. The Sangiack of Morea summoneth the cities of Naples and Maluesia in Morea to yeeld. The Turkes, with and Spoyle Dalmatia, whither the Senate sendeth supplies. The Turkes take certaine Castles in Dalmatia. A motion made in the Senate for the recovery of that which they had taken there. The Turkes returne doth breake that motion. The Emperor after that the Venetians had remued the league sendeth his Nauall Army to Corfou.

The

The Army of the league resoluerh to goe and assaile the Castle of Preueze. Doria fauoreth the Army of Barbarossa. Doria is unwilling to giue Barbarossa battail. The Generall Capel complaineth for that they did not fight. And lastly, Dorias retreat to Corfou, to the great greefe and discontent of the whole Army.

The Second Booke of the sixth Decade of the Historie of Venice.

THE Treaty of peace being wholly broken, and no hope remaining but in armes, diligent and carefull prouision was made in Venice of all things necessary for the warre, great numbers of vessells, and soldiers, munitions and victualls to furnish the Islands, and other townes on the Sea coast. Those of Naples and Maluesia made sure to haue their Garrisons augmented, and especially to furnish them sufficiently with victualls and munition, for want of which Naples had like to haue fallen into the enemies hands, promising that if they might be thus releued, to sustaine all the perills and dangers of warre, to keepe those Citties vnder the Venetians obedience.

The Isle of Candy made the like request, where certaine troubles being raised and sundry scandalous speeches giuen forth that they would yeeld to the enemy, if hee should come thither, for feare of sacke and spoyle, as it had happened in the Islands of the Archipelago, the cheefe townes of the Island sent Ambassadors to Venice to cleere them-selues of that imputation, and to let them know that the error of some of base condition had occasioned those reports, rather by cowardize and indifferention, then for any euell will; and therefore they did offer to spend both their meanes and liues for the seruice of the Common-wealth, promising to giue sufficient and ample testimony of their loyalty, earnestly and humbly entreating them, not to forsake them, seeing that they were ready, and determined to make defense.

The Senate did willingly giue eare vnto them, and with faire speeches, and great promises, they were sent backe againe; where-vpon, the Generall was commanded to send fise and twenty Gallies to the Isle of Candy, vnder the conduct of the Prouidator Pascalis, who had like-wile commission to carry soldiers and victualls to Naples, and to leaue foure Gallies there for the guard of the city. They did in like manner furnish the Castle, and Isle of Corfou, with all things necessary. As for Dalmatia, sundry companies of light horse drawne from Greece and Croatia, were sent thither to gard the country against the enemies incursions. But that which did trouble them, was the vncertainty which way they would take, there being sundry speeches thereof; whereby they were at one time to prouide

The Venetians diligence to fortifie the Islands against the Turkes.

The Isle of Candy offers to the Senate.

The Venetians are vncertaine what way the Turkes would take.

for

for all the places which they held vpon the sea, and likewise to assure Patria in Frioul, because the report was, that Soliman in person would be in his land army which made them feare that he might come thither.

Andrew Doria
Chief General of the Army for the League.

In the meane time the last conclusion of the league, was most earnestly solicited, whose forces were supposed would be very great, which was the cause that no more mention was made of the treaty of peace, the which for a time lay dead. The Venetians, to please the Emperor, had chosen Andrew Doria General of the whole army, and the Pope, in fauour to the Common-wealth, had appointed Marto Grimani Patriarke of Aquileia to command his Gallies, a Venetian by nation, and of a noble and rich family. But there rested to conclude the portion of their expence which each of the Confederates were to beare in that common enterprize, knowing very wel that the third part was to great for the Sea Apostolick, the Venetians being contented somewhat to ease it, and that the Emperor should beare the rest: but his Agents, notwithstanding they said that it was reason to ease the Pope, would neuertheless not giue their consent to haue him charged more then the Venetians.

The Expence divided betwixt those of the League.

The Emperour at the last fearing least that the delay of the conclusion of the league, might breed some coldnesse in those who were most forward to warre, and might in the end cause the Senate to giue eare to the propositions of peace, and that thereby he might be enforced alone to sustaine all the Turkes attempts, did encrease the authority of his Agents at Rome, promising to be pleased with whatsoever they should agree to, and chiefly concerning the difficultie about the expence, suffering the Pope to beare but the sixth part, and of the residew, the three partes should bee for him selfe, and the two for the Venetians.

The Venetians
acquainted with Solimans
preparations for warre are exhorted to
peace.

Whilest these treaties were made in the Court of Roome, Gensino who at Constantinople serued as Dragoman for the Common-wealth, arriued at Venice, bringing letters from the Bayley, and was enioyned by the Visier Bascha, the admiral, to aduise, counsell, and exhort the Venetians to haiken vnto peace, he did afterward acquaint them particularly with the great warlike preparations which were made in sundry places of Solimans Empire: he told them besides, from Ajax the Visier Bascha, that he did greatly maruaile why they had not answered his former letters; that he did neuertheless beare the selfe same goodwill and affection to the Republike; that a way lay open vnto them for peace, if they would send their Ambassador to the Port of the great Lord, to iustifie their actions past, and by the satisfaction for losses to vie meanes to appeale Soliman, who otherwise was ready to make inuasion vpon them.

The Senate
determines warre against Soliman.

The arriual of this Dragoman and his new offers, did cause sundry effects in the Senate, for it did more animate those that craved warre, and strengthened the other in their opinion which required peace. Therefore the Senate being therevpon assembled to answer the Bailly, the businesse being brauely disputed on in the assembly, chiefly by Marc Antonio Cornare, who had at other times main- tained in that place, That it behooued them to ioyne with the League, and to make warre: and by Marcio Foscare who was one of the Councill, and by his skill and long experience in the managing of publicke affaires, had purchased great authority, it was determined by the plurality of voices, according to the former resolution, not to write vnto Constantinople at all, but onely for to make warre.

Therevpon, within a while after, they sent ample commissions to their Ambassadors at Rome, for the conclusion of the league, and for the signing to the articles thereof, on which, after a long contestation, they had agreed, and which were read and approoued in the Senate, being these: That there was a league and confederacy made betwixt Pope Paul the third, the Emperor Charles the fifth, and the Republike and Senate of Venice, as well offensive as defensive, against

Soliman

Soliman King of Turkes: whereby the Confederats did promise, to make warre vpon the Turkes with two hundred Gallies, a hundred armed ships, and fifty thousand Italian footemen, tenne thousand Spaniards, and twenty thousand Almans, with foure thousand five hundred horse, armed after the Bourgonian manner, to which forces were added a sufficient quantity, of artillery, munition and other necessaries, which should yearly be ready about the middle of March.

Of these Gallies, the Pope armed thirty sixe, the Emperor foure score and two, and the Signory of Venice as many, vnder the command of Vincenzo Capello their Generall, the Emperor was bound to furnish all the shippes of warre, and the Venetians to lend the Pope Gallies ready furnished with all necessaries. Concerning the expence, it was diuided as aboue is said. Ferdinand King of the Romans, was vnderstood to be comprehended in that Confederacy, whome the Emperor did promise should wholly ratifie it, and would cause him to leuy an army a part to assaile the Turkes in Hungary. The most Christian king was therein likewise comprehended, so soone as he should declare that he would accept of the cheefe and most honorable place, which they had referred for him: wherein the Pope was to appoint with what forces he should be present there. That the Pope should likewise vie meanes to draw the King of Poland, and the other Christian Princes to this Vnion: and if that any contention should arise among the Confederate Princes concerning the League, the Pope was to decide it, and to make them friends. Andrew Doria was (as hath beene said) Generall by Sea, and the Duke of Vrbino for the enterprizes of the firme land.

Andre Doria,
Generall by Sea, and the Duke of Vrbino by land.

As for the conquests which should bee made by the common armes, it was mentioned in a scedule apart, that euery of the confederates should enter vpon the same state, which had belonged vnto him: so as if they should conquer the Empire of Constantinople, it should belong to the Emperor, without prejudice to the claimes of the Republike, and so in like manner of the rest, but for the Apostolike sea was referred the preeminence of some State worthy the merit thereof, & according to the quality of the conquest that should be made. Concerning other things where vnto no man laid any claime, that euery of the Confederats might haue a share therein according to the expences which he contributed towards the warres: and if they should chance to recover the Isle of Rhodes, it should returne vnder the Dominion of the Knights of Saint John of Ierusalem.

The Venetians
sought to draw the King of England to the league.

In this treaty there was no mention made of the King of England: The Venetians neuertheless supposing that they might draw greate aide from that King, who was a Prince of exceeding great wealth and authority, and had in time before shewed great affection to their Common-wealth, went about by meanes of Leonimo Lucente their Secretary, resident in his Court, to dispose him to fauour the league. But the King, disdayning the matter for that he had not beene particularly inuited to the treaty thereof, would by no meanes endure to heare of it, but did greatly complaine: for that neither him selfe nor his Realme, had beene mentioned in the number of the Confederates. As for the French King, they did dayly preceae that he had no great desire to enter into it, because that they treated therein of encreasing the Emperors forces, and reputation, his coriual, and perpetual enemy.

The French
King refused to enter into the League.

The Venetians then, the league being concluded and established (as hath bin said) commanded the Generall Capello, that if the Turkish fleet did come into the Gulphe hee should keepe aloofe towards the Leuant, that hee might with more ease passe into Sicily, where he was to ioyne with the Confederates fleets, as well to assure those quarters, as to hurt the enemies, if occasion were offered. And because they would not weaken their garri- sons, they did on a sodaine leuy two thousand foote-men, whome they sent to the Army. Some were of opinion to referre to the Generalls discretion, in all causes, to doe that which he should iudge to be most profitable and conuenient for the Common-wealth, according to

to the occurrences of the affaires, and not to limit him what hee had to doe, which might peradventure bee cleane contrary to reason, seeing that warre is managed by the sight of the eye : alledging for example that which happened the yeare before, by limiting the Generall Pesare what he should doe, which hath occasioned sundry disorders, and at last the warre against the Turkes: yet neuerthelesse, the other opinion was followed, because they would not hinder nor delay the v-nion of their Army with the Confederates.

Now the Senates greatest care, was to find ready money for the great expenses they were speedily to be at. By means whereof it was decreed, that all those who would put in any money into the publicke Treasury, should have an annuall rent for it of foureteene in the hundred: and they did afterwards proceed sharply against the debtors to the Common-wealth, as well by the imprisonment of their bodies as sale of their goods.

They did moreover create three Pocurators of Saint Marke, Ieronimo Marcello, Bernardo Moro, and Julio Comaresin, in regard of some loanes of money. As for the goods of the Clergie, they could neuer make any vse of them: for although the Pope had permitted the Senate to alienate of Church goods by reason of renne in the hundred, to the worth of a million of gold, and afterwards calling back that fauour had giuen them leave to raile the said somme vpon the reuenuue of the Clergie for the terme of five yeares, yet neuerthelesse, they could neuer draw a breefe from him either for the one or other, his Holynesse full finding new shifts and excuses.

In this great want of money the Senate went very slowly forward in the propositions that were made vnto them of raising the said somme, peradventure for feare of displeasing many people, and chiefly those of the Champaine cuntry of the firme land: wherupon it reiected a proposition which was made (although it would haue amounted to a great somme) to sell the medows of the communalities, of which there are store ouer the whole state, in a manner of the Republique on the firme land.

The Senate neuerthelesse in this great necessity did spare nothing that was necessary for the warres. Peace at the same time was treated of betwixt the Emperour and the French King, which each of them made shew greatly to desire, and they concluded to send their Agents for that purpose to Canus which lieth betwixt Perpignan and Narbona: but having spent all the time there in contestations, the assembly brake vp without any resolution, by reason of the distrust that the one had of the other, which did greatly greeue the Venetians, because that by those Princes discord, the warre against the Turkes would prooue more difficult, the likelihoods thereof being already discerned. For the Marquis of Guasto, whom the Emperour had in the beginning appointed to serue in the enterprize of the Leuant, was countermanded not to stirre forth of Italy, and speedily to augment the Garrisons in the State of Milan, so as all hope of agreement being taken away, the Emperour being constrained to diuert his forces elsewhere, for feare of the French King, he did boldly affirme, that hee could at that time doe no other seruice to Christendome, then to stand vpon his owne defence against the Turkes & for to assure his owne States from receiving any hurt from their Army. The Pope beeing infinitely sorry that the enterprizes against the Turkes were not foreward, and it concerning him, as the head of Christendome to procure peace and v-nion among Christian Princes, resolved, seeing that his letters and Ambassadors had beene to no purpose, to attempt to preuaile by his presence, supposing that his authority and entreaties ioyned with reason, might cause them to condescend to some honorable agreement: wherupon hauing exhorted and inuited the Emperour and the French King thervnto, he requested them that they would meet at Nice, whither he likewise offered speedily to come, as to a place fit for that purpose.

The

The Venetians were very glad of this proposition, because that the desired effect of peace falling out successfullly it would much augment the forces and hope of the League, the which with-out that helpe would be very poore and weak: but on the other side they were very loy for the losse of so much time, which was to be spent in the preparations for warre, and in the v-nion of the Armies: because they well perceived that the Emperour coming from Barcelona by sea to Nice, Doria must needs bee employed in that journey, at such time as he should be buied in ordering the fleet, and failing against the enemies, who were already with great forces vpon the Seas: on the other side they feared, that the same meeting would bee to no purpose by reason of the great difficulties to establish a perfect peace betwixt these two Princes, in regard of what had happened on either side: and that the cause which had moued both of them to grant the pope this case, was but for to inflame themselves, and to make a shew to all men, that they were desirous of peace, but that the means to obtaine it were hard: both their zealozies beeing equally alike to purchase the Popes fauour, by allowing all his Councells and designs: for his Holynesse euer fearing to aduance the one of them more then the other, would not suffer any of them to grow more mighty by the forces and authorities of the Sea Apostolicke, and especially in Italy.

Some likewise did thinke, that the Pope was not moued to procure this enterprize only for the publick and vniuersall good, but for some particular profit of his owne, hoping by the means of his presence, and the meeting of these two Princes to insinuate himselfe into their fauor and to obtaine some matter of importance for the establishment of the greatnesse of his owne house, as the effect did afterwards manifest, hauing at that assembly concluded the marriage of the Lady Marguerite the Emperors naturall daughter, and widow to Duke Alexander of Medici, with Ottauio Farnese the Popes Nephew, whom the Emperour inuested with the State of Nauarre.

Notwithstanding: hat the Venetians were possessed with these doubts and suspicions, the Senate neuerthelesse did not cease to doe the duty which the time required, to testifie the honor and respect it did beare to those great Princes, and chiefly to the Pope, and to this end, to manifest how much it desired, according to their antient custome to ayde and fauour that accord, they chose two Ambassadors, Nichelao Tepulo and Marc Antonio Cornare, to be present at that assembly to make knowne the Senates good-will, and withall, how greatly it desired peace betwixt Christian Princes, and also for to make warre vpon the Turkes.

Now the Pope departing from Rome in the month of Aprill according as it had bene determined, came to Parma, where he celebrated Palme-Sunday in the Cathedrall Church, staying in that City and at Placentia certaine dayes, expecting the Duke of Sauoyes resolution concerning the City of Nice where the assembly was to be made, because some difficulties were made thereupon, not without suspicion that it came from the Emperour, who was desirous before his coming to the assembly to see what the Turkes progression would be. But the Pope at last resolving not to make so long stay in his journey, did set forwards directly towards Nice, where at his arriual, the entry into the City was denied him, the Gouernour thereof saying, that he held that place for the Prince, and that the Duke his father was not to dispose thereof, where vpon the Pope was enforced to retire him selfe into a Monastery of Moncks beeing not farre from thence, whither within a while after the Citties keyes were brought vnto him.

The Emperour and the French King came sodainly into those quarters, the one being lodged at Villafranca, and the other at Villanoua beyond the Riuer Var. Yet the Pope could neuer procure them to meet in his presence, because they both deter-

A a a a

The Senate
sith means to get money to defray the expenses of the warres.

A treaty of peace betwixt
the Emperour
and the French
King is broken off.

The Emperour
declareth that he could not take armes for the league.

The Pope resolueth to goe to Nice to assure the Emperour &
the French
King.

What moued
these Princes to grant the enterview at Nice.

Ottauio Farnese married the Emperors
bastard daughter.

Ambassadors
chosen at Venice to be present at the Assembly of Nice.

The Pope declareth his resolution to goe to Nice.

These two Princes refuse to see one another at Nice in the Popes presence.

determined not to grant the Popes desire in that meeting, which was to make them good friends and to establish a firme peace betwixt them, yet neuertheless he procured the prolongation of the truce, which was already confirmed, for the space of tenne years, hoping that in the meane space, the hatred, which was so deeply rooted in their hearts, might bee worn out; that beeing done, euery one went his owne way, the Pope towards Rome, the Emperor towards Barcelona, and the King iourned to Auignon, from thence to returne into France.

But the King being come to Auignon, was aduertized that the Emperor was desirous to conferre with him; and that for the same purpose hee entreated him to come to Aigues-mortès where he would land; which the King willingly granting, went thither, where both their maiesties did carffe each other, and the Emperor went and dined with the King in the towne, with great demonstration of brotherly friendship: Then the king went into the Emperors Gallie, wherethey had long conference to gether, where-vpon all men hoped shortly to see a firme peace established betwixt them; but no effectas thereof could euer since bee discerned: but on the contrary the Emperor perceiving him-selfe to be assured, by the confirmation of the league with the Venetians against the Turkes, not alone to sustaine their attempts, beganne to make greater demands to the King, according to the treaty of Madritt, the King on the other side promising to him-selfe, to recouer the States which hee detained from him; made great warlike preparations to assaile him in sundry places, not tarrying for the expiration of the truce.

Now whilst Christian Princes stood vpon termes of making warre one vpon another, the Turke had in the winter time prepared all that which was necessary for his comming forth into the field, who like-wile remembering that which did belong to his owne religion (for those Barbarous people haue some impression of diuinity in their hearts,) did before his departure celebrate with great solemnity, the feasts of Baieran, (those daies are celebrated and reuerenced by that nation euén as Easter is by the Christians) hee caused prayers to bee made in all his Melquites for the happy successe of him-selfe and his army. Then in the moneth of March, his armies by sea and land departed from Constantinople, where Solimán was in person, and Barbarossa neere to him, who held the rancke and grade which Luffi had done not long before, who was deprivied of his place of Balcha, and confined into Macedon: But the whole army being not yet well accommodated, Barbarossa in the meane time, with fixe score sayle, went to wards the Archipelago, as to an assured booty to assaile the Islands, the which beeing defended the yeare before, had as then no Garrisons that were sufficient to make defence, whereby it came to passe that Schiros, Schiaroc, Schiati, with certaine others of lesse fame being first sackt and spoyled fell into the power of the Turkes.

There happened a memorable accident at the Taking of Schiati; for the Islanders and those few soldiers that were within it, hauing constantly sustained the first assaults of the Turkes building vpon the assurance of the situation of the Castle, seated vpon an high place; some of the cheefe amongst them were desirous, either thorow feare or a premeditated malice, to yeld them-selues vnto the Turkes, but fearing peraduenture to be punished for their basenesse and treachery, if the matter should not fall out according to their desire, did runne to the Pallace where Ieronimo Ademi gouernor of the place lay hurt in his bed, who by his valor giuing example to his soldiers, had beaten the enemies from the wals, whome they slew, by whose death all matters remayning in confusion among them they did by ropes draw the Turkes vp into the Castle. This cruell and Barbarous act did so highly displease Barbarossa, as in sted of recompensing those vil-

Interview of Emperor and king at Aigues Mortès.

War rencoured betwixt the Emperor and
the King.

The Turkish feasts of Baieran.

Barbarossa's
looted the islands of the Archipelago.

lans, he did by death chastice their infamous wickednesse. Then hauing encreased his forces, hee sailed into Candy to get more booty there, or else to view the strong places of the Island.

The Senate vpon the report which was currant at Constantinople, how that the army should faile into Candy, had carefully provided what so euer was necessary for the gard of the Island, against so mighty an enemy, by sending thither, mony, soldiers, munition & victuals, and Giovani Moro to command there, during the warre in quality of Prouidator Generall, a man very well experienced and of great valour and discretion. The conseruation of that Island was thought to be of very great importance, as well for the Nobility thereof, being defended from a Venetian Colony, as for her richesse, as an ancient seate of Kings, as also for the trustfulness thereof, and other great commodities which those receiued from it that traded into the Leuanr. This Prouidator was chiefly enioyned to exhort the Gentlemen and Knights, (for so are the feudataries of the Republicke termed who enioy the benefitis thereof) to the defence of the Island, and to assure them that the Senate would neuer forsake them.

Now Moro being come into Candy, did assembly the Generall councill of all the Nobility of the Collony in the City of Candace, to dispose them by some honest exhortation constantly to attend the enemies comming.

If yee consider (said he) the quiet of your state, where at this present, yee doe peaceably enioy so many goodly inheritances, so sweet an aire, such abundance and commodity of all things as grow here, or else are brought hither from the countries neere adioyning, I doe assure my selfe that this remembrance will be of greater force with you, then the efficacy of all my words can bee able to perswade you to doe all you can, and to be sparing neither in expences, trauail, nor life it selfe, to keepe either your selues, or children, from changing your present condition, and to fall from the toppe of so great happinesse, into a Gulph of misery and calamities, as it is like to happen, if this Island falling into the Turkes power (I tremble with feare onely to thinke thereof, and to tell you of it) yee should be enforced to goe and dwell else-where, to forsake your country, so great wealth, and so many commodities as yee here possesse; or else tarrying here still, be subiect to the Tyranny of a faithlesse and Barbarous nation. An other thing besides your wealth doth oblige yee to defend this Island, one of the cheefe and most important members of our Common-wealth, which is, the loue and duty which you owe to our common country; from which I hope, the distance of place is not able to diuide you, being true members thereof, and not cut off from it, hauing a share in the honours, fauours, and in all other her fortunes. Now your particular interest being, for these respects, inseparably conioyned to ours, it behoueth mee to labour to let you see, the importance of the businesse in question, and to stirre yee vp to provide those remedies which may defend yee from such a danger: I will then onely entreate you, not for any feare what so euer, to lose that courage, and good resolution which I discern in you all, least being disurnished of valour, and strength, yee happen to yndoe your selues. I will not deny but that the enemies power is very great, and that wee ought not to contemne it; but I dare well assure you that it is not such as may cause yee to despaire of being able to resist it; but on the contrary wee are to hope, that their comming will purchase vs honor and reparation, by valliantly repelling them from the whole Island. We are certainly to beleue, that although there bee great numbers of soldiers in the enemies Army; yet neuertheless they haue no store of ordnance, or other necessary matters sufficient to batter and force townes, whereby wee are assuredly to thinke, that if they doe come to this Island, their intention is rather to spoile and get booties, if by our negligence wee will suffer them so to doe, then to tarry here and make warre. And though they

Aaaaaa

Moro his oration to the gentlemen of Candy.

they should come hither to that end, what-like lihood is there that they will busie themselves in a long and difficult enterprize, perceiving for many mighty fleets of the Christian Confederat Princes at sea, which may on a sudaine affaile and fight with, either their fleets, or some of their townes; for they are no lesse care-full for the preservation of their owne, then they are to offend and conquer other mens. I know, and am expressly commanded from the Senate to acquaint you with it, how highly above all other things it esteemeth the preservation of this State, and your safety, for which, they are ready to expose all their forces, witness the provisions which of it owne proper motion, it hath speedily sent vnto you.
 You then, whome these dangers doe more neerely concerne, and for whom wee are here assembled, are so much the more obliged not to omit any thing wherein you may manifest your loyalty, diligence, and loue, towards both the one and other country: Let euery man then dispose him selfe to succour the common cause with his wealth, authority, and person; I doe assure my selfe that in so doing, we shall not onely auoyde the greatest danger, but shall free the whole country, to your great glory and praise from the enemies spoiles and incurfions.

The Proutadtors speech is applauded by all men.

The Candian
 preparations for their defence.

The Proutador had scarce made an end of his exhortation, when all of them arose, applauding his speech, and promising with great offers, to employ all their power, care and diligence in the defence of the Island: Hee did afterwards make the same remonstrance to the people of Candy, exhorting them to their owne defence: wherevpon all of them beganne with great speed to provide things necessary, to arme certaine Gallies, and to assemble the country people, vnto whom hauing giuen Armes, they placed part of them in Candall, to encrease the garrison of Italian foote-men, and the rest were sent to the gard of sundry passages and places of importance to stoppe the enemies progression. The Gentlemen of the Island and the feudataries of the Common-wealth, did proceed therein with such earnestnesse and courage, as the family alone of Calergians, which is one of the cheefe and richest of the country, did raise more then hue and twenty thousand armed men.

Barbarossa
 commeth into Candy.

Barbarossa pursuing his iourney came neere to the Island on the North side, betwixt Standia and the City of Candace, and without casting ankor ranne along the Island as farre as Rettrima, where making but a short stay, because that the Citties ordnance did greatly hurt him, he sailed to La Suda, hauing there found better abiding then in any other place, by reason of the Hauen which is great and safe, whose entrance was then open to him, it being not fortified as it is now at this day, hee landed great numbers of his people to scoure and spoyle the Country.

This City was in old time called Cidonia, and reckoned among the cheefe of the Island. Andre Gritti was Governour thereof, hauing with him about a thousand Italian foote-men, and diuers Greekes of the city and places neere adioyning. These men perceiving the Turkes to approach in disorder, who had not in-trenchen themselves, did boldly fall forth of the City and assailed them, who being first beaten with the Citties ordnance, whereof it was well provided, and being found in disorder, they chased, and slew a great number of them: Those which scoured the country had no better fortune, by reason that great multitudes of the Islanders arising who were duely armed by their Lords commandment, went and encountered the Turkes which were laden with spoile, whome they fell vpon and slew many of them; so as they enforced them to giue ouer their enterprize, and to retire with speed to their Gallies.

Barbarossa hoping for better and more fortunate successe in another place, or at least to recompence that losse, leauing behind him neuerthelesse some me-moriall of his being there, to the peasants detriment, sent an hundred Gallies to Sithia.

This

This place is seated in another corner of the Island on the west side, beeing weak and ill provided of defense notwithstanding that a particular magistrate sent from Venice doth usually make his abode there. From thence the enemy might easily passe into the Ile of S carpenta, possessed at that time by the Turkes and distant from thence some forty miles.

The enemy finding that place to bee abandoned, tooke away certaine pec-ces of ordinance and other munitions, spoiling all the Champaigne neere adioyning. But fearing least the Venetian Fleet comming to the ayde of Candy would enforce them to come to strokes, the Soldiers being speedily imbarcked and all the Gallies beeing vnited together, they sailed towards Negrepont.

Barbarossa hits Candy from Candy.

The Sangiach of Morea did at the same time by Solimans command beseege Naples and Malucia. He hauing encamped before those two townes, wrote to the Governours and people thereof that they should speedily yeeld, promising to them great rewards in so doing, and on the contrary, seuerer punishment, if they should continue to make resistance: that Soliman had sent him thither commanding him by no means to stirre from thence vntill he had reduced both of them vnder his obedience: that their succors were farre off, and their hope vaine, long to hold out, and therefore that it was best for them to fitt themselves to the time and to the fortune of the vanquisher.

The Sangiach of Morea summoneth Naples and Malucia
 to yeeld.

The Governours and all the people, resoluving brauely to defend themselves, as well by reason of the situation of the place as for their hope that the Venetian Army would shortly releue them with vittuals and necessary munitions; made none answer to his letter, but betooke themselves more carefully to the Guard of their townes.

Resolution of the Governours and Malucia
 to resist.

And because they in Naples wanted water, the horfemen that were Stadiors a hardy and warlike nation, making diuers sallies, beeing followed by the Italian Harquebuziers did provide for that want. The Generall Capello hauing intelligence of this siege, and beeing very desirous to releue those valliant and trusty defendants, did opportunely with six Gallies send them supplies of whatsoeuer they needed.

But during these exploits those of Dalmatia were in like manner greatly afflicted by the Turkish Army, who entring into the Countrey made an horrible spoile there, carrying away, men, woemen, little children, and all sortes of cattell, burning the houses, and putting the whole Countrey in feare and confusion: so as Camillo Frisino, Governour of the Prouince, had thought to haue abandoned all the other Citties, and that the Soldiers should retire to Zara to assure it, as the chiefeft and easiest to guard, fearing that to attempt to preferue al of them against such great numbers of enemies, would bee a cause to expose them all to great dangers.

The Turkes
 wast Dalmatia

The Senate did not allow of this opinion, esteeming much more, besides the losse of so many Citties, this note of infamy, to haue at once without any fight giuen place vnto the enemies insolency, and abandoned so goodly a Countrey: wherefore, vying all means to preferue and defend it, it determined to make a new leuy of horse and foote, to weete, twelue thousand footemen and fiftene hundred horse, hoping with these forces to bee able sufficiently to assure the Prouince: and also to encrease the Peoples affection towards the Common-wealth, and to encourage them brauely to defend themselves, they appoynted fiftene Gentlemen who should speedily be transported thither for the guard of Zara, Sibenice and Cararra, with thirty men a peece:
 moreover Ladonico Badoario was sent vnto Zara, in quality of Proutador General of Dalmatia, with commandment neuerthelesse, not to goe forth of that City without the Senates permission and leave: the Inhabitants like-wise of Dalmatia

The Venetians are sent into Dalmatia.

A a a a 3

Dalmatia were permitted to send their wiues and children to Venice for feare of the enemies.

In these occurrences, the Prince shewed the Senate, how that euery man was to helpe his country in a time so miserable, and alledged vnto them for example that which had bene performed and done in the last warres of the firme land, in which (saide he) the Citizens loue towards their country, the vnion and readinesse of their helpe, had bene of so great force, as in dispiight of bad fortune, they had drawne the Republike forth of so many calamities, and had restored it to her fauour, splendor and dignity, wherein, (God be thanked) it now continued. That the dangers present, were no lesse then those that were past, hauing to doe with an enemy, who though hee be alone and of him-selfe, is neuer the lesse very mighty, and to be feared, whome if they did not speedily resist, but suffer all things to fall out according to his desire, his ouerweening would in such fort encrease, as they were neuer to looke for any safety from him: that their hope of forraigne aide, did dayly more and more vanish, the Confederates, proceeding with such vn certainty, and slownesse, as they were to expect nothing from them: That their true, safest and onely defence, depended vpon them-selues. It did then behooue euery man to finde meanes to surmount his forces, and speedily to relecue the Common-wealth with counsell, meanes, yea and with his owne life: That the publicke Treasury would shrinke vnder an insupportable burthen, vnlesse it were speedily releued by the Citizens: in regard that the expence alone of Dalmatia with the new prouisions thereof, did monethly mount to more then fise and twenty thousand crownes: that it behooued them to glad the people who were ouer pressed with sorrow, and amazed, and to comfort them by the presence of those, vnto whome the conseruation of the state did belong, to shew that they were desirous to be sharers in the dangers, and troubles, which should be offered. Let those then (quoth hee) who were appointed depart with speed, and goe to execute that which is commanded them, and let others, vnto whome some publicke charge shall be committed, freely accept thereof: He that is moued thereto by his duty, encrease his owne glory, and he that maketh none account thereof, let obedience moue him; if nothing else can prouoke you, yet at least wise let necessity and the present dangers, make yee discrete, diligent and ready in all things. The Princes authority, and the force of his reasons, did confirme diuers, who would haue freed them-selues from taking any publicke charge vpon them.

The resolution of the Turkes in Dalmatia.

Nadin yeeldeth to the Turkes.

The Turkes
take the castle of Laurana.

The Turkes in the meane time, the more that they vnder-stood the great preparations which were made to prevent them in Dalmatia, the more they made hast to come and assaile it: And for their better weakening of the Venetians defences, they resolved at one time to assaile all the Principall townes, to the end that the one might not helpe the other: And hauing assembled great forces at Cluin, a towne vnder their obedience, they entered with foure thousand horse and as many foote, vpon the Territory of Zara, and besegged Nadin the Venetians cheefe Castle, seated vpon those confines, Sebastiano Sagredo being Governor thereof, who had an hundred and fifty Italian foote-men with him, vnto whome the onely sight of the enemies gaue such feare and terror, as they basely yeilded on condition to haue their liues saued, without making any prooue of their valour, or vie of the places situation, and retired to Zara, whether they brought more feare then comfort, by exalting the enemies forces to couer their owne shame.

The like befell the Castle of Laurana which was commanded by Vilure So-rance with like number of soldiers as in Nadin, who hauing for one whole day sustained the battery, fled away and was taken by the enemies: but Zemone being abandoned by the Italian footmen, was garded and defended by certaine Sclauonians, whome some Venetian gentlemen of the family of the Vinieri, vnto whom it did belong, had placed there.

The

The Turkes hauing put Garrisons in Nadin and Laurana, went vp and downe scouring the country euen to the gates of Zara, so as none durst come abroad although the enemies campe lay farre off. The Cities of Antiuare, Dulcina, and Sebenic, were in the same trouble. The Sangiach of Scutari went with great forces of foot and horse to Antiuare, and did encampe betwixt the sea shore and the walles, and had sent part of his forces to beseege Dulcina.

Success sent to Antiuare.

But Bondalmiero, captaine of the Gulphe, hauing notice thereof did speedily releue the Antiuarians, the like did the Generall Capello within a while after, by sending them souldiers and munition, so as the Batha depaying of any speedy or happy successe in his enterprize, determined to raise his seege from before Antiuare, causing those who at the same time lay before Dulcina to doe the like.

As for Sebenic, part of the forces that were assembled at Cluin, went thither at the first, and after the taking of Nadin and Laurana, many foldiers did goe thither, who neuer came neere the city, because their number was not comparable to a true army, but went scattering vp and downe, and spoiled the country. The Sibenians hauing intelligence of the enemies coming, resolving bravely to defend and keepe the towne for the Venetians, did assemble them-selues together in the market-place, where they all swore a sollemne oath that they would not yeeld to the enemy, but endure all extremity rather then falsifie their faith. But the Turkes being not able to execute their designs vpon the other townes so easily: as they supposed, would not likewise medle with this, hauing before bent their thoughts vpon Hungary: where vpon so soone as they had reduced all their forces together, and made vp the body of an army, leauing three thousand men for the gard of the frontiers, they marched towards Boffina, from thence to passe into Hungary.

The Sibenians bravely resist
the Turkes.

The Turkes
leue Dalmatia, and goe to Hungary.

The Turkes departure forth of the confines of Dalmatia did greatly ease the Venetians, and freed that poore people from much calamity. But as the alteration of affaires doe easily alter mens designs, the gouernors and captaines of that Prouince, who did badly digest the wrongs which they had sustained by the enemies, and most of all because an infamous imputation was laid vpon them for the losse of certaine townes, and for suffering them without resistance to scoute and spoile the country, made a proposition (being desirous to make vse of the occasion which did offer it selfe by reason that the enemies campe was farre off) to attempt the recovery of those townes which the Turkes did possesse; wherewith acquainting the Councell of Tenne, they did asseure that the forces which were in Dalmatia, were sufficient for the execution of that enterprize: As also, because that if the castles nere to Zara were not recovered, the city would be still in feare, hauing such mighty enemies to their neere neighbours who not stirring forth of their Garrisons, did hold it in a manner besegged.

The Proposition
of the captains
in Dalmatia.

These propositions were entertained in the Senate with great attention, where the desire to be reuenged on the enemies caused the more credit to be giuen vnto them: next, the Duke of Vrbin perswasions, vnto whom the whole matter was imparted, did augment their hope, who did not only commend that proposition, as a matter of great importance, but affirmed, that by adding fise thousand Lansequenets to those Italians that were in Dalmatia, and certaine numbers of Italian horse to the Greeces and Stradiots, it would be an easie matter with those forces to enter into Boffina, and seize vpon some good towne, which might open them a way to greater conquests. That it was better and more profitable to make war in their enemies country then in their owne, and that there were but three thousand horse in garrison at Boffina.

The Senate of
the Duke of Vrbin, allow this proposition.

This aduise carried with it a goodly shew, and a certaine valour attended by profit: wherupon they concluded speedily to raise the Lansequenets, and to this end Constantino Canuto, Secretary to the Councell of the Pregauis, was sent into Bauaria, who by meanes of Duke Lewis, a great friend to the Common wealth, did in a short time performe that he was enioyned, so as those souldiers hauing receiued received their first payment, marched forthwith into Friull. Camillo Friso having in the meane time assembled forth of the garrisons of Dalmatia foure thousand foot and five hundred horse, and taken with him some peeces of ordnance, went and besieged Obrouazza.

The taking of that towne was of importance, it being a place of retreat for the Turkes, where they were wont to assemble themselves to enuade the Venetians confines. The castle was neither strong nor well manned, whereby the enterprize was thought to be as easie as profitable. The castle then, having beene battered two daies one after another, the third day the souldiers went to the assault, where after some small resistance, they entred by the ruines of the wall.

Friso being Master of the place, perceiving that he could not fortifie it but with great difficulty, nor afterwards keepe it, but with much trouble, commanded it to be razed downe to the foundations. But the Turkes being aduertized thereof, came backe on a sodaine and found the Venetians ruining off the castle, who being possessed with feare and terror by the Turkes vnlooked for arrivall, did forsake their worke and retired in disorder towards their ships, being followed at the heeles by the Turkes, who in the end would haue broken and defeated them had not capitaine Camillo de Monte the Neapolitan with certaine troupes made head against them, whilst the souldiers were imbarcked.

As these descignes had at first increased mens courages and hopes, even so, the condition of the affaires altering in a short time, there was no more speech of the other enterprizes of Nadin, Laurana, Clissa, and Ossrouizza; greater difficulties being dayly discovered concerning them, those likewise who had shewed most heate and forwardnesse towards the Turkish enterprizes, beganne by the same accident to grow could, and especially the Duke of Vrbino, who had propounded it, did alleadge diuers impediments, saying that the number of souldiers which he had first craued was not sufficient to enuade those places, and withall to keepe the passages against the enemies, and that a great number would neede to great a quantity of victuals and other provisions as it would be an hard matter to lend them thither, by reason that they were to passe thorow the enemies country. In these perplexities of minde what was best to be done, opinions were very different, some supposing that their forces being ready, they were to be employed for the releefe of the people, who by that meanes might hope for some better fortune, and not to keepe them idle: others on the contrary having maturely considered the matter, were of opinion to dismishe the Laniquenets, by giuing halfe-pay to the souldiers, and great gifts to the capitaines to keepe them still their friends when need should be, and not to passe on any farther against the enemies, for feare least by provoking them, they might draw vpon themselves the whole Turkish forces, to the entire ruine and losse of Dalmatia, seeing it was more expedient to quench that fire then to kindle it, in regard that all forraine aide did deceiue them. These reasons were allowed of, and the Laniquenets were sent home into their country.

The Turkes after this exploit returned into Hungary having first refreshed their Garrisons, which remaying quiet the country was for a time at rest.

All men were in the meane time very desirous to see what would become of those nauall armies: Barbarossa departing from Candy retired towards the confines of Negrepont not attempting any thing, for feare of meeting with the Christian armies. The Generall Capello having great number of gallies, one gallion, and diuers ships of war, the Patriarke Grimani being ioyned with him with the Popes gallies, did waite for the Spanish nauall army which was reported every day to arrive, but none effect thereof was to be seene, consuming to the great griefe of all men the fittest time and season for Marine actions.

The Emperor did promise, speedily to send the 30. Neapolitan gallies which lay

The Venetians take Obrouazza.

The Turkes arrived against the Venetians to quit Obrouazza: & there after enterprize.

The difficulties alleadged by the Duke of Vrbino.

The Senate resolued to send home the Laniquenets, to passe on no further.

The Venetians wait army, and that of the Pope, vntill together.

at Messina, to Corfou, and fiftene ships of warre with three thousand Spanish foot-men conducted by Von Ferrand de Gonzaga, Lieutenant for the King in Sicily, who (because the Duke of Vrbino by reason of his indisposition could not come to the army) was to supply his place: he promised moreover, that so soone as he should come to Barcelona, he would forthwith send away Doria with two and thirty gallies, to saile to Corfou to ioyn with the other army.

Diuers things neuerthelesse caused men to doubt that it would not so come to passe: first, because that the Emperor, before his going to Nice, had often said, that it was impossible for him at one time to assaile the Turkes and the French, and the assembly of Nice being broken off without any effect, by reason of the French, there was no great hope in his forces. Next, his officers at Naples did not only hinder those capitaines whom Camillo Friso had sent to leauy souldiers in the Kingdome for the defense of Dalmatia, but vnder feigned excuses refused (contrary to the treaty of the league) the Generall Capello a certaine quantity of corne for the entertainment of the army. Diuers others deeds and words gaue iust occasion of suspition, that the Emperor sought nothing else but to let time slip away vnprofitably, not being willing, or else able, to make warre vpon the Turke as he should, hindring on the other side as much as he could, the Venetians from agreeing with them, for feare least the whole burthen of the war should light alone vpon himselfe.

The Emperor in the end seeking new meanes of assuring himselfe, propounded to the Venetians the renewing of the capitulations of the league, the which although it was a superfluous matter, in regard of the short time since the agreement was made at Rome, they did neuerthelesse satisfie him therein, because they would not omit any thing which might serue for the vnion of the armies to let all men know their great desire to pursue the warre.

The Capitulations being confirmed, the Emperor commanded Gonzaga, who was not yet gone, to saile to Corfou, where he arrived with the Gallies only, hauing left their ships behind to the end (said he) that the residue of the foot forces which were not yet come thither might haue shipping. But his so much desired coming, was to no great purpose, because that the Generalls to the Venetians and the Pope, hauing made a motion to goe from thence and to scoure towards the Leuant, he would not consent thereto, saying, that it was no safe matter for the Confederates, nor very honourable for the Emperour to execute any enterprize with so few forces, wherevpon he was desirous to tarry till the arrivall of the ships, which he knew could not much linger.

The armies remaying in this manner at Corfou, the Patriarke Grimani being impatient of so long stay there, without doing any thing, departed thence with sixe and thirty gallies, and sailed toward Saint Nicolao de Ciuita, and hauing intelligence by the way, that the castle of Preuse was not very well garded, he resolved not to let slip such an occasion, but to assaile it on the sodaine, the place being an assured retreat for the Turkes, when they did meane to enuade Christendome: the Patriarke going on in this resolution to assaile it, hoping to take it by some vnlooked for assault, and being come to the Channel of Preuse, the galley of Paul Iustinian did shew the way to the rest, where all of them being entred, he landed his souldiers and artillery in the plaine field a mile of from the castle, and because the greatest hope of the happy successe consisted in speed and diligence, without spending time in making trenches and rampiers, he beganne sodainly to batter the castle-walles with the artillery, himselfe being come on shore to hasten the businesse, and to continue the battery without intermission. But they had scarce begunne the battery when on a sodaine, people from all places round about come running into the field where the Venetians lay, and the number of them hourly increasing, grew so great, as our men being lodged in the same field without trenches or rampiers, were affraide least the enemies caualry should

Men did doubt the Emperors promise.

The Emperors designe.

Don Ferrand de Gonzaga comes with his company.

The Patriarke Grimani his enterprise vpon the castle of Preuse.

The Patriarke saileth of his enterprise.

should come and over-run them, whereupon they resolu'd on a sodaine to re-embark the souldiers and the ordnance, and without any farther attempt to returne to Corfou.

Grimani his valor and speed was highly praised by some, and condemned by others, who said, that he should haue vied more mature deliberation, and not rashly to haue expos'd himselfe to so great a danger, his journey neuertheless was to purpose, for the viewing of the sytuation of the place, and for what-soeuer should belong to such an enterprise, and was the cause that within a while after, an occasion of a goodly victory was offered, if the Venetians had knowne better how to haue vied it: because that Barbarossa hauing intelligence that the Patriarke had entred the Gulphe of Larta, did forthwith saile thither with all the army, hoping to find him there still and to ouerthrow him.

Now newes being brought to Corfou which way Barbarossa directed his course, and that he had tarried at Preuefe, the captaines opinions were very different concerning that which was to be done. Some said it was best to send to Messina, whither Doria was come from Spaine, for to hasten his coming to Corfou: others, that it was not good to depart from Corfou, but there to expect him, because he did meane to come thither shortly, it being neither for the profit nor safety of the Common-wealth, to abandon the castle of Corfou and the gard of the whole Gulphe.

Doria commeth to Corfou.

The army of the league
saileth to goe to Preuefe.

Doria at the last came to Corfou vpon the seuenth day of September, but not with all the gallies, for he had some of them in Spaine for the gard of those seas against Pirates, and other some were gon into Africk to the aide of Thunis and Gazetta, there being some suspicion that the Moores & Turks of those quarters would raise some tumults. At his arrival they began a new to consult on that which was to be done, where by the General consent of all men they resolu'd to goe to Preuefe to fight with the enemies. The meaning of our men was, so soone as they should come thither, to land the troupes, and to vse all meanes to become Masters of the castle, &c. to build a fort right ouer against it, to keepe the entry of the Gulph open, that it might be in their owne power to rake what resolution they pleased, either to enter into it to fight with the enemies army, or to stop the going forth thereof, and to defeat it of it selfe. There were in the leagues nauall army a hundred and six and thirty gallies, two gallions, and thirty armed ships. These vessels were diuided into fve battaillions: in the first were all the great ships placed, vnder the command of Francisco Doria, and in the other foure, all the light vessels diuided in this manner: The Patriarke Grimani sailed formost, and the General Capello last of all, and in the midst, were Doria and Gonzaga. The whole fleet staid a while at the Gomenizzes, tarrying for the Emperors other ships, but they making no haste to come, and the Generals hauing a prosperous winde, sailed towards Saint Maure.

The order of the league
sail.

The Turkes do wonder at the Christians
boldnesse.

Some opinion ons of the Turkish army.

The Turkes hauing notice that the Christian army, which departed from Corfou, did saile directly towards them, were greatly amazed, as those who thought themselves safe enough in that haven, and could not thinke that those armies would so soone haue bene vnited together, or that being vnited, they would haue resolu'd to seeke them out to fight with them: whereupon, wondering at their boldnesse, they were in great doubt what they were best to doe: some thought it a goodly matter, for that after they had scoured the seas all the sommer, and greatly endammaged the Venetians, they had retired themselves without any losse in length, to consume the Venetians, and to separate the intelligence and forces of the Confederates, and by that means, purchase to themselves a more assured victory: whereupon they counselled Barbarossa not to stirre forth of the Hauen, where they might liue safely, by reason of the castle, and the Streight of the Channell, with commodious abundance of all things: others with a barbarous insolency not being able to endure that the Christians who were wont to fly from them, should now shut them vp into an haven, made a motion presently to goe forth with the whole army to fight with them, saying, that to continue so shut vp, besides the great infamy that would redound vnto them thereby, it would not purchase them any safety, by reason that they might be kept in longer then they thought, and thereby be deprived of all commodities: How that Saliman would vndoubtedly commend that valliant and generous counsell, rather then to endure that his enemies should come and defie his army in his owne hauens and vnder his owne fortes, to the contempt of the reputation of his forces and happy fortune, and of the Otoman Empire.

Barbarossa was a man valliant and couragious, and accustomed to the hazards of fortune, who had often fauored him, he knew likewise how that diuers of the great Turkes Porte did enuy his greatnesse, and that the retreat from Corfou and the infortunate issue of that enterprise, whereof he had bene the chiefe author, had caused them to vse sinister speeches of him, whereby he feared the diminution of his credit, and the losing of the great Turkes grace and fauor: besides, he had some hope, that the captaines of the Christian army, notwithstanding that they were nere them, were not fully resolu'd to fight: and that which confirmed him in that opinion, was the treaties of agreement which Doria had already prattized with him.

These things made him resolute to goe forth with the army, and promised him great reputation for such an exploit. He had in his fleet, a hundred and fifty vessels which vied the oare, and a certaine number for saile, wherein were comprehended, diuers Galeors, Fusts, and other smaller vessels. Resolving then to goe forth and to shew himselfe to the Christian army, not to seeke, nor refuse the battaile, but as a politike and well aduised captaine, to vse meanes to discouer the enemies behavior and defeignes, he would before his going forth with the whole fleet send forth fifty of his gallies, to sound the meaning of the Captaines of the league, and to discerne whether their intention was to fight, and in what order they did set forward.

The Confederates nauall army did at the same time saile towards Saint Maure, but those in the tops hauing discouered the enemies that were come forth, aduertized the captaines, who altered their course, sayling against them towards the entrance of the Gulphe of Larta, from whence they came: whereupon by altering their course the order of the fleet was likewise changed, so as the General Capello was in the vanguard, who from as farre as he could descry the Turkes vessels causing those of his battailon to double the banks of Rowers, did speedily set forward against the enemies and by discharging diuers Canons vpon them, enforced them to returne from whence they came, the which they did speedily (being come forth only to discouer and not to fight) as they fell into some disorder, whilest euery one of the gallies striued which should enter first to free themselves from danger, which neuertheless grew greater by their fight, by reason that by turning their gallies, their poores lay open to the ordnance shot, being neither able to defend themselves, nor to be releued by their fellows, who kept the mouth and entrance of the Gulphe closely shut vp.

Doria who sailed in the battaile, so soone as he perceived it, did set forward, all men supposing that he did it to keepe the enemies from entering into the mouth of the Hauen, who being beaten both in poope and flanke, could not choose but bee vanquished or sunke: But so soone as hee came nere to them, he sent commandement thorow the whole fleet (no man knowing the cause why) that vpon paine of punishment, all his gallies should forthwith retire, and being ioyned altogether should saile to the Ducall Cape in the Island of Saint Maure, so the great astonishment and griefe of all men, whereupon, men did boldly and openly thorow the whole army vse reproachfull speeches against him, for that by his

Barbarossa his considerations vpon this sundry opinions.

The number of Barbarossas
fleet.

*Barbarossas
sendeth forth fifty Gallies to discouer the Christian army.*

The Turkish
Gallies are in a manner put out of the army of the league.

Doria in fauor to the enemies causeth his army to retire.

meanes

meanes they had lost the commodity of ouer-throwing a great part of the enemies fleet without the losse of one only man.

Being come to that place the chiefe of the army beganne a new to consult on what were best to be done: some were of opinion to send part of their gallies to assaile the castle of Lepanto, affirming that Barbarossa would neither himselfe come forth nor yet suffer his gallies to leaue the Gulphe without vrgent necessity: and if he should come forth, it would be in their owne power to take what aduantage they pleased to giue battaile; others thought it fit to returne speedily to Preucle, because that the Turkish Army not stirring forth of his place, they might assaile the castle, and if it did come forth they would be enforced to come to battaile to their disaduantage, and be assailed before they could put themselves into order of battaile.

This opinion was allowed, as being thought fittest for the honour of our army, and for the assurance of breaking that of the enemies: and thereupon the army of the league, departing from Saint Maur on the eight and twentieth of September, sailed forward in the same order as at the first. But the winde hauing failed them by the way, which till then had euer fauoured them, they were enforced because they would not separate the gallies from the ships to row them with great discommodity and delay, by meanes whereof the Turkes had time to come forth of the Gulphe, and to order themselves in battaile as they desired, contrary to the opinion of the confederates: so as the army of the league desired that of the enemies in battaile, before it could come to the mouth of the Gulphe, the which came sailing with a faire winde vp to ours.

We haue now (said Doria) caused the enemy to dislodge according to our desire, it is now in our power to fight, but certainly it behooueth vs well to consider of it: it is a matter of very great importance, and repentance afterwards will be in vaine. We are to consider, that by giuing battaile, we comant to the hazard of a short time not onely this army, but likewise the whole reputation of the Confederate Princes; and if I may so say, the wealth and safety of all Christendome; because that these forces being lost, where are the meanes to set forth an other fleet to oppose the enemies to stop the course of their victory? What hope is there of being able to defend and preserve the sea townes, without forces at sea? Then turning himselfe towards the Venetian Generall, he added, that it was his part, whom it most of all concerned, to consider those things, because that the danger which threatened the State and liberty of his Common-wealth was greatest of all other.

Capello made answer, that the Senate had commanded him to fight with the enemy when occasion should be offered, and that at the same time to faire an one being presented, he was to obey that commandement, and to beseech God that the iustice of their cause might be accompanied with a fortunate successe to the seruice of all Christendome, and their owne particular commendation, and that his desire was to be placed in the most dangerous part of the battaile which he would willingly accept. The Patriarke Grimani seemed to be of the same mind; notwithstanding that in the beginning he had counselled them to goe to Lepanto.

Doria perceiuing that all men consented to a battaile, Be it so then (quoth he) and I beseech God to fauor our enterprise, and in so saying, he did speedily cause the battalions banner to be erected, and gave order for whatsoeuer was necessary, saying that with his owne battallion he would be the first that should charge the enemy: All men were ioyfull when they vnderstood this resolution, for the great hope they had of victory, and in regard of the smal forces that were in the enemies army, whereupon they imagined that they would not haue the courage to attend them, but that they made that shew only in brauery. The Captaines in the meane time did exhort the souldiers to fight valiantly, setting before their eyes the greatness and facility of the victory, the rich spoiles, and the immortal glory prepared come forth

The Turkes
of the Gulphe doe put them selves in bat-talle.

Doria his remourence vs
the whole
army.

Capello his answer.

The resolution to giue battaile reioyceth the whole army.

for the vanquisher. Doria would needs saile formost with his gallies, placing Capel in the battaile, and Grimani in the rereward, to succour with his battallion those parts which he should perceiue to haue most need, he commanded Antonio Doria who conducted the great vessels, that keeping before the light gallies, hee should vse meanes to get the winde of the enemies, that he might with more ease runne vpon them, and with his ordnance disorder them, before they should come too neere the light gallies. But the Turkes on the other side, seeking the same aduantage, yf all meanes they could to get before the Christian Army, that they might first assaile it; which Doria perceiuing, did in time draw his army towards the land, to keepe the enemies from possessing those quarters. Then vpon the sodaine, there beeing no winde at all, it was an hard matter to pursue that desiegn, in regard that the light Gallies were with many turnings enforced to tow the great ships: yet neuertheless, all men were so earnest to the battaile, that by their industry this impediment was taken away, and the two great ships, namely the Argo and the Gallion, were placed at the head of the Army like two strong Towers, to breake the enemies first assaults.

So soone as Barbarossa perceiued those two great ships comming against his Armie before the calme, fearing least hee should bee first enforced to fight with them, hauing auoided it as much as hee could, began to repent his comming forth of the Gulphe of Preuze: Yet neuertheless taking presently courage, hee did euery where play the part of a good Capitaine, thinking on nothing more then on fight, seeking all aduanrages that the condition of the time and place would afford him, and chiefly hee sought to bend his course towards the cape of the Island of Saint Maur: wherevpon auoiding at the same time the meeting with those two great vessels, hee did vse meanes by turning to the other side, to charge our Army on their backs, the which being desirous to keepe the great vessels vnited to the light ones, could not but with great difficulty & disorder moue and chang their place; and therefore hee did sollicit his souldiers, both by promisses and threats not to be discouraged; and to speake truth, hee did that day do whatsoeuer belonged to a discrete and valiant Capitaine. He had diuided his Army into three parts, the right wing was gouerned by Trabacchio, the left by Salecia, both of them valiant Captaines, and renowned for their great experience, and Barbarossa was in the midst with the body of the battaile. Dragut a famous Pirat, went before the whole army, with great numbers of Fustes, Galloes, and some light Gallies, as it were to lead the way to the rest, and with those lighter vessels to begin the skirmish. The long delay and irresolution of our men, or the speed and good fortune of the enemies, the sea beeing calme, so that the great vessels could doe no seruice for want of winde, did giue the Turkes time and leisure first to possess that part neere to the firme land, which the Captaines of the league had determined to leaze on, and to driue the enemies from it, who lying in a very commodious place, and a great way off from our vessels, lay in front of the Christian Army to describe how it would make vp towards them, supposing themselves to be forth of danger, by reason that they perceiued that the Captaines of the league were determined to giue battaile without those great vessels, and that it was dangerous to row them any further on in the view of the enemies; so as it seemed that it was in their power either to giue battaile or not.

Doria in the meane time beeing followed by all the light Gallies, turning towards those great vessels, had for a time not onely held our men, but the enemies in doubt what he would doe, all men expecting when he would turne the prowes of his ships vpon the enemy, and begin the fight. But during this long delay, hee gaue time to the Turkes to get the vantage, and to eschew the battaile. Doria's pollicy was (as hee said afterwards) to beguile the enemies, who being vncertaine what course he would hold, thought it best to lie at sea in the same place, and close order which they held: whereby it had bene an easie matter for him, by fetching a great

The Turkes
purpos broken by Doria.

Barbarossa repenteth his comming forth of the Gulphe
of Preuze.

The order of Barbarossa
his Army.

The enemies got into a place of safety too near the fault of those of the league.

What Doria
purpos was.

B b b b

compasse

compasse, to haue assailed them with his Galleys in sundry places. But Barbarossa perceiuing his intent, did with great speed (as hath bene said) make to land-ward, keeping still, as he sailed along, the prows of his Galleys turned towards our Army, keeping as farre off as he could from our great vessels.

The Army of the league in the meane time, to all mens wonder, stood immovable to behold the enemies insulting, and the faire occasion which it lost; the Generall Capell, and Grimani, began to cry out with a lowd voyce, that they were no longer to loose time, nor the certain hope of so goodly a victory. Capell, presently after, leapt into a Frigate, and was carried round about the fleet, stirring vp all men to battaile, being reciprocally welcomed and commended of all men, and being 10 come to Doria's Galley, he said vnto him, Let vs goe my Lord to charge the enemies that flye from vs; time, occasion, and the soldiers cries doe call vs forth, the victory is ours, I will bee the first that shall charge, and I tarry for nothing but the commandement to begin the fight.

Capell was a man of three score and thirteene yeares of age, of a cheerefull countenance, healthfull constitution, singular iudgement, and was reuerenced of all men for his age and great discretion, ioyned with a singular experience in marine matters, so as great estimation was made of his aduice and counsell; and indeed all men were desirous of battaile, and did ioynly cry out, battaile, battaile, victory, victory. Doria at the last being moued by these cries, and spurred forward by 20 shame, commanded the rest to set forward, and himself with his battalion did passe on beyond the great ships, our army came neerer to the enemies Galleys, who were already come to the place they wist for, their poores beeing towards the land, and their prows to sea-ward: wherevpon, from both parts (though a farre off) the Cannon plaid, so as a man would haue thought that the battaile had bin begun, and yet neither on the one side nor other, did the Galleys set forward. Doria did still looke when that the Turkes, all amazed, would forsake the Galleys without fight, and saue themselves on shoare, and Barbarossa perceiuing the light Galleys to bee backt by the Gallion and the Argozey, durst come no neerer for feare least the Ordnance of those great ships would disorder and sinke him, but 30 Doria hauing for a time continued in this manner, and perceiuing that his pollicy tooke no effect, and resoluing (as his actions did afterwards shew) not to commit himselfe to the hazard of a battaile, began openly to retire.

The Turkes taking courage by the retreat of our men, did come so farre forward, as diuerse of the enemies Galleys were very neere to the Gallion and the Argozey, who by reason of the place, wherein they were, and their greatnesse they could not retire so soone, but a Cannon shot beeing made vpon the Gallion, and fire taking in a barrell of powder, the marriners and soldiers were in great feare and disorder: but the Captaine providing a speedy remedy for it, did defend them from danger, and the Turkish Galleys comming still neerer to these ships, 40 both of them at one time discharged their ordnance vpon them, so as euery Bullet dooing execution, they enforced them sodainly to retire.

In this manner the whole army of the league beeing safe and vntoucht (sauing a few vessels that were lost in the retreat) was brought to Corsou. Doria in his Galley would be the last that should retire, thereby to shew himselfe more braue and valiant, or else that hee had a great care of the Army: but all men knew, that it did not proceed from magnanimity of courage, or from any good will that hee did beare to the cause, but onely because hee trusted to the swiftnesse of his owne Galley, wherein he might easily escape, which Capell perceiuing, would not likewise depart, till the very selfe-same time that hee retired. 50

The end of the second Booke of the sixth Decade.

The Contents of the third Booke of the sixth Decade.

BArbarossa retireth into the Gulph of Larta, for feare of Seatempests. How all men did condemne Andre Doria. The Confederates take Castel Nowo in the Gulphe of Cathara. Doria with his Galleys retireth into Sicily. The Venetians take Risana. The occasions which moued the Senate to make peace with the Turke. Gritti goeth to Constantinople for that purpose. Guy Vbaldo, Duke of Vrbin, sonne to Francesco Maria, is made Generall of the Venetian troopes. An Accord betwixt the Pope and the Duke of Vrbin for the Dutchy of Camarin. Barbarossa recouereth Castel-novo. The Bascha alledgeth Solimans complaints concerning the accord with the Venetians. Barbarossa giueth an assault to Cathara, hoping to take it. The Baschas unreasonable demands vpon the agreement with the Venetians. The Emperor Charles passerh thorow France into Flanders, to chastice the Gantois. The Cardinall Farnese commeth into France, as Legat at that enter-viue. The Conclusion of the peace with the Turkes according to their owne minde. The sorrow and discontent of those of Naples and Maluesia, when they understood that their Townes were made ouer to the Turkes. And lastly, the Consignation of 40 those two townes into the Baschas hands, with the departure of diuerse of the Inhabitants, to goe and dwell else-where.

Bbbbbb 2

The

The third Booke of the sixth Decad of the Historie of Venice.

10

The Turkish
Army retireth into the Gulph of Laris.

THE Army of the league being returned to Corfou, Barbarossa not being satisfied that hee had escaped shame and danger, went into the Isle of Paxu, some twelue miles from thence, where he continued for a time, daring as it were the Confederates to come forth of their Hauens and fight, or else waiting for an opportunity to endanger them, but the Army of the league was filled with disorder and feare, Doria his conduct being thought most unfortunate, and his loyalty and counsell much suspected: there was no man that durst undertake a deed of consequence: if any proposition were made, infinite numbers of difficulties were found therein, and the Gallies remaining thus in the haven, without any military action, the Turkes after that they had braved the Christian army, fearing foule weather and tempests, by reason that part of October was spent, retired into the Gulph of Laris.

All men cry out upon Doria.

Such was the successe of that yeare, such was the end of so great a warlike preparation, and in a word, that great expectation of all men came to nothing, to the great hurt and disadvantage of all Christendome, and to the particular dishonor of André Doria, against whom, all men cried out, some taxing him of cowardise, others of treachery, and for that hee stood badly affected to the good of Christendome, and particularly to that of the Venetians. Those who spake of it more openly, did blame his sundry immoderate affections, his inrolerable ambition, his feare to expose himselfe to dangers, his great avarice, wherewith he was some-times so blinded, as hee esteemed nothing so much as his owne private gaine. The Spaniards more then all others cried out against him, and especially the Marquis of Aguilar the Emperors Ambassador at Rome, who went about to wipe out the opinion which all men had conceiued, how that the Emperor his maister had intelligence with him, and that by his commandement he had so carried himselfe. But the Venetian Senate being well aduised, thinking it not fit to make him their enemy, in regard hee still had the command of the Army, was desirous, amid these publick curses, to shew that they did in no sort resent it, nor were any whit displeased with him, but wrote him a very louing letter, to assure him that they beleueed, that he, as a wise and discret Capitaine, had done nothing, but with great consideration and good counsell. Yet neuerthelesse, the imputations laid vpon him, being come to his hearing, did greatly afflicke him: so as since his returne to Corfou, he did for many dayes lue in priuate, not coming abroad in publick, and when in his owne presence, any mention was made of that which had happened in that voyage, hee did seeme to bee extremely sorry for it, being scarce able to keepe him selfe from shedding teares, (either true or feigned,) in acknowledgment of his fault.

All

Warlike sorrow
for his fault.

All the Army of the league after that retreat, did for a time remaine at Corfou: but the Confederates supposing it to bee a disgrace vnto them to continue so long in the haven, the season being fit for sea actions, notwithstanding that it was then Autumne, and the enemies being farre from thence, they began to propound sundry matters. The Generall Capell did sollicit them to faile with the whole Army into the Archipelago, where (as he said) some new occasion might be offered of fighting with the enemy, and though that should not come to passe, yet an other notable and certaine profit might redound by that journey, in regard that diuers ships that were laden going to Constantinople, would fall into their hands as an assured booty, besides, they should releuee Naples and Maluesia, and might recouer diuerse Islands of the Archipelago, as easily as they had been lost, from whence they might draw great commodity, and chiefly of Rowers for the Navy, whereby double profit would redound to them, as to driue the enemies from thence, and to make aboade there by reason of the hauens, where with those Islands doe abound, where the fleet might lye in all safety, and their abode there would make Barbarossa ialous and full, so as hee would not dare to carry his fleet to Constantinople, and that Gulphe being taken from him, which was very commodious for his vse, hee would not come forth at all, or else very late, to sea the next yeare: whereby his honor and reputation would enforce him to come to a battaile.

Sundry opinions in the confederates councille.

Others, and especially Doria were of opinion, rather to go and besiege Durazzo, thinking it a dangerous matter to faile at that season vpon the Archipelago, and the labour likewise which should be bestowed in the recovery of those Islands would be lost, there being no safe nor assured Fort; wherupon so soone as the Turkish Army should shew it selfe, they would bee againe recovered: But on the contrary, they could but haue great hope of the happy successe of the enterprise of Durazzo, in regard of the quality of the place, being of it selfe very commodious, a neere neighbour to Italy, and fit for opening the way to greater exploits in Albania. But this proposition likewise did finde sundry difficulties, first, that there were no hauens there fite for the Fleet, especially for the ships, who without danger could not ride vpon those shallow flattes: Next, that the countrey was full of Turkish Cavallery, who might easily breake the enterprise, the like might Barbarossa doe comming to Valona: so as it would bee no safe matter to land the soldiers, and to leaue the vessels vnfurnished, hauing so mighty an enemy neere them: that they were to make warre else-where, and to molest the enemy in places farther off from his greatest forces, which consisted in horse and foote.

Both these propositions then being for these reasons reiected, they resolved to enter the Gulphe, there to enterprise some-what, which might assuredly, and without difficulty answer their desire. The Army then departing from Corfou, sayled to the mouth of the Channell of Catharra to besiege Castle nouo, a place seated on the sea-shore, a little within the Gulphe, which Mahomet had certaine yeares before, taken from Cherfega: that place was sufficiently esteemed, not for being great, or of an impregnable fortification, but onely for the situation, commodious for diuers matters, and chiefly for the Venetians, for the safety of Catharra. About the Towne there is a Castle, kept by a garrison of Turkes, all the other inhabitants are Dalmatians or Sclauonians.

The Confederates Army
commeth to besiege Castle
nouo.

The fleet hauing entered the Gulph, Doria landed his footmen not farre from the castle, and within a while after his ordnance to batter it, giuing the particular charge thereof to Don Ferrant de Gonzaga. But whilst they planted the ordnance, the Generall Capello being come neere to the Citties walls with his gallies, forth of the danger of the Castles shotte, the which comming from aboute flew ouer their heads, hee began to giue an assault to the Towre with his Rowers and mariners, who vsing their oares instead of ladders, and assailing it in sundry places, places, did at last enter it, and opened the Gates to the soldiers: Wherevpon the Turkes did sodainly retire into the Castle, but within a while after, perceiuing that they could not long hold out, they yielded vpon discretion. The towne was sackt by the Spaniards, notwithstanding Don Ferrants prohibition, who knew that the spoile did belong to the Venetians, but the insolency of that nation was so great, as not being satisfied with the spoile of the Citie, when they did meete with any of the Venetian Rowers, returning to the Gallies laden with pillage, they did take all from them, and would perforce enioy the fruite of other mens labours. Barbarossa being aduertised that the Christian Army was gone to besiege Castel-nouo, did leaue Preuceze, and was onward on his way, meaning to go and releue it, or at least by the report of his coming to breake the enemies enterprize: But hauing sailed halfe way thither, a marueilous tempest arose, in which thirty of his Gallies were cast away and sunck: Wherevpon hee returned with the rest, very much beaten to Volona.

Bbbbb 3

The Christian army hauing intelligence of this losse, all men began to cry out and said, that it behooued them to saile forthwith towards the enemies, who were weakened both in courage and forces, to fight with them: the Generall Capello did with great vehemency perswade Doria not to lose such an occasion, seeing it was not farre from thence to Valona, where they might assaile the Turkish fleet, which was not in state to fight, being weakened by the fortune of the sea, nor was able to escape, by reason that all their Oares were in a manner broken: neither could it presume vpon the safety of the place where it lay, the Castle of Valona being not able to defend them, because it was too farre off from the haven. But Doria making excuses, saying some-times that hee resolved to goe thither, and afterwards that the season was vnfit for such an enterprize, with diuerse other impediments, did make such long delays, as hee gaue Barbarossa time and leisure to conduct his army in safety to Constantinople, hauing left Dragut in the Gulph of Lepanto with fise and twenty Gallies, and a certaine number of Galeots and Fusts belonging to Pirats, to hinder the Christians nauigation.

Doria afterwards alledging new occasions, that he might be gone from thence, and chiefly the want of Bisket that was in the Army, resolved to depart, and to carry his Army into Sicily, notwithstanding that he was counselled and exhorted by his owne friends and countrey-men, and namely by Don Ferrants, to keepe the armies ioyned together all that winter, either at Corsou, or in some other commodious place, to the end they might at the spring put to sea betimes, and outstrip the enemies preparations. He left foure thousand Spaniards for the guard of Castel-nouo, vnder the command of Capitaine Iohn Sarmiento, notwithstanding that the Venetian Generall entreated him, that according to the capitulations of the league, the towne might bee assigned to him, to be kept by his soldiers: but excusing himself for that he had no commission so to do, he referred that businesse to the Emperour: he went about beside to place six thousand Spanish footmen in garrison in the cities of Budua, Antiuari, and Dulcino, vnder colour that hee did it for the Venerians commodity, the better to assure those townes, and to haue soldiers alwayes ready to make speedy vse of, at the Spring.

Doria being gone, the Patriarke Grimani followed him within a while after, and sailed to Ancona, where hee disarmed the Gallies, and sent them empty to Venice: afterwards hee went to Rome to yeeld an account to the Pope of that which had bene done. Capello in this manner remaining alone (all the other Commanders being gone) in the Gulphe of Catharra, went to Risiane, a small towne not farre from thence, held by the Turkes with a small Garrison, which being soone yielded vnto him, hee manned with Soldiers, and made Lodouico Zene their Gouverneur. Capello in the meane time, by reason of the toyle and trauaile which hee had sustained, or rather with greefe and discontent, to see matters

matter handled contrary to his desire, fell into a greuous sicknesse, in regard whereof hee besought the Senate to giue him leaue to returne home to Venice to take order for his health.

The Duke of Vrbino at the same time being consumed by a lingering disease dyed, not without suspicion of being poisoned, to the Venetians great greefe and discontent: Sollemne obsequies were made for him at Venice in the Church of the Saints Iohn and Paul.

Now the occasion being so often lost of fighting with the Turkish fleet with a certaine assurance of the victory, and the Spaniards seizing vpon Castel-nouo, did more and more encrease the suspicion which all men had conceived of the Capitaine Generalls small sincerity, or great cowardize: but some said that hee had proceeded in that manner by the Emperors will and consent: wherevpon the Senate was greatly troubled and perplexed, for that it had undertaken such a warre against so mighty an enemy, and made their aronement with him more vncertaine by their refusal thereof, (hauing bene therevnto inuited), vpon the weake and vncertaine hope of the aid of Christian Princes, so as it knew not by what means to assure the conseruation of their State.

The Emperour by good offices had bene disposed to the obseruation of the Articles of the league, namely, to grant a proportion of corne out of Naples and Sicily toward the entertainment of the army, to cause Castel-nouo to be assigned into the hands of the Republicks officers, and to command the Gallies to be ready in the moneth of March, that the fleets might be ioyned together: but the Emperour performing nothing of all this, did still find out delays and excuses; for concerning the proportion of corne, his officers were first to haue their owne share and diuision: for the restitution of Castel-nouo, they alledged that the Common-wealth should first pay the Spaniards for keeping that Fort till then; and as concerning the ready expedition of the Army, in regard that the Emperour determined to be in it in person, it behooued them to make greater preparations, and also to haue more forces, and so consequently a longer time.

But in some of these things, reason, and the effect did manifest, that hee did neither regard equity nor the common good: the Emperors speeches were very magnificent, full of goodly promises, but greatly suspected that hee did only intend to keepe the Venetians bound, by means of the league, that hee might make vse both of their armes and friendship, in as much as concerned his owne particular profit and comodity, and not for the wealth or seruice of the Republicke, by reason that it was knowne, how that the Estates assembled in Spaine did beseech him not to depart forth of the Countrey: besides, his want of money was so great, as although his meaning had bene to haue gone in person into the Army yet hee would not haue had meanes to haue defraied the expences of such a iourney: in regard whereof all men may perceiue that it was farre more safe and expedient for the Signory of Venice to thinke on peace and agreement rather then on armes. That which moued them to this Treaty, was their hope to obtaine peace on honest conditions, seeing that the Turkes did vse them with more respect then they were wont, for they had released the Bailly forth of the Tower of the great Sea, and admitted them into Constantinople, and did likewise put them in hope (as it came to passe) speedily to restore all the Venetian Marchants to their liberty, and to suffer them to trade in the same manner as they had done before, so as they would be bound one for another, not to depart from Constantinople, nor to send their goods forth of the Ottoman Empire.

There came besides to Venice a man whose name was Antonio de Modon, dwelling at that time in Zante, bringing letters from Ianushy his friend, which hee had written to him concerning their owne particular trafficke, wherein hee mentioned how that the great Turke and the Basha were desirous of a Peace with

The Spaniards insolency.

The most part of Barbarossas fleet was destroyed by tempest.

Doria hesitates because he would not fight with Barbarossa.

He is with his galleyes directly into Sicily.

The death of the Duke of Urbino.

The Emperors excuses for not performing his promise.

The Emperors chaffing.

The Senate resolved to do as it pleased with the Turke.

with the Republick: so as if an Ambassador were sent from Venice to Constantinople for that purpose, some agreement might bee easily concluded, and that this Ianushey did offer, (so that they would intreace him) willingly to employ him selfe therein.

All these things did moue the Councell of Tenne to begin some practise of agreement: but to the end it should bee kept secret, they would not for that time send any publick person to Constantinople, but appointed Lorenzo Grissi the Dukes sonne for that iourney, vnder coullor of some affaires of his owne, and in particular for the recouery of certaine goods belonging to a brother of his, who a little before dyed at Constantinople. They enioyned him first to speake of a generall truce, and that hee should bee very earnest therein, the better afterwards to come to some resolution. But if the Turkes should not entertaine it, then to motion a treatie of peace for the Common-wealth, by renewing the ancient capitulations, and on conditions that both sides should yeeld vp those places that had beene taken during that warre.

The French King had an hand in this treaty of truce, sending an Agent expressly for that purpose to Constantinople, but the small hope of any peace was soone discerned, the Turke being not willing to haue any accord with the Emperour, whereupon the better to turne all his forces against him, he had propounded and consented to an agreement with the Venetians. But so soone as Grissi his going to Constantinople was published, notwithstanding that the cause was kept secret, all men did suspect the matter, how that his iourney was to treat of peace with Soliman. Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, Ambassador at that time for the Emperour at Venice, being come into the Senate in secret audience, did discover this suspition, and made a modest complaint, for that they went about to treat of peace with the common enemy, not comprehending therein the Emperour, their friend and confederate, and did afterwards seeke by a long and perswasive oration, to dissuade them from peace with the Turkes. They answered him that the Republick had more then two years since entred into the league, & yet neuertheless it might truly say, that it had alone sustained all the Turkish attempts: That they did allow of the lawfull occasions which had held back the arriuall of the ayde of the other Confederates, at that time when they most needed them, that they did likewise beleue, how it might easily come to passe, that by sundry accidents the same occasions might be againe offered: and yet neuertheless they had ener borne and would beare great respect to the Confederates: that the French King had procured generall truce at Constantinople, by accepting whereof they did suppose to haue procured much wealth and profit to the common cause, whereby great commodity might redound to the league, if there were nothing else then the gaining of time, which the Emperours selfe did thinke to bee most necessary for his voyage into the Levant.

The like pursute was made in the Emperours Court betwixt his Maiesty and the Ambassador of the Common-wealth: But it was not to any purpose, either to hasten the Emperour to make prouisions for warre, or to with-draw the Venetians from the treaty of peace already determined. With such successe ended the year 1538. about the latter end whereof, on the seuen and twenty day of December, Prince Grissi deceased, being foure score and foure yeares of age, hauing gouerned fiftene yeares and seauen moneths, and was buried in Saint Francis Church.

Grissi goes to Constantinople to treat of an agreement.

The Emperours Ambassador doth in the Senate complain against this agreement.

The Senate answer to the Ambassador.

An. 1538.

PIETRO

PIETRO LANDE was chosen in his place, a noble man, and of three score and eightene yeeres of age. The yeere following was in a manner spent about the negotiation of peace, at the beginning whereof, the Venetians supposing that it behooued them only, to trust and hope in their owne forces for the safety of their state, went about to encrease the Garrisons of their fortres, and to re-enforce their Armie, whereupon they made a great leuy of Soldiers, and armed other light and great galleys at Venice, likewise sent a commandement to Alessandro Contarén the Prouidator in Candy, that hee should speedily arme fise and twenty Galleys in that Island. The Senate at the same time decreed, that foure thousand artificers of the City should bee enrolled, with whom, foure times a yeare, the Galleys appointed for that purpose should bee manned, that they might all of them row together, and they did commonly call it, Regata: and sundry stipends were appointed for such as had continued that course thrice together: This was done, that they might bee assured by this exercise still to haue men fit and ready to man on a sodaine, a certain number of Galleys.

They did likewise confirme Guy Vbaldo Duke of Vrbín, in the degree of General of their forces by land, who in his fathers life time, had serued the Republick, they encreased his place with an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horse, and the pay of ten Captaines, with foure thousand Ducats for his entertainment. This Duke was thought a very fitte man for the seruice of the Common-wealth, as well for the excellent parts that were in him, hauing from his youth beene trained vpp in marriall discipline, vnder his deceased Father, as by reason of his Countrey, full of good Souldiers, it being commo-diously feared, for the easie sending of them thence to their Fortes along the Sea coast: Therefore the Senate after the death of the Duke his father, did in signe of loue and honor, send Francesco Sannio their Ambassador, to condole with him for his death, and to assure him that the Senate would neue

The Senate prepares for the conferation of their fortres.

neuer forget the notable seruices which hee had done to the common-wealth. But certaine moneths were spent before they confirmed him in his place, in regard of the Pope, fearing least hee would take it ill, to see them honor and entertaine a Duke that was a feudatarie of the Church, hee being at variance with him. The occasion of their strife, (as hath beene already mentioned) proceeded from the Dutchy of Camerin, which the Duke of Vrbino did enioy, by reason of his wife, the sole daughter and heire to the last Duke of Camerin, and the Pope pretended that the line masculine failing, that infeofment was to returne to the sea Apostolick. The Senate in remembrance of Duke Francesco Maria, who had deferred well of the common wealth, and for the loue that it did beare to the sonne, did earnestly employ it selfe in that businesse, fearing least it might stirre vp some new troubles in Italy, because that the Duke of Mantua, Vncle to Duke Guy his wife, did determine to defend him, not onely with his owne forces, but with those of strangers whom he did meane to call into Italy. The Pope at the last, resolving by force to haue that Dutchy, if hee could get it by faire meanes, it was agreed that Duke Guy should referre himselfe to the sea Apostolick; and that his Holynes should giue him a certaine summe of money in recompence, in name of dowry of the Dutchesse Iulia his wife.

Agreement betwixt the Pope and the duke of Vrbino.

This controuersie being thus ended, Duke Guy was confirmed (as hath beene sayd) in the pension of the Common-wealth. But to the end likewise that the Nauall Army should not bee without an Head, whilest Capell, by the Senates permission lay at Venice for the recovery of his health, who was not yet in state to execute his place, they chose in his stead John Moro, Prouidator Generall at that time in Candy: but the Senate having notice within a while after of his death, the place of Generall was giuen to Thomaso Moceniga, a man excellently scene in the important affaires of the Common-wealth at home and abroad. John Moro was slaine in Candy in a Popular Comotion, betwixt the Greekes and the Italians of the Garrison, among whom hee running with his Halbardiers to appeale the tumult was stricken with a stone vpon the head, whereof within a while after hee died.

The Turkes
great preparations for the recovery of Castell-usum.

These were the preparations of the Venetians, whilest the Turkes did speedily make ready their fleet, being not able to digest the losse of Castell-nouo, as men that were alwayes wonte (to the great losse of all Christendome) to winne and not to loose: therefore resolving before all other things to attempt the recovery of that place, thereby to repaire their honor which that accident had bereft them of, they made great preparations of men and warlike engines, sufficient for a farre greater enterprise.

Dragut in the meane time, whom (as hath beene said) Barbarossa had left in the Gulphe of Lepanto, departed thence with thirty vessels both Gallies and Fusts, all well armed, and beeing come into the Isle of Paxu, did there barre the Christians free Navigation: for hiding himselfe in Saint Nicholas Hauen, foure miles off from Corfu, hee often sent his vessels to scoure the channell of Corfu, and to take those ships which should arrive in that Island: but the Prouidator Pascalie being not able to beare that indignity, determined to goe forth with twelue of his best Gallies, against certaine Turkish Gallies, which were come neere to the land: but the enemies not tarrying for him, fled towards the Gulphe of Larta, to deceiue the Prouidator, and to make him thinke, that there were no other Vessels of theirs at Paxu: but as the Prouidators Gallies, giving chase to those Galeots, were come farther to Sea-ward, they discovered Dragut, who coming forth of Paxu, with the residue of his Galeots and Fusts, had put himselfe forward to Sea, to take the advantage of the winde, that hee might the better be able to encompassse the Prouidator, who then perceling the danger, wherinto hee should runne by goeing any farther forward, did sodainly

Dragut policy to encompassse
the Venetian
Galleys.

did sodainly hoist sailes, and turned back towards Corfu, beeing still pursued by the enemies vessels, which coming very neere to them, caused three Venetian Gallies, who feared that they should not be able to escape by flight, to runne on ground vpon the Sands of Messinga twelue miles off from Corfu, where they did beat themselves in peeces, all the men within them, with their goods, escaped, one only Galley, belonging to Antonio Canalis, whose saile yards were broken and thereby vnable to follow the rest, was taken by the enemies.

This successe having made the Turkes more bold and insolent, they went with those vessels into the Ile of Candy, where landing vpon the territory of Canea, they burnt and spoiled the Countrey; but great numbers of Stadions and feudataries of the Island being gathered together, did charge them so fiercely as hauing slayne diuers of them, they did enforce the rest to returne to their Gallies: Gritti the same time returned from Constantinople about the beginning of Aprill, hauing made great hast in his journey: hee reported how that by the meanes of Iannus hee had beene brought into the prelence of the Visier Bascha, who although hee entertained him very curiously, did neuertheless first of all greatly complaine, of the hostile actions which lundry officers of the Republicke had executed vpon the Musulmans, which the Signory had left unpunished, then proceeding farther hee told him how badly hee did digest their manner of proceeding against the great Lord, and all those of his Port, hauing neuer vouchsafed to make any answer to the propositions of agreement which hee had set downe vnto them. Gritti vpon this discourse supposing that the Turkes were not at that time much disposed to peace, had craued a suspension of armes, on all sides for three monethes, to the end that in the meane time they might treat of an agreement, which hauing obtained, hee did at the same time publish as hee passed along vpon the Frontiers, so as the Turkish troopes encamped before Saona to take it, that they might afterwards goe and beseege Spalatia, did sodainly retire vpon this publication.

The Bascha
complained to Gritti against the Venetians

Truce for three moneths betwixt the Turkes and
Venetians.

The newes of this truce did not greatly please the Venetians, diuers fearing that his suspension of armes for so short a time might rather tend to cause some distrust in the Confederate Princes, then procure any peace: therefore the opinions in the Senate, touching the pursute of this businesse, were sundry & different, where after long disputation it was resolved to send an Ambassador to Soliman to treat of peace, and Petro Zene was chosen to that end. And whilest he was preparing for his journey, and the accustomed presents, Gritti was dispatched to Constantinople to carry news of the Ambassadors election, and to vse means to prolong the truce, and to begin, as occasion should be offered, to motion peace, being expressly inioyned, therein to imploy the fauor and Councell of the Lord of Rincon, Ambassador for the most Christian King at the Port of the great Lord, who had very earnestly oftentimes offered himselfe to deale in that businesse: but it was afterwards perceiued that hee did more harme then good, by making the matter more difficult, to the end that the King his maister might at the least be chosen vmpier of their controuersy, and might reconcile them to Soliman, and thereby oblige them to him-selfe and disioyne them from the Emperor.

The French
Ambassadors
designe.

At the same time that Gritti arrived at Venice, the new Generall had received the Standard of the Common-wealth and was ready to depart to his charge, but beeing not yet gon forth of the Hauen, his departure was deferred, supposing that his proceeding on his journey might cause the Turkes to suspect that this negociation of peace was feigned, and by that meanes might returne to invade the confines of the Republique, which newly began to lue at quiet: but to the end that the Army in the meane time should not be without an head, the same power and authority which the Generalls by Sea were wont to haue, was giuen to the Prouidator Contaren.

The Ambass. Zene within a while after departed from Venice being sufficiently in-instructed what hee had to doe, but being come to the Serraglio of Boffina, and falling greuously sick, hee dyed there within a while after, whereof the Senate beeing aduertised by Petro Francejchis his Secretary, they chose Thomas Contaren in his steed, a man of foure score and foure yeares of age, but greatly esteemed for his wildome and particular knowledge in the Turkish affaires, with whom hee had a long time conuersed vpon sundry occasions. Hee was enioyned to depart within foure dayes, and in the meane time they speedily aduertised Gritti, and the Secretary of the new election, to the end hee might acquaint the Balcha therewith, with whom Gritti his proposition, concerning a generall truce, was to no purpose, the Turkes still continuing their preparations, determining to recouer 10 Castel-nouo rather by force then by agreement. Barbarossa was already gone thither with an hundred and fifty saile of all sorts, and with great store of Artillery: the Beglerby of Grecia was at the same time gone thither with a great Cavallery: so, that beeing contented to make an agreement with the Venetians, they did likewise make no great difficulty to prolong the truce with them for the whole moneth of September. The report of this treaty beeing diuulged, men did diuersly discourse thereof; interpreting it according to their owne passions: the Pope neuertheless among others did greatly commend the Venetians, for that they had in such sort provided for the safety of their state, seeing that the other way would rather haue hurt then profited them. Now Barbarossa pursuing his iourney, did in 20 no sort hurt any thing that did belong to the Venetians, saying, That his meaning was to obserue the truce with them, but that the Emperor was not comprehended therein, whereupon he was desirous to besiege Castel-nouo, which was held by the Imperials: The Spaniards that were within it beeing danned by the artiuall of the Army, and great numbers of Turkes, did offer that to the Venetians which they had before so brauely refused, namely, to deliuer Castle-nouo to them; but the Senate answered, That the same offer was out of time, that they had oftentimes requested that the Capitulations of the league might be obserued, and that according thereto, that the same place might be deliuered to them, and that at the same present, being enforced to a treaty of peace, they neither ought 30 or could doe any thing that might interrupt it.

Barbarossa then in the moneth of August, being come into the Gulphe of Catharra with ninety Gallies and thirty Fusts, did cast anchor so farre off from Castel-nouo, as the Artillery within it could not offend him, and safely landed his troopes, with foure score peeces of ordnance of all sorts. At the same time in a manner, Musman Sangiach of the Prouince came thither with great numbers of foot and horse, which encamped round about the towne, those within it not being able by their sallies to hinder their encamping. The Turkes hauing begun the battery in three places, did so well continue it, and did afterwards assaile it in such sort, as all those of the towne, after they had brauely defended themselves, being taken 40 and slaine, Barbarossa made himselfe maister of the place, who after the taking of Castel-nouo went to Rissane, which was yeluded vnto him without contradiction, by Lodouico Zene, the Garrison being not strong enough to defend it: Barbarossa assent to Matteo Bembo Governour of Catharra, to will him to deliuer that place vnto him, with whom hee fought occasions of quarrell, that hee might assaile that towne.

In the end, after sundry complaints that his runne-away slaues were retyred thither, with other feigned matters which hee alleadged, hauing layde aside all respect of the truce, hee did audaciously send word to the Governour to deliuer the City of Catharra into his hands, otherwise hee would come and take it by force, beeing commanded by Soliman to seaze vpon that Fort, and on what-so-euer the Signory did possesse in those quarters: therefore hee should not doe well to attend and waite for his owne ruine, but to provide 50

Truce is proposed betweene the
the Venetians

The Spaniards
not being able to keepe Castel-nouo, offer it to
the Venetians.

Castel-nouo is taken by Barbarossa.

Barbarossa
summoneth the Governour of Catharra to deliuer the towne vnto
him.

in time for the safety of himselfe and people; that he would giue leaue to as many as would depart thence, so to doe, and good entertainment to such as would abide there.

Bembo not being daunted with these summons, although hee did not looke for them, vied speedy meanes to provide all things necessary for the defence of the towne, and to stirre vp the Citizens and souldiers to a braue resistance; then hee answered Barbarossa, that hee did greatly wonder, and so would likewise all the world beside, at his audacious demand, the which beeing wholly against all reason, hee could not imagine to proceed from Soliman, who was 10 cuer wont to keepe his word and promise, and that therefore hee did so much relie vpon the iustice of his owne cause, as hee did determine to keepe and defend that towne, committed vnto him by his Country and Common-wealth.

Barbarossa made no reply to this answer, but caused part of his Gallies to set forward, the which being inconsiderately come neere to the forte, were to their great hurt and losse beaten backe by the Artillery: Barbarossa beeing the next day come thither with the residue of the army, was likewise repul- 20 sed by the ordnance; and hauing landed great numbers of souldiers farre off from the castle, those which went by the way of the hill, coming very neere vnto the walles, were so hurt by small peeces of ordnance which were planted vpon the highest place of the castle, as being disordered they made all possi- 30 ble haste they could for to returne towards their Gallies: but vpon those who went on the land side wherethe Church and Monastery of Saint Francis standeth, with whom Barbarossa was in person to view the place, the Stradiots with certaine Harquebuziers on horse backe made a salley, and enforced them to re- tire to their losse; and to saue themselves on the toppe of the next hill whither the horse-men could not follow them.

Barbarossa hauing well viewed and obserued the castle, and the resolution of those within it, brauely to defend themselves, despayring of being able to take 30 it, hauing stayed there one day longer without enterprizing any thing, determined to raise his campe and to returne to the mouth of the Gulphe; whether being come, and leaving a strong Garrison in Castel-nouo, hee did wholly depart forth of the Gulphe of Catharra: it was then thought that hee would goe to scoure the sea-coasts of Puglia; and by the way hee passed by the Channell of Corfiou, wherein signe of friendship hee was saluted with certaine Cannon shot from the castle, and presented from the Governour with fresh cates, and certaine garments, which hee did very willingly receiue with great thanks, and kinde speeches.

The report of the taking of Castel-nouo, and Barbarossa his enterprize vpon 40 Catharra was not very pleasing to the Senate, fearing, that their army beeing deuided, the enemy would make some other attempt vpon their State. At the same time whilst that the Turkes did batter Castel-nouo, Andrew Doria departing from Sicily was come to Calopa, from whence hee sent word to the Prouidator Contaren, who lay at Corfiou, that a faire occasion was offered to ouerthrow the enemies, whilst they hauing forsaken their Gallies were busied in battering Castel-nouo, therefore hee did aduise him for to ioyne both their fleets together: the Prouidator hauing answered him (the better to found his intent) that hee would bee ready to releue Castel-nouo, and to execute any other enterprize, so that all the forces might bee ioyned together 50 with hope of profit: Doria making no replic at all vnto this answer, retired to the haue of Brandiffa.

The Ambassador Contaren in the meane time iourneyed towards Constantinople, whither beeing come and brought into Soliman's presence who had graunted him audience, all the time that hee was deliuering his commission,

Cccccc

Sola

The Governour
answers to Barbarossa.

Barbarossa
dott in vaine
give officials to Catharra.

Deus his pro-pitiis to the Prouidator
Contaren.

The Prouidator answers to Doria.

The Bifness demands to Contareno,

Soliman held his hand vpon his brest, signifying (as his seruants interpreted it) a troubled minde, yet neuerthelesse hauing quietly heard him, hee told him that hee was welcome, not making any other answer to his negotiation, referring him (as the manner is) vnto his Baſhas: with whom Contareno afterwards conuerſing, and beginning more particularly for to expaſe his commiſſion, ſo ſoone as they heard him to motion the yeelding vppon both ſides, of places raken in that warre, they answered on a ſodaine that hee was not to ſpeake any more of that; how that their Lord was greatly animated againſt them, and eſpecially for their league made with the Emperour againſt him, whereby hee was ſo farre off from harkening to any reſtitution, as on the contrarie they were not to hope to obtaine any thing of him, vnleſſe that they did render vnto him the Cities of Naples and Malueſia, with whatſoeuer the Signory did poſſeſſe on the ſea of Conſtantinople, as farre as Caſtel-nouo, by meanes whereof all cauſe of warre ſhould bee taken away for after times, and a firme peace eſtabliſhed betwixt them: they demaunded moreouer, to haue Soliman recompenced for his expences in that warre, hauing bene by them drawne to it perforce, and not moued therevnto by any auaice, but for his owne honour, knowing very well that they had granted as much to the Emperour, a farre meener Prince then hee.

The Ambaſſadors
demands to
the Biſhou,

The Ambaſſadour declaring that hee could not grant any of their demands, told them that his commiſſion did not extend ſo farre, that the Common-wealth ought verilie for to deſire peace, ſo farre forth as it might ſtand with her honour and dignity, the which it would euer maintaine and defend by armes, and that for himſelfe, hee beeing but an actor of the Senates will and pleaſure, neither could nor would ſay or doe any other thing, but that hee would acquaint them at Venice with the whole matter intreating them in the meane ſpace that the ſame buſineſſe might bee delayed till ſuch time as hauing written thither he might vnderſtand the Senates reſolution therevpon.

The Baſhas did put him in hope that the buſineſſe might haue a proſperous end, ſo that the Venetians would grant part of their demands: how that their cuſtome was to craue much to obaine little: therefore they did aduiſe him to returne backe in perſon to Venice, particularlie to acquaint his ſuperiours with the whole buſineſſe, that they might afterwards come to ſome new treaty, and that his returne would bee in a very fit time to bee preſent at the nuptials of the great Lords daughter, and at the circumciſion of one of his ſonnes.

Contareno vpon theſe words, notwithstanding that ſo many iourneys and delaies were tedious to him in regard of his yeeres, and the important buſineſſe that was in hand, yet neuerthelesſe ſuppoſing that if he ſhould ſtay any longer at Conſtantinople, after this leaue giuen him, it would put the Turkes in hope to obaine their demands, hee reſolved to depart, hauing firſt very ſpeedily aduertized the Senate of all that which had paſſed.

The Senates
doubt vpon theſe newes.

The Ambaſſadors departure did greatly trouble the Senate, together with the difficulties made vpon the accord: for the found it a very hard matter alone and of themſelues to make warre vpon ſo mighty an enemy: that their hopes grounded vpon other mens forces, although weake and to ſmall purpoſe, were by that negotiation wholly loſt: on the other ſide, to accept peace on ſuch vnliſt conditions would to much blemiſh the Republickes reputation, and by quitting ſo eaſily their townes, and giuing away their money, was nothing elſe but to caule the enemies who by nature are inſolent, to demand greater matters.

During theſe irrefolutions Cafar Cantelmo came to Venice, who hauing bene already ſent (as hee ſaid) to Soliman from the moſt Chriſtian King, about the negotiation for the truce, at his returne into France, had informed the King of the whole matter, wherevpon hee returned againe by his his commandement to Conſtantinople for the ſame buſineſſe.

The French Ambaſſador comming into the Senate, told them that the King his Maſter did expreſly ſend that gentleman to Conſtantinople, about the affairs of the Venetian Common-wealth, and from him to deale in the negotiation of peace, and therefore he was come to Venice to receiue their commandements therevpon, being by the King enioyned to execute them as though they were his owne. The Lord Iohn Franceſco Valerio a Venetian Gentleman, did affirme the very ſame, who hauing remained a long time in France, had bene very familiar with the chiefe Lords of the Court, who did often acquaint him with matters of importance: this Gentleman did teſtifie the Kings loue and hearty affection towards them and his readineſſe to ſend other Agents to Soliman, if the Senate ſhould diſlike of Cantelmo; exhorting them to truſt to the King, and to his loue towards the Republike, the totall ſumme of this negotiation: that there was no better nor ſafer way then that to reconcile them to the Turke, with more honour, and leſſe loſſe.

The French
King's loue to wards the Venetians.

They were aduertized at the ſame time that an enteriue was practiſed betwixt the Emperour and the French King: the cauſe thereof was the iourney which the Emperour determined to make into Flanders, to chaſtiſe thoſe of Gant who had rebelled, reſolving to goe thither through France, and to talke with the King, and to treat with him (ſo ſo it was reported) about ſome good agreement, that being good friends they might afterwards ioine their forces together againſt the Turkes.

The Emperour
deſires paſſage through France to goe into Flanders.

The enteriue of theſe Princes furniſhed all men with matters of ſundry diſcourſe, and chiefly the Venetian Senate, where it was a long time debated whether they ſhould continue the treaty of peace with the Turke, in regard of matters offered, and the hard conditions propounded by Soliman: On the other ſide, ſome were of opinion to embrace the occaſion of Cantelmo his voyage, and the Kings offer; if they ſhould reſuſe it, it was to bee feared, that his Maieſty would take it in ill part, thinking that they made ſmall account of him or his frienſhip: that they were at leaſt to entreat that Gentleman on the Kings behalfe to inſiſt vpon the Generall truce, which beeing graunted, would greatly ſerue, for the ſineſſe of the time and the quiet which thereby would ariſe, to enioyne him beſides, to aſſure the Turke, that the Senates intention was none other then to procure a firme peace vpon honeſt conditions.

Sundry opinions in the generate.

Others propounded that it was beſt to ſend a ſpeedy meſſenger to Contareno to command him for to tarry in that place where hee ſhould meet with him, and there to expect a new commiſſion which the Senate would ſend him, according to the progreſſion of the affaires: others thought it fit to proceed to the election of a new Ambaſſadour, or elſe to reſerre the whole buſineſſe to the Bayly Camilio, who was at liberty, and able to negotiate: but theſe men were not of opinion to make uſe of Cantelmo in this negotiation, nor to impart any thing vnto him: that he was a Neapolitan, baniſhed from his Country, who beſides the Kings deſignes and intereſts, quite contrary perhaps to thoſe of the Republike, had his owne likewiſe a part, which might hinder and not further the good ſucceſſe of that buſineſſe: That their ſafety and publike dignity did not permit them to diſcouer vnto ſuch men any iot of the Senates intention, the which they were to ſuſpect, and not without cauſe, that hee was very deſirous to know rather to croſſe then to further it: that the Emperour ſought all occaſions to breake this purſuite of peace, which did ſo much trouble and annoy him; and the French King vpon hope to recover the State of Milan, was ready to conſent him in all things.

To all theſe conſiderations they added an other, which was of no meane conſequence, which was, that becauſe the harveſt of the ſame yeere had bene euery where, and eſpecially ouer all Italie, verie badde, wherewith the Dearth of victuals in Venice.

City of which was to feed an infinite number of persons, was greatly troubled, so as the people, who were wont to fare delicately, and to eat none other bread then that which was made of wheate, were enforced to feed on all sorts of graine, and in hazard likewise to want them, vnlesse they might bee brought from foraine countries (Venice hauing no corne territory of her owne) a thing which did greatly trouble the Senate; wherevpon, the better to prouide for a matter of so great importance, some said that the friendship of the Turkes was very necessary: and others thought it fit to haue recourse to the Spaniards to get proportions of wine and graine from their countries: whereby it fell out that the same subiect serued for a foundation whereon to build the two sundry opinions.

In this manner was the time spent without any certaine resolution, so as the Ambassador Contareno hauing continued his journey, and receiued no new commandement from the Senate, arriued at Venice, and Canselmo departed thence without any commission.

These irresolutions gaue the Emperor some hope, who espied all occasions to breake the negociation of peace with Soliman, and once more to draw the Venetians to confirme the league, therefore supposing that there was nothing which could better further his intention, then to make them beleue that he was friends with the French King, and that being thereby freed from all other lets, he would employ all his forces vpon the enterprize of the Leuant, and that the French King would aide and fauour the league, determined to send some noble personage to Venice, perswading the King to doe the like, to acquaint the Venetians with the enterview, and to discouer somewhat of their intentions.

The Marquis of Guasto who was gouernor of Milan for the Emperor, and the Lord of Annebault Marshall of France, and Generall for the most Christian King in Piedmont, came to Venice vpon the tenth day of December. Their entertainment was magnificent, as well in regard of the Princes greatnesse that sent them, as for the quality and nobility of the persons, great numbers of Senators went to meet them with the Bucentaur, and seuen Gallies; then they were lodged in a goodly pallace, and their expence defraied by the Signory. Their first audience was giuen them in the great Hall, where the great Councell is held, in the presence of many people, where there were no other speeches vsed but complementall and of entertainment.

Returning at an other time into the Senate in secret audience, the Marquis of Guasto began to tell them, that he was sent by the Emperor Charles to acquaint them, as his trusty and inward friends, with the enterview which he determined in France with the French King, and in Flanders with King Ferdinand his brother and the Queene his sister, who did then gouerne those countries for him, assuring them that in the same assembly of Princes, affaires would be handled concerning the common good of Christendome, and the particular profit of that Common-wealth, which the Emperor did as much desire, as that of his owne Estates. And that now seeing they were ready to assaile the Turkes with very great forces, the Emperour was desirous to know the Senates will and intention therein, what provisions they would iudge to be necessary, and what they would haue him to doe for his part, for the better manning of his designs: that the peace with the French King, although it were not established, might neuertheless be held for done, in regard of the mutuall disposition and good correspondence betwixt those Princes: whereby all men were certainly to beleue, that they would both together turne their armes (being freed from all other lettes) vpon the Infidels: but because the greatnesse of the businesse did likewise carry with it length of time, and for that the time of yeere was already so farre spent to make such great provisions, the Emperor thought it fittest for the time present to stand vpon the defensive rather then on the offensive with the the enemies, wherein he would not faile to haue as great a care of the safety of his friends States, as of his owne.

The Lord of Annebault spake in a manner to the same effect, protesting his Kings good will and desire to the peace and profit of all Christendome. It was no hard matter to discern wherevnto all these practises tended; and what the Emperours true designs were, namely to feed the French with a vaine hope of restoring vnto them the Duchy of Milan; and the Venetians, by propounding vnto them to make great preparations for warre against the Turkes, not caring very much to performe these things, but onely thereby to winne time, by being assured of the armes of the French, diuerting the Kings thoughts from warre, and of those of the Turkes, by opposing against them as a Bulwarke the States and army of the Venetian Common-wealth.

Answer was made to the Marquis and to the Lord Annebault how that their arriual was very pleasing and acceptable, as well for respect to the Princes which sent them, as for their owne persons, for which, and for the honour and friendship which they did beare to the Common-wealth, they did infinitely thanke their Princes: the newes of the good correspondence, and certaine hope of peace betwixt such mighty Princes, had much reioyced them, and so much the more, by how much greater the profit was which all Christendome might receiue thereby. But as concerning the declaration of their meaning and intent towards the present occasions, it might be sufficiently knowne by their actions, seeing that they had so soone at the first taken armes, many times refused all propositions of agreement, and liberally furnished all expences requisite, without regardize, neither had they refused to execute all enterprizes how dangerous soeuer: how that for their parts, they had already for the space of three yeeres borne the whole burthen of the warre: and being at that time inuited by those hopes, they were ready againe to expose themselves: yet neuertheless all men might well perceiue that they were not able alone to hold out long against the power of so great an enemy: therefore what could they say more? Their necessity being knowne vnto all men: how euery one knew that Barbarossa lay in the Gulphe of Lepanto with fourescore saile, intending (as it was reported) to winter there, whereby the whole world might perceiue to what danger the whole State of the Common-wealth was exposed, and by consequence that of all Christendome, vnlesse the nauall armies might bee euerywhere ready by the month of February, to diuert his designs: all which things were very exactly to bee thought vpon and considered, and speedily remedied.

This answer without any resolution at all was thought fit for their proposition, and the condition of the times: and without proceeding to any more particular negotiation, the Ambassadors of the Emperour and the King returned home into their countries.

The Pope on the other side hauing had notice of these Ambassadors coming to Venice, was displeased therewith, because that the enterview was refused on, without his knowledge and consent: not that hee did any way distrust the Republike, being very well assured that it would euerrunne the selfe same fortune as did the Sea Apostolike: but because hee greatly feared, least all that outward shew of honour and friendship should couer (as at other times) some important practice against the liberty of Italy: wherevpon, hee did by all good offices sollicit the Venetians, that their might bee betwixt the Sea Apostolike and their Common-wealth a sound and perfect intelligence and correspondency, and he for his owne part would not any way faile for to provide all possible meanes to beate backe all the dangers which might happen.

The Emperor hauing intelligence of these suspicions of the Pope, fearing least

The Pope send eth the Cardinal Farnese Legation to France.

his discontent might be some hinderance to his designs, did on a sodaine send Luigi Daula to Rome, and caused the French King to send the Lord of Saint Just thither, to acquaint the Pope with that enterview in France and for to iustifie their actions. The Pope by the arriual of those Ambassadors was greatly satisfied, and the better to demonstrate it, he determined to send his Nephew, the Cardinall Farnese, into France, to the end that as Legat to the See of Rome, he might be present at the assembly of those Princes, fauor the conclusion of peace, and offer the Popes authority, with all the Churches treasure, for the enterprise against the Infidels. The Senate in demonstration of the friendship and respect which it did beare to those Princes, did appoint two Ambassadors to be present likewise at that enterview, namely Antonio Capello, and Vincenzo Grimani, both of them Procurators of Saint Marke, who were enioyned by the Senate to thanke the Emperor and the French King for the friendship and honour which they had shewed to the Common-wealth, by acquainting it with what they determined to doe; next to praise and commend their intentions, and to incite them to provide for the dangers of Christendome, and lastly to excuse them for that they had sent an Ambassador to Constantinople, being enforced therevnto, because they had not sufficient forces to resist the enemy.

An Hungarian
Ambassador
condueth to Venice.

At the same time an Ambassador came to Venice from the King of Hungary, to request the Senate to make a firme alliance with him for the common defence of both their States, and to exhort them besides to continue the treaty of peace with the Turkes, in regard the Emperor would neuer be at peace with the French, so long as he could haue the Estates of the Venetian Republike, and the Realme of Hungary for his Bulwaik: for the which aduertisement they thanked his King, and for that present delt no farther with him.

But although the Pope did offer his forces to maintain the warre, and exhorted the Senate to provide diligently for the conseruation of their States and defence of Christendome, yet neuertheless he did not disssemble the supition which he had conceiued of the Imperials, and the smal hope he had in their aide: wherevpon, he did often times assume, that being assured that the Venetian Senate, as most prudent and well aduised, would neuer make peace with the Turke, vnlesse they were enforced therevnto by very vrgent necessity: euen so, the occasions being once knowne to be such, he did commend their counsell, which knew how to fit it selfe to times and necessity.

Now about the same time the Senate received letters from the Bayly Canalis, who aduertised them that great and magnificent triumphs were preparing at Constantinople for the nuptials of the great Lords daughter, married to Rusten Basha and for the circumcision of two of his children, and to that end they expected some from Venice, and that the Basha did greatly desire, that according to the vsuall custome, some Ambassador of theirs might come to the Porte, to haue an occasion to reuine the treaty of peace.

The Senate being assembled therevpon, and a proposition being made to elect an Ambassador to send to Soliman, all of them with one voice and consent embracing the businesse, did choote Lodewico Badoario, a Senator of great authority, and one of those who had most of all perswaded the Senate to an accord with Soliman, offering himselfe, if neede were, to goe thither for that purpose.

Lodewico Badoario is chosen Ambassador to goe to Soliman.

VVhat the Senate did en-ioyne the Ambassador.

They did then enioyne him first of all to procure the negociation of the Generall truce, according to the former instructions of the Ambassador Contarini, continued by the French Kings Agent: then to motion the restitution of all those places possessed on either side during that warre, and if hee could not obtaine that, then to treat of a final peace, by renuing of the ancient capitulations: giving authority for to offer some five or sixe thousand Ducats a peece for the Cities of Naples and Maluesia, and to promise three hundred thousand thousand Ducats for the expences that Soliman had beene at in that warre. This was the Senates commission. But the counsell of Tenne, who at that time did Soueraignly treat of the most serious affaires of state, without communicating them to the Senate, to the end they might be more secretly managed among fewer persons, added another more ample commission, namely to haue power, if hee should perceiue the treaty to bee wholly desperate, to surrender vnto them the townes of Naples and Maluesia.

These Senators, who were of the ancient and best experienced in the gouernment, did very well know how greivous, and insupportable that warre had bin vnto them: how that Naples and Maluesia were farre off from them, and therefore hardly to be releued and easie to be besieged by the enemy, whetby they had beene in danger oftentimes to haue beene taken, in regard of their want of many things: So as they would ere then haue fallen into the enemies hands, had not the truce protected them. That the Common-wealth was at the same time in great danger, wherevpon it was discreetly aduised, to cast away some what, although it were deere and pretious, to conduict it safely to the Hauens of peace, forth of the rockes of that dangerous warre: That it was a Maxim confirmed by many experiences, that time, in the Negotiations with the Turkes doth breed danger, and the conclusion of matters, by delays, haue euer had a bad and difficult successe.

The Emperor
commeth to Paris.

This happened about the latter end of the yeare, and at the beginning of the next which was 1540. the Emperor came to Paris, where the king entertained him with all possible signes of honor and friendship. Christophero Capello, Ambassador at the same time for the Signory in France, did acquaint both of them with the Senates answer to the Marquis of Guasto, and the Marshall D. Anibault, wherevnto the Emperor answered, that although for his owne part hee did resolute to make warre vpon the Turkes, yet neuertheless hee could not see, in regard of the shortnesse of the time, how they might satisfie the Republicks desire: and therefore that it would be to more purpose, at that present, to obtaine a generall truce, during which they might haue time to prepare forces, conuenient for such an enterprise, and that he in the meane time, would not omit to doe whatsoeuer lay in him for the common safety of their Sea Estates. The most Christian King did at the same time make great protestation for his good will, saying, that hee would let men know, that his intention neuer was to diuert the common good of Christendome, but that he was ready speedily to embrace peace, and concord with the Emperor, that he might afterwards undertake a warre, more profitable and necessary, but that the present time would not permit him to treat of those businesse, because he would not mingle graue and serious matters among feasts, and ioy for the Emperors arriual, the negotiating whereof might breed difficulties and discontents, wherevpon, they had referred the whole businesse to the assembly of Flanders.

The answers of
the Emperor &
the French
King to the Venetian Ambassador.

Capello hauing acquainted the Senate with the Emperors and French Kings answers, they were found to be very generall, so as no certaine hold could be taken thereon: neither of peace betwixt themselves, nor of warre against the Turke; wherevpon they resolved more earnestly to peruse the treaty of peace already begun: and did write to Badoario, who arriuing at Constantinople about the middest of Aprill, began to treat according to his commission with the Bascha, therein vying the fauour and aduice of the French Ambassador. But at the beginning of their negotiation, great difficulties did arise, not that the Turkes were vnwilling of an agreement, but because they hauing notice of the secret commission giuen to Badoario, and thereby being growne more insolent, as well in regard of the feare and desire of peace, which they discouered to be in the Venetians, as for that they were assured to obtaine whatsoeuer they demanded, began forthwith to protest that they would not harken to any other proposition, vnlesse that take on peace with Soliman.

The Senators

(besides besides the Ilands of the Archipelago and the Castles of Nada Laurana which they already enjoyed) the Cities of Naples and Maluesia might be freely surrendered to them, and restitution made for the expences of the warre.

The Ambassador being amazed at these demands so suddenly and obstinately made, and suspecting the truth of the matter, did for certaine daies giue out that negociation, incertaine of himselfe what he were best to doe, on the other side he was drawne from it, when he considered how that by continuing this treaty and consenting to the Turkes demands, he should put them in hope to obtaine other matters. Having spent certaine daies in this perplexity, Barbarossa 10 seeming to be desirous that he should go forward with the treaty of agreement perswaded him not to giue over his enterprize, offering to aid and fauour him, and although he opened him a way to be a better hope, yet neuertheless by continuing the Treaty he found no alteration in the Baskhas, wherevpon he was enforced in a short time by little, and little, to consent to that which was referred till the very last, namely to giue over, besides the Townes which they already possessed, the Cities of Naples and Maluesia, and to pay vnto them within three 20 yeares towards the expences of the warres, the summe of three hundred thousand Crownes. Then were the antient Capitulations renewed and confirmed, together with diuers other particularities concerning the establishment of the peace.

The report of this agreement being brought to Venice, although every man desired it, the Republick being in great distresse by reason of the commodities of the warres, and the dearth of victualls, and at such a stay as it had need of, being restored by peace, was neuertheless badly welcomed, when men understood the particularities thereof, many blaming that Councell for hauing bought peace at so deere a rate, by the giuing away of so goodly a portion of their state and to great a somme of money, wherewith they might haue bene still able for a time to haue maintained the war: others did taxe the Ambassadors ignorance, or to much feare, who by a precipitate resolution had yielded at the first to the 30 Turkes demands, and had suffered himselfe to be carried away by latest remedies, referred for the safety of most desperate matters. But these first motions being vanished, and the State of the affaires more maturely considered on, with the reasons which had moued those wise Senators to consent therunto, all men did rest satisfied and very well contented, praying their good aduile and wisdom.

Within a while after, the treachery of certaine perfidious persons was discovered, whereby the intention and honor of the Ambassador Badaurio was preserved. The traitors were Constantine and Nicholas Canazzo of the order of Citizens, who entering into the Councell of Tenn and into that of the Preguats in quality 40 of Secretaries, receiuing pension of the French King did acquaint him with the affaires of greatest importance of the Common-wealth: with them Maffeo Leone, of the order of Senators, was ioynd, who by reason of his place had access into both of the Councells: besides Augustino Abondio, and Francisco Valerio had a hand in that treachery. These men being discouered by means of certaine letters found in the Cabinet of Abondio, where-in matters of State were mentioned, three of them, to wit Nicholas Canazzo, Abondio and Valerio, retired vnto the Pallace of the French Ambassador; as vnto a place of franchise.

This retreat of theirs hauing caused the Senate to thinke very badly of 50 them, the officers were forth-with sent to apprehend them, where some resistance being made, they were enforced for to bring a small Basse thither, with two great peeces of Ordnance in it to spoile and batter the house

Badaurio is greatly pleased.

Peace concluded with the Turkes according to their owne minde.

The Traitors which bewrayed Badaurio committion to the Turkes are discouered.

Force is offered to the lodging of the French Ambassador.

house, where-vpon the traitors were deliuered to them, and being committed into the hands of the officers of Iustice, and their proceesse made, they were hanged in the market place of Saint Marke. Constantine Canazzo and Maffeo Leone, leauing the City berimes, had leasure to escape to some place of safety: They were proclaimed thorow the City three feuerall daies, with promise of a good summe of money to any that could take them alieue or dead.

The King seemed to be much displeased, for the violence offered to the Ambassador lodging, so as for certaine moneths space he denied audience to Gionan Antonio Venicya Ambassador to the Signory, vntill that one day being at the 10 Campe before Perpignan, and being desirous to here newes from Constantinople, he called for him, and complained (but very modestly as though, he were halfe reconciled) for that his Ambassadors house had bene forced, vsing these speeches among others, what would you haue said, if the like had bene done vnto you? Venier made this ready answer. If God should send into my house, and vnder my power, a traitor to your Maiesty, I my selfe would lay hands on him, and deliuer him vnto you, being wel assured if I should doe otherwise, that the Signory would sharply reprehend me.

During the negociation of the treaty of peace, albeit that the Generall Moceniga was abroad with a great fleet of Gallies, yet neuer-the-less hee executed no warlike exploit, for feare least he should hinder the agreement, but onely sailed vp and downe, entertraying the time, and hauing intelligence that Dragut lay neere to the Ile of Zante with great numbers of Fusts, and other vessels belonging to Pirats and robbed all those that hee met with, hee sayled thither-ward to meete and fight with him; But he hauing a farre off descried our Gallies, and hauing a faire wind, tooke another way and escaped, and after wards not daring any more to returne into those seas, he went into the West, where hee was taken by Iacotin Doria, with eight of his vessels.

Now after the conclusion of the peace, the Generall before he would goe to Dalmatia to disarm the fleet, went to Naples of Romagnia, and Maluesia, to acquaint those people with the successe of the businesse concluded at Constantinople, and the Senates resolution, to quit those townes to the Turke. It is not to be imagined how greuous these newes were to the people, being as loth to tarry there as to go from thence: For to liue vnder the Turkish tyranny, seemed a very hard matter vnto them: To depart thence like wife, and for euer to abandon their country, goods, houses and sepulchers, was a grieffe almost intollerable.

The Generall then to comfort them, (the whole people of Naples, being assembled in the market place) spake to them in this manner.

The fatherly loue wherewith the Common-wealth hath embraced and receaued you from the beginning vnder her rule and protection, and then gently gouerned 40 you for a long time, may very easily perswade you, that the fame which I am now enjoyed to deliuer vnto you, (which perhaps yee already know) how that this City and Maluesia your neighbour, are by an agreement made at Constantinople, to be deliuered to Soliman, hath bene done rather vpon extreame necessity, then by any free or voluntary will. Diuers things may make you see how dearely the Republick hath euer loued you, and especially in these last warres, in which for your reliefe it hath readily exposed part of her forces to great dangers: it hath furnished you with mony, soldiers and victualls, for feare least yee should fall into the enemies power, who with barbarous cruelty would haue bathed their hands 50 in your blood, (as they threatened to doe) and made this City desolate: hath in aword, not to come to this last point to leaue her deere and welbeloued subjects, vnder a tyrants power, made great provisions of Armes, bene at excessive expences, and at last, vndergone for a time, the insupportable burthen of warre. But what greater signe of loue, can the Common-wealth shew vnto yee in this present affliction, then to promise, (as it doth) vnto all those who are willing 10

The traitors are punished.

The French king complains to the French Ambassador.

The Ambassadors brauely answer.

The sorrow & grieffe of those of Naples and Maluesia when they understood the conditions of the peace.

The Generall Moceniga his oration to the people of Naples.

to depart, to giue them another fit dwelling place wherein they may safely liue vnder her protection, and to helpe, fauour and nourish them. The ancient Sages said, how that the same place may be truly termed a mans Countrey, wherehee liueth well: but what better thing is there, or more to be desired, then to liue vnder the moderate gouernment of a good Prince? yee shall remaine vnder the gouernment of the Common wealth, wee will find yee out a dwelling place in another Countrey, where yee may liue, if not so commodiously as heere, at least wife more safely, and free from the continuall dangers and alarmes of the Turks, to which I may truly say that yee were dayly exposed. Diuers nations, their numbers waxing ouer great at home, haue of their owne free-will departed from their native Countrey, haue followed fortune, seeking by armes for new and vncertaine habitations. In miseries and calamities to haue a certaine and assured refuge carrieth with it such a comfort, as a man doeth often-times remember things past with greater contentation. Without all doubt our cheifest desire hath bene, to haue still liued at peace, not to haue had the enemies to come and beseege this City, not to haue purposed to take it by force, or if this should happen, to haue had greater forces to resist and repulse their attempts. But seeing neither the one or other was in our power or yours, what other thing is there now to be done in this State that we stand, but for vs to performe the duty of a good Prince, Father and Pastor of his people, to defend, vnder our safeguard and protection, your persons, seeing that we cannot preserue, and beare from hence the houses and walls of this City; and for you, to comfort your selues with the loue of your Prince, to fit your selues to time, and to make vse of necessity: your persons shall be preserued, your posterity shall encrease, and of you, beeing valiant fathers, shall be borne generous Children: who knoweth but that some of them may one day reuenge your wronges? fo great is the change of humane affaires, whereunto the greatest Emperors are no lesse subiect then the meanest things on earth. It is certaine that the Common-wealth will euer retaine the same will and desire to take armes against these enemies, so soone as it shall perceiue the Christian Princes so well vnited together, as it may hope for some commodity thereby, and bee able to doe some notable seruice to Christendome. Therefore as it is necessary, so is it great discretion, and a gallant resolution to seeke to liue in safety, and still hope for better and better.

Whilest the Generall did thus comfort them, all men did shed warme teares, being no lesse moued by loue, then by greefe and sorrow.

The Generall after-wards did make the same remonstrance to those of Maluesia, whereby the poore people beginning by little and little to bee resolu'd, the greatest number of them prepared for their departure, carrying with them their best and deereest wealth: And so within a while after, in the month of Nouember the treaty of peace beeing confirmed and ratified, the Prouidator Contaren came thither with twenty Gallies and diuers other Vessells of all sorts, in which hauing imbarcked the artillery, munitions, soldiers, & those inhabitants who were willing to depart, with their baggage, conigned, (as it was decreed) those two townes into the hands of Casin Bassa of Morea, who came thither with sinale forces.

All matters being in this sort pacified, the Generall and the Prouidator did dispatch, leauing only abroad the ordinary number of Gallies for the gard of the Gulph. But so soone as the Prouidator Contaren came to Venice, he was called into question by Petro Moceniga, Auogator for the common-wealth, to answer (according to the Senates decree made three yeares before) for that which hee had done in Puglia when hee sank the Turkish Gally; but the matter being debated in Senate, and diuers Senators defending Contarens cause, the Commandement of the Auogatore was declared to bee of none effect, and Contaren was wholly acquitted, in regard of the worthinesse of his good seruices done, during the

Maluesia and Maluesia are consigned to the Turks.

the time of that warre. No other thing worthy of Memory hapned during this yeare 1540. which was made notable by the peace concluded with the Turkes, which continued for the space of thirty yeares.

The end of the third Booke of the sixth Decade.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the sixth Decade.

TH E occasion of the warre of Hungary. Soliman determineth to make warre in Austria. The French king resoluech to make vse of the Turkish forces against the Emperor who had broken promise with him. The Imperialls doe murder Rincon and Fregosa going in Ambassage from the most Christian king to Soliman. The Emperor granteth the Interim in Germany. The Senate deny the Pope the holding of a Councel at Vincenza. The Accord betwixt the Turke and the Venetians is confirmed. The Venetians are discontented because there was not a particular Duke of Milan. An Enteruiew betwixt the Pope and Emperor at Luca. The French King being incensed against the Emperor doth at one time prepare three armies against him. Maran is taken from Ferdinand. A league betwixt the Emperor and Henry King of England against the French King. Barbarossa with his Army aideth the French King. Enteruiew betwixt the Pope and the Emperor at Basser. The Turkish Army in Hungary. Maran by agreement remayneth to the Venetians. The English men take Boloyn. Peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King. Tyrre granted betwixt the Emperor and Ferdinand on the one side, and Soliman on the other. The Pope giueth Parma and Placentia in title of Duchy to Petro Lodouico. And lastly the great contentions betwixt the Emperor and the French King, which were the causes of the quiet of Italy.

The

The fourth Booke of the sixt Decade
of the History of Venice.

PEACE being in this manner concluded betwixt Soliman and the Venetians (as hath beene said) and the Venetians hauing elsewhere no warre with any Christian Princes, they did hope after so many toyles and trauaills of warre, to see an age full of peace and felicity. For Soliman made shew, that hee was disposed to make a generall truce for a long time with the Princes of Christendome. Wherein the French Ambassador did much good, who assured them that he held the to-tall resolution thereof in his owne hand, and that which made them to giue more credit to his speeches, was because though the fleet were ready to set saile, yet Barbarossa his journey was held doubtfull, and beside, no preparation at all for a land army was made, which might giue cause of suspicion of any enterprize.

The Emperor on the other side and the French King had confirmed the truce, formerly made at Nice, and shewed to one another sundry good offices of loue and reconciliation: For whilst the Emperor stayed in France in his journey towards Flanders, hee remained for a time with the King, which gaue hope to all men that those Princes hauing trodden all hatred and rancour vader their feet did determine to liue in peace and quiet. But the new accidents which did happen (as humane affaires are subiect to change) did alter the State of things, and altogether breake of all hope of peace.

For John King of Hungary beeing deceased, and leauing a young Child by his wife Isbell, daughter to Sigismund King of Poland, and Ferdinand King of the Romanes, laying that the Realme belonged vnto him and not to the child, by vertue of a late agreement made with that King, made hast to get it by armes, and hauing to that end raised great numbers of Soldiers, he entred, vnlooke for, into the Kingdome, and seized on Alba Regalis, Visgrade, Peste, and other towne of Hungary, and at the same time he sent Ieronimo Alasoto to Constantinople to treat with Soliman that hee might obtaine the Kingdome after the same manner as King John had held it: but the Queene, widdow to King John, had likewise sent thither, procuring by meanes of a sollemne Ambassade of the cheifest Barons of the Kingdome, the aid and succor of the Turkish army to keep the Kingdome for hir Sonne, which by the selfe same armes had bene maintained for the Father. Soliman seemed to bee greatly displeased therewith, and by so much more, as he supposed to haue receiued a double iniury from Ferdinand, for enuading a State recommended vnto him, and vnder his protection, and for crauing that by his Ambassador which he went about to take by force. Where with being greatly incensed, he did not only cast from him that good inclination which he seemed to beare to peace and concord, but for the reuenging of this iniury iniury determined to assaile Ferdinand with great forces both by Sea and Land, and at the same time to keepe the Emperor to busied as he should not be able to helpe his brother: Therefore hauing reuoked that which hee had treated with Rince the French Ambassador concerning the truce, hee sent him backe to his King to tell him that hee had changed his mind, resoluing altogether vpon warre.

The troubles of Flanders were in the meane time appeased, the Emperor hauing rigorously punished the Gantois for their rebellion, to giue feare and terror to others. This being done sooner then was expected, was cause, that the foundations of peace betwixt him and the French King were not surely laid, and finding himselfe freed of that let which hindred him, hee resolved in no sort to quit the Dutchy of Milan. On the other side, Soliman haued to the house of Austria, did augment the French Kings courage, hoping to make vse of his mighty aide, and thereby to reuenge the wrong which he had supposed he had done to him by contemning his friendship.

Rince then being come to Venice did acquaint the Senate particularly with all what hee had beene done, and of the Turkes great warlike preparations, the which he presumed to be able to dispose of at his Kings pleasure, and crauing after-wards a conuoy for his safe passage into France, Mercurio Bue was commanded to attend vpon him with his company of light horse as farre as the confines of their State. And because there were but three moneths limited him for his returne to the Port of the great Lord, the King hauing speedily dispatched him, and returning onward on his way to Venice, from thence to passe to Constantinople, hee was neere to Pauiia, vpon the riuer of Po, assailed, taken, and murdered, together with Cesar Fregosa, by certaine Spanish footmen, and by the commandement (as it was thought) of the Marquis of Guasto.

This deed, did more then can be imagined incense the French King, for that during the truce they had so vilanously slaine his seruants, & that the Emperour not being satisfied (as hee said) to haue deceiued him with words, hauing at first put him in hope of peace, and that hee would restore the Dutchy of Milan to him, after-wards to bee so slacke therein, hauing appealed the troubles of Flanders, and besides, to haue iniuried him contrary to the law of Nations, by the trecherous murder of his seruants. He complained hereof and caused to be published al a broad that hee would bee reuenged thereof; hee wrot to all Forraigne Princes, giuing them to vnderstand that he had not broken the truce: Then hee did particularly aduertize Soliman thereof, to whome hee sent Captaine Polin, enioyning him to goe first to Venice, to seele how they stood affected to the Emperor, and to acquaint them with his iust occasion to take armes for the reuenge of such an iniury, and after-wards, to offer vnto them for his owne part what-so euer hee could doe for them at Constantinople, by employing his credit and authority so long as he should continue there in quality of Ambassador.

Polin hauing executed his commission, and crauing of the Senate that hee might passe on safely, a Gallie was giuen him for his transportation to Ragusa.

The Emperor at the same time was in Germany, where at Ratisbon hee held a Diet concerning matters of Religion, wherein nothing beeing concluded hee graunted to the Protestants an interim, so as euery man might vse the same ceremonies which before hee had done; and vpon report of the Turkes great warlike preparations, who were already come into hungary (Soliman being there in person) where they had defeated Guilian of Rocandolf, Lieutenant Generall to King Ferdinand, perceiuing that in regard of his own honour, being in Germany and so neere a neighbour to that defeat, all men expected when he would march against the Turkish forces, hee, the better to free him selfe from it, determined to vnder-

D d d d

The Emperours resolution contrary to his promise.

The King resolved to resist the Ambassador
against the Emperours.

Rince and Fregosa being sent Ambassadors to Soliman are murdered.

The Kings complaints against
the Emperours.

The great hope of a long peace.

The cause of the warre of Hungary.

Soliman incensed against Ferdinand determineth to make warre in Austria.

undertake the enterprize of Argier, thinking it to bee easier then that against the great Turke, to the great amazement of all men which did see him to attempt an enterprize nothing so honorable as the other: but hee did it vpon hope that passing along by Italy he might take the King vnprovided, and make some attempt vpon him, desiring rather to leaue his owne patrimony in prey then to omit any occasion to be reuenged on the King, whom he knew he had greatly wronged by the murder of his Ambassadors: but he found that the Lord of Langey, Lieutenant for the King in Piedmont, had diligently provided for all matters. Such were the State of affaires and such were the designs of Princes concerning Peace and warre. The Venetians thought it fit in those stirs to beare them selues with great consideration and vigilancy, and to keepe themselves neuters, and free from all danger of being offended. They very well knew how important a matter the losse of Hungary was, as well for Christendome, as because hereby the Turke, their common enemy, would grow more mighty. But what hope was there of any happy success? King Ferdinand was not strong enough of himselfe to resist the Turkish army: the Emperor resolued not to hazard his forces against the Turkes in his brothers defense. Germany, badly affected to the house of Austria, would enterprize nothing which might augment the power and authority thereof: and on the other side the widow Queen Isabell and the King hir sonne, young and without meanes to defend that Kingdom, and enforced by necessity not onely to make vse of the Turkish ayd, but wholly to depend vpon them. The Venetians notwithstanding that they knew all this, did neuertheless determine to be Spectators of all these miseries, and to auoid all occasions that might cause the Turkes to suspect any sinister affection towards them, being not desirous to prouoke them to take armes against the Signory.

Whilst these affaires were thus carried the Pope entreated the Senate to grant, That according to that which had been concluded at Luca, betwixt him and the Emperor, the Councell might be held at Vincenza, the yeare following 1542. but the Senate supposing that it would greatly hurt them, by reason of the Turkes, made an excuse, saying, that at that time when they had wars with the Turkes, they could willingly haue granted it, but that now, Soliman would thinke that the Venetians went about to stirre vp the Christian Princes against him, and by that meanes they should draw ruine vpon them selues, for a small and vncertaine hope of a great good: As also because they knew very well that the cheefe Prelates did intend to make the Christian Princes friends, before that they would assemble the councell. This excuse was strengthened by an accident newly happened, which gaue suspicion that the Venetians stood badly affected to Soliman: it was thus, two Turkish Galeots going from Barbary toward Constantinople, and suspected, by reason that they fled from our fleet, to be Pirates, were taken by the Prouidator of the Sea: the greatest number of the Turkes were slaine, and all the Christian slaues within them were set at liberty: the Turkes tooke this in bad part, and especially Barbarossa, vnto whom those vessels did belong, who being greuously incensed thereby, threatened to bee reuenged.

The Senate speedily excusing the matter, did at last obtaine that their might be a treaty concerning the making of amends for it, and the businesse being delayed, and Barbarossa being by time and sundry good offices appeased, the strife was ended by meanes of a summe of money to the content of both parties, the Venetians resoluing to continue their freindship with Soliman who sent Iamufy to Venice to cause the Prince and Senate to confirme the agreement made at Constantinople by the Ambassador Badoerio, who was likewise enioyned vpon entreaty of the French to dispose the Venetians to contract alliance with their King.

The Turkish Ambassador was honorably entertayned, and his demands attentively

The reasons that moued
the Venetians to entertaine
the Turkes
in their affaires.

The Stratagem that he used to haue his Councell held at Vincenza.

tiuely heard: as concerning the confirmation of the Treaty of peace, he was there in speedily satisfied: But to his proposition of fauoring the French they answered, how that they were at peace and friendship with the French King, intending to continue the same: But they they could not as then doe any thing which might enforce them after-wards to take any armes against other Princes: how they were assured that Soliman being a most wise and iust Prince, would like wise allow of their lawful reasons and excuses. This answer being reported to Soliman by Iamufy, was allowed by him, and vnderstanding by the same man, the Venetians firme desire faithfully to obserue the agreement, he was very glad of it, and seemed to be desirous to performe the like towards them. This is all which passed at that time betwixt Soliman and the Signory of Venice: But as concerning the Christian Princes, they dealt with them with no lesse respects, ayming still at this, not to offend any one, nor to fauour any one, nor yet to doe any thing contrary to their neutrality. The Venetians for sundry reasons were greatly displeased with the contention betwixt the Emperor and the French King, they were likewise displeased for that the Treaty of placing a new Duke in the State of Milan was broken, a matter so often promised to them, and treated of not long before with the French king at the enteruiue of Paris: and to suffer the Emperor peaceably to enioy that state, was nothing else, (as the wisest and discreetest Senators had a long time before foreseen) but to support the Emperors immoderate greatness, to the great preiudice of the liberty of Italy, and yet for all that, to depart from his confederacy, and to enter into a new war, the conditious of the times, and the Common-wealths necessity would not permit them. They were greued besides, for that the Turkes being solicited by the French against the Emperor, had determined to march with their army to the hurt of Christendome: yet neuer the lesse they only busied them selues, in furnishing their sea townes with soldiors, munitions, victuals, and all other necessaries, in re-enforcing and augmenting their army not meddling with the affaires of other men. Each of those Princes did vse meanes to diuert the Senat from the resolution of their neutrality, by propounding sundry meanes vnto them of new agreements.

The Emperor was ready come into Italy, resoluing to passe into Affricke, notwithstanding the Pope dissuaded him from it, setting before him his brothers danger: His Captaines like-wise propounded vnto him the doubtfull euent of the enterprize of Argier, being to attempt it in the Autumnall seasons of the yeare, which is commonly subiect to diuers alterations, and in a place filled with all discomforts. Yet neuer the lesse, considering the great forces of the Turkes, and how farre they were able to enter, (which was a pollicy to draw the Venetians to another Treaty by altering the former capitulations) he did propound vnto them a new confederacy for the safety of Italy against the incursions of those Infidels, assuring them that the Pope, King Ferdinand his brother, and diuers other Princes should enter into it: But the Senate resoluing no more to enter into those dangers, excused it selfe from harkening therevnto, and being more earnestly solicited, they wholly refused that proposition, especially when they heard that the Pope had no great inclination therevnto, by reason of the small hope he had (being wise and well aduised) to bring that businesse to a fortunate end, as also because he having dispoiled Astasio Colona of all his Estates, by reason that hee had bene rebellious and disobedient to the Sea Apostolicke, would auoide all occasions of restoring them againe vnto him, as he well perceived that hee should bee enforced to doe, by making a new league with the Emperor, who for his owne honor could not forsake a man that had so well deserved of him, and that had bene cheefe of his faction in Italy: besides, aiming at an other matter, he was desirous to continew in his neutrality, to the end that he might obtaine first to haue the state of Milan deliuered into the hands of Ottauiano Farneze as Guardian thereof, and to yeeld to the Emperor and the French King a certaine homage, til such time as they should find out some more assured meanes of Agree-

Peace confirmed betwixt
the Turkes &
the Christians.

The Venetians
are greued for that there is not a Duke of Milan.

The Venetians
are solicited to leave their neutrality.

The Senate
refuseth to make any new alliance.

ment: wherein he presumed that the Venetians would interpose their authority. The Venetians perceiving that they proceeded slowly in that business, and with small hope, being desirous not to give the Turkes any occasion of suspicion, did abstaine from it, notwithstanding that they were diuers times solicited by the Emperor, to send their Ambassadors to Luca where the Pope and hee were to meet: In all other matters they had neuer failed in their duty to the Emperor. They had giuen passage through their state to the Almaine foemen leuiued for the journey of Affrick, and so soone as they vnderstood of his coming into Italy by the way of Trent, they appoynted foure Ambassadors, to w^{eet}, John Antonio Veniero, Nicholas Tepulo, Marc Antonio Contaren, and Vincenzo Grimani, who entertained him very honorably vpon the Verona territory, and attended vpon him so long as he remained vpon their State, which was for the space of two dayes; for being come to Pescara he entered the Mantuan territory, from whence after ward, he went to Milan, from thence to Genoa, and then to Luca where hee met with the Pope, with whom hauing made some small abode, he pursued his journey for the enterprize of Affrick, which succeeded badly, as it had beene foretold: for hauing landed his soldiers vpon the sands of Argier, he found more resistance in the Garrison of the City then hee did expect, and did besides receiue great hurt by the Arabian horsemen, procured by the Turkes, who coming vpon them with great celerity, and fighting in a new and vsuall manner with our soldiers, did present all their deignes and the business being drawne forth in length, great harme happened: for their arose so terrible a tempest at Sea, as the ships being not able to ride at Ankor, by reason of the force of the wind, som of them were driuen on shore, and the others to Seaward in the midst of the tempest, So as hauing lost diuers of his vessels, and the residue being forced and beareen, the Emperor was enforced to giue ouer his enterprize. Diuers men of note dyed in that voyage by diseases and bad ayre, and among others, Marin Lusitaniano Ambassador for the Signory, who by the Senates command had still followed the Emperor, and Doctor Nicholas de Ponte, who at that time was gouernour of Vidua, was sent in his place. During the Emperors journey, the French King was not at quiet who being mightily incensed (as hath beene said) against the Emperor, thought on nothing but meanes how to be reuenged of these wrongs which he had offered him: therefore by meanes of his Ambassadors whom he sent to Luca to meet the Pope, he had earnestly entreated his Holinesse to declare the truce made at Nice by his owne meanes and authority to be broken and infringed, by the murder of Fregosa and Kincen, the better to let all men see the iustice of his cause: But resolving by all meanes to preuaile by force, he did with greater vehemency reuiue his former conceits to prevent the Emperor by meanes of the Turkes aid and friendship, whereupon he determined to send back Polin to Constantinople to treat in particular of the coming of the Army against the Emperor and as he passed along to vse new meanes to draw the Venetians to his party.

Polin then being come to Venice from thence to passe to Constantinople, he with the Bishop of Montpellier, ordinary Ambassador to the King, came into the Councell of the Tenne, according to the vsuall custome of secret audiences, where they discharged their commission from their Prince: Polin stirring very much by a long oration to perswade the Senators by a new alliance to embrace the Kings friendship. But all his discourse and goodly reasons could not preuaile with the Senators to make them alter their opinion, or to draw them to any new alliance, thereby to entangle them in a new warre.

Therefore that business being referred to the Senate their resolution with a general consent of them all was like to that of the council of the Tenne, to giue the same answer to the French Ambassadors as was made to Iansby: How that the Common wealth did deerey account of the French Kings friendship, the which

for

for their parts they would euer constantly and inuolably maintaine: yet neuertheless, they determined to liue at peace with other Princes, & not to enterprize any thing which might procure war betwixt them. Polin after this answer being inbarked in the Venetian Gallies sailed into Albania, and from thence pursued his journey towards Constantinople, with a certaine assurance to cause the Turkish army to march whither he would desire: but the designes of the French took none effect for that year, either because it was already too far spent to make great preparations, and to execute all at one time, or else because Soliman had settled all his thoughts vpon the enterprize of Hungary, making account to goe thither in person with a farre greater army. The French King in the meane time resolving on warre had raised three armies, the one conducted by my Lord the Dauphin went to beseege Perpignan, the other commanded by my Lord the Duke of Orleans marched to enuade the French Country and Luxembourg: the third greater then any of the rest, by reason of the supplies of the Duke of Cleaues, gouerned by the Duke of Vendosme Prince of the blood of France, entered Flanders by the country of Artois. But all these forces did by the report of such great provisions more amaze then hurt the Emperor: because that the Dauphin finding Perpignan to be sufficiently fortified by the Duke of Alua, returned without any notable exploit, the Duke of Orleans on the other side, did but scoure and wast the country: Wherevpon the French King perceiving all his deigns were to no purpose, did greatly taxe Soliman and the Venetians because they had not taken Armes to fauour his party whilst the Emperor was busied else-where.

The King being thus discontented, was the more incensed against the Venetians thorow the bad offices of the Bishop of Montpellier his Ambassador, so as Polin being informed of his Masters discontent, did openly in all places oppose himselfe against the Venetians affaires, scandalizing the Bailly and the Commonwealth: and because he hoped to haue the Turkish army the year following, at his kings deuotion, he said, that it being once ready, he would make the Venetians feeble, to their losse, what great force his Kings pursuits and authority had against them. The cause of the kings discontentment proceeded from that which is aboue mentioned, for that they went armed and in troups to the house of the French Ambassador, to take the three traytors that had retired them-selues thither, who after som resistance being deliuered ouer into the hands of iustice, were forthwith executed: whereof, the Ambassador hauing aduertized the King otherwise then the matter was handled, his maiesty shewed both by word and action to be highly displeased with the Venetians: but afterwards hauing truly vnderstood their manner of proceeding therein, hee sent the Prothomatory Monlus to Venice, to excuse him, if by meanes of a false report hee had sinisterly conceived of the Commonwealths friendships, protesting vnto them that he would neuer more remember any thing that was past, but esteeme them as his good and trusty friends: within a while after he caused the same Prothomatory to return to Venice (who by his commandement went to Rome, to acquaint the Pope there-with) to remaine there as ordinary Ambassador, in the Bishoppe of Montpeliers place, who was called home at their entreaty & to please them. Another accident happened at the same time which did greatly trouble the Commonwealth as well for it owne particular interest, as for the respect to other Princes which was the surprising of the towne of Maran vpon King Ferdinand, vnto whom it had bin giuen by their last agreement. Bertrando de Sacchia a subiect to the Venetians hauing of his owne proper motion seized on Maran, perceiving himselfe not strong enough to keepe it called Petro Strozzi to his aid who was banished from Florence, who speedily came thither with a great troupe of soldiers assembled in hast, and hauing entered it, did forthwith erect the French kings baner, saying that they held it for the king, threatening those of the town to deliuer it ouer to the Turkes, if they were not speedily seconded by som Prince or other, rather then to returne it into the hands of Ferdinand. That, as the beginning to a great war was very troublesome to the Venetians.

Ddd dd 3

For

The French King at one time raised three armies - against the Emperor.

The King is displeased with the Venetians.

Polin is displeased against the Venetians.

Stranis taken from Ferdinand.

The French King is incensed against the Emperor.

Polin, solicited the Venetians to make a league with the French King.

The Senators answered to Polin.

The Venetians doubt upon the raising of Maran.

For on the one side they considered how that Ferdinand might suspect that they were consenting therewith, the cheefe Author of that trouble being one of their subjects: on the other, they knew not what to thinke, in regard those that had seized on it did shield themselves vnder the name and authority of the French King, being ignorant of his meaning therein: But that which did most trouble them, was their feare least that towne should bee deliuered to the Turkes, it being but foure and twenty miles of from Venice, wher being once sedd they might howlerly at their pleasure make incursions vpon the land, by meanes of the lake which is a very neere neighbour to it.

The Senate then determining speedily to prouide for those inconueniences, 10 caused proclamations to be made: That none of their subjects on paine of bodily punishment, should carry victuals, or other releefe to those of Maran: They did besides, commit to safe and sure keeping, the father and wife of Sachia who were at Vdina, that they might haue in their power, a sufficient pawne to bridle his audacious rascallness: yet neuer-the-less they did still entertaine those of Maran, with faire and gentle speeches, putting them in hope to end all matters to their content, for feare least Ferdinand comming with a great Army, and they dis- 20 paring (without aide) of being able to resist him, should receiue a Turkish gar- rison into the towne. The Venetians in this diuersity of suspitions resolving not to meddle therein, but only so farre forth as necessity should enforce them, did abstaine from doing any thing, that might incense the Princes interested in that businesse.

The Swiss answer to the French Ambassador.

Vpon these newes Ferdinand sent the Bishoppe of Trent to Venice to request the Senate to aid him with vessels for the recovery of Maran, concealing that which concerned the French King: The Senate answered, that it was very desirous, as a louer of iustice and equity, that Ferdinand should recouer Maran which had beene so treacherously snatcht from him, and therefore it was ready to giue passage to his troupes and to furnish them with victuals: yet neuer-the-less, they were in hope that all matters would bee ended in friendly sort. And question- 30 ing with the French Ambassador there-vpon, he answered that the King would no otherwise dispose of Maran, then should stand with the Senates good liking, and therefore he desired to know their meaning therein: The same Senate replied that his King was so discrete, as he needed no other mens counsell; but that their desire was to proceed by such meanes as might preferue vnion and concord.

The Venetians
raise the fort of Maran.

During these Treaties time ran on, and those which continued in Maran (Sachia hauing beene driuen from thence by his owne fellows, who going forth of the gates, to accompany the German gouernours wife, who went to get money to pay their ranfome, returning backe, was shut forth) waxing more bold and insolent began to build a Fort at the Hauen of Lignare, five miles of from Maran, that they might haue a safe place of retreat, when they should come forth, (as they oftentimes did) to surprize and rob such vessels as passed along that way. 40 The Venetians thinking it a disgrace to suffer a deed of so great consequence did sodenly resolute to beate it downe and ruine it: The charge thereof was committed to Bernardo Sagreda, who speedily and fortunately executed it. This resolution made them to obtaine that certaine Imperiall galleys, sent for the recovery of Maran, did not enter into the Gulph: for the French King being aduertized of their going thither prepared other some to goe to the same place, to the releefe of Maran, which would haue beene a great prejudice to the Venetians to haue seene both those fleets in their Gulph, but both the one and the other, at the Senates entreaty, refrained from comming thither.

The affaires of Maran remaying thus doubtful, the French King and the king of Romans, had in the meane time begun to treat of an agreement about that towne, in which new difficulties daily arising, Storzi and those within Maran, seemed desirous to deliuer vp that Fort rather to the Signory of Venice then to any other other Prince whatsoever, protesting that vnlesse they did speedily agree amongst themselves, they would treat and deal with the Turkes.

50

Ferdinand although he truly knew the Venetians integrity, or else being desirous to dissemble the suspicion which he had conceiued, knowing that their friendship and aide might greatly auail him in that businesse, did chiooe two Commis- 10 sioners to end the controuersie, heretofore often mentioned, concerning the intelligence and obseruation of the treaty of Trent: They came to Venice: Francesco Contaren, and Francesco Sanuto, cholen in former time for the same businesse, were deputed by the Senate therewith, who conferring together, and with them the Emperours Ambassador as a louing vmpier, matters seemed to be brought to a good passe, and in a manner to an agreement, if they could haue found meanes to haue composed the controuersie, about the townes of Belgrad and Castell- 20 nuo, engaged heretofore with other castles by the Emperours of the house of Austria to the Duke of Saxony, whereon, and vpon the quality of the engagement hauing a long time insisted, the whole businesse remained vnresolved on.

This assembly was broken off by reason of the rumors spread abroad at the be- 30 ginning of the yeere 1543. of the great prouisions for warre made in sundry places, and chiefly at Constantinople, to enuade Hungary and Austria, and to scour all the sea-coasts belonging to the Emperour. The French King hoping by 40 meanes of this army, raised in his behalfe, and at his entreaty, to breake the Emperours designs and forces, had likewise raised a great army as well of his owne subjects as of Swisses, to vphold the Duke of Cleues rebellion and to assaile the Emperour in diuers and sundry places: who on the other side determining to reuenge the wrongs and iniuries receiued from the French, and especially to cha- stise (as he said) the audaciousnesse of the Duke of Cleues a feudatary of the Em- pire, for taking armes with his enemies against him, did assemble the Dyet of Prin- ces and free townes according to the custome of the country, where hee procured them to make warre on the French King, and the Duke of Cleues, at the com- 50 mon charge of all Germany: and for the augmenting of his forces, he resolved to ally himselfe with Henry King of England, notwithstanding that the same King had repudiated his Aunt Queene Katherine, and shaken off the yoke of the Ro- mish Catholike Church, that they might both of them together make warre vp on France.

King Henry did easily agree to the Emperours motion, being distasted of the French King, for fauoring James King of Scots his enemy.

The Pope in the meane time and the Venetians did still continue in their neu- trality, meaning as much as in them lay to maintaine the peace of Italy. The Pope neuerthelesse being for sundry reasons displeased with the Emperour, made suite to the Venetians to contract a more strict alliance together for their com- 40 mon safety, propounding at that time termes tending wholly to peace, and not to depart, but vpon constraint, from their neutrality, but determining neuerthelesse, as it was perceived by sundry signes, to draw the Republike afterwards to some new confederacy with the French King.

The Senate continuing the accustomed answers, and telling the Pope how that there was not any cause to moue them to renew their alliance, which might (not without suspicion to Princes) rather hasten then prevent the mischief to come, made an excuse, saying, that it could not make any new agreement with any one, for feare least the Emperour would be incensed against them, who had 50 so often sought vnto them for new confederacy, to the which they had neuer consented. But they were most of all troubled to see the Turkish army to depart from Constantinople, whereof men spake diuersly; notwithstanding that the Turkes did promise them in no sort to meddle with any thing which did be- long to their Common-wealth, and that captain Polin, who was to goe along with it, had assured them of the like, who by his Kings commandment had changed

his

The controuersie
betweene the Venetians and Ferdinand is not to be com-mised.

An. 1543.

Great preparations for warre on all sides.

The Emperour
allies himself with Henry King of England.

The Pope seeketh about to make alliance with the Venetians.

The Senates
answer to the
Pope.

his minde. Yet the Senate not relying ouer much on all these promises, determined likewise to arme the number of three score Gallies, and to appoint a Generall ouer them, which was Stefano Trepulo, a man very famous for his rare vertues and deserts: whereof they forthwith aduertized all Princes, to the end that the making ready of their fleet, might not make them to suspect that they had any sinister meaning; saying that the Republike had armed certaine Gallies for the defense of their owne subiects, and for the gard of their sea-coasts: and they commanded their Generall to visit the Islands vnder their dominion, and all their forts vpon the sea, to giue order and prouide for all things necessary, with expresse charge to auoide all occasions that might giue the Turkes any cause of distrust-10 their friendship towards them: whereinto they very well knew that Doria would haue oftentimes cunningly drawne them.

The Turkish nauall army in the meane time consisting of fixe score saile departed from Constantinople vnder the command of Carsadine Barbarossa, capitaine Polin going along with him, and comming to Negrepont where it made some stay to take in souldiers and other necessities, it failed to the Hauens of Figara, and from thence directed their course towards the West, and hauing passed the Far of Messina, came neere to Calabria, where landing certaine of his troupes, he tooke the city of Regio, and after he had spoiled it and scoured the country round about (the castle still holding out) he did re-embarked his people, and held on his course towards France, and by the way, he tooke in water at the Isle of Ponze, and next at Ostia vpon the Riuer Tiber, whereby Rome was in alarme, but Polin did by letters assure the Gouvernor of the towne, that no harme should bee done to any one vpon the coast, then hoysing ankors, and still coasting along the Riuers of Tuscany and Genoa, he arriued in the Hauens of Tolon, where finding two French Gallies, hee was by them conducted towards Marseilles, whither the Kings other foure and twenty Gallies came.

Barbarossa went on shore where hee was magnificently entertained in the city together with great numbers of Janissaries, Polin riding post to finde the King and to receiue his commandements, whom Barbarossa was enioyned wholly to obey, did speedily returne to the army, which being encreased by sixtene French Gallies, and certaine shippes wherein were fixe thousand foote-men, hee departed from Marseilles and sailed with a faire winde to the hauens of Villafrauca to beseege the city of Nice which the Duke of Sauoy then possessed, which had euer belonged to the crowne of France.

The Artillery and souldiers beeing landed, the City for certaine daies was battered, whereby it was enforced to yeeld without being sacked: but the Marquis of Guasto hauing victualled the castle, and Barbarossa being diswaied from making any longer aboade there, Autumne being very farre spent raised his campe and returned with his whole fleet to the hauens of Marseilles.

Now the Venetian fleet beeing truly aduertized what course the Turkes held, and how that Janetin Doria was gonne into the Leuant, did entertaine time in the Gulphe, the Generall thinking it more safe and profitabile to prouide for that which concerned themselves, and to auoide occasion of meeting with the others, that he might take away all suspicion of being desirous to helpe or hinder their designses.

The Emperour at the same time resolving to goe into Germany to stirre vp that country against the French King, hauing first caused the Estates of Spaine to accept the Prince Don Philip his sonne for their King, came to Barcelona where finding Doria with forty Gallies and certaine ships he embarked himselfe with the Spanish fantery, and came to Genoa. Vpon the report of his arriual in Italy, the Venetians chose foure Ambassadors, to wit, Carlo Morosini, Gabriele Veniero, Lodouico Faliero, and Vittor Grimany, to meet him as he passed through their State and to entertaine him by the way.

The

The Pope in the meane time hauing promised other matters to himselfe, seeing that the confederacy propounded to the Venetians had taken none effect, resolved to take with the Emperour, determining first, better to assure his owne affaires, as well for temporall matters as for Religion, and his Pontificall dignity in the councill which was to be held at Trent a city in Germany: and next, meaning once more to try if the Emperour would quit the Dutchy of Milan to Ottauio Farnese for a certaine summe of money, which he perceived the Emperour stood in great need of, by reason of the warres he had in hand: but concealing for that time those his secret designses, made shew, that the cause which moued
10 him as the common father and head of Christendome to embrace the Emperour passing along so neere him, was to exhort him to peace with Christians, and to warre against the Infidels; and to try if his presence in that businesse would be of more force then his exhortations made by his Legats sent to the Emperour into Germany, and into France to the most Christian King.

Now the Pope hauing acquainted the Venetians with his departure from Rome and going to Bologna, alleadged no other reason of his iourney then the former, wholly concealing the negotiating concerning the Dutchy of Milan, thereby to feele if he could discover any thing from them concerning it, for, on the one side he knew that the same treaty was pleasing vnto them, but on the other, it behoued 20 them to proceed therein very respectfully in regard of the aboue mentioned matters. The Senate continuing the old resolution not to meddle with these negotiations, did vnfeignedly commend the Popes good and holy meaning, with his resolution in so honest and important a businesse for the common good of all Christendome, not passing on any further to any other consideration.

The Pope seeming to bee greatly desirous of that enteruiue did not cease to pursue it, notwithstanding that hee was alone in that negotiation, and that the Emperour alleadged diuers difficulties and lets, who making no great account of him, made shew that he did not much affect him, either because hee was distast of him, the Pope hauing not openly shewed himselfe his friend as he ought to haue done, by reason of the honour done by the Emperour to him and his house, hauing by the marriage of his daughter preferred it to so many other noble alliances: or else because he did suspect the truth of the matter, how that the Pope would recommence his suite, that the Dutchy of Milan might be made ouer to Ottauio Farnese, the which he resolved not to quit to any man whatsoeuer: and therefore he was desirous to eschew all occasions of discontenting the Pope, and of prouoking him to embrace the French Kings friendship, by refusing his demand.

But the Pope supposing it would greatly blemish his greatnesse and dignity, if he should let the Emperour passe thorough Italy without seeing him, had to that end sent, first, Pietro Lodouico his sonne to Genoa, and then the Cardinall Farnese his Nephew, to entreate him that the enteruiue might be at Bologna, and vpon his Maiesties excuse that he was not willing to come so farre backe and to delay his iourney, he determined to come farther forward euen to Buffet, where it was concluded they should see one another, which was a towne very discommodious and smally frequented belonging to the Palatinis: but this enteruiue had no better successe then all men expected, nothing being there concluded, either for the Churches seruice or the particular profit of the Farneses. For the Emperour continued his resolution to make warre vpon the French King, and the Duke of Cleues, and as for Milan, because he would not flatly deny it, hee told him that he could not dispose of that State, vntill he had acquainted the Princes of the Empire therewith, whereby he might easily perceiue that he did meane to appropriate it to himselfe.

The enteruiue being dissolued which only lasted three daies, the Emperour pursuing his iourney entred vpon the Venetians State, where the foure aboue mentio.

The Venetians
doe arme for their owne safety and defence.

The Turkes
take Regio in Calabria.

Barbarossa his fleet at Marseilles.

Barbarossa
taketh the city of Nice and then returneth to Marseilles.

The Emperour
returneth into
Italy.

The Pope designes to confer with the Emperour.

The Emperour
refuseth to confer with
the Pope.

The Pope and Emperour en-teruiue at Buffet, to no purpose.

mentioned Ambassadors met with him, and did honourably entertaine him furnishing him with whatsoeuer he needed either for his owne person or his household, so long as he continued vpon their territories, wayting vpon him as farre as the confines of Trent, making diuers offers vnto him in generall in the name of the Common wealth, not mentioning any negotiation till they were ready to take their leaues of him, and then they besought him to be a meanes to his brother for a dispatch concerning the agreement of Trent which they had taken vpon them. From Trent the Emperour went to Vuormes, and from thence to Spire, to be nerer to that which he had determined to doe, hauing still resident with him Daniele Bouricci Secretary to the Common-wealth, the Ambassador de Pons remayning like at Trent, who being returned to Venice for the recouery of his health, Bernardo Nougersa was chosen in his stead.

Warre was at the same time much kindled in Hungary whither Soliman being come in person with a mighty army (hauing first scoured and wasted the country) had besieged the city of Strigonom, from whence he sent an Ambassador to Venice to acquaint the Senat with his journey and designs, and also there to vnderstand newes of his fleet, which at that time lay in the haven of Vil-lafranca at the enterprize of Nice, whereof the Senate aduertized him, and withal did infinitely thanke him for the honor he did them by acquainting them with his actions and designs. This demonstration of friendship from the Turkes did serue them for two purposes, first to continue peace betwixt them, and next, to encrease their reputation with other men. Therefore Soliman hauing againe sent an other Ambassador to Venice to aduertize them of his progression in Hungary, the Senate resolved in reciprocal manner to render him the like demonstration of honour and friendship, by sending an Ambassadors to him. This charge was committed to Stefano Tepalo (hee hauing giuen ouer the place of General) who at the Spring was to goe to Constantinople to Soliman (who was come thither from Hungary) to reioyce with him in the Common-wealths name for his fortunate successe, and to make shew at his Porte of a correspondency of loue and frindship.

The affaires of Maran were not yet appeased, but on the contrary much more enkindled, as well in regard of the French, who did meane to keepe and defend it, as for the Almaines who determined to haue it by force: so as besides foure hundred foot-men which the Lord of Senei brought thither, the French King sent great troupes of horle and foot: on the other side the King of Romaines hauing caused certaine companies of Lansquenets to passe the mounts at Pontieba, vnder the command of John Baptista Saucella, did besides assemble all the souldiers from the neereft places of his Dominions to make a bodie of an army, and to beseege it. The Senate had giuen free passage through their State both to the one and other, to shew that they had no hand in that businesse: they were neuertheless displeased for that one Fust and two Brigantins had bene armed at Trieste which entering into the Haven of Dignana had begonne straightly to shut in those of Maran on the sea side: wherevpon, to suffer them to stay there, besides the drawing of many others thither, would seeme greatly to preiudice the Republicke claime to that Haven, and shew some partiality, by suffering them to offend Maran from that place: the which they determining not to suffer, because they would proceed modestly therein, did entreate Ferdinand and the Emperour likewise to cause those armed vessels to depart forth of the Haven, sending thither at the same time an armed galley to hinder their incursions, till such time as they should receive an answer.

During these treaties, John Francisco de Pacis a Florentine came to Venice, to offer vnto the Senate in Stroffis his name the fort of Maran for some honest recompence, protesting that vpon their refusal, he should be enforced to negotiate with some other great Prince, whom he knew would gladly accept it: Stroffis resolving resolving in no sort to render it to Ferdinand, but rather to get some great summe of money for it, by contracting with the Turke: that the French King had left Maran to bee disposed of at Stroffis his pleasure, to make his profit thereof, in recompence of the good seruices done by him to the crowne of France.

The Senate therevpon was greatly perplexed, either to accept or refuse it. It desired to auoid all occasions of contention with Ferdinand, who might suspect that they had some intelligence with Stroffis: and to suffer that place to nere a neighbour to Venice to fall into the Turkes hands, would be very dangerous, not only for the Common-wealth but for all Christendome. Being then moued with feare of such a danger, they resolved to harken to Pacis proposition, and to that end two Senators were appointed, Antonio Capello, and Francesco Contarini, to treat with him vpon the particularities of the agreement: where after sundry contestations the composition was made in this manner: that Stroffis for consigning Maran into the Venetians hands, should for recompence receiue five and thirty thousand Ducats at one entire payment. This being thus concluded, Alessandro Bondimiero was so dainely chosen Prouidator of that place, who going along with Pacis, with some few foot forces, was brought into it, and Stroffis hauing consigned the towne to him, the whole people with great ioy did iurthwith take the oth of obedience to the Republike of Venice.

The Venetians did afterwards acquaint the Emperour and Ferdinand with the causes which had moued them to embrace that necessary resolution: that their actions in two yeeres space, that the towne had bene offered vnto them, could yeeld sufficient testimony of their integrity, during which time they had not only refused to giue an eare to their often propounded offers, but had giuen passage, victuals, and other commodities to *Ferdinand*s troupes for to recouer it: that they had likewise considered, how that place was of no great importance to Ferdinand, neither for the States confines, nor reueneu thereof: but on the contrary of great expence, accompanied with extreme danger for all his States if it should haue fallen into the Turkes hands, as vndoubtedly it would haue so happened, if they should haue refused Stroffis his offer.

These reasons being cunningly deliuered to those Princes by Bernardo Nougersa, and Marin de Canalis, Ambassadors for the Signory, the one with the Emperour, and the other with King Ferdinand, did in some sort appease them, both of them hauing at first taken the treaty concerning that place in bad part: and then the quality of the times did greatly helpe to make those Princes capable of the reasons by them alleaged: by reason that a Dyeth had bene published at the beginning of the yeere 1544. Where all the chiefe Princes and Lords of Germany were to meet to treat of affaires of great consequence, to make warre vpon the French, and to resist the Turkes attempts: for all the thoughts of the Emperour and the King of Romans tended only to those two ends; hoping besides (as a matter which they much desired) that the Venetians perceiuing so many Princes and free townes of Germany leagued against the Turkes, would enter into league with them, and abandon that of the Turkes; this was the visuall talke among Courtiers.

Now the Emperour was greatly afraid lest that the Venetians, vpon the least discontent giuen vnto them from himselfe, should quit his alliance and embrace that of the French King, who had so often sought to them for it; and his feare was at the same time greater then euer, in regard of his hope (being ioyned to the King of England and the Swisses) to molest France more then euer he had done, so perceiuing himselfe to be freed from the care of releuening Italy, which would be peaceable so long as the accord with the Venetians should last.

The French King on the contrary hauing the selfe same considerations, did hope to defend his owne Realme by troubling Italy, with the warres of Naples and the Dutchy of Milan, to constrain the Emperour to diuide his forces, and

The Turke makes warre in Hungary.

A Turke's Ambassador comes to Venice.

Sharpwar about Maran.

A motion made to the Senate for the buying of Maran.

Agreement betwixt Stroffis and the Venetians concerning Maran.

The Venetians excuse to the Emperour and Ferdinand concerning Maran.

An. 1544.

The Emperour and French King, resolving to draw the Venetians to their party.

The Cardinal
of Ferrara exhorteth the Venetians, in
the French
Kings behalfe.

to send part of them to the aide of those countries, and to that end did againe vie meanes to draw the Venetians to his party, and supposing that the quality and reputation of the man might greatly further the businesse, he caused the Cardinal of Ferrara to goe to Venice to that end, who was honourably entertained there, and comming into the Senat in secret audience (as he had desired) he be-ganne in substance to declare vnto them what the Emperours desires were; who only aspired to a sole Monarchy, and especially to that of Italy, the which he might with ease attaine to, did not the French King counterpoise him, who being their louing and trusty friend, did by him entreat them to enter into league with him, and speedily to send their nauall army into Puglia, where they should finde the country disurnished of Garrisons, and all the people at their deuotion, who did openly hold the Spaniards for their enemies, and he in the meane time, for the safety of their State, offered alwaies to haue fiftene thousand men ready in Piedmont, or in any other place that they should thinke fit.

The Senators
answer to the Cardinal.

The Senate according to the custome, did not at that time giue the Cardinal any answer to his proposition, but the businesse being afterwards debated in the councell, they answered him, That as the Republike did highly esteeme and deere-ly reckon of the French Kings friendship, it did likewise determine still to embrace and cherish it: but it neither could nor would (being now at peace with other Princes, and in want of diuers things by reason of the last warres) enter into trouble and expence by a new warre.

Anew practise
to draw the Venetians to the league with
the King.

The King supposing this answer to be no flat deniall (so desirous hee was to draw the Venetians to his party against the Emperour) within a while after the Cardinals returne to Rome, imagining that the speech which the Pope had vsed in his behalfe would be of force to alter the Venetians mindes, caused Bartholomeo Caulacanti, who was banished from Florence, to goe from Rome to Venice, to acquaint the Venetians with the Popes great affection towards the affaires of France, and to reuiue the negociation of the league, not long before propounded; although the King by dissembling it, to make the offence and sorrow seeme lesse, for that so many of his attempts had not taken effect, did protest that Caulacanti his going to Venice proceeded from the Cardinals sole and onely motion.

Two Legats sent to those Princes to procure peace.

Caulacanti was a man of great iudgement, and an excellent Orator (as his workes that are published doe manifest) who made a long and excellent discourtse to the Senate, contayning the selfe same substance that the Cardinal had before vtered; but the Senate being firme in their resolution did stop their eares to his speech, till they heard him speake of peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King, with all men so much desired.

The Pope to hasten the matter, sent two of the chiefeft Cardinals, to wit, Mo- ron to the Emperour, and Grimani to the French King, exhorting the Venetians to send their extraordinary Ambassadors, as they had done at the assembly at Nice, to the end that the exhortations both of the one and other might be of greater force to perswade them to so good a matter; and worthy the piety of any Christian Prince.

The Senate although it desired to see peace and concord betwixt those Princes, did neuertheless know that it behoued them to gouerne themselves moder-rately therein for diuers reasons, hauing oftentimes had experience of the bad offices done vnto them, by sinisterly interpreting in the Courts of Christian Princes, their found and sincere adions, and that the selfe same interpretations had beene diuulged at Constantinople vnder false colours, to their preiudice, yea, euen in Soliman hearing, and satisfying themselves with doing their duties by their ordinary Ambassadors, they were desirous to eschew that vaine and dangerous appearance. These Ambassadors acquainting the Senat with what was done in the Court of those Princes, reported, that they were very much inclined to
peace,

The English is besieged by the French.

peace, not so much for any desire they had to be good friends, as because they were weary of the warres: for the French being on the one side assailed by the King of England who comming to Calais with a mighty army did in person be-sege Bullin, and on the other by the Imperiall army, which after along sege had taken the city of Saint Desier vpon Marne, was very desirous by peace to free himselfe from so many discontents: the Emperour on the other side, wholly wanting money for the continuing of the warre, and fearing the losse of that which he held in Italy, by reason of forces raised in the Kings behalfe neere to Miran- dola. Doubting likewise the successe of that warre in regard of the great numbers of Swisses which went to the Kings aide, and being very desirous to see the Duke of Sauoy restored to his State, who vpon his occasion had beene despoiled thereof, the which could not be done but by agreement, was very willing and desirous of it: but each of them did looke when some other would motion the businesse.

The French Queene offered to employ her selfe therein, who was the Emperors sister, hauing caused Don Gabriel de Guzman a Spanish Frier and her Confessor to goe to her brothers campe, to motion the matter to the chiefe of the army, supposing therein to doe a pleasure to her husband and brother both at once.

A Spanish
Frier beginneth the treaty of peace betwixt those Princes.

This treaty then begunne by Guzman after sundry goings and commings from one campe to another did speedily take effect. Therefore, there being assembled the Admirall of France and the Secretary Bayard, which Granuelles and D. Ferrant de Gonzaga to conclude in their Princes names on the conditions of peace, it was decreed, that on either part those towne which had bene taken since the treaty of Nice, should bee redeliuered; that all particular controuerfies which might arise therevpon should be decided in the city of Cambray by Commissioners therevnto appointed: that the French King should aide the Emperour with a certaine number of horse and foote whensoever hee should make warre vpon the Turke: that the Duke of Sauoy should be restored to his State, certaine places thereof excepted, to the which the French King laied some particular claime:
and for the better assurance of this accord, the Duke of Orkance, the Kings second sonne should marry the Emperours daughter, or one of his Nieces, daughter to Ferdinand, according as he should thinke fit, (who within foure monthes was to resolu himselfe therevpon) and yet with a different dowry for marrying with the Emperours daughter the whole Low-Countries were promised him for her dowry, and for the Niece the Duchy of Milan. The Venetians as friends to them both were comprehended in that peace, who had so discreetly behaued themselves during those warres, as both the one and other of them were fa-tisfied and pleased with their proceedings: the like did not happen to the Pope, of whom the French did greatly complaine, because that hee hauing made a shew to fauour their party, had not aided them at their greatest need: the Imperials on the other side did accuse his designs, saying, that if hee had not openly declared himselfe for the French King it was not for want of loue, but for feare of the Emperours forces; so as his Legat had much to doe to get him to be comprehended in the peace: but because it was laid to be made for the common good of Christendome, it was requisite and necessary to haue him therein named, as the chiefe of Christians.

The Capitulations
of the
peace.

Both sides complaine of the Pope.

This peace happening at a time and after such a manner when all men least expected it, gaue occasion to men to discourtse diuersly thereof, some thinking that it would continue, because the King did thereby purchase vnto himselfe, either the Duchy of Milan, or Flanders, with the whole Low-Countries, others beeing of a contrary opinion did imagine that the same accord would bee of none effect at all, by reason whereof the Emperour, who would not see the Realme of France to bee any way ruined by Ecce

Diuers opinions concerning this peace.

the English (which was the cause of the agreement) would not likewise endure to see it grow great and flourish by peace, and by the purchase of so many goodly dominions. The Venetians for all that did not let to reioyce therefore both by beneficers and other demonstrations of ioy, yielding follemne thanks to God for that he had inspired the hearts of those Princes to embrace peace.

Barbarossa his owne spoiles as he returned home.

Barbarossa in the meane time departing from Villafraua to returne towards Constantinople, and sayling alongst the coast of the Realme of Naples, he spoiled and wasted the whole country, and chiefly the Isles of Ischia and Lipari, which with a barbarous cruelty he did miserably ruine; from thence sayling to Corfou, and saluting the castle as a friend, he received the accustomed presents, not suffering any harme to be done to the inhabitants of the Island. Captaine Polin was in that fleet with five Gallies and other vessels, who hauing brought the Turkes as farre as Lepanto, returned with all his vessels to Marceilles.

The Turkes were displeased at the newes of this peace betwixt Christian Princes, thinking it be done, the better to breake their designs vpon Hungary or Transilvania, for which they had already made preparations; but they went about to conceale their discontent for the better maintenance of their reputation, being wont to contemne Christians; and therefore not giuing ouer their former determination they caused to be giuen out that they were making farre greater preparations then at any other time before, to march at the spring against the Srates belonging to the house of Austria: and yet neuerthelesse, the report at the same time was, that if the Ambassadors of those Princes did come to that Port, they should be entertained and willingly harkened to: for by their law they can not deny audience to any that come to sue for peace and friendship with their great Lord: the report of these great preparations, caused the Emperor and Ferdinand expressly to dispatch their messengers to that Port to treat of peace and agreement: and for their safer going to worke, they caused the French King first of all to send one of his seruants to sound Soliman's disposition thereunto, and withall to craue a passe-port for their Ambassadors.

The Emperor
and Ferdinand doe send Ambassadors to treat of agreement with the Turkes.

The King did willingly entertaine this businesse, as well to free himselfe of that he was tied to by the treaty of peace to aide the Emperour when he should make warre vpon the Turke, as in some sort to wipe out that blot, for which men taxed him; that a most Christian Prince had made vse of the armes of Infidels against Christians: wherevpon, his Ambassadour passing by Venice, did tell the Senate by his Kings commandement, that he had to none other end entertained the Turkes friendship, but only to make vse of it vpon such occasions for the good and profit of Christendome.

This Ambassadour being come to Constantinople found Soliman disposed to whatsoeuer he demanded, and the passe-port which he craued being deliuered to him (which was at the beginning of the yeere 1545.) Ieronimo Adorni, did in Ferdinands name goe to Constantinople; the Emperour hauing to that end appointed Doctor Girardo, caused him first to goe to Venice, where he, and the Prothonotary Montlake, ordinary Ambassadour for the French King with the Signory, did imbarke themselves in the Venetian Gallies for Ragusa, and from thence went to the Port of the great Lord. Before their departure from Venice they had entreated the Senate that their Bailly might haue an hand in that businesse, the which was granted, and commandement sent to him so to doe, but that he should doe it so cunningly as the Turkes might not conceiue any sinister opinion, whereby any harme might redound to the Common-wealth, or profit to themselves.

An. 1545.

These Princes
Ambassadors
come to Constantinople.

Commissioners decide the controversie betwixt Ferdinand and
the Venetians.

They treated at the same time in Venice of composing the strife betwixt King Ferdinand and the Republike, as well for the execution of the sentence of Trent, as for that which happened since concerning Maran, where after great contestation they did at last conclude for the businesse of Trent, to send Commissioners thither thither to decide it, but for Maran it was referred to the Emperours counsell: one of the chiefe conditions was that the Venetians should giue to Ferdinand three-score, and fiftene thousand Ducats, the which (all other controversies being ended) they promised to pay in three yeeres, and at three equall payments.

This accord although it tooke none effect, was maliciously interpreted by some, who vsed to sow discord and contention, telling Soliman that the same treaty was made against him in Ferdinands behalfe, vnto whom the Venetians promised that summe of money to leaue souldiers: These false reports being iustified and the truth of the matter knowne, Soliman was satisfied therewith: wherevpon the Senate thought it fit not to giue him any more cause of suspicion: and therefore they wrote to their Bailly, willing him no more to visit the Ambassadors, nor to make any more publike demonstration of dealing in their businesse, the which he did exactly obserue, yet neuerthelesse some times when he had any secret conference with the Bassas, he did not let to doe all good offices which might further the conclusion of the accord: wherein because the Republike had no other aime but the common peace and quiet, they solicited the Bassas that it might be mentioned in the treaty, that the Emperour and Ferdinand should not attempt any thing in Italy during the truce.

Soliman is silly informed of
the Venetians.

Raffin hauing heard this proposition, and seeming to be desirous to performe any thing for the particular profit of the Signory, sayd, that by all meanes it was particularly to bee inserted in the treaty of the accord, as the friend of the great Lord, and expresse mention was made, how that during the truce the Venetians State should in no sort be molested by the Princes, comprehended in the agreement, who doing otherwise it should be understood to be broken with Soliman selfe: yet neuerthelesse, it was thought that the Venetians had opposed themselves against that truce then handled, seeing that they could not procure peace, which caused the Emperour for that purpose to returne from Trent to Venice his Ambassadour Mendoza, who not dissembling this suspicion, and assuring them of the Emperours hearty affection towards them, entreated them from him to fauour the treaty of truce, which was already (as hee said) well forward at Constantinople, and which for the Republikes sake might easily bee effected, promysing to haue it comprehended in the treaty as their good and louing friend.

This did the rather moue the Venetians to sollicite a suspension of armes betwixt those Princes, in regard, that besides other commodities, they were to receiue thereby great assurance, and reputation, by being declared friends to both parties, enioying the benefite of peace which they were to hope for by such an agreement. It was thought that the Emperour did not so earnestly pursue the conclusion of the league, for any distrust not to be assisted by Germany against the Turkes; but because he perceiued himselfe to be enforced to take armes against the chiefe Lords and States of that country, who hauing pell mell ouerturned all matters sacred and prophane to the great contempt of the Church of Rome, and the Maiesty of the Empire, went daily vp and downe practicing nouelties by a manifest rebellion, so that the Emperour, who from the beginning to draw them to his party had consented against the Popes minde, that the counsell should be held in the city of Trent, to the great aduantage of the Almaines, did afterwards repent him of it, knowing that therein he had done no great good seruice to Religion: that he had broken with the Pope, and nothing preiuailed with the Almaines, wherevpon he sought to moderate the conditions with which it had bene published.

What did moue the Em-perour to solicit truce with Soliman.

The Venetians on the other side perceiuing that the assembly of the counsell (though they would not openly hinder it) was not pleasing to the Pope, as being made in an vnfit time and place, and by meanes not becoming the dignity and authority of the sea Apostolicke, would not send their Ambassadors thither.

Eeecc 3

Concerning

Truce for one yeere betwixt
the Emperour,
his brother, &
Soliman.

Contention betwixt the Venetians and
the Turke.

A tyrannicall law of the Turkes.

Concerning the accord treated of at Constantinople, of which all men hoped for a prosperous end by means of a long truce of many yeeres (certaine difficulties arising about the restitution of some few castles in Hungary) it ended by a short suspension of armes for one yeere, with an intent neuerthelesse (as Soliman selfe did say, and write to the French King) that after the matter should be well debated in Ferdinands Court, the Ambassadors might returne to the Port the next yeere following with new Commissions to strengthen the peace with a longer terme.

In the meane time a new Contention arose betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians about the confines of Dalmatia, where the Sangiacks of Boffina and Cliffa being desirous to disturbe the peace for their owne particular profit, or else to spoile the country, or to receiue some presents of the Venetians, would haue vsurped a great part of the territory of Zara, saying, that a country contrayning nine and forty villages did belong vnto them, as dependances of the castles of Nadin and Laurana, which by the last accord remayning to the great Lord, they said did likewise belong vnto him with all their territories: wherevpon they forbade the inhabitants of those places vpon grievous penalties, to acknowledge any other Lord but Soliman.

This new trouble did greatly vex the Venetians, the country in question being of great importance, both for it selfe and for the preservation of the city of Zara, and although their reasons were vnreasonable, in regard that Nadin and Laurana, small castles, had no territory belonging vnto them; but did with the other villages nere adioyning depend on Zara, the chiefe city of the Prouince, yet neuerthelesse fearing least the strange and insolent proceedings which the Turkes are wont to vse in such businesses (who hold it for a law, that the whole country whereon the horse of the great Lord hath once trod doth belong vnto them) might occasion longer strife, had recourse to Soliman, who referring the decision of that controuersie to the Sangiac of Cherssega, and to two Cadis (these men are ordinary iudges in law) was desirous to haue whatsoever they should set downe to be executed, who were to meet in the same place with the Commissioners of the Signory. The Senate did for that purpose choose Lodouico Rayniero who handled the businesse so wisely and discretely with the Turkish officers, as the whole territory in question was quietly adiudged to the Republique of Venice.

The same yeere deceased Prince Landi, leaving behind him a great and singular reputation to haue well and wisely gouerned the Common-wealth for the space of sixe yeeres and eight monethes, and lieth buried in Saint Antonies Church. Francesco Donato was chosen in his place.

FRANCESCO

Bout the beginning of the yeere 1546. all those that desired the peace of Italy were afraide, least it would be shortly shaken with new troubles, because that the peace betwixt the Emperour and the French King (the principall Articles thereof taking none effect) was so badly assured, as there wanted nothing but a fit time to take armes.

The French King by the sodaine death of his sonne the Duke of Orleans having not obtained the Duchie of Milan promised vnto him, by means of the marriage, had not for all that lost his desire to recouer it: the Duke of Sauoy likewise could not be restored of his State, the King still detayning it vpon sundry pretences, hoping to enforce the Emperour to some other conditions by the restitution thereof, seeking thereby to obtaine his desire.

An other new matter happened in Italy which gaue cause of feare of some new troubles: for the Pope perceiuing al his delignes to fall out contrary to his desire for the aduancement of his house, hauing cut off from the Churches demaines the cities of Parma and Placentia, which Pope Iulius the second had annexed thereto, gaue them in fee to Petro Lodouico his son, on condition to pay a yeerely rent of eight thousand crownes to the Church, and in recompence thereof to make ouer to the sea Apostolike the Duchy of Camerin, and the Signory of Nepi wherewith his son Ottauio had bene inuested. This Cession did so much displease the Emperour, as he could by no means be induced to giue the Pope the inuestiture of those two cities which he demanded, hauing bene in former time incorporated into the Duchy of Milan.

This refusal of the Emperour had equally incensed both the father and the son: so that Petro Lodouico would willingly haue embraced the first occasion offered against the Emperour: and the Pope, distrusting both the Emperour and the French King, resolved by all means to maintaine and defend what he had done concerning the erection of the new Duchy in the person of his sonne, who discouising with the Venetian Ambassador told him, into what danger Italy was like to fall, so soone as the French King should be at peace with the King of England, which at that time was treated of; and that the Emperour, if he could not

Eccc 3

An. 1546.

The Pope giueth Parma and Placentia in title of Duchy to his sonne Petro
Lodouico.

The Emperour
refuseth to inuest Petro Lodouico in the Duchy of Parma and Placentia.

The new Duke but offers to
the Venetians.

not at the Dyet of Ratisbon draw the Protestant Princes to his desire, would be enforced to make warre vpon them: therefore he did exhort the Senate to ioyne with him a firme and sound intelligence, as it behooued them for their common interests, and for a greater assurance, he caused the new Duke to send Augustino de Landes his Ambassadorto Venice, who acquainting them with the new grade and dignity which he had lately obtained, did in his name offer both his State and person to the seruice of the Signory.

The Senate did very louingly thanke him for his offers, offering him the selfe same, but in generall termes, which could not tie them to any thing, because they would not thereby giue his Holinesse any hope by their meanes to raise any troubles in Italy: then, providing for the defense of their owne States, and foreseeing what might happen, they tooke into the seruice of the Common wealth Guido Vbaldo Duke of Vrbin, in quality of Generall of their forces by land, with a yeerely pension of fife thousand crownes, and fiftene thousand crownes for an hundred men at armes and a hundred light horse, which he was bound to haue continually ready for the seruice of the Signory.

But the troubles wherein the Emperor and the French King were engaged, was cause of the safety of Italy; because that the one, notwithstanding all his attempts could not get Bolloigne from the English: and the other hauing called the Protestant Princes to the Dyet of Ratisbon, to treat of affaires concerning Religion, although he were there in person, could not induce them to decree or conclude any thing: but whereas at the beginning it seemed that they would haue bene satisfied to haue had the councill held in the city of Trent, whither they promised to send their Doctors to treat of matters concerning faith, and afterwards to hold and embrace what there should be decided: they did then craue first of all to haue a nationall councill held in Germany, and if afterwards it should happen to be referred to that of Trent, that the assembly might on all sides be free, with diuers other exorbitant and vnreasonable demands. This caused the Pope no more to feare the councill, and to assure the State of Parma and Placencia to his sonne, the Emperor, Princes and people of Germany, hauing turned their thoughts to other matters, determining to end that controuersie by armes.

The Emperors
and the French Kings difficulties were cause of the peace of Italy.

The end of the fourth Booke of the sixth Decade.

The

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the sixth Decade.

THE Venetians goe about to diuert the Pope from taking armes against the Protestants. The Venetians grant passage thorow their Territories to the Pope and the Emperors Soldiers, who were the Protestants partakers. The Venetians refuse to lend money to the Duke of Saxon and Landgraue of Hesse. The Protestants take the Castle of Chiusa to stop the Italians passage. The cause of the losse and overthrow of the Protestants. What the Venetian Gentlemen are, with their prerogatives. The commotion of the Sienois against the Spaniards. Petro Lodouico Duke of Parma and Placencia is murdered. The Death of Francis the first, French King. The death of Henry the eighth King of England. The occasion of the new warre betwixt the French and the English. Horacio Farnese marrieth the daughter of Henry the French King. The Venetians being solicited by the Pope and the French King against the Emperour, continue Neuters. The Popes great perplexities. Soliman takes armes against the Persian, making truce with Christian Princes. Contention betwixt the Emperour and the French King concerning the Truce with the Turke. Controuersy about the Place wherein the councill should be held. The death of Pope Paul the third with the election of Pope Iulius the third. Horatio Farnese committeth him selfe and his family into the French Kings protection. Great warre in Italy concerning Parma and Placencia. The Publication of the Councel of Trent. Pietro Strozzi his policy to reticnall Parma. The German Princes Treatate with the French King against the Emperour. The French King being incensed against the Pope forbiddeth the Annates in France. The Turkes warre in Hungary and Transilvania. All Germany in league against the Emperour and his brother. Ferdinand to free him selfe from the warre with the Turkes, offereth to pay him tribute for Transilvania. And lastly the murder of Frier George, Cardinall of the Sea Apostolike.

The

The fift Booke of the fift Decade
of the History of Venice.

The Venetians
refuse to diuert the Pope from meddling with the Protestants

The Senate answer to the Pope and the Emperer.

The Venetians
grant passage to the Pope and Emperers troops.

The number of
the Emperours
Army.

HE Pope perceauing the Emperor to be distast of the Protestants (as hath bene said) began to heate him more, by promising to aid him with great numbers both of horse and foote paid by the Sea Apostolike. The Senate from the beginning vsed meanes to appease the Pope, and to diuert him from meddling in that warre, the which it thought could bring no good to Italy, and there was small hope to preuaill by force in matter of Religion: For all the free townes of Germany hauing declared them-selues for the Protestant Princes, fearing that the Emperor, vnder other pretences, went about to subjugate them, Germany on the other side standing badly affected to the Pope, and Court of Rome, it was to be feared, and not without cause, that the same fierce and warlike nation would by reason therof make incursions into Italy, where they that had in no sort delt in that businesse were to smart for it: Or if the Emperor should happen to quell Germany; hee by that victory growing more mighty, both in forces and reputation, his greatnesse would proue fearefull to the Princes of Italy. But the Senate knowing him to be resolute therein, and that being prickt forward by two mighty spurrs, Feare, and Hope, concerning the affaires of state, of his owne greatnesse, and that of his house, he would not embrace any counsell contrary to his owne opinion, did forbear to speake vnto him any more concerning that matter, but vpon the Pope and Emperors motion vnto it about that extorprize, by their Ambassadors, it made a modest answer, because it would not vainly offend the Emperor, without praising or dispraising it, being not willing to giue any occasion to be requested to aide him. Yet neuertheless it was certainly reported, that the Common-wealth had promised at the conclusion of the league at Rome, to giue payment for fise thousand footemen, which was most false.

The Venetians being desirous, in some sort, to content these Princes in any thing which was not of expence, and being intreated so to doe, did promise free passage to the Popes soldiers, who being assembled at Bologna to the number of twelve thousand footmen, and fise hundred horse, were to passe thorough the Territory of Veronato goe to Trent: the like was done to the Emperors forces, who for their money were furnished with victualls and other necessaries. The best and bravest soldiers of all Italy were in the Popes Army, whereof Ottavia Farnese his Nephew was Generall, who was a yong Lord of great hope: But that of the Emperor was composed of sundry nations; namely of diuers Almans, drawne forth of the patrimonial States of the house of Austria, fro those of the Dukes of Bawaria and Cleues, and the Marquis Albert of Brandenburg, who did follow the Emperors party, so that the whole number of his forces were forty thousand foote-men and fise thousand horse.

The

The Protestant Princes made preparations at the same time, the cheife of whom were John Fredericke Duke of Saxony one of the Electors of the Empire, and Philip Landgraue of Hesse, who, saying that they would defend the liberty of Germany, which Charles went about to vsurpe, (as they said) did draw vnto their parts diuers of the greatest Lords and Cities of Germany, as the Duke of Wittemberg, the Count Palatin another Elector, with the Common-wealthes of Argentine, Vlnes, Francofort and Norimberg, the City of Aulbourg hauing a long time before declared it selfe in their behalfe: all which hauing resolved to hold a diet at Vlnes did send their Ambassadors and Commissioners thither, to treat particularly of the preparations for warre, where the concourse of all Germany was such, as they leuied a very great army of fourescore thousand footmen, and tenne thousand horse, with which forces they promised vnto them-selues to be able to ouercome those of the Emperor, and to driue him forth of Germany, in regard hee was not able to assemble Germane forces comparable to theirs.

They feared none but forraigne soldiers, and especially the Italian Fanterie, leuied by the Pope: whereuppon, to stoppe their passage, they did write louingly to the Venetians, and by putting them in mind of the ancient freindship betwixt the Germane nation and them, they entreated them not to giue passage to those through their territories, who came only to offend them, and to serue the Emperor, who went about to bring Germany into seruitude. The Senate answered that it did hold their freindship deere, which they had euer embraced, & generally that of all Germany, but their Countrey being open and Champaine, they could not stoppe the soldiers passage but with great forces, which they were wont to employ but against open enemies. Within a while after, they received particular letters from the Duke of Saxony and the Landgraue of Hesse, which acquainting them with their designses, and how that for their owne defense they had bene enforced to take armes, did earnestly entreate them to lend them a certaine summe of money. The King of England did greatly fauour his demand, by his Secretary residing at Venice, who presented his letters; (that King being distast of the Emperor) but the Senate making still one answer, said, that it did hold those Princes for their good and trusty freinds, and did wish them all prosperity and aduancement, but that they could not satisfie their request without offending other Princes with whom they were in league and freindship, which they did mean to maintaine, and that (these respects excepted) they did greatly affect the Germane nation. Those of Aulbourg likewise hauing by their letters and by an expresse messenger recommended their Marchants to the Senate, (many of whom were retired to Venice, and greater numbers comming daily thither for feare of those troubles); were kindly answered, that their Citizens, with all others of any other Cities of Germany, which came to Venice, should be very welcome and vsed as their owne Citizens, as they had bene in former times. Now Whilst either party was busied in making preparations for warre, and that already great numbers of soldiers raised in Italy were ready to march, a rumor was spred abroad how that both sides were at peace and become freinds, the Capitulations whereof being vnkowne, and no Postes being sent abroad into all places to publish it, did sufficiently manifest that it was nothing so, yet neuertheless these foudaine newes did amaze the Venetians, considering that such great numbers of soldiers which at that time filled all Italy, were sufficient to affright other mens states which were vnfurnished of force, whenso euer they should bee desirous to turne their Armes vpon any other enterprize. The Pope hauing intelligence of the Venetians doubt, and fearing least the Senate would determine, for their safety, to league themselves with some other, with a resolution cleane contrary to his designses, did enter into a long discourse with the Ambassador for the Signory, telling him how that for the Common good hee had euermore bene carefull of the peace and quiet of Italy, with a particular desire to aduance what

Who they wrote that took part with the Protestants.

The number of the Protestants
Army.

The Protestants suite to the Veneti-
ans.

The Senates
answere to the Protestants.

The Duke of Saxony and the Landgraue of Hesse their suite to the Venetian Senate, with their answer.

The Venetians
gentle answer to those of Aul-bourg.

The Venetians
are in some doubting, for many soldiers in Italy.

The Popes discourse to drive the Venetians from their possession.

whatsoever did belong to the safety and greatnesse of the Venetian Commonwealth: wherefore he willed him to assure the Senate of his good meaning, that they might continue their sound intelligence with him, seeing that thereby they should preserve one anothers States in safety, yea and all Italy beside; that he was desirous at that time to revive that discourse when he was armed and out of danger to be outraged, to let them know that it was not feare, but a true and zealous love that moved him to discourse with him, and to open vnto him the secret of his thoughts.

The Protestants take Chiufa.

The treaties of peace being broken, and the Armies on both sides in the field, the Protestants seeking to do that of themselves, which they could not obtaine of others, namely to stop the Italians passage which were coming against them went to seize vpon the Castle of Chiufa, a place in the County of Tiroll, seated among the mountaines, by which they supposed that the enemies would passe; but the Pope and Emperors Armies, keeping the way that leadeth neerer to Ispruch, entered the Duchy of Bauaria and from thence went to Ratibon, where the Emperor with his other forces expected them.

The occasions of the enemies luste.

The two armies as well that of the Emperor, as the enemies, continued a long time idle, each of them watching for some advantage, notwithstanding that they were oftentimes so neere together, as sundry great skirmishes were many times made in one anothers view, without coming to battaile, which the Emperor, being well aduised, did as much as in him lay seeke to auoid, the better to draw the businesse out in length, and to defeat the enemies, (who were many heads of fearefull minds, by temporizing, the which he did.

The Cardinal Farnese commeth to Venice

For the soldiers and the townes beginning to loose their former great opinion of being soone able to vanquish and defeat the Emperor, and to feeble the commodities of tedious contributions towards the wars, King Ferdinand hauing on the other side entred Duke John Fredericks State with a mighty army, accompanied by Duke Maurice of Saxony his enemy, there arose such a confusion and amazement in the enemies Campe as suffering diuers Castles to be taken before their faces, and their Army dissolving of selfe, the Emperor might in a short space contrary to his expectation giue an end to that dangerous warre. For hauing by these fortunate euents, purchased great fame, and reputation, diuers of those Protestant Princes and free rownes returned to their obedience and begged pardon: so as in a few monethes space, he wonne a great part of the Counties of those great Lords and mighty Commonwealthes, the which he had scarcely hoped to be able to haue done in a long time and with great labour and trauell.

This Warre thus ended, winter being already come the Emperor dismissed the Popes troopes, which being disbanded returned back into Italy. The Cardinal Farnese, the Popes nephew, who had bene his Legat in that Army, returning towards Rome was desirous as he passed along to see the City of Venice, where hauing notice that they made preparations for his entertainment, he determined to goe thither in priuate, where he was so well receiued and entertained of all men both in publique and priuate, as he departed from thence well satisfied and contented. The Farneses not long before at the Popes request, had bene receiued into the number of the Venetian Gentlemen, in all places so highly reckoned of, both for the ancient gouernment of the Commonwealth, and for the name of liberty which they haue ever inuolubly maintained together with the dignity and command of great dominions: And because occasion is now offered by the way to speak somewhat of this nobility, we will briefly make some mention thereof.

V/ho be Venetian Gentlemen with their Prerogatiues.

The Venetians do call those Gentlemen that haue a share in the gouernment of the Commonwealth, that is to say, those that haue authority to elect the publick magistrates, and may themselves likewise bee elected: this authority is giuen them from their birth, so as who-so-euer is borne of noble parents, is noble and

and may at a certaine time and manner limited by the lawes, enter into the great councell, where the ordinary election of Magistrates is made. Into this ranke are receiued, either those who hauing bene the cheefe inhabitants of the City, and most famous for vertue and wealth, haue from the beginning had the managing of publique affaires: or also those who for some notable and worthy act, done in seruice of the Commonwealth, are at sundry times, and for sundry accidents, admitted therevnto: who for the most part haue bene of the cheefe and noblest families, of some other place: or some others vnto whom by speciall grace and fauour, this title of Nobility hath bene giuen: Wherein neuer the lesse they haue carried themselves very moderately, it being graunted but to Lords of great Estate, and in this manner were the families of Este and Gonzaga, with some others of the cheefe of Italy, admitted therevnto; namely, Henry King of France and Poland, being at Venice, in the yeare 1574. and among other honors receiuing the title of a Venetian Gentleman, did seeme to be highly pleased, and satisfied with that giust. Besides, all those that descend from them, who haue bene once receaued into this degree, haue the same preeminence, and to the end it may continually be the better maintayned in it perfection, they do curiously search out the pedigrees of those who are to enter into the great councell, not only the nobility of the father, but like-wise whether they bee borne of lawfull matrimony, and of no common woman, but of some honorable degree and condition, whereof are register is kept by one of the cheefe magistrates, termed the Auogario of the Commonwealth. But to returne to our history, the Emperor Charles was in all places highly praised, and commended for his fortunate successe, and for breaking the enemies army: Duke Fredericke and the Landgrau, were yet vnquished, who despayring, as authors of all those troubles, of obtaining the Emperors fauour, did still continue in their rebellion: and yet for all that men might perceiue that they could not long resist the forces of so great and victorious a Prince. The Pope calling to mind by himself, whatsoever was past, perceiued how much more profitable it had bene for him to haue followed the Venetians councell; whose wisdom he highly praised, for he saw no prosperous successe of any thing that he had taken in hand; The councell lay open as before, the Emperor doing it to content the people of Germany, although by reason of the warre certaine Prelats were gone home againe: That Pietro Lodouico was in no great safety, in regard the warre was so sonne ended, the which he thought would haue continued longer, with diuers other matters which discontented him, and gaue him cause to complaine. The Emperor on the other side made his complaints, saying that he had broken promise with him, because the warre being not yet ended, which hee had begun throw his perswasion, he had countermanded his troups, leauing him still entangled in Germany, betwixt two mighty enemies, the Duke of Saxony, and the Landgrau of Hesse; the which he much amplified, to draw the Pope to a new contribution of money, or that hee might haue leaue to make vse of the wealth of the Churches of Spaine, which he had often craued, or els to make his victories seeme greater by exalting the enemies forces, so as they made him more proud, and increased in him his desire to rule, especially after that he had in battaile vanquished and taken John Fredericke Duke of Saxony prisoner, and enforced the Landgrau to craue his pardon: wherevpon entering in triumphant manner into the City of Ausbourg, he there held a Diet, where he obtrayned whatsoever he demanded for his owne profit and commodity. Yet neuer the lesse, in the middelt of all these prosperities his mind stil ran vpon the affaires of Italy, how he might keepe to himselfe the State of Milan, whether he sent great store of ordnance, which he had taken from diuers Lords of Germany, with great numbers of Spanish foot, as those in whom he repoled most trust, and him-selfe going thither afterwards, caused the oath of allegiance to be made vnto him-selfe, and to him whom he should appoint for their Prince, (meaning his Sonne Philip) who for that purpose was shortly to passe

The Popes complaints against the Emperor.

The Emperors complaints against the Pope

The Emperors returne to Milan.

The Sienois rise
against the Spaniards.

The Emperours designs in Italy.

The death of Pietro Lodovico to the Popes Sonne.

The death of Francis the first French King & Henry
the eight King
of England.

Henry the Second French
King.

The Senate sendeth Ambassadors to the new
French King.

And so Edward the Sixth King of England.

The Cardinall
Saint George is sent Legat
into France.

passed into Italy: yet neuer the lesse he procured an agreement with the Swisses, whereby they were bound to maintaine and defend the State of Milan. He had moreover placed foure hundred Spaniards in Siena, for the gard of the City with an officer of his owne, who in diuers matters vsed great authority, and went about to build a Castle there, that he might afterwards make him selfe absolute maister thereof, vnder colour of the commotions of the people and nobility, who being not able in the end to endure to see them selves brought into bondage, had driuen the Spaniards forth of the city, and committed diuers other outrages against the Imperiall Maiestie; he did likewise vse meanes to seaze on the towne of Piombino, to take it from the true Lord vpon sundry pretences, promising to recompence him with some other place, hoping to make vse of the commodiousnesse of that place, being seated on the sea of Tuscany, and fit for his other designs: But his seazing on the City of Placentia, together with the death of Pietro Lodovico, did more then all the rest amaze euery man, and especially the Pope: & for the full accomplishment of the Emperours happinesse, there died at the same time, not long one after another, the two greatest and mightiest Kings of Christendome, Francis the first of that name French King, and Henry the eight King of England; so, that all things seemed to fauour him, and to fall out according to his desire, seeing that those two great and mighty Princes, being taken away, who were his enemies, and enuious of his greatnesse, hee remained alone of him selfe in a manner ludge and Vmpier of all matters, with a soueraygne authority.

Henry Daulphin of France succeeded King Francis his Father, not onely in the crowne, but in the selfe same affections and desires, in no sort to giue way to the Emperours fortune. The Senate were greatly grieved with King Francis death, where vpon they chose two Ambassadors, namely Vittore Grimaldi and Mateo Dandolo, who were in all hast to goe into France to the new King, and according to the custome to bewaile with him his fathers death, and next to congratulate his comming to the crowne, and to assure him that the Venetian Republike was disposed and resolu'd to continue peace, and friendship with him, as it had done with his Father the late King. As for Henry King of England, Italy was not so much grieved for him, that Kingdom being farther off: the Venetians alone bewyled him, by reason of their ordinary commerce, and trafficke into that realme, for which, they kept an ordinary Ambassador in England. Edward the first of that name succeeded his Father Henry, who was young and gouerned by the chiefe Lords of the Kingdome, vnto whom the Senate sent Dominico Bollandi for their Ambassador, who found them very willing to continue friendship and visuall trafficke with the Venetians, promising to giue kind v'lage to as many of their nation as should come into those parts.

The French King was desirous at the same time to make warre vpon the English for diuers respects, but especially for the towne of Boloign. Those which feared the Emperours to much greatnesse, were sorry that the French King should busie him selfe in that warre, which made him to forget the affaires of Italy, and to suffer the Emperour freely to pursue his owne designs, but the Pope was more discontented then any other, as he that for his owne particular interests, and not for the common good, did determine by the armes of the French to abate the Emperours greatnesse: therefore hee resolu'd to send the Cardinall of Saint George into France, vnder colour (as it was giuen forth,) to cause the French Prelates to come to the counsell published at Bologna: But in effect it was for other ends, namely to incite the French King to turne his designs against the Emperour, and to stoppe his pregressions, offering him for that purpose all ayde and friendship.

King Henry did willingly harken to this motion, as one desirous to execute some

some great enterprize, and who would not omit any occasion whereby he might hope to purchase glory by some generous action: wherein the Pope, by meanes of his forces, was thought to be a very fit Instrument for the affaires of Italy, as well in regard of the commodiousnesse of his State, as most of all for his authority: wherevpon the King being easily perswaded to harken to this proposition, resolu'd to strengthen his intelligences in Italy, and to purchase friends there, and among others, he sent for Pietro Strossi into France, whom he forthwith honored with the order of S. Michell, which at that time was a great honor, and giuen to none but noble persons, or to such as had well deserued of the Crowne of France: this man was highly esteemed for his excellent witte, and also for that he was an enemy to peace, and greatly followed by the banditti of Florence and others, which was a ready means to trouble the affaires of Italy. The King did likewise fauour the reuolt of the Sienois promising to aid them in the defense of their liberties. But together with the Pope (for the vnion betwixt them was already confirmed, Horatio Farnese sonne to Pietro Lodovico having married King Henries daughter) he was likewise desirous to draw the Venetians to that league and Vnion, because hee would attempt nothing against the Emperour in Italy, but that which he was sure would take effect.

The King to this end sent his Ambassador to Venice, to bid the Pope his Nuncio, who supposed to find the Venetians more ready to condescend to their demandes, then they had beene in times past, in regard of the Emperours dealings, and especially for the Villany committed vpon the person of Pietro Lodovico who had beene murdered by certaine Placentine Gentlemen, by the consent (as it was reported) of D. Ferrant of Gonzaga, Lieutenant to the Emperour in Italy, who presently after had seazed vpon the City of Placentia, leauing great numbers of Spaniards in Garrison there in the Emperours name, whoby that meanes went about to take away an other mans rightes not by open force but by deceit.

Gonzaga acknowledging that the Venetians would suspect and think strangely of that deed, did speedily send Giovann Baptista Schizae, a Senator of Milan to Venice, to acquaint the Senate with what had beene done, and by qualifying the matter to assure them that he was not guilty thereof; but that he could do no lesse, being sent for and sought vnto by the Dukes murderers who presently came to him to Milan, to haue him goe and receiue that City in the Emperours name the which he did, but till such time as hee might receiue newes what the Emperours pleasure was therein: but his deeds were contrary to his worps; for so soone as he entred the City, he caused the building of the Castle, which the Duke had already begunne, to be set forward, and caused the nobility and people to take the oath of alledgeance to the Emperour, and made speedy preparations to goe and beseege Parma, notwithstanding that Ottauio Farnese complained in vaine that so great an iniury was done vnto him he being the Emperours sonne in law.

This stirre being in very deed of great importance had caused the Venetians to make provisions for the defense of their townes: therefore they made Stephano Tepulo Prouidator Generall on the firme land, to the end that in that office hee should provide for all their soldiers, visit the Forts belonging to the State, and take speedy order for what soeuer should be needfull: They did besides, call home the Duke of Vrbin Generall of their Army, who was then at Rome, about his marriage, not long before concluded with Virginia daughter to Duke Pietro Lodovico, Farnese. They wrote afterwards to Antonio de Castello, who serued them as maister of their Artillery, and a man of great credit, that he should make hast to the City of Brescia, to augment the ordinary Garrison that lay there; the Prouidator Generall did the like at Verona and in all other townes of importance, the Venetians supposing that all places were full of deceit and trechery. Things standing at this stay, the Pope and the French King did daily more earnestly sollicit the Venetians, openly to declare themselves without any more delay, and not to

deferre

deferre

Pietro Strossi sent for into France to trouble the peace of Italy.

Horatio Farnese
sonne to King Henries
daughter.

Gonzaga knew
the Venetians concerning the death of Pietro Lodovico.

The Pope and
French King
do sollicit the Venetians to declare the warre.

deferre the remedying of the present mischief till it were too late. The Senate for all that did not make hast to take armes against a most mighty Prince their neighbour, who at the same time exalted to the very height of his prosperous greatness, because that the common-wealth was not so weak and low brought, as whosoever those should bee that were desirous to assaile it, might thinke their enterprize easie; nor yet so mighty as it was able to keepe others in awe, and thereby gaue them cause to goe about to abate their greatness: so as the condition thereof was farre different from that of others, because it might without any feare of being assailed by the Emperor, expect that which time, and the alteration of affaires might procure it; which might (as it often happeneth) open a way to some better and safer course. Whereupon, after that the matter had bene well debated in open Councell, the Pope and French Kings demands were answered after one manner, and yet apart, how that the Senate did infinitely praise their care of the common safety, together with the provisions which they had made, for the maintainance and defence of that which did belong vnto them: that they would follow and imitate that Councell, and haue a watchfull eye on the defence of their State, supposing that remedy alone to be sufficient for that time, to free them from all feare and dangers: and therefore, they did not thinke it necessary to enter into a more strict and particular vnion, whereby they might stirre vp and prouoke those that were desirous to trouble their peace.

Although this answer did not greatly please the Pope and King, they did neuer the-lesse dissemble it, because they would not altogether estrange them from their friendship, and loose their hope of seeing them one day (having changed their minds) to bee ioyned with them. Whereupon, commending the graue and mature Councell of that Senate, they said, that when they should haue a further insight into the Emperors intention, which could not bee long concealed, together with the suspicion which all men had conceiued of his ambition, they would then on a sodaine resolve with true and firme foundations to assure that which concerned themselves and the whole State of Italy. Now notwithstanding this resolution of the Venetians, & that their hope of their good successe in their own enterprises were for the most part lost, the desire neuer the-lesse of taking armes against the Emperor was not diminished, neither in the Pope nor French King: and being not able in the meane time, by reason of sundry difficulties, to come to open force, yet diuers secret practises were broched betwixt the French and the Farneses in sundry Cities of Italy, & chiefly at Genoa, Siena & Millan, Cities infected with the humors of diuers factions. The yeere following 1548, was in a manner spent in such like busineses & secret practizes, & conspiracies of Princes against one anothers States & yet without any effect of impotence. For although the French King was desirous to trouble Italy, that he might altogether keepe the Emperor busied there, and yet neuer the-les, he thought it a weak and feeble thing to build his hopes vpon the Popes friendship, who was very old and poore, & one already in the graue: & perhaps not very firme & constant to maintaine war, if the Emperor should propound vnto him (as it was likely he would by reason of his alliance with Ottauio Farnese) some means of agreement: he did likewise perceiue, that the Venetians being not well resolved to take arms, were still desirous to remaine neutrals, & were so strongly vnited with the Emperor since certain yeares, as he thought it an impossibility to bee able to disioyne them, besides, he was desirous to pursue the war with England, hoping by reason of the contention in England betwixt the Governours of the yong King, not only to keepe Scotland, which he hoped one day would fall to his eldest son, by the marriage of the Infanta of that kingdom, but likewise to win & recouer the towne of Bouloigne, by means whereof, although he continued his sundry practizes, not only with the Pope, concerning Parma, but likewise at Genoa & Siena, for the alteration of the government of those townes, depending on the Emperors authority, yet neuer the-les hee made no preparation to put his desires in execution, nor declared himselfe openly the Emperors enemy.

The Senate
answer to the Pope and
French King.

Sundry practises in Italy.

An. 1548.

The French
Kings doubts and desires

The Pope on the other side being extremely desirous to reuenge the wrongs which the Emperor had done him, and to restore the City of Placentia to his house, did greatly doubt, whether it were best for him to proceed therein by armes, or by way of agreement: some times hee hoped that the Emperor as Lord of so many great States, although hee did for a time shew himselfe sterne and severe, would not in the end deprive Ottauio his sonne in lawe with his children descended from that marriage, of that State, and reduce them to a priuate fortune and condition, for which hee had more then once sent expresse messengers vnto him, to entreat him to deliuer the City of Placentia to Ottauio, and to forbear to molest him any more about the possession of the City of Parma: but at the same time that hee sent these Ambassadors, hee dealt with the French King, to take Duke Ottauio, with the City of Parma, into his protection against the Imperiall forces.

The Pope in this sort being tossed vp and downe, resolved, (for the satisfying of the Emperor and the Almaines, with whom hee was at odds in regard of the Councell which he would haue had to be kept at Bologna, and others at Trent) to send the Bishop of Fane his Nuncio to the Emperor, and the Bishop of Verona at the same time for his Legat into Germany, with power and authority to grant the Almaines sundry things which they craued for some alteration of the ordinary customes in the Romaine Church, the which the Emperor had iustly lookt into, the better to bridle that nation, after that he had granted them the Interim: and in the meane time, for an answer to the Pope, hee fed him and the Duke Ottauio likewise, with sundry hopes, without any certaine resolution: propounding sundry kinds of agreement vnto them, some times that hee would recompence him with some other State in an other place: then he said that he would first see who had most right to that State, either the Church, or the Empire: at other times likewise, seeming to bee discontented, instead of surrendering Placentia, hee demanded to haue Parma deliuered to him: in a word, those which best knew his inward meaning, did suppose that he went about by those incertainties to entangle the Pope in perpetuall doubts, having already determined with himselfe by no means to quit the City of Placentia, as being very commodious for the State of Milan, but sought to prolong and giue time, and to keepe himself from being enforced to take armes, waiting for the Popes sodaine death, that he might in the meane time be able to execute his other great designs. Now whilst the Christian Princes, enemies to peace, did in this manner vex themselves with sundry thoughts, their Estates were by mere chance, and vnkowne to themselves, freed from the assaults of the Turkish armes, because Soliman was desirous to lead his Army appointed for Hungary against Persia, being thereunto prouoked by a desire of glory which hee hoped to purchase by the defeat of Tamas forces. This caused him more willingly to grant the truce for which Ferdinand had sent an Ambassadger to him to Constantinople, which was confirmed for five yeares, on condition that Ferdinand should pay him a yearly tribute of thirty thousand Ducats, for the lands which he possessed in Hungary. The Venetians in this agreement were on both sides mentioned, which procured them much safety and reputation, especially by that wherein it was expressly said, that none of those that were mentioned, should during the time of the truce, trouble the peace and quiet one of another. There hapned certainly at the same, a matter worthy of note, which was, that our Princes distrusting one another, did of themselves, by diminishing their owne reputation, encrease the authority and pride of the common enemy. For the Emperor craued that the French King might be mentioned in that agreement, and enioyned to performe that which the late King Francis his father had promised him, and on the other side, the King did earnestly labour to haue it expressed in that treaty, that the Emperor, during the time of the truce, should not make war vpon any Christian Prince, & the matter went on so far, that although

The Pope to
satisfie the Almaines sends into Germany.

Soliman Army against the Persians.

Soliman mak-eth truce with Christian Princes.

Strife betwixt
the Emperor
& French King

the treaty was in a manner concluded: King Henry did with speed send the Lord of Cottignac his Ambassador to Constantinople to crosse the accord, saying, that the Emperor had not consented to the truce for any other end, but that hee might with more ease make warre vpon him, whereby Soliman was to be aduised and not suffer the Emperors power so much to encrease, who would neuer haue entertained the truce, had hee not thought to profit himselfe thereby. The Lord of Cottignac vsed the same speech at Venice as he passed along, exhorting the Senate to vse meanes that this treaty, without that clause, might be of none effect, which the Venetians making small account of, he went forward to Constantinople, where finding the truce to bee concluded and finished, hee did neuertheless obtaine letters from Soliman to the Emperor, and to Ferdinand, written very imperiously, but with a stile fit for a great and iust Prince; how that hee had willingly granted the truce, with an intent that there should bee a surcease of armes on all sides, betwixt those who were friends to either party, and therefore if any of the Princes, mentioned in the accord, should goe about to molest one another by armes, hee would giue ayde and succour to the party offended, against the disturber of the peace.

The French King in this businesse had diuerse suspitions of the Venetians, who being desirous speedily to conclude that accord, wherein they were to bee mentioned, had without caring for the King their friends interest, too much fauoured the Emperor and Ferdinands party: and on the other side, the Emperor complained of them, saying, That they had first giuen that counsell to the French King, and afterwards fauoured it at Constantinople, to the end he might be more strictly enioined to be at peace with the French King, by reason that they were desirous to take away all occasion of warre in Italy, which was so highly displeasing vnto them. At the same time, the discontents betwixt the Pope and the Emperor were much encreased, and men did already perceiue great signes of warre betwixt them two, by reason that the Emperor continued in his resolution, that the Councell should bee speedily held (according as it had been published) in the City of Trent, as well to satisfie the Almaines who desired it, as because hee supposed that his reputation would be impaired, if the Councell already published at Trent by his authority, should contrary to his pleasure bee held else-where: & on the other side, the Pope no lesse constant in his opinion, would haue it to be kept at Bologna, whether diuerse Bishops and Prelates by his commandement were already come, but although the Pope had commanded the Imperials to depart from Trent and to come to Bologna, saying, That the Emperor without all doubt, was Protector of the Councell, but that hee had no authority to conuoke it, did neuertheless, tarry still at Trent, obeying the Emperors authority and command, who on the contrary sent to the Prelats that were at Bologna, and to the Popes selfe, making great protestations: and to haue more appearance on his side, hee caused the Cardinal of Trent, of the family of Madruis, a Prince of the Empire, to go to Rome, where he protested that he would not allow any other councell, then that which had bin published to be held in the city of Trent, and if they should go about to crosse that, and thereby be cause of infinite other miseries, he did request to be acquitted of it before God and men. These things being very greivous to the Pope, and hapning presently vpon the neck of the bad successe of Parma, did greatly trouble him: yet neuertheless his hope of agreement with the Emperor did make him proceed more slowly therein. But during these delais and prolongations, Ottauio being impatient of staying any longer for the euent of the businesse, concerning the recovery of Parma, after that he had attempted in vaine to reduce it vnder his obedience, his entry into the Citadell hauing bin denied by Camillo Vrsino, who commanded the city, did on a sudden determine by a precipitate counsell, to throw himselfe into the armes of the same Spaniards of whom he had receiued so many wrongs; that he might be able (as the Emperors Ambassador at Rome

Soliman sent dieth Imperious letters to the Emperour.

Contention concerning the place where the Councell should be held.

Rome had craftily perswaded him) by means of their Armes to get that City: at which strange action the Pope greatly wondering, and by reason of the greefe thereof, together with his weaknesse and great age keeping his bed, hee being foure score and foure yeares old, did within a few dayes after depart out of this mortal life, after hee had with great commendations gouerned the sea Apostolick fiftene yeares, hauing euer shewed himselfe a good and discret Prince, and a louer of good and vertuous people, and about all other things, hee had for a time remained neuter betwixt those Princes being very desirous of peace and quiet. The Popes death did put the Italian Princes in great feare, that it would be cause of the disquiet of Italy, seeing that the French and the Imperials did in diuicise places leuy forces, meaning (as it was thought) to recouer the City of Parma, which Camillo Vrsino did still possesse, but with a very weake garrison and small prouision, for the maintenance of the warre, who would not obey the letters and commandements of the college of Cardinals, who had willed him to conigne that City into the hands of Ottauio Farnese, who promised to keepe it for the future Pope. This feare of troubles encreased by reason of the long time that the Cardinals spent in the creation of a new Pope, for the two factions of Cardinals French and Imperials, did obstinately strue one with another.

The Venetian Senate in these long disurations, according to the custome of their ancestors would not meddle therein, but ayming onely at the common good, did write to the college of Cardinals, exhorting them to choose a Pope that might bee for the wealth and commodity of Christendome. The Venetians as well aduised, haue neuer sought to haue Cardinals partiall on their sides, nor haue meddled in the creation of Popes, although they had as much interest therein as any other Prince, for they being in the number of the chiefe Potentates of Italy, there is no doubt but if they were desirous to haue a hand in it, that their faction would be one of the strongest: but they considered the great mischiefs which the Common-wealth might receiue by such friendship and intelligence with particular persons in the Court of Rome, and how that this word faction hatcht at Rome about Ecclesiasticall dignities, might afterwards slippe among them and infect the Common-wealth: and this is the reason why they haue abstained from it. Now after a long strife, Giovann Maria Cardinal of Monte, was for his sanctity created Pope, who was borne at Mont S. Seue in Tuscany, a man who obtaining the dignity of Cardinal, not by fauour of Nobility, or help of kindred, was reputed to be very vertuous, and especially to be a man newter: the Venetians being very ioyfull for this election, were perswaded, that he depending no more on the Emperor then on the French King, they might procure him to hold them both for friends, and mediate likewise betwixt them, and especially in Italy a firme peace. Wherevpon the Senate did speedily write to Matteo Dandale their Ambassador at Rome, to congratulate Pope Julius (for so the new Pope would be termed, who was the third of that name) with great demonstration of friendship and entire affection: then within a while after, determining to send a solemne Ambassage to him, to present their vial and due obedience, foure of the chiefe Senators were chosen, namely Philippo Tron, Francesco Contaren, Marc Antonio Venier, and Nicolao de Ponte. But the effects did in no sort answer the hope, which men had conceiued of this new Pope, and especially in that all men did expect & desire, namely, that he would appease the troubles, & prouide for the quiet of Christendome, and for the safety of Italy. For adding himselfe to buildings and other vaine matters, he seemed to contemne serious things, and such as belonned to the rank & grade, which he held, and the miserable condition of those times, in which Christendome was in diuerse places much afflicted. For notwithstanding that peace ensued betwixt France and England, all men did neuertheless perceiue, that the same peace was the beginning of a farre greater warre. For Henry the French King being greedy of Fame, and finding himselfe free from

The death of Pope Paul the third.

Parma is kept by Camillo Vrsino.

The Cardinal de Monte is chosen Pope, and called by the name of Julius the third.

*The Senate
sendeth Ambassadors to the Pope.*

1571.

Horatio Farnese put into the French King's protection.

the warre with the English, having recovered the towne of Bulloigne, could not long lye in quiet: for Horatio Farnese comming into France to entreat his Majesty to take his house, himselfe, and brother into his protection, and to defend and keepe the City of Parma, things which had bene already motioned by others, he was very kindly welcommed, and the King did embrace his protection vpon certaine conditions, beeing desirous to disturbe the peace of Italy, whereby he might afterwards haue a more open occasion to take armes against the Emperor, hoping moreouer (although the matter fell out very diuersly) that it would open him a way, either to vnite himselfe more strictly with the Pope, or at least to disioyne him from the Emperor, by taking vpon him to defend a vassall of the Church, whom the Emperor went about to oppress and ruine, the Popes entreaties beeing of no force to make him desist from his enterprize; by meanes whereof, fire was already much kindled in the heart of Italy.

Prelopes of great warres.

King Ferdinand on the other side, hoping vnder coullor of some contention betwix the Barons of the Realme of Hungary, and certaine rebellion hapned in Transilvania, to bee able to impatronize that Prouince, departed from Augusta (vpon sundry promises of ayde which the Emperor had made to him, the better to induce him to quit the succession of the Empire to his sonne Philip) and went into Austria, where he had already assembled a Dyer to leny men and money for such an enterprize: it was besides reported, that Soliman at his returne from Persia to Constantinople, could not endure, that the young King of Hungary, who was vnder his protection, should be so dispoiled of part of his dominions: as also for that hee accounted the five yeates truce to haue bene broken by Doria, who had taken certaine places from him in Affrick, held by Dragut, which he had manned with Spanish Garrisons: so, that all these things beeing exactly considered, were prelopes of great warres.

The Turke leueth an Ambassador to Venice.

These accidents did greatly displease the Venetians, and by so much the more, as they were in hope to prolong the truce for a longer time, Soliman beeing come to Constantinople, beeing willing to shew how desirous hee was to continue friend to the Venetians, sent a Chaus to Venice, to acquaint them with his returne from Persia, & with his happy successe, extolling (according to the manner of that nation) all his exploits done there, saying, That in regard hee found the Persians stronger then he expected, his attempts had not succeeded to his desire. The Senate, beeing desirous still to entertaine Soliman's friendship, resolved to do the like by him, and to send an Ambassador to his Port; wherevpon Catherin Zene was appointed to that end, who although he was foure score and foure yeares of age, did not refuse to vndertake so long and tedious a journey for the seruice of his counrey: His Ambassage was to great purpose, for by his wisdom he caused to be troden vnder foot the complaints which the Turkes made for the death of Saba Rais, so often reiterated, wherevpon, Soliman promised that it should neuer more bee remembered.

An. 1550.

A general death.

In this manner was the yeare 1550. spent, famous of it selfe ouer all Christendome, it beeing the yeare of Iubilee, but it was more noted by the publication of the Councell of Trent, whither speedily from all places diuerse Prelates began to come: then there hapned a great dearth of corne, which was in a manner general, but greater in Italy then in other places: whereby it behooued Princes to open their treasures for the reliefe of their poore subjects, and in particular the Signiory of Venice, who providing with singular bounty and affection for the necessity of the people of the City, and other their subjects, gaue great gifts to such as brought corne to Venice, to prouoke those of forraigne countries to doe the like, which was afterwards distributed among other Townes of their obedience.

An. 1551.

The yeare following 1551. did open great warres ouer all Italy, whereof the Pope by his resolutions, rather then of malice, was the chiefe Author, who by little little and little falling from his first resolution, did publish monitories against Otho Farnese, (of whom not long before himselfe had taken vpon him the defense and tuition) accusing and cursing the French Kings protection of the city of Parma, although that (according to the common report) when hee was made acquainted therewith, hee seemed to allow it, or at least in no sort to contradict it. Hee did not consider how that by his ordinary reuiling of the French and the Farneses, hee did enforce them to league themselves more strictly together, and to augment their forces, which hee hauing no meanes to resist, in that hee had not prouided in time, was enforced to haue recourse to the Emperor, who for the very selfe same matter of Parma was displeased with him.

The Pope not thinking there on, causeth great warres in Italy.

Hee was by little and little false into these inconueniences, by the craft of the Imperialls, (vknowne to him,) his owne seruants, in regard of their particular profit, not caring to let him know the truth, giuing credit to the dissimulation of other men, and entreteining him in the meane time with vaine suspitions: whereby, without knowing it, hee had in a manner giuen ouer his neutrality, and had giuen occasion of disturbing that peace, for which hee had so much sought to purchase fame and glory. The Venetians had often dealt with his Holynessee for the appeasing of these troubles, fore-seeing the long and dangerous warre that might proceed from them, hapning then in a bad time for Italy, in regard of Soliman's great preparations to enuade Christendome by sea and land: and by putting him in minde, that it was his duty, as the common father, to mediate peace betwix Princes, and in no sort to shew himselfe partiall, but neuter, as he had determined at the beginning, they caused him to consent to procure some accord: Wherevpon within a while after, hee sent the Cardinall of Medicis to Parma, who was brother to the Marquis of Marignan, and kinsman to the Duke of Parma, offering to giue him the Duchy of Camerin and Nepi in recompence of Parma, the which should remaine to the Church, whereof hee forthwith aduertised the Emperor, assuring him that the Venetians council had made him to resolve thereon: the Pope supposing that the Emperor would easily condescend to that agreement, as well because it was reasonable, as for feare likewise, that by refusing it, he should league himselfe against him, and augment the French faction in Italy, which would bee dangerous for the kingdom of Naples, in regard of the great troubles raised there at the same time.

Proposition of an agreement about Parma.

It was thought that the Emperor was willing of himselfe to haue granted it, but that he was altered by his seruants and officers, and especially by Don Diego de Mendoza his Ambassador at Rome, and by Don Ferrant de Gonzaga Gouvernor of the State of Milan, shewing therein (as it was openly spoken) their particular hatred to the Farneses. But the Pope perceiving that it did not please the Emperor, and not daring for feare of his forces to displease him, fell to his former resolution, to pursue the Farneses by Armes, who beeing already strictly allied to the French King, would no more accept of that offer. Warre then being kindled in Italy, the French King having sent ayde to the Farneses, and the Emperor to the Pope, it increased in such sort, as the Pope entering into some distrust of the Emperors designs and actions, detesting openly his officers' manner of proceedings, repented for what hee had done, and sought occasions to withdraw himselfe from him: Wherevpon hee determined to send his nephew Afcanio de la Cornia to the French King, to perswade him to lay downe Armes, and to consent to some agreement, by putting him in minde of the difficulty of his enterprize, defending a City so farre off from his kingdom: not long after, hee sent Achilles de Grassis to Venice, whose comming, although it seemed to be only for the iustificying of his actions, and in counter change of so many good offices which the Venetians had done to him, was neuertheless to entreat them to bee a meanes to draw the French King and the Duke to some agreement, which the Senate did not greatly deny, so as they might see any hope of beeing able thereby

Who hindered the Emperor from allowing of that agreement.

The Pope seeketh means of agreement with the French King.

to aduance the common good. Now Ascanio being returned from France, reported that the King had vied many goodly speeches, and seemed willing of agreement, and had likewise caused Ottauio to giue consent that Parma should returne to the Church, provided that the Emperor would doe the like by the Castles and strong Townes which hee held vpon the Parmesan; and that hee would not withdraw his forces from Parma, till such time as hee were well assured, that it should neuer more returne vnder the Emperors power: Wherevpon sundry difficulties arising, all men perceived that the proposition tended onely to draw the businesse out in length, and to weaken the affaires of warre, rather then to any firme peace: so as at last, all their care on either side, was to strengthen themselves with soldiers and other necessary things for warre.

The warre continuing in Italy.

Stroff his policy to vie small Parma.

The King still sent troopes into Italy vnder the command of the Duke of Neuers and other Captaines, causing Pietro Stroff to make an other leuie of soldiers in Mirandola. The Pope and the Emperor did the like, so as those two Armies, Ecclesiasticall and Imperial, being ioyned together, amounted well neere to fiftene thousand footmen, with great numbers of horse, of whom Don Ferrant de Gonzaga was General: but Stroff his wit and diligence was to bee admired, who on a sodaine going forth of Mirandola, entred vpon the Bolognois, scouring and wasting the Countrey with such terror, as the Pope beginning to stand in doubt not onely of Bologna, but likewise of Rauenna and other places in Romagna, was compelled to call his forces forth of the Parmesan, and to command them to goe speedily to the Bolognois, to the reskew of their fellows, whereof Stroff taking aduantage, did with great speed march towards the Parmesan, and entred with great numbers of footmen, and store of victualls into Parma; in regarde whereof, the assailants being out of hope to take it of a long time, did perceiue that the warre would long continue.

The Venetians in the meane time looking warily to all matters, and not willing by any means to depend on any but on themselves, determined to leuy foure thousand foot, and fise hundred light horse, with whom hauing encircled the garrisons of their frontier townes, and caused most of their best Captaines to goe thither, they were watchfull for the guard of whatsoeuer did belong vnto them. The Duke of Florence on the other side, being greatly obliged to the Emperor, did openly fauour his party both with men and money, not with any intent to feed this fire, which hee would willingly haue seene quenched, but because hee would not haue him thinke sinisterly of him: for he likewise, with the other Princes of Italy, did not allow of the behauiour of the Emperors officers, nor yet of his designs, suspecting them very much, and especially in regard of a new Castle which he had lately built in Sienna, which was commonly termed, Il Ceppo della Toscana.

The Duke of Florence taketh the Emperors party.

As for the Duke of Ferrara, although as a vassall to the Church, it behooved him to beare himselfe discreetly in that businesse, yet neuertheless following his owne passion, hee did secretly ayde the French faction: Wherevpon, the Imperials, to keepe all succours from the besieged on that side, did seaze vpon Brisselles, and on two other small Castles of the Dukes, seated on the frontier: Where with the Duke being greatly moued, sent Jerónimo Scraffino his Ambassador to Venice, to craue (as he said) the Senates aduise, after what manner hee should behaue himselfe in so miserable a time, resolving to follow their counsell, and especially in their neutrality: but finding himselfe too weake of himselfe to doe it, hee feared, vnlesse hee were releued, to bee enforced, for the conseruation of his owne State, to ioyn himselfe with some one or other, and to deale otherwise then hee desired.

The Duke of Ferrara craveth aduise of the Venetians how to behaue himselfe in those troubles in Italy.

This demand was thought to be very suspitious and full of cunning, they supposing that the French went about by this meaner to sound their meaning, the better to draw them to some confederacie, or at least to discover some what of their interior purposes: wherupon the Senate was of opinion to answer him in generall termes. Now it had about all things desired the peace of Italy, and that to those ends it had vied all possible means with the Pope, and others besides, according as it had seene occasion: but hauing nothing prevailed therein, they were at least resolved to keep themselves in peace and in their ancient neutrality, and the better and more honorably to doe it, and with greater assurance, other men being armed, they thought it fit to arme; and by providing for that which concerned them, had together taken care for the preservation of the Dukes state in regard of the particular affection they did beare him, and for their owne interest likewise, being in manner inseparable with his by reason of the neere neighborhood of their States. This answer not satisfiying the French, they resolved to discourte themselves more plainly to the Senate, seeing that all men knew that they did meane to enterprize some matter of consequence vpon Italy, for which Lodouico Alemanni being sent to Genoa, had vnder sundry pretences attempted to raise his faction there, and craued in the Kings name, that it might please the Genouois to lend him their haue, for his fleet to lie in safety, where hee might land those troopes which he intended to send into Italy. Now the Cardinall Tournon being at the same time at Venice, whither he came from Rome, vpon the Popes commandement that all the French Cardinals should leave the City, King Henry wrote vnto him that he should in his name expose to the Prince and Senate in open Councell, the State of the affaires of Italy, the occasion and intent, for which, and with which he had resolved to send his troopes to the aid of Duke Ottauio, and to defend his cause, That hee thought he should performe: a noble part, and worthy a great Prince, and which in particular ought to be pleasing to the Princes of Italy, to defend an Italian Prince, weake, and vnusully oppressed by the violence of other men, who had cast himselfe into his armes and protection: that he could hardly be perswaded that the Pope would hinder the defense and preservation of his owne vassall with an other mans armes and aid, seeing he himselfe was able to giue him small releefe: and that being to defended he could least of all beleue that the other Italian Princes would crosse him in going about to moderate the Emperors greatnesse, and curbe his vnmeasurable desires, aiming (as all men did plainly see) to rob weake Princes of their States, and to bring Italy into bondage: that the matter it selfe was able to giue sufficient testimony that his designs tended to none other ends, seeing that he stood vpon those termes, that without needing the City of Parma, possessing so many townes in Piedmont, the passages lay open to him through which hee might march against the State of Milan: but, because hee then knew, that his actions were sinisterly interpreted, he was resolved to giue ouer that enterprize: yet neuertheless he could not be perswaded but that the Venetian Senate, being so great and wise a Prince in Italy, on whose authority all others were at last to depend, would be moued with these troubles which drew after them sundry others of very great importance: that he did excuse that which the Pope had done as falling out by constraint, rather then of set purpose, being incompassed with feare in the midst of the Emperors power and armed forces, as also in regard of the Councell already published, with very dangerous designs, the Hereticks of Germany being come to it: but when his Holiness should be assured that other men would aid him, it was not then to be doubted but that hee would embrace some other resolution; seeing that to quit the Emperors friendship in such a case might rightly be termed, a setting of himselfe at liberty. The Senate gaue the King thanks and did highly commend his generous designe of defending such as are destitute of helpe: yet they were in good hope that by an accord already treated of with the pope, who did not resist it those businesses might in some sort be composed. The King notwithstanding, continued the war although contrary to his desire he found none in all Italy Ottauio Farnese excepted, whom

A discreet answer of the Venetians to the Duke of Ferrara.

Instructions sent by the French King to the Cardinall Tournon to be proposed to the Venetian Senate.

The Senates answer to the Cardinall Tournon.

hee might bee assured did fauour him, but resolving to declare him-selfe, afterwards more openly against the Emperor, hauing sent other forces into Piedmont, hee did vnlook for cause diuerse places to bee assailed which were kept by the Imperials, some of which hee tooke, hee did at the same time proclaime warre by sea, commanding the Prior of Capua brother to Pietro Strossi Admirall of the French Gallies, that scouring the seas hee should fight with the Emperors vessels: whereby it happened within a while after, that Doria with his Gallies conducting Maximilian King of Boheme and his wife from Barcelona to Genoa, he hardly escaped the French fleet, yet neuerthelesse some of his vessels that lodg behinde were taken and brought to Marfeilles. But the Kings treaty with Duke Maurice of Saxony, Albert Marquis of Brandenburg, and other Princes, and free Cities of Germany, was of farre greater importance, all these beeing mercueilously distasted of the Emperor, though vpon sundry occasions, some beeing not able to digest the wrong done to the Landgraue, whom the Emperor kept prisoner contrary to his promise, and others, beeing prouoked against the Emperor, for matters of Religion.

King Henry resolving vpon this league, and hauing imparted it to Giovann Capello the Venetians Ambassador resident with his Maiesty, hee did assure him that hee would in person goe into Germany, earnestly entreating him to follow him thither, to the end, (as it was supposed) that hee might haue occasion to practise some confederacy with the Venetians, or at least to keepe the Emperor in perpetuall ielouzie and suspicion. The Senate, although it had determined not to enter into any farther alliance with the French, did thinke it against reason to deny the King that, as well to shew their good meaning towards him, as in regard of the profit and commodity which the Republick might receiue thereby, to the end that the Emperor, who by reason of Parma and Placentia, and other his actions, which all Italians did greatly suspect, might know, that a more strict alliance might bee easily contracted betwixt the French and the Venetians, to the great danger and preiudice of his Estates in Italy. The Pope in the meane time beeing moued with these troubles, and considering that himselfe hauing bene the 30 motiue thereof, by reason of Parma, all men did blame him for the warre which hee had raised in Christendome, and whose successe beeing different, himselfe was to beare a part in it, determined to send two Cardinalls to those Princes, as Legats from the sea Apostolick, to weeke, Fersale to the French King, and Carpi to the Emperor, to exhort them to lay by all hatred and malice, and all desire of making any more warre one vpon another: how that the taking of Tripoli, and diuerse other great warlike preparations of the Turkes for Christendome, ought to excite them to firme peace and friendship.

But the flame was already growne so great, as all his exhortations could not quench it, although the French King for his part gaue some hope thereof, and had within a while after sent the Cardinall Tournon to Rome, to prosecute the treaty of accord, and that the Venetian Senate was entreated to haue an hand therein: yet, all men might perceiue that hee was more disposed to warre then to peace, and that all his practises tended to draw the Popeto his party, and to make him a companion in the war which he intended against the Emperor, who on the other side, suspecting these treaties of peace, had re-enforced his army that lay at the siege of Parma, thinking that it would greatly blemish his reputation, if during these practises, they should surpris and take him vnprovided. The Pope on the other side, being in great doubt & feare for that hee was disioyned from the Emperor, and vncertaine of the friendship of the French, knew not what to resolve vpon, yet neuerthelesse beeing moued by the Emperors great power, and already tied vnto him by a particular confederacie, thought it best to make shew of that was not, and in no sort to seeme to doubt of his friendship. Hee did afterwards create diuerse Cardinalls at his deuotion all Imperials, vning in open

Consistory

Consistory very bitter speeches against against the French King, detestling sundry of his actions, and especially his alliance and friendship with the Turkes, to as the King being out of hope to haue him for his friend, dismissed his Legat from his Court, and called home the Lord of Termes his Ambassador at Rome, threatening both the Pope and the whole Romaine Court; forbidding his subjects to send any more to Rome for Bulls concerning benefices, saying, That it was against reason to make warre on his kingdom with his owne money.

At the same time a very great and mighty Turkish Fleet departed forth of the Hauen of Constantinople, commanded by Sinan Bascha, and Ruizen the visier thereof, the Senate did augment the number of their forces with leauen and forty Gallies, as beeing vncertaine what way the Turkes would take, and Stefano Tepulo was for the second time chosen Generall. But the Turkish Fleet layed peaceably through the Channell of Corlou, and held on it course towards Sicily, where the Bascha was desirous to know of the Viceroy, what account the Emperor made of restoring the townes which Doria had taken in Affricke the yeare before, and beeing answered that hee did meane to keepe them, to take away those places of retreats from Pirates, who did ordinarily scoure those seas, hee landed great numbers of souldiers, who tooke and sackt the City of Augusta, carrying away with him from that Sea-coast great number of prisoners, whom they made slaues, from thence the Fleet sayled to Malta, which they hauing begunne to barter, and finding the interprize to bee very difficult, hee did on a sodaine re-embark his Souldiers and Artillery, and went to Goze, a finale Island eyght miles distant from Sicily, the which was likewise spoyled and wasted, and the Castell taken by force, although it was man'd with a strong Garrison: from thence sayling into Barbary, it stayed before Tripoli, which after some small battery was yeelded by the Knights of Malta, that commanded there, who with some of the cheefe inhabitants of the towne escaped into the French Gallies which followed the Turkish Fleet, great cruelty beeing vsed vpon those that tarried behind, contrary to the promise made vnto them.

This is all which the Turkes did at sea, but at land on the parts of Hungary and Transilvania, the Christians were strongest, for King Ferdinand by the helpe of Giovann Battista Gasfaldo, Sforza Palancin, and other his Captaines, made himselfe maister of all Transilvania, and of the County and City of Temisuar: the which lands although they belonged to yong King Stephen, and to the widow Queene his mother, were neuer the lesse vnder Solimans protection, who first sent the Bascha of Buda and after him the Beglerbey of Grecia, with great numbers of horse to driue *Ferdinand*s troopes from thence, but all their attempts were for that time to no purpose. A certaine Frier, called George, who serued the 40 yong King, did by his authority and good counsell much further that enterprize, by whose aduice, notwithstanding that the cheefe of the kingdom were of a contrary opinion, aduising the Queene to tarry for the Turkish succours, which were expected, she all amazed resolved to quitte Transilvania to King Ferdinand, and in recompence thereof, to take the Duchy of Opelia, hee promising her to giue his Daughter in mariage to the King her sonne, so soone as hee should bee of age: so that *Ferdinand*s souldiers hauing fortified them selues in Transilvania and Temisuar, could not bee driuen from thence by the Turkish succors that came thither afterwards, who beeing compelled by the extremity of winter, did wholly giue ouer the enterprize, and returned with small 50 credit and reputation.

In regard of the selfe same commodity of winter, all exploits of warre ceased in Italy, notwithstanding, that Parma and Miranda were still besieged without any further progression.

The yeare following 1552. the Emperor Charles and Ferdinand his brother were

The Germane Princes treat with the French King against the Emperor.

The Pope by his Legate goeth about to attune the Emperor and the French King.

The King intended against the Pope's bid.

A great Turkish Fleet at sea.

The course taken by the Turkish Fleet at sea.

The Turkes make warre in Hungary and Transilvania.

Ferdinand doth presently besiege Transilvania.

were threatened with great warres, whereby they were to defend their owne States and dominions. All Germany in a manner was banded against Charles, the Almaines having resolved in a Dyer to driue him by force forth of all Germany, and to elect a new Emperor, because he (as they said) had done diuerse things to the preiudice of the Empire, and against the liberty of Germany. King Ferdinand was likewise greatly perplexed, by reason of the great warlike preparation which Soliman made to enuade Hungary and Transilvania, the which hee knew not how to resist, despairing of all ayde from the Emperor his brother, as well for that hee was busied else-where, as also in regard of the discontent betwixt them, because Ferdinand would not quit the succession of the Empire to Philp sonne to the Emperor, and his Nephew: therefore seeking by other meanes to provide for the safety of his owne, he vsed meanes to appeale Soliman, by offering to pay him an other yearly tribute of thirty thousand Ducats for Transilvania, as he already did for those lands which hee possessed in Hungary.

All Germany is banded against the Emperor and his brother Ferdinand.

Ferdinand to free himselfe from war with the Turke of force to pay him tribute.

Frier George the Cordinall is murdered.

The Venetians preparations when they heard how the Turkes arm'd.

In the meane time, the better to assure himselfe against the rebellions and commotions which were then made, & all intelligences which the Turkes might haue vpon those newly conquered countreys, hee caused good guard to bee kept, and that all such as went and came too and fro, should be narrowly obserued: whereby hee discouered that Frier George, who at his entreaty had bene made Bishop of Varadine, and afterwards Cardinall, beeing spurd forward by new ambition, had secret intelligence with certaine Baschus, and did fauour the Turkes party, aspiring to appropriate that Province to himselfe, vnder Solimans protection: this being verified, he determined to put him to death, & hauing giuen charge thereof to Sforza Palauician he with one more entered on a day into the Cardinals Chamber to entreat him to signe a passe-port, and whilest hee was subscribing it, both of them fell vpon him and slew him.

The news thereof being brought to Rome, the Pope, and the whole Colledge of Cardinals were greatly offended with it, wherevpon King Ferdinand, with all those who had bene consenting to his death, were excommunicated: but the King offering to iustifie himselfe, and to prooue, that if hee had not dyed all Christendome would haue been in danger to haue receiued great losse, he alone, at the Emperors intreaty was absolved, and none of the rest.

Now the report of Solimans great warlike preparations at Constantinople, which were making ready against the Spring time, did hold all men in doubt, because they did not certainly know for what place that Army was destin'd, nor what Solimans designes therein were. It more troubled the Venetians then any else, in regard of the great expences and perplexities of minde which the coming forth of those fleets from Constantinople had procured them, causing them thilto bee well provided: therefore they chose Stephano Tepulo for their Gerall the third time, they did re-enforce their Garrisons in the Islands and other sea townes, they caused certaine Gallies to be armed in Candy, and to haue store of them they speedily commanded new to bee built in the Arsenall. The Senate appointed twenty Captaines for their Gallies, and the great Councell as many Lieutenants, to the end all matters might bee well ordered, and that their fleet, if need were, might be encreased with the number of an hundred Gallies.

The end of the fifth Booke of the sixth Decade.

THE

The Contents of the sixth Booke of the sixth Decad.

THE French Kings great Army where hee was in person to back the Protestants of Germany against the Emperor. The French take the City of Metz. The Protestants great forces. The French King ouer runneth the Countrey of Luxembourg. The Prince of Salerno commeth into France, to incite the King to the enterprise of Naples: The Emperor is enforced by the Protestants to retire and escape by flight. Peace betwixt the Emperor and the German Princes. The French King soliciteth the Venetians against the Emperor. The Almaines doe band themselves against the French King, for the cities of Metz, Thou, and Verdun. The Emperor besiegeth Metz. The Spaniards are driuen from Siena. The death of Edward the sixth King of England. The election of Pope Paul the fourth, of the family of Caraffa. Siena is surrendered to the Emperor. The Pope declaring himselfe for the French King, is assailed by the Duke of Alua. The Duke of Guise commeth into Italy with great forces. Peace betwixt the Pope and the Spaniards. The death of the Emperor Charles the fift, of his two Sisters, and of Mary Quene of England. Peace betwixt the French King and the King of Spain. The death of Henry the second French King. The death of Pope Paul the fourth. The Creation of Pope Pius the 4. The Cardinall Caraffa with three of his kinsmen are put to death. The Ouertrue of the Councell of Trent. Charles the ninth French King. Strife betwixt the French and Spanisb Ambassadors in the Councell, is appeased by the Pope. A strange matter happening at Rome. And lastly the death of the Emperor Ferdinand.

Ggggg

The

The sixth Booke of the sixth Decad of the Historie of Venice.

Metz is taken by the French.

LL these great warlike preparations made by the Turkes, could not cause the Christian Princes to make peace among themselves, but on the contrary it seemed that the French King was more provoked thereby to molest the Emperor, whilst he saw him busied in answering the Turkish forces. For continuing in his determination to passe into Germany, hee perswaded himselfe that the Emperor, being assailed in so many sundry places, and especially by the Germanie Princes, who had all conspired against him; would, to free himselfe from so many dangers, consend to some accord, by surrendering vnto him some State or other in Italy or else where, to which the crowne of France laid some claime.

Having then assembled forty thousand footmen of sundry nations, and foure thousand horse, he marched towards the countrey of Lorraine, whither the Constable of Montmorencie being already gone before, had seized on the City of Metz, an Imperiall city, which was governed by the Bishop and some principall townsmen, and the King coming thither afterwards, was very honorably entertained. Hee remained for a while with his Armie in those parts, to stop the Flemish troopes leuyed by Queene Mary, sister to the Emperor, from hindering his designs, or till the confederate Germanie Princes should set forward, who had already begun their enterprize prosperously, the City of Ausbourg being at their devotion, and passing speedily forwards without delay, thorow the Duke of Bauarias countrey, had greatly amazed the Emperor and King Ferdinand, who were then at Ispruch, so, as they presently resolved to retire to some place of safety: but being afterwards encouraged, and having fortified certaine narrow passages of the Mountaines, thorow which the enemies were to passe vnto them, they determined not to stirre from thence.

The French King being aduertised of the Emperors amazement, with that of Ferdinand his brother, and of their enemies progression, thought it best not to let slip the occasion offered, the Emperor being weake both in courage and forces: Whereupon he resolved to march towards the riuier Rhine, to encourage their confederates, and to fauour their enterprize, intending likewise to passe on farther if need should bee. But being come to the riuers side, hee received news that made him turne back againe: for the Confederates thinking themselves strong enough to expell the Emperor, and desiring to keepe forraine forces forth of their countreys, for feare of receiving some discommoditie thereby, thought it fit that Duke Maurice should write to the King, how that they had already agreed with the Emperor, whereby they had obteyned their desire, and that there remained nothing more for them to doe, but to thanke him most hartly for the great pleasure hee had done them, for the which all Germany should should owe a perpetuall bond and remembrance to the Crowne of France. These newes did trouble the King, who saw his hope frustrate besides the trouble and expences of such a journey: yet neuertheless being vnwilling to keepe his troopes idle he marched toward the Dutchy of Luxembourg, where he conquered diuers places of importance, and among others, the Castle of Monwalter, accounted the key of that countrey, in which the Count Mansfelt was taken, who was Governour thereof for the Emperor. Then propounding to himselfe other important designs, he determined to fashion himselfe in some sort to the Pope that he might disioyne him from the Emperor, whereby he obtained at last, that for Parma and Mirandola, there should be betwixt the Sea Apostolicke, and the Crowne of France a suspension of Armes for two years.

The French King commeth as farre as the Rhine in fauor of the Protestant Princes.

During these praesides the Prince of Salerno came to the Kinges Campe, who propounding vnto him the enterprize of Naples, his Maiesty did willingly hearken vnto it, entering into discourse with him what forces would be sufficient, and what meanes were to be used for the execution of that enterprize: for which the Prince having made great offers to the King and promised diuers matters, grounded chiefly vpon the peoples desire to shake of the Spanish yoke, and to cast themselves betwixt his armes, the King concluded that he should be the cheife of that enterprize.

20 This Prince leauing the Realme of Naples by reason of some contention betwixt him and Don Pedro de Toledo the Viceroy, and for hatred to the Emperor, because hee maintained his enemy against him, came to Padua, where for a time he remained, & then determining to be reuenged of his wrongs and of the small account the Emperor made of him, hee resolved to goe into France: but he was desirous first to passe by Venice to conferre with the Senators concerning his designs, that he might the better informe the King of their meaning, conferring the proposition that he intended to make vnto him. And being brought vnto the Senate, he began with a long and eloquent speech, to set forth the occasion which then offered it selfe to them, for the recouery of those

30 Townes and hauens which they had in former times possessed on the coast of Puglia, & for assuring themselves against the Emperors greatnesse; going about thereby to found their meaning, concerning such an enterprize, if the French King should propound it vnto them: seeing that the Neopolitans were tired with the Spanish gouernment, and wearied with the Viceroyes pride and tyranny, who was not only back and maintained by the Emperor, but highly reuenced and esteemed of him, and chiefly in regard of the inquisition which hee went about to bring into that Kingdom, to the persecution and ruine of the Nobility; who being no longer able to endure such bondage, were resolved to embrace any other party whatsoever, rather then to continue vnder the Emperors obedience, who did so contemne and ouer-maister them. That the selfe same reasons

40 had beene already represented to the French King, who tooke great compassion of their misery and calamity: and had likewise as a magnanimous Prince freely embraced their protection, and promised to aid them in all he might, which hee had put off til some other time that he might performe it with such an army as hee desired. Therefore (added this Prince) it behooueth the Venerian Senate more then any others to listen to that enterprize, as an Italian Prince, a lover of liberty, and most potent at Sea, and one that may lay iust claime to some part of that Kingdom: that there was no alliance more profitable to their Commonwealth then that of the Crowne of France, as this ges past could giue them sufficient testimony, and in particular, the King then being, who did so deere loue their Republique, as it might hope to obtaine any thing how great soeuer it were. But what greater commodity, (said he) can be hoped for, then that which now offereth it selfe? And what greater trouble and vexation of mind can there happen vnto the Emperour, then that where in hee is presently wrapped

GGGGG 2

The Senates
answers to the Prince of Salerne.

The Pace of Chiufa is taken by the Principals.

wrapped by the warres of Germany, and by the preparations where-with the Turke threateth his brother Ferdinand? But about all other things the mature judgement and wisdom of the Venetian Senate, ought to be well advised, and not to suffer the Neopolitans, destitute of all aid and succour, to cast themselves headlong by constraint and necessity into a wretched resolution, not only hurt-full to themselves but much more to others, by having recourse to Solimans protection who was upon the point of sending a very mighty army into the field they being determined so to doe for their last refuge. All these reasons and remonstrances would not preuaile with the Senators, none amongst them being of opinion to accept their offers, whereupon the Prince was dismissed, with this answer, That they did much lament the discommodity of the time, and particularly his owne toyles and sorrowes, extenuating the importance of the business, which merited a long and more mature deliberation: yet neuertheless this Prince going afterwards (as hath bene said) into France, and acquainting the King with his deigne, he heard him, and resolved to execute that which hee had propounded. At the same time as the French King did ruminate in his mind certaine doubts concerning that enterprise, he receiued newes which did confirme him to execute it; namely the vexations and troubles wherevnto the Emperor was reduced, which were such and so great, as he verily seemed to be forsaken of that good Genius which had euer waited vpon him in all his actions with wonderfull prosperity. Duke Maurice and the other Confederates holding on their way towards Ispruch, and being come to the pace of Chiufa neere to Fussen, (which was strong and narrow), in the conseruation whereof the Imperials had placed their chiefest hope by stopping the enemies passage) they forced and tooke it, opening themselves thereby a way to march to Ispruch without any contradiction.
The Emperor, and his brother Ferdinand about midnight receiving newes of the losse of this place, having but five hundred horse with them, did sodainly leave Ispruch, went towards Perfenon, and from thence into the County of Tirol: then hauing intelligence that the enemies were at Ispruch meaning to march on farther they againe journeyed through sharpe and steepe mountaines, and tarried in no place till they came to Villac, where they continued in great feare and suspicion, being aduertised by such as came forth of Italy, that they had seen great numbers of horse & foot in the contrey of Frioul, which made them to suspect that the Venetians, ioyned with the French Kings & Almains, had assembled those forces to ouerrun them. This suspicion proceeded from the passengers who had seene great numbers of horse which the Sauorgnians had assembled in those partes neere to the Caste of Oloft to meet the Count Gazuoles, and to entertaine him at their Castle, who was going to the Emperor.

His maiesty had by so much more giuen credit (as men are easily drawne to believe that which they desire or feare) to these reports, in regard of the per-suites and practizes of the Prince of Salerno; so, as being counselled whilest hee remained at Ispruch, to goe into Italy, he seemed not to allow of that Councell:
considering with himselfe that there was small safety in passing through the Venetians State: and yet they had neuer lesse will to hurt him then at that time, hating to take aduantage on the aduerser fortune of a great Prince their freind and Confederate, notwithstanding that certaine Germane Princes had solicited them to take armes against him, offering them tenne thousand footmen and two thousand horse, which the Senate would neuer accept of: but hee being afterwards informed of the truth of the matter by Dominico Morosin, who in quality of Ambassador had stil attended vpon him, he did commend it, & highly thanked the Senate for their loue & good meaning toward him in so hazardous a fortune.

His maiesty then perceiving that in his greatest desalter the Spanish footmen whom he expected were not arrived turned all his thoughts vpon peace: and to to this end, the Confederate Princes holding a Diet at Possionia, King Ferdinand went went thither in person to treat of the conditions of peace: But the Protestants desiring to make vse of the time, to abate the Emperors authority and to preserve the liberty and priuiledges of the Princes and free Citties of Germany, made very vnreasonable demands: where vpon the Emperor, sometimes being enforced by necessity, and so many miseries, did for their satisfaction grant their demands, and at other times againe, recalling his vsuall courage and invincible constancy, he said that he would rather endure all hazards of Fortune, then grant things vnworthy of himself and his imperial dignity. In the end standing firme for the matter of Religion, not to innouate any thing in the Citties, which had accepted the interim, nor like wise to submit to the decrees of the new Diets, that which appertained to the prerogatiues and authority of the Emperre, hee condescended, by accepting the accord to the enlargement of the prisoners, and granted a generall pardon to the rebells. These troubles had put the French King and Prince of Salerne in great hope, to be able to execute the enterprise of Naples: in which they supposing that the Venetians could doe more then any others, the Prince of Salerne returned to Venice, where he and the Lord of Selua, Ambassador for the King, made new & more earnest practizes, to draw the Common-wealth into a league for that purpose: They declared whatsoever they thought might incite the Senate to hate the Emperor, and on the contrary they forgot nothing which might serue to insinuate the French King into their fauour, and to extoll him as well in regard of his great forces, as for his loue and affection towards the Republick: And because they perceived the Senate to bee resolute to persist in their neutrality, the Lord of Selua embracing the matter with great vehemency, spake thus.

My Lords doe you not perceiue, that it lyeth not in your power to diuert the King from this enterprise, hee being wholly inclined thereto, either alone, or in your or others company, and whatsoever your resolution is, these Princes are to strue together for their fortune; which side soeuer it shall incline, it is to bee feared that your newtrality will not bee able to defend your State, and that which belongeth to you, exposed to infinite dangers, being equally hated of the victor and vanquished: of the one, because that when you had meanes to assist him, you did not respect his misery, nor vouchsafed to doe it: of the other, for that enuying his wealth and prosperitie, you would not ioyne with him. And what can my King presume eyther of you, and of your so ancient (as you terme it) and deere friendship, if to your owne profit and commodity yee accept not his offers, full of affection and good will, and grant not his honest and iust demands? What hope may hee haue of your friendship in aduersity, if you make so small account of him in his prosperity? What fitter or more commodious occasion can you expect for the aduancement of your Common-wealth, or for your assurance against the Emperors redoubted power, if you reiect that which is now offered? How often vpon lesse occasion, haue your Ancestors and your selues, to the immortal praise of your Senates magnanimity taken armes?
Perhaps you thinke that my King, being now able, to his great aduantage, to make an accord with the Emperor, and refusing so to doe, will without you at some other time, hearken to it to his owne disadvantage and yours: or perad-uenture some hope, that the Emperor recouering his former greatnesse, will remember this good office, for that you being sued vnto, would not take armes against him: but vndoubtedly it is more like, that hee according to the cus-tome of all Princes, and in particular, following his owne naturall inclination, will make more account of his owne interest and particular possit, then of all duties and good offices done vnto him: Florence, Siena and Genoa, may serue you for examples, whom, in recompence of their good seruice, hee hath wholly deprived of their liberties.

Peace betwixt
the Emperre and Germane Princes.

The Prince of Salerno, enur-meth in Venice
from the King.

The Oration
of Selua the French Kings
Ambassador to the Venetian Senators.

The Senate answered to the Prince of Sa-
lerne and the French Ambassador.

These reasons were great in shew, but being neerly examined, it was perceived that they were not well grounded having no firme foundation: and therefore after that the Senate had maturely considered the matter, as well that which concerned their newtrallity, as the time of yeare already farre spent, and vnfit for any great enterprize either by Sea or Land, they concluded with a generall consent to answer the Prince, and the French Ambassador, thus. That the Senate did infinitely thanke the King and Prince, for their loue and affection towards the profit of the Commonwealth; and that it would perpetually remember it: but the Venetians having for many yeares bene at peace with all Princes, they thought it not a fit thing to breake it vpon no occasion: that in any other matter the Senate would strue to satisfie the Kings desire, vnto whom, and his Realme likewise, it witheld all health and prosperity.

The enterprize
of Naples being found very difficult: in resolved by the
King.

After this answer the Prince continuing his propositions, did in the City of Chioggia assemble diuers of the French faction, to determine with them on fit- test means for the enterprize of Naples. There met the two Cardinals, Ferrara, and Tournon, the Lord of Termes the Kings Lieutenant in Italy, Selua the Kings Ambassador at Venice, The Duke of Somma, with other Dukes of the realme of Naples, and certaine other Lords, vnto whom the Prince hauing represented the businesse very easie, the Assembly did not so finde it, in regard of diuers great and euident difficulties: the which hauing like-wise bene well examined by the King, he wrote to the Prince and to his Ambassador, not to motion it to the Senate: but they had already done it, as hath bin said: whereby the Senates answer and resolution was the more commended by all men.

The Almanis hand themselves against
the French
King concerning Metz Thousand Per-dun.

Whithin a while after, matters beginning to turne and change, the French King was aduertized how that the Almanis had forsaken his alliance, and were banded against him, because he had seized vpon three Imperiall cities, Metz, Thou, and Verdun: that Queene Mary hauing raised an army of Flemmings had besieged Helden: and how that his owne army on the contrary did daily decay, by reason of the contagious sicknesse which was crept into it: whereby he was enforced to leaue the contry of Luxembourg and by breaking off the corse of his victories to send a great part of his forces to winter at home, in their owne houses, and to leade the residew to the frontiers of his Kingdome, to gard it; and in the meane time tenne thousand Spanishe foote-men came and ioyned with the Emperor.

The Marquis Albert of Brandenbourg, who in the beginning held the kings party, changing his mind, turned with his forces to the Emperors side, so as by example, diuers of the cheffest of Germany did the like, who at the first had made shew to fauour the King: after-wards they fell at ods with him, because he would not graunt their demands, which were altogether vnreasonable.

The Emperor being moued by these new accidents, resolved without any more delay to go in person with his forces to besiege the City of Metz, notwithstanding that winter drew neare, and that the Castle of the City, which was great both by situation and arte, and excellently well manned with diuers good Captaines, did dissuade him from that enterprize, together with his owne seruants, who were of a contrary opinion: For that action being made out of season, had no prosperous successe: for after that he had extremely trauelled his Army, and lost great numbers of foldiors, he was enforced to retire, hauing done more hurt to him-selfe then to his enemies. In the meane time an other fire, which had a long time layne raked vp in ashes, began to breake forth in Italy; for the Siennois being not able to endure the ouer cruell and seuer government of the Spaniards, resolving to driue them forth of their City, sent messengers to Rome to acquaint the French Agents there with their resolution, craving their aide and fauour therein, promising to keepe their city for the French King. This offer offer, for which diuers secret practizes had bene already made in France was willingly entertained, and commandement was forthwith giuen to certaine foot companies of the Kings that lay at Parma and Miranda to goe thither, and presently after, the Lord of Sanfac went thither to encourage the people, to whose aide other forces being brought by the Count Pettillan, the Spaniards were driven forth of the towne, their fort rased, and diuers other indignities were committed (such force hath the peoples liberty not being restrained by lawes or power of the Magistrate) to the disgrace and contempt of the Emperor, they tore in peeces his Ensignes, brake his priuiledges, and trod his armes vnder their feete, the which did make the matter more odious, and did the more incense the Emperour against them, who being desirous not to delay his reuenge vpon the Siennois, nor to suffer the French to haue an other place of retreat in Italy, did command Don Petro of Toledo, Viceroy of Naples, to march speedily into Tuscany with five thousand Almanis and Spanishe footmen, seeing that the Realme of Naples was in no danger to be enuaded, and that he should attempt to reduce Sienna vnder his obedience.

The Emperour
sends the Viceroy of Naples against Sienna.

It was supposed that the designs of the French, succeeding prosperously, would greatly hurt the Emperour. For although the French did publicly say that they had taken the defense of the city vpon them, to free it from the tyranny and oppression of the Spaniards, and to restore it to her former liberty and spendor, yet neuerthelesse, they plainly made shew of their meaning therein, in regard, that refusing all motions of agreement that were propounded, they went about to place their Garrisons in that city for their owne behoofe, and in other places depending thereon, and to leaue forces in Italy for their owne designs: wherevpon the French King craued of the Siennois, that in recompence of their liberty they would declare themselves friends to his friends and enemies to his enemies. Now the Viceroy being desirous to execute the Emperors commandement, hauing obtained passage through the Churches territories (the Pope saying that he had giuen him leaue, by reason hee had no means to hinder him) entered with his army vpon the Siennois territory, and spoiling whatsoever he met with, he tooke certaine weake places by a voluntary reddition: for the stronge townes were well fortified with men, victuals and all other necessities, so that the Imperials would haue spent much time in winning them; wherein the Viceroy being very wilfull, besieged Montalcina, because if that fort should hold out, Sienna being well provided of all things would be in lesse danger. But the Siennois doubt to be seuerely punished by the Emperour if hee should take their city, did mightily encourage them to their owne defense, together with the hope to be soone rid from the Imperiall army, by reason of the Turkish and French forces, which were to come into the Realme of Naples.

The Kings de-mandeth the Siennois.

The Viceroy of Naples spoils the country of the Siennois.

The Venetians had done all they could to quench this fire kindled in Italy, fearing, like men that saw their neighbor houses on fire, that it might fall vpon theirs; but by their valor and discretion they auoided it. In the meane time a famous Pirate called Mustapha Biso scouring their seas, entered the Adriaticke Gulphewith diuers Fusts, spoiling and robbing whatsoever he met with vpon the coast of Dalmatia, Crisoforo Canalis Admirall of the Gulphic went forth to meet him with certaine Gallies, and incounting with him, he did brauely assaile him, and hauing sunke all his vessels, he tooke this Mustapha, and struck off his head vpon the side of his Galley.

Thus ended the yeare 1552. the ensuing yeare was full of warre as well in Tuscany, as in Piedmond and Picardy, the Emperor making great preparations of men and money to renew the war with the French, that he might recover his reputation which he supposed to haue lost at the siege of Metz. At the same time, Petro Zene being chiefe of the councill of forty, communicated to the councill of Tenne, that it was necessary to reuiue the remembrance and execution of the last will

An. 1552.

The counsel of Venice
with the magnanimous courage of the King and testament of the Cardinal
Zene.

The death of Edward the first King of England.

will and testament of the Cardinall Zene, who in his time, hauing beene very rich, had left a goodly and honorable Legacy of a yearly rent of two thousand one hundred Ducats, to the Prince, Signory, and Senate, to forraigne Ambassadors, to the Clergy, and diuers others, as is more at large mentioned in his testament, on condition that all of them should be present at the seruice yearly celebrated in the month of May in Saint Markes Church by his appointment: the which being granted did procure great magnificence to the memory of that great Prelar, and gaue much content to the whole family.

At the same time great troubles arose in England by the death of yong King Edward the sixth, whom his sister Mary succeeded in that Kingdome.

Prince Donato in the meane time, after that he had repaired and embellished the Ducall palace, after the same manner as it is to be seene at this day, and by his example animated diuers Senators to doe the like, departed forth of this life to the great griefe of all men, in the feuenth yeere and sixth month of his principallity, and lieth buried in Saint Maries of Serui.

MARC-ANTONIO TREVISAN sonnet to that Dominico Trevisan who was so renowned for his great seruice done to his country, succeeded him after the accustomed manner: He was a man of such integrity and holiness of life, as they had much to doe to perswade him to accept the dignity; for being a good man and brought vp from his youth in all simplicity, he knew not what ambition did meane. At the last being enforced by his friends, he consented to their pleasure, with as great humillity and modesty as could be desired; so, as being feared and honoured of euery one, he maintained iustice without any parciality. He found the Republike at peace both at home and abroad, by the discreet government of his predecessors, who had cut off all occasions of warre with forraigne Princes, continuing still Newters.

In the meane time, Cosmo Duke of Florence hauing declared himselfe against the Siennois, sent Gian Giacomo de Medicis, Marquis of Marignan, with Italian & Spanish

The Duke of Florence found the forces against the Siennois.

Spanish forces to assaile them. The French King being incensed there at commanded Pietro Stroffi his Lieutenant Generall in Italy to beseege the city of Florence: to vse means to take it, and to restore it to her former liberty, expelling the Duke: but the Marquis preuenting Stroffi came with his forces vallooked for in the night to assaile the city of Sienna, and hauing at his first arriual given vpon one of the Gates, the allarme was so hot, as euery man ranne thither, whereby he was repulsed and enforced to retire, but with no losse of courage, for in his retreat he seized on a fort builded with in a Harquebuz shot from the walles, which the Lord of Termes had caused to be made there for the defense of the city, and fortifying himselfe therein, he could not be driuen thence by any means that the Siennois, or Stroffi could vse, who vpon the report thereof came speedily to Sienna, where for the safety of the city he caused an other fort to be built betwixt that of the enemies and the Gate, forth of which they did vually come to skirmish.

Stroffi after that, marching into the field with certaine troupes, surprized Rodolfo Bailon and Ascanio de la Corne who were going vpon an enterprize against Chiusi, whom he put to rout, slew Bailon, and sent Ascanio prisoner to the King, who did ransomlesse set him at liberty.

Thus passed this yeere 1553, which was full of warres in sundry places, the next ensuing was not exempted from it, and yet the Venetians were no way touched therewith being spectators of other mens games, they themselves hauing no hand therein, though warre was very neere them as well in Tulcauy, as in Pæma and Mirandola, and afterwards in the Isle of Corse against the Genouis the Emperors partisans. In this manner did the city of Venice enjoy an assured peace on euery side, when on a morning Prince Trevisan being at Masse in the Hall of the Heads, died sodainly of a faintnesse that tooke him, proceeding (according to the common report) from too much abstinence, hauing gouerned eleven monthes and feuen and twenty daies, hee lieth buried in the Church of the Saints John and Paul.

An. 1553.

FRANCISCO

An. 1554.

An. 1555.
The death of Pope Julius the third.The election of Pope Paul the fourth.The Emperor Charles resign-eth all his States to his sonne Philip, and to his brother Ferdinand.Truce granted and peace between

An. 1556.

FRANCISCO VENIERI a man of sixty foure yeeres old was vpon the eleuenth of Iune chosen in his steed. The Republike likewise was in his time at peace, whilst fiers of warre flamed in all places neere vnto them, and that no Prince or common-wealth of Italy but felt the misery thereof, the armes of the French and the Imperials ranging euery where abroad.

In this sort was the yeere 1554. spent, which in sundry places was full of warre, defolation, fiers, smoke and ashes: in the yeere following diuers alterations of State were scene. For first, Pope Julius the third deceased on the three and twentieth day of March, whom the Cardinall Marcello Cernus succeeding, who was a Tuscan by Nation, death within a while after buried both his name and memory.

Giouan Pietro Caraffa a Neapolitan, called in former times the Cardinall Theasin, was chosen in his place, who being termed Paul the fourth, did at his entrance put all men in great hope of a good reformation in the Church, and of a generall peace, to which he being not able to induce the Emperor and French King, warre beganne to kindle more then before. Sienna after a long sege did, through want of Victuals, yeeld to the Imperials, and yet vpon honorable composition which was partly performed, but not altogether.

The Emperor Charles at the same time bending vnder the burthen of worldly affaires, and being discontented to see that great good fortune which had euer accompanied him in all his haughty enterprizes, to giue place to that of the French King or else being touched with some remorse of conscience for hauing beene the occasion of so much bloudshed in Christendome, in regard of the length of the sad precedent warres, sent for his sonne Philip forth of England to Bruxels, and resolving to quit the Empire, his owne Kingdomes, and honours of this world, did by authentick letters of the five and twentieth of October, resigne vnto him all his Lands and Signories, enioyning all his Estates and subiects to acknowledge him their true and lawfull King, determining to withdraw himselfe (as he afterwards did) into a Monastery in Spaine, hauing likewise renounced the administration of the Empire to King Ferdinand his brother, and recommended him by letters to all the Princes and Potentates of Germany.

Philip then according to his fathers earnest exhortation, seemed very much to encline to peace, but in regard of the great difficulties which were found therein on either side, truce was granted for five yeeres, that in the meane time they might haue leisure to conclude a peace, but this truce likewise was as soone broken as concluded, being supposed to haue beene but a false baite to delay the provisions of the French in Piedmont, whilst the Duke of Alba should set forward, wherevpon warre beganne againe more hotly then before, to the great griefe of al men, which continued the yeere following 1556. in which Prince Venieri being ill disposed of his person, and ordinarily sicke, departed forth of this mortall life, hauing gouerned two yeeres, one month, and one and twenty daies, and is buried in Saint Sauiors Church.

LORENZO

THE Senate being afterwards assembled, according to the vsual manner, did in his stead, elect Lorenzo Priuli, a man wise and learned. At the beginning of his principallity the plague beganne to shew it selfe, which within a while after ceased by the diligence and industry of Petro Mosso the Senator, deputed at that time to the office of La Sanita. The pestilence was followed by a dearth and want of victuals, proceeding from a suspicion that the sicknesse still continued, by meanes whereof strangers did no more bring any thing to the city.

At the same time Pope Paul the fourth a bad friend to the Spaniards, did imprison in Castle Saint Angelo, the Cardinall Santa Fior, Camillo Colonna, Iuliano Cafarin, and the Abbot of Bresogna, all of them enemies to the house of France, for secret assemblies which they made in Rome in the houses of Marc-Antonio Colonna and that Cardinall Marc-Antonio escaping went to the King of Spaine, who presently commanded the Duke of Alua to release them.

This Duke being Viceroy of Naples, was grieved to see the Pope openly to pursue the Roman Lords Spaines partizans, and being desirous to obey the King his Masters commandement, marched into the field, and tooke from the Pope neere to Rome, Agnane, Pilastina, Segna, Tiuali, and last of all Ostia, whereby he did cut off victuals from the Romans, he on the side, and the Colonnesse on the other keeping the Pope in this manner shut vp within the circuit of his wailes.

The Pope made meane to the French King, sending the Cardinall Caraffa his Nephew vnto him, his Maiesty wrote to the Marshall Stossi who then lay in Tuscany to march thitherwards and to expect aide which the Duke of Guise should bring him. His Holinesse did likewise send to Venice to moue the Senate to aide him. The Senators being grieved for the Popes troubles, and desiring to haue him at quiet, sent Phaebe Capello, a very wise & discreet Secretary to the Duke of Alua, to pacifie the matter if it were possible.

Philip King of Spaine in the meane time perceiving this warre to be backed by

The Pope an enemy to the Spaniards.The Duke of Alua taketh diuers towns
from the Pope.The Venetians being enuied, led by the Pope use means to pacifie the Duke of Alua.

Ottan's Farnax is: esto red: o his Dutchy.

An. 1557
The Duke of Guise commeth into Jsaly.

The losse of the battaile of Saint Lawrence, and the torment of Saint Quintins.

The Spaniards demands upon the treaty of peace with the Pope.

Peace betwixt
the Pope and Spaniards.

by the French, and that thereby it was likely to prove more dangerous in regard of the intelligences and partialities which they had in Italy, did receive Duke Oſtiano of Parma into favor, reſtoring to him the city of Piacenza and all other places nere adjoining which he had ſeized in regard whereof, this Duke embraced the Spaniſh party, to the Popes great diſcontent, who ſaid, that a Prince ſeafary of the Church, as he was, ought not to make an accord with his enemies without his leave, whereupon, he cauſed him to be cited to Rome, together with the Cardinal Farnex his brother.

The Duke of Guise about the same time came from France into Italy, which was at the beginning of the yeere 1557. with fifteene thousand footmen, eight hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred light horse, to aide the Pope against the Imperials, with whom within a while after Stroff, Monlus and others, (who by the Kings commandement were gonne before to Rome with six hundred horse and fve thousand foot) joyned themselves.

Upon the report of the arrivall of these forces, the Duke of Alua had retired himselfe to the frontiers of the Realme of Naples, by his retreat opening a way to Rome for the Duke of Guise, who presently went thither, vpon hope to finde great forces ready there, according to the accord concluded bewixt the Pope, the King, and the Duke of Ferrara, but finding none at all there, he went into La Marca, where the Marquis of Montebel came vnto him with the Churches forces, and from thence they marched into the Realme of Naples where they stayed not long, by reason that the aide came not which the Cardinall Caraffa had promised to the King, and because the French army for want of pay did dayly decrease, and on the contrary, that of the Duke of Alua did increase: wherevpon, the Duke of Guise returning to La Marca, and afterwards going to Rome to talke with the Pope, perceiving the small meanes his Holinesse had to make warre, and the great pursuite made by the Duke of Alua, hee aduized him to haiken vnto peace and agreement with the Spaniard, resolving to returne into France. For at Rome hee received letters from the King bearing newnes of the losse of the battaile of Saint Laurence, and of the taking of Saint Quintins by the Spaniards, with commandement presently to returne into France; the Duke of Guise being willing to obey, tooke his leaue of his Holinesse, and went forward on his journey home-ward, the Pope determining to follow his counsell.

During this warre against the Pope, The Venetians and Cosmo Duke of Florence, had solicited King Philip and the Duke of Alua, to make an accord with his Holiness, either of them answered that they had not taken armes to take from him anything that was his, but only to defend the Realme of Naples, and that they had made warre in an enemies country to defend their owne subiects; and therefore so soone as his Holiness should leaue his confederacy with the French, and the resolution of making himselfe master of the Realme of Naples, they would yeeld him the obedience due to the soueraigne pastor of Christendome, and would restore whatsoeuer they had taken from him during that warre: to which the Pope giuing eare, the Cardinall Caraffa with certaine others went to the Duke of Alua to treat of peace, the which was easily granted with restitution on all sides of places taken in the warre, the Duke of Ferrara being the recomprehended.

The Senate to mediate this agreement, sent Marc-Antonio de France (his thither, who was Secretary to the Common-wealth, a very wise and discreet man, who stirred not from thence till the final conclusion thereof. In the meane time two hundred Turkish Gallies returning from the coast of Calabria, did cast anchor at La Valona, and did in no sort hurt the lands belonging to
the Venetians.

Within a while after the two fonnas of Soliman, Selim and Batazet, took armes

armes against one another in Asia, and because the father did most fauour the elder brother Selim, the other was enforced to haue recourse to Tamas King of Persia, who in hatred to Soliman did willingly aide him, and giuing him great forces, the two brethren joyned their bataile, which continuing a day and a night, Selim was victor, his brother being fled from the battaile hurt, and more then forty thousand Mahometans one either side slaine in the place.

The Senate on the other side being still desirous to continue their ancient customs and alliances, sent Giovan Capello Knight, and Bernardo Nouggera Ambassadors to the Emperor Ferdinand to congratulate his promotion to the Empire (as hath benebefaid) and Paulo Tepedo to King Philip.

10 This was at the latter end of the yeere: the next, 1558. bred great warres both in France, Piedmont and Tuscany, together with the death of Princes and Princesses. For lo for as the Duke of Guise returned into France, hee executed the enterprize of Calais, a long time before determined of, and reduced vnder the Kings subiection the country of Oye, and all the forts which the English held there: the Duke of Neuers on the other side tooke diuers places in the country of Luxembourg, as Herbemont, the forts of Iamoinne, Chygni, Rossignoll, Villeneuve and diuers others.

This happy successe did change the French mens sorrow into gladnesse (their hearts still panting for that red and bloody battaile of Saint Lawrence) and chiefly at Court, where the ioy was doubled, in regard of the marriage of Francis Dauphin of Viennois with Mary Steward Queene and Inheretrix of Scotland, daughter to James the fifth and Mary of Lorraine, daughter to Claude Duke of Guise, and that of Charles Duke of Lorraine, with Claude the younger daughter of France. This ioy was accompanied with an other, by reason of the taking of Thyonuille, which after a long battery of fūe & thirty great peeces of ordnance, was yielded vpon composition. Great preparations for warre being after this manner dayly made, Almightie God tooke pity on the people and raised vp Mediators of peace betwixt those two great kings, the which at that time tooke no eff: & in regard of the great difficulties which were presented. But the death of Charles the fifth happening in Spain, and that of his two sisters, Eleanor Queene Dowager of France, and Queene Mary Dowager of Hungary, who accompanied him, Mary Queene of England died soone after, which procured the accomplishment of the peace, turning the bitterness of the precedent warres into a pleasing sweetness of accord, by means of the alliances made the yere following 1559. For as the Commissioners of both Kings did treat together, the death of Charles the fifth happening in September, and that of Queene Mary of England in November, altered the place and time of that conclusion.

Peace was concluded in the castle of Cambresis, by means of the marriages 40 of Philip with Elizabeth, eldest daughter to King Henry, and of Filibert Emanuel Duke of Savoy with the Lady Marguerite the Kings only sister, who rendered back to the Spaniard what he had taken from him, and to the Duke, Savoy and Piedmont, and to the Genevois Corsica. But while the nuptials of the Kings daughter and sister were celebrated at Paris with all sports and delights that might be imagined, this pleasant Comedy was turned into a mournfull and lamentable tragedy, by King Henries death, who being at tilt stricken into the eye with a splinter of a Lance, died, the eleventh day after his hurt.

But to returne to the Venetians, great numbers of pirates did at the same time scour the Adriatick sea, and by their viall spoiles and incursions, did great harme on the sea coast of Dalmatia and Histria. Matto Bembo, a discreet person, well experienced in many matters and Generall of the Venetians nauall army, came forth of the Gulph of Corfou with twelue Gallies, and with great speed purfued those Rovers, gaue them chafe, and did greatly molest them, who escaping into the Hauen of Durazzo, those of the Duke of Ferrara sent out

Index

Journal of Management Education

The Pirates
purſued by Hemus ſaw himſelfe in Durance.

their behalfe, Bembo being incenſed thereat, not regarding the peace which the Venetians had with Soliman, diſcharged his Cannons vpon the cities walles where ſome of the inhabitants were ſlaine and yet he could not ſeize on the Pirates. The Turke tooke this battery and manner of proceeding in very bad part, and determined to reuenge it: the Venetians, conſidering the loſſes and harme that might ariſe if they ſhould breake peace with ſo potent a Lord, did appeaſe him both by preſents and excuſes, baniſhing Bembo from their State, being not able to apprehend him, that they might giue him an exemplary puniſhment, which did the more coole and appeaſe Soliman. On the other ſide by the death of Mary Queene of England Elizabeth her ſiſter, obtained the crowne. To Henry the ſecond ſucceeded Francis the ſecond Daulphin of Viennois his eldeſt ſonne of the age of ſixteene yeeres. At the ſame time died Pope Paul the fourth, who being extreemly hated of the Roman people, as well for the behauiour of his Nephewes, as for the Inquiſition which he had eſtabliſhed in Rome, before he had ſcarce giuen vpon the gholt, the people aroſe, and being led by the chiefeſt of thoſe that bene iniured by him, ranne to the palace of the Inquiſition, from whence with their ſwords hauing driuen the Monkes, they opened the priſons and let all the priſoners at liberty: the like did they to all the other priſons in Rome, then they went to the Capitoll, where finding the brazen Statue which the Romans had erected in honour of the Pope at the beginning of his papacy in regard of the good offices he had done them, they brake it in peeces, and drag'd the head diuided from the body through the dirt and mire of the city, that done, they threw it into Tiber.

The Venetians ſent their Ambaſſadors to the new French King to congratulate (according to their manner) his comming to the crowne. Nicolo de Pont Doctour and Knight, and Bernardo Nouſſera were appointed to that end: and within a while after the Prince falling ſicke deſeased, to the griefe of all men, in regard of his integrity and learning: he was buried in Saint Dominikes Church in the monument of his anceſtors. Then by the example of former times, they choſe Ieronimo Priuſi brother to the deſeased Duke, a man very famous and of great Maieſty.

The death of Pope Paul the fourth.

A Popular commotion in Rome.

Venetian Ambaſſadors to the French
King.

AT

The beginning of his gouernment, Gieuan Angelo de Medicis a Milanois, brother to the late Marquis of Maignan was choſen Pope to the great contentment of all the Romans, taking vpon him the name of Pius the fourth, which was at the latter end of the yeere 1559: who to make his actions conformable to his name, pardoned the people of Rome the commotion and mutiny made by them againſt his predecessor: then ſeeing all Chriſtendome at peace, he tooke order that the generall counsell begunne at Trent, and broken off afterwards, by reaſon of the warres, ſhould be reuiued. And although he was by nature meeke and gentle, yet neuertheleſſe being enforced, by the great complaints made vnto him againſt his predecessors Nephewes, who during their vnckles Papacy had committed infinite extortions, hee imprifoned Charles and Alphonſo Carraſſi Cardinals, the Duke of Palliano brother to Charles, and two others of their nere kiſmen, who, their proceſſe hauing bene made, and conſidered by Iudges deputed to that end, being found guilty of ſundry bad crimes, the Cardinal Charles was ſtrangled in Caſtle Saint Angelo, and forthwith buried, the Duke of Palliano with his other kiſmen were beheaded in the tower of Nona, and ſhewne afterwards in publicke, and Cardinal Alphonſo as leaſt culpable, was ſent home to his owne houſe by meanes of a pecuniary amends which hee paid, and the office of Chamberlaine was taken from him.

About the ſame time died that famous Prince Andrew Doria, being foure ſcore and thirteene yeeres of age, famous as well for the great enterpriſes he executed, as for reſtoring the city of Genoa, his natie country, to the liberty it enioyeth at this day.

The Venetians in the meane time beeing vnwilling to bee ſurprized, if they ſhould happen to be enforced to take armes, receiued into their pay Sforza Palatin Marquis Cortemajor a very famous captaine: then they ſent Ieronimo Grimani, Ieronimo Zene, and Marc-Antonio de Mulla Ambaſſadors to Pope Pius the 4. an inward friend to the Common-wealth, who entertained them very louingly: and hauing giuen them audience in the Chamber of Kings, hee did greatly commend the Republike, promiſing to fauor and augment it with all his power, who being deſirous to roote out heresies, which on euery ſide troubled the Catholike Religion, did by his briefe cauſe the Generall counsell to be published at Trent in the Octaues of Eaſter of the yeere following, exhorting the Prelars to come thither and Chriſtian Princes either to come or ſend their Ambaſſadors.

In this manner ended the yeere 1560. wherein Francis the ſecond French King deſeased, and Charles Maximilian Duke of Orleans his brother ſucceeded him in the Kingdome of France, being twelue yeeres of age, and was called Charles the ninth.

In this meane time the ouerture of the counsell ſtill continued at Trent, whither the Pope ſent ſeuſen of the chiefe of the Colledge of Cardinals famous both for learning and good life, namely, Hercules Gonzaga of Mantua, Ieronimo Seripando the Neapolitan, Grouan Moren of Milan, Staniflaus Hoſius a Polander, Lodouico Simomete a Milanois, Marc-Sittic a German, and Bernardo Nauigera a Venetian. The Emperor likewise ſent his Ambaſſadors thither, who were Sigifmond Thuenius Archbiſhop of Trent, and Antony Magliſtus of Morauia, Archbiſhop of Calurgia. Thoſe of the French King were, Regnard Ferrier a very learned man, and well ſcene in the tongues, and Lewis of Saint Gelais, Lord of Lanſac, Knight of honour to the Queene the Kings mother. For Philip King of Spaine there was Claudio Fernandus Earle of Lunel a very noble perſon: and for the King of Poland Valentine Herbutus a Polonois.

The creation of Pope Pius the fourth.

The Cardinal
Carraſſi and three of his kiſmen are put to death.

The death of Andri Doria.

The Venetians
ſend Ambaſſadors to the
Pope.

The ouerture of the counsell of Trent.

An. 1560.
Charles the ninth French
King.

The Cardinal
ſent by the Pope to the the counsell.

Hhhhh 2

The

The Venetians sent thither Nicolo de Ponte, and Matteo Dandolo, men much renowned for their singular learning and knowledge in many matters: they were accompanied by Antonio Milledonna the Secretary, a man of so rare & excellent a wit, as being employed in some actions in that holy assembly, he made him selfe to be admired of all men.

Toward the latter end of the same yeere the last Session of the General Councell was held at Trent, and about the beginning of the yeere following, that which had there beene concluded, was solemnly published, and sent to Rome to Pope Pius the fourth, who in the open consistory of Cardinals accepted and ratified it, commanding it to be receiued over all Christendome.

*The Venetian Prelats, that were present at the councell
of trent,*

At this councell were present, diuers great Prelats of the Venetians State, ¹⁰ aliborne at Venice, namely, Bernardo Navagera Cardinall, and Legat in the councell, in stead of Scipiano who died there, Giovann Trevisan Patriarke of Venice, Daniele Barbaro chosen Patriarke of Aquileia, Pietro Lande Archbishop of Candie, Marco Cornare Archbishop of Spalatra, Philippo Moceniga Archbishop of Cyprus, Antonio Cocco Archbishop of Corfou, and afterwards claike of the Chamber, Lodovico Pisani the Bishop of Padua and afterwards Cardinall, Georgio Cornare, Bishop of Treviso, Julio Contaren Bishop of Bellun, Tomaso, Bishop of Cap. Histria, Giovann Francisco Commendune Bishop of Zant and Celaloniz, and afterwards Cardinall, Pietro Barbarico Bishop of Curfoles, Pietro Contaren Bishop of Bassus, Dominico Bolano Bishop of Bressia, Federico Cornare, ²⁰ Bishop of Bergamo, André Moceniga, Bishop of Himosia, Ieronimo Trevisan Bishop of Verona, Ieronimo Ragazzone Bishop of Famagosta, Matteo de Priuli, Bishop of Vincenza, Francisco Contaren, chosen Bishop of Bassus, Giovann Desio Bishop of Torcelles, and Ieronimo Vicino, Bishop of Citra-noua, all men of singular knowledge, and admirable learning.

At the beginning of the councell there arose a controuersie (which did greatly trouble the Pope) betwixt the Ambassadours of France and Spaine, about precedency, each of those Kings beeing desirous to haue their Ambassadours to take the chiefest place next to the Emperours Ambassadour: King Philip sent word to the Pope, that his pleasure was to haue the chiefest place assigned to his Ambassadour, or otherwise, hee gaue him to vnderstand, that hee would not onely call home his Ambassadour from the Councell, but likewise all his subiects: King Charles protested against it, saying, That if they went about to doe him that wrong to take from him the place and ranke which his predecessors had euer held, as well in regard of their nobility and antiquity, as for the great benefits which the Church of Rome had receiued from them, hee would not onely call home his Ambassadours, but himselfe, together with his whole Kingdome, would depart from the obedience of the sea Apostolike.

The Pope ends en the controuersie betwixt the Ambassadours of France and Spaine.

The Pope to preuent the inconueniences that might arise thereby, did decree, ⁴⁰ by the aduise of the consistory of Cardinals, That the French Ambassadour should keepe his vsuall ranke and place, and that hee of Spaine (to giue some satisfaction likewise to that King) should sit in the midst of the Cardinals below the Priests, and about the Deacons, by meanes whereof the whole matter was pacified.

A strange accident at Rome.

About the same time there happened a very strange accident at Rome, the like whereof had neuer before beene scene, which was thus: certaine young men of verie good place, beeing prouoked by a vision, which they said they had receiued from Angells, how that to the Pope then living an other diuine Pope should succeed him, who should bee the onely Monarke of the world, commanding both the Spirituall and Temporall iurisdiction, and should bring all men to the knowledge of the true God, and they being desirous to haue ⁵⁰ it it sodainely come to passe, not tarrying till the Pope should die his naturall death, resolved to dispatch and kill him, whilst (as his manner was) hee should giue audience, and one of their number called Benedetto Accolis tooke vpon him to strike him, as hee should read a supplication that hee would present vnto him, but when it came to the execution, so great feare and amazement seized on him, as hee withdrew himselfe all trembling, wherevpon, one of the conspirators fearing least that they should bee discouered, went presently to the Pope and opened the whole complot to him, so as they were all apprehended, ¹⁰ and publickly executed.

In other places great numbers of pirats scoured the Adriattick seas, so that nothing could escape their hands, comming euen as farre as Chioggia. The Venetians disdayning these incurfions, sent Christoforo Canalis against them, who departing cheerefully from Venice with foure Gallies, did so narrowly pursue them, as he tooke part of them, whom he forthwith hanged, and chased away the rest, so as by that meanes the navigation was assured.

*The Venetians
chase away the Pirats.*

Toward the latter end of this yeere the Emperour Ferdinand died, whom his ²⁰ sonne Maximilian, before crowned King of the Romans, succeeded, who so soone as his fathers funeralls were ended, did forthwith march against the Transiluanian, to reuenge the wrongs which he said he had done him in his Realme of Hungary, determining hotly to pursue him, but the Transiluanian being backt by the Turke, enforced the Emperour to retire,

Maximilian Emperour in his fathers stead,

The end of the sixth Booke of the sixth Decade.

H h h h h 3

The

The Contents of the seventh Booke of the sixth Decade.

THE great hurt caused by the Inquisition after the manner of Spaine. The Venetians being solicited by Pope Pius the fourth to receive it, doe excuse themselves because they would not trouble their Dominions with it. The death of Pope Pius the fourth with the election of Pope Pius the fifth. The death of Soliman before Zighet, which is concealed by Mahomet Bascha. Selim succeedeth Soliman. The ceremony which is used in bringing Ambassadors into the presence of the great Lord, with the forme of the oath which hee useth to make. The first motion of the enterprize of Cyprus by the Turkes. And lastly Selims resolution to invade the Isle of Cyprus.

The seventh Booke of the sixth Decade of the History of Venice.

An. 1565.

The great harme with the Inquisition after the manner of Spaine.

HE Pope being desirous at the beginning of the yeere 1565. to pluck up by the roots all heresies forth of Italy, & to dive into the very secret thoughts of men, fearing least that Province should embrace heresies like others, did throw it head-long into very great and difficult Labirintus, which had almost caused an intestine warre in the country. For he procured King Philip to establish the Inquisition after the manner of Spaine, namely this sharpe

sharpe and cruell inquisition; by which the convicted do loose both lives and goods, to the great hinderance and vndoing of their heires.

Now King Phillip having written to the Senate of Milan that his pleasure was to have the Inquisition of Spayne received into the City, all the People began to mutine, and take armes against the Spanish officers that went about to introduce it: which the Senate of Milan perceiuing made answer to him that brought the Kings commandement, that they were ready to obey whatsoever his Maieity should please to command, and that they would take order to have his will performed in every point: yet neuertheless they were not of opinion to have that commandement to take place as then, in regard of the Kings profit, as well because those rigorous lawes were needlesse in Milan, by reason that the Inquisitors would know all matters, though distinct and divided, from all customes and lawes as also for that the City of Milan, and all Italy in generall did detest that new manner of proceeding, which might in the end breed much hurt: That it was not good, especially in these times, full of miseries and calamities, to put good men and a warlike people into desperation, for feare of the mischeefes which might ensue thereof, which could in no sort profit his maieity. This discreet answer of the Milan Senate, did change King Phillips determination, who revoking his Edict, did greatly assure and confirme the Milanais.

The Senate of Milan answer to the King of Spaine concerning the Inquisition.

The Pope perceiuing that his designe had taken none effect at Milan as he desired, he did by letters exhort the Venetians thereunto, entreated; and in a manner went about to enforce them to embrace that novelty. The Venetians being wise and discreet, after they had maturely considered the businesse, together with the great danger they were like to incur, if they should permit such cruelty to take place in their Townes and Cities (in regard that the Realme of Naples for the selfe same matter, had in a manner revolted from the Emperour, and the Milanais had brauely impugned it,) they being unwilling openly to seeme to deny the Pope, nor likewise to grant his request so dangerous unto them, delayed as much as they could to make him an answer.

The Venetians answer to the Pope.

But his Nuncio still vrging them more and more to grant the Popes demand, the Senate was assembled for that businesse, where after sundry opinions had bene propounded, they diligently considered the discomodities which might arise unto them by means of the Popes wrath and indignation, if they should refuse him, who being already not very well affected to the Common-wealth, would be the more enflamed against them: On the other side they did represent before their eyes, how that the wretchedest of all others was a ciuill and domestick war, whereby the Republick did weaken her owneforces, which were sooner raised, then pacified.

Therefore the Senate, all this being well examined, made the Pope an answer full of meeknesse and humility: how that it was of opinion by rigorous and sharp punishment to extirpate all execrable heresies; but that it was not seemely to deprive children, guiltlesse of that crime of their fathers successions, seeing that they had Cities very zealous of Catholick Religion, which had no need of such great rigor and iustice: yet they would take order, that those who should be convicted of Heresy should abjure their errors, or else, should be punished with death according to the manner of their Iustice.

The Death of Pope Pius Quartus, and the election of Pius Quintus.

About the latter end of this yeare dyed Pope Pius Quartus in the sixth yeare of his Papacy, unto whom succeeded, at the beginning of the yeare 1566. Frier Michael Gisleo of the order of Saint Domjnick, called the Cardinal Alexandrine, who tooke vpon him the name of Pius Quintus.

The death of Soliman before Zighet.

Soliman lying at the siege of Zighet, and being enraged to see a handfull of Christians so brauely to resist the great numbers of his soldiers, this disdain and rage did so alter him, as it brought him to a fixe, which killed him on the fifth day of September: but his death was in such sort concealed by Mahomet Bascha, who next

next him was the cheifest man in the Army, as the Turkes knew is not, fearing (as it was likel,) that the newes of the great Lords death, would be the cause of the ruine of the whole Army, Selim his sonne succeeded him in the Ottoman Empire.

The Venetians
send Ambassadors to Selim
the new Emperor.

But to returne to the Venetians, of whom our meaning is chiefly to speake, certaine monethes after that this new Emperour of Turkes was installed in his Empire, and that from all parts Ambassadors were sent vnto him to congratulate his happy comming to the Crowne, they appointed Marin Caballo, a nobleman, and excellently well seene in the knowledge of diuers things, being both learned and ritch, to goe and reioyce with him likewise in the Common wealthes name for his aduancement to the Empire, and afterwards to confirme the ancient Articles of peace and alliance which they had made with his father Soliman: the which that hee might obtaine with more ease, hee tooke along with him the presents which Ambassadors were wont for to carry to the new Emperours. But whilst he prepared for his iourney, it happened, that one called Iohn Miches a Iew by nation, a great favorite of Selims, a man of an euill disposition, and who had turned Turke, for a certaine wonderfull pollicy, did continually sollicite Selim against the Duke of Nesia, (one of the Islands Cicades, descended from the race of Cripes, and was the one & twentieth Duke of that Island) to bereaue him of his Principallity, hoping (as it came to passe) that he being driuen thence, easily to obtaine it for himselfe.

A malicious praisie of a reuolted Iew.

This Duke being aduertised of the praifes which were wrought against him, went to Constantinople to iustifie his cause, where, knowing that the fauour and friendship of the great Lords Councillors is bestowed on such as giue most for it, he cartied with him fiftene thousand Crownes to bestow among them, hoping by that money to winne those of the Councell to his side, but at his arriuall the laid hands on him, and being committed to prison, he lost at one time both his money, and all the wealth he had.

At last being set at liberty as innocent, and hauing committed no fault at all, he could neuer afterwards recouer his principallity, so as being reduced to extreame pouerty he came to Venice. The Venetians taking pittie on that honest man, who by the mallice and enuy of that Iew was fallen into such misery and calamity, and not through his owne fault, were very liberall to him: the like did the Pope when he came to Rome.

By this time Marin Caballo, who was appointed by the Senate (as hath beene said) to goe Ambassador to Selim, was ready, who departed from Venice, and with a faire and gentle wind sailed towards Constantinople, where at his first arriuall he treated (according to the vse) with the cheife of the great Lords Councillors: (for no stranger is admitted to speake with the Emperour, till such time as his demaund be determined and concluded by them) but he had much to doe to obtaine that which he demanded, those Councillors feigning that Selim the new Emperour refused to confirme their alliance, which was only to draw greater guifts from them, which they did: for the Ambassador hauing giuen them many other great presents he did at length procure the Councillors, to consent to the conditions of peace and freindship: then hee was brought in by the Captaine of the Porre, and led by the Armes to kisse the Emperours hand, the like did diuers young Gentlemen which had accompanied the Ambassador: but they were led in another fashion: for two Turkes held each of them by the armes, and brought them as prisoners, who did not kisse the Emperours hand, but his knees, that doon, they returned, and went backward, their faces being still turned towards the Emperour. These young Gentlemen being led forth of the roome, not any Christian remained in Selims Chamber, but only the Ambassador, who spake breuely vnto him in this manner.

The Ceremony of bringing Ambassadors to the great Lord

As

As much greefe (most gracious Emperour (as our Venetian Common-wealth, highly affected to the Ottomans, hath receiued by the death of Soliman that glorious and most wise Emperour, euen so much ioy and contentment hath it, to vnderstand that the diuine power hath raised you to such a dignity and placed you in the throne belonging to the famous and most iust family of the Ottomans, For it is most certaine that the soule of Soliman doth at this present glory, not only for that it did so much surpass all men in good hap and glory for high enterprises, in wisdom and knowledge of diuers things, for being meeke and gentle to the humble, liberall to his freinds, and faithfull to his allies; but much more for leaving you his sonne behind him, farre more excellent then himselfe, For hee hauing beene euer inuincible, and hauing neuer giuen place to any man, is not only at this present ioyfull, but likewise accounteth himselfe more honored for being surmounted and overcome by his sonne in all vertues belonging to an Emperour. The excellency of so many great Emperours your Aunccestors doe inuite vs; nay rather doe enforce vs, (most mighty Emperour) to expect as much from you, the glory of the Ottomans, the high attempts of your progenitors, euery where so much renowned doth draw vs thervnto, and the fame of your forefathers, continued for so many yeares without intermission doth confirme it to vs. These things beeing thus, the Venetian Senate hath sent mee hether to confirme and establish the same freindship and alliance which hath euer beene betwixt the Ottoman Emperours & our Republique, and this amity with your most excellent maiesty, ought to bee so much the more pleasing vnto you, by how much it is more ancient, confirmed by sundry good offices on either part, and continued for so many yeares. For in very deed all worldly things doe by long tract of time corrupt and grow weake, and still new things are found best, but freindship which is a sacred & diuine thing, and which can not be but among good and iust men, the older it is, so much more perfect and durable is it. Our Republick then being moued by these reasons, doth continually pray vnto Almighty God for your health and prosperity.

The Ambassador hauing ended his speech, Selim swore a sollemne oath, and ratified that which was written in his Patents sealed with his seale. The forme of Selims oth was thus, I sweare & promise by the eternall God creator of Heauen & Earth, by the foules of the Seaunty Prophets, by mine owne soule, and those of all mine Aunccestors, to obserue from point to point all the rightes of alliance and freindship mainrained vntill this present, and to keepe them sacred and inuiolable, in the same manner as they are confirmed by my seale. Selim as the Ambassador was taking his leave, answered him in few words badly polished, but yet full of all curtesie and humanity.

Gaballus departing from the great Lords Pallace, and mounting his horse, was conducted by the Ianisaries (vnto whom before hee had audience he had giuen guifts) to his owne lodging; then preparing for his returne to Venice, the Bachelors of the Councell vied him with great curtesie and liberality, giuing him sumptuous garments, Terra Sigillata, Salsamum, and diuers other precious things, sometimes likewise they doe vse to feast and banquet one another.

At the same time such numbers of Pirates, did scour the sea-coasts of Dalmatia, as men could not liue safely in their own houses they did not only rob those whom they encountered at Sea after the manner of Pirates, but did likewise come on shore, putting all to fier and sword killing old men and young Children: carrying away with them Men, Women & Cartail. The Venetians were not able to indure that insolency, but did on a suddaine arme forty Gallies vnder the command of Hermolao Tepsalo, whereof these Pirates beeing aduertized, departed speedily from thence, and left the Prouince in quiet. In the meane time Ieronimo Priuli dyed, hauing governed eight yeares, eleuen monethes and foure dayes, and was honorably buried in Saint Dominicks Church in the monument of his Aunccestors.

The Venetians
do purge the Sea of Pirats.

PIETRO

The Arcenall
of Venice,
burnt.

PIETRO LOREDANO, a renowned and excellent Senator, was chosen in his stead on the 26. of Nouember, all men hoping that his gouernment would procure great commodity to the common-wealth, and so ended the year 1567. Not long after the Arcenall of Venice was set on fire, which was fearefull for the noyce it made, it being heard many miles off: after which followed an intollerable dearth, so as for the peoples reliefe they were enforced to imploy the munitions which were reserved for the fleets. 30

These two inconueniences happening one after an other in the city, did prouoke the Turke to make an attempt vpon the Isle of Cyprus, being vrged therevnto by John Miches, who of a few beeing become Turke, could doe much with Selim (as hath beene said). This man, the better to perswade him to the enterprize of Cyprus, did acquaint him with the aduertisement which he had receiued from the Iewes at Venice, how the Arcenall had beene burned on the third day of September 1569. where all the munitions had beene for the most part spoiled and lost, together with the great dearth which had followed that losse, wherewith the city was still afflicted.

The first motion of the enterprize of Cyprus for the Turke.

Selim who long before then had beene desirous to seaze vpon that Island, and to take it from the Venetians, and who for that purpose, had in the year 1567. secretly sent to the Duke of Sauoy, to incite him to recouer that Island, which did of right belong vnto him, promising him all ayde and succour, and to make him quiet possessor thereof; but the Duke giuing no eare therevnto, hee himselfe resolved to haue it by all means. As also because he beeing desirous to build a Mesquite (for no great Lord is truly proclaimed Emperor, vntill hee haue builded one, and endowed it with reuenues) was dissuaded from it: their Musti, (who among them is as the Pope with vs) saying that hee could not doe it, till hee had made some great enterprize against Christians, to the augmenting of his religion and Empire, and hauing made a conquest, to endow it with the wealth thereof, it being no way lawfull for the great Lord to build a Mesquite with the reuenue of the Empire, or that of the Calsara (which is like to the Chamber of accounts in France) but onely with that of the countrey conquered by him.

Hee

He hauing along time debated these reasons with him-selfe, did at last resolue to communicate the matters to his Baschas. And departing from Constantinople in the moneth of Nouember, the third year of his Empire with his cheefe Baschas to ride on hunting, (the Turkes terme it the councill on horse backe) hee began to acquaint them with that enterprize.

Mahomet as Visier Bascha began cunningly to disuade him from it, as well for the loue he did beare to Christians, as for the great profit which he ordinarily receaued from the Venetians, telling him that vpon what occasion soeuer hee was moued to take armes, either for Religion, Empire, or for glory, he ought by no means to breake with the Venetians, whose friendship had been euery profitable for their nation: That he ought rather to attempt to releue the Moores of Granada, as a matter more becomming the greatnesse, wherein by the grace of the great Prophet Mahomet the Ottoman Emperors were seated; not to abandon the defence of those, who by an holy and constant resolution had neuer forsaken the Mahometan religion: That it was likewise necessary for the power and safety of his Empire, & for the glory which Selim seemed so much to desire, not to suffer any one Potentate to grow too great, but presently to abate those which might make head against the power of the Ottomans, such as was that of the king of Spaine, which though it would be a difficult enterprize, would neuertheless be full of glory and great hope. Therefore he besought him to acknowledge and make good vnto that great occasion which God offered him, to preferre the faithfull Musulmans, to molest his enemies, and to open to him selfe a way to great and glorious conquests.

The other Baschas Piali and Mustapha, did with no lesse vehemency then Mahomet had done maintaine the contrary, for they not onely enuying him, but hauing declared themselves his open enemies, did euery crosse his designs & counsels, and did more earnestly embrace this businesse, knowing that the great Lord did affect it, and highly extolling his designs, they hoped to win his fauor, and to disgrace him that councelled the contrary: Likewise, they thought that by counselling him to what he was addicted, that they themselves should be employed in that enterprize, the one by Sea, and the other by Land; wherupon they perswaded him that the Venetians forces were of themselves weak, and the aide of Christian Princes vncertaine and badly grounded, as they had knowne by experience: that the Isle of Cyprus being farre from Venice was not easily to be releued, and easie to be enuaded by them, by reason of their neere neighbourhood: that it was a most rich and excellent Island, and very commodious for all his other states, and seated in a place, which might much assure his subjects nauigation vpon those Seas.

Selim lent a willing eare to those two, because they were of his opinion, and Mahomet's credit was thereby much diminished, and his speech greatly suspected, so as after-ward, that enterprize was resolved and concluded, to the which Selim promised to goe in person, with such a will and resolution as all men thought that the very first year of his Empire he would haue vndertaken this warre if other lets had not detained him: For after Selim's death he found the Empire much wasted, by reason of his fathers continuall warres both at Malta, Zighet and in other places, where he had lost great numbers of Soldiers and spent much treasure: besides, his army was ill provided of all necessaries, which it behooued him to renew by rest and time, & with all to repaire his fleet; all which being done there was no more likelihood that it would be any longer deferred.

The Venetians were speedily aduertized of all these things, by Marke Antonio Barbaro their Bailly in Constantinople, a very wise & discreet man, who at that time did many great and good seruices to the Commonwealt. But these things at the first seemed vnto them impossible, so as the Senators could hardly be drawne to beleue it, for when motion was made of making prouisions for the nauall army they

Selim came married with the enterprize
of Cyprus to his Bascha.

The counsel of Mahomet
the Visier Bascha.

The opinion of the other Baschas was contrary to that of Mahomet.

The reasons of the two Baschas were contrary to Mahomet.

Selim resolved with to invade the Isle of Cyprus

they answered that it behooued them to proceed discreetly therein, and not to prouoke Selim, who peradventure had neuer thought on such a matter, which would rather hasten the danger then prevent it.

The end of the seventh Booke of the sixth Decade.

The Contents of the eighth Booke of the sixth Decad.

THE Senate are certainly aduertised of the Turkes enterprize vpon Cyprus. A Cypriot practiseth treason ouer the whole Island. The Venetians implore the ayde of all Christian Princes. The Pope soliciteb all Christian Princes, in the Venetians behalfe. The Venetians solicit the King of Persia to make warre on Selim. The Turkes great preparations for the warre of Cyprus.

Selim by the perswasion of Balscha Mahomet, sendeth a defiance to the Venetians, vntlesse they quit the Isle of Cyprus. The small entertainment giuen to the Chiues of the great Lord. The Venetians prouisions and preparations for the warre of Cyprus. The Popes Proposition to prevent the delay of the vniou of the Armies. Mark-Antonio Colonna, Generall of the Popes Armie, in title of Gonfalonier of the Church. The enterprize of the Marquerites is broken off, by reason of the bad accesse to the place. The vniou of the Armies of the Pope, King Philip of Spaine, and the Venetians. Mustapha, Generall of the enterprize of Cyprus. The Turkish Armie landeth in Cyprus. The small forces which were in the whole Island. The enemies come and encampe before Nicotia. The situation of the City of Nicotia. Those of Famagosta will not suffer Baillon to goe to Nicotia, who was sent for thither. And lastly the Prayers and Processions of those of Nicotia.

The

The eighth Booke of the sixth Decad of the Historie of Venice.

ANTONIO BARBARO Bayly in Constantinople hauing giuen sundry intelligences to the Senate, he sent the last thither vpon the first day of Ianuary 1570. whereby he aduertised them, not of the common report, but of the certaine resolution made in the Councell of the great Turke, concerning the enterprize of Cyprus, although the Balscha did constantly affirme the contrary, vsing all meanes to keepe it secret. For the Bayly seeming to beleeue nothing of the matter, dealt with the Turkes, and chiefely with Ibrahim their Dragoman, who was one of the Visier Balchas Domesticks, and thereby more reckoned of, did found him, and draw him into sundry discourses of diuerse matters which hee had learned of the Balscha, about the prouisions which were made, and especially of the great number of ships which were built in the Gulphe of Aizza, and in the great sea; of the commandement giuen by the Captaine Generall of Asia, whom they terme the Beglerbey of Nartolia, to the soldiers of that Province to bee ready to goe to Caramannia, with other like matters, which gaue sufficient testimony, that the enterprize of the next ensuing Spring, was onely for the Realme of Cyprus, which they did meane to enuade on the sodaine.

The Senate are certainly aduertised of the Turkes enterprize vpon Cyprus.

The Senate by these so often reiterated intelligences, desiring speedily to redeeme the time which they had lost, began to provide all things necessary for a long warre: Wherevpon they suddainly resolued to send troopes of soldiers in Garrison into Cyprus, commanding all the Gouvernors of the Island, to take speciall care for the gard thereof, and to prepare for their owne defense, exhorting the people to bee loyall to them, and the Gentlemen which were feudatories, to make prouision of armor and horse, as they were bound to doe.

The Venetians preparations for the warre of Cyprus.

They did likewise speedily prouide for the other Sea-townes of their dominions, sending men of authority to command their cheife Castles. They made great leuies of footmen in sundry places of Italy, and tooke into their pay the best Captaines of those times: in a word, they left nothing vndone, which might serue to defend themselves or to offend their enemies; they caused great numbers of Gallies to be made ready in the Arsenall, they chose eleuen Captaines of the great Gallies, and made Francisco Duodo their Admirall, a man much esteemed for his valour and skill at Sea, and fourescore captaines for the light Gallies, who were of the cheifest Gentlemen of the City, and best experienced in marine matters. Pietro Troni was made Captaine of the armed ships, Ieronimo Zene Procurator of Saint Marke was declared Generall of all that fleet, hauing been chosen to that office two yeares before, no occasion beeing offered them to send forth their fleet to Sea, and he by that meanes hauing not executed his place, did neuertheless still retaine the same dignity. He was repured both in particular and in publick to be a man till then very fortunate and had well and honorably discharged the most important offices of the common-wealth which had beeing imposed vpon him. All things being thus ordered, they waited for nothing but to put them in execution, whereupon they consulted how to employ those forces: some thinking it fit to send forth Gallies towards the Leuant, which lying in the hauens of Candy should bee euer ready in all occasions, which the time, and the enemies attempts should present: saying, That by so dooing they should encourage their subiects, and encrease their reputation, and might besides breed diuerse doubts in the enemies mindes, which might for a time delay their journey, they not determining to hazard themselves forth of the streight of Gallipolis, but with all their forces ioyned together, especially when they should vnderstand of any that were able to stay them. But opposition was made against this opinion, some saying, That the danger was greater, then the assurance which that aduise 10 did promise, because that those Gallies which the Turkes doe vsually keepe armed at all times for the garde of their townes, are so many in number, as diuerse Fusts belonging to Pirats (which they ordinarily vse in time of warre) beeing ioyned vnto them, it might happen that ours would bee exposed vnto great danger, the which by so much the more was to bee auoyded, as the hope was great that all their forces beeing ioyned together, might execute some notable enterprize.

IIII

put

I will not forget to obserue by the way, how that some fewe moneths before Selim resolved on that sege, some of his counsell seeking by all meanes to surprisethat Kingdome, beganne to consult by what treachery and deceit they 20 might obtaine it, not fearing to be reprehended for it, but rather highly commended, seeing that if the worst should happen they could but restore what they had taken.

Now as the way of trechery was the safest, it seemed likewise vnto them the easiest: for if any towne of Cyprus should be taken in that manner, it was a very easie matter in regard of the neere neighborhood, not only to keepe it, but likewise to seaze on others, by reason of the great and ordinary quarrells and dissensions among the Cypriots. For the execution of this designe, one Diasorinus seemed vnto them a very fit Instrument. He was by nation a Cypriot, by nature subtil and cunning, a great Courtier, and one that had much credit among the Cypriots. To this man Scander, Gouvernour of the higher Misia, sent letters full of courteous complements, with whom by little and little he beganne to enter into a league of freindship, sending often-times letters and presents one to another. 30

After familiar conuersation by letters, Diasorinus being won through faire and goodly promises by the Gouvernour gaue consent to betray his Contrey, and to that end, wrote to Scander, as often as any fit occasion was offered, sometimes in the Greeke tongue, and at other times in Charactery: The Characters were small animals, as flies, ants, spiders, butterflies and such like.

But because Gods will was not to haue the Cypriots as yet to fall into that misery, they beganne to suspect Diasorinus, in regard of the frequent sending of letters and presents betwixt them, whereupon, they found meanes to interrupt some of his letters which they finding to be written in Characters with the figures of these animals, they forthwith supposed that there was some secret in them which they would not haue all the world acquainted with. 40

Diasorinus was presently apprehended, his letters laid before him and beeing loath to confesse any thing hee was put to the tortures which made him to confesse that not only himselfe, but diuers others of the cheife of the Island, drawne by the goodly promises of Scander, and wearied likewise with the Venetian Government, vnto whom they would not giue place either for nobility or for wealth, had conspired and determined to receive the Turkes into the Island: whereupon he with his other complices were put to death.

Now to returne to the Senates determination concerning the resisting of the Turkish Army: they resolved to place strong and sufficient Garrisons in the Castles Treason practised by a Courtier.

Treasons discovered by the Author's care.

Castles of Cyprus, speedily to send thither the necessary aid; and beeing ready to choosethat Commander to conduct those forces, Eugenio Singletico Count of Roccas a Gentleman of Cyprus, (who at the same time beeing Lieutenant General of the Army of the firme land, did for the most part continew at Venice) did freely offer himselfe to aid his Contrey at such a need and to serue his Prince; whereupon hauing a speedy dispatch he embarked himselfe with a thousand footmen, the Senate hauing first made him General of all the Caualery in the Island. 10

Jerónimo Martinengo, Captaine of the men at armes, did likewise freely make offer to raise within a few dayes vpon other princes states two thousand footmen to conduct them to the releefe of Famagosta, and to remaine there with them for the defense of the City: the which hee hauing in a short space done to his great honor, and brought them to Venice, to imbarke them in the vessells appointed for that purpose, he would first shew them in armes to the people in the market place of Saint Marke, who tooke great pleasure to beehold them, which being done, they failed towards Cyprus, but their Captaine falling sick at Sea, dyed within a few dayes after, for want of looking to, who was mightily bewailed, & being carried into Cyprus was buried in Famagosta in S. Sophias Church. 20

The Senate beeing desirous to implore the ayde of all Christian Princes, sent word to their Ambassadors residing in their Courts, that they should acquaint them with the cause, which at that time did onely concerne themselves, but would shortly bee common to all Christendom; the which they did, not so much for any hope they had to bee releued, as for that they were willing to take from them all cause of suspicion that they despised other mens ayde, and that presuming too much on their owne forces, they went about to precipitate into a manifest danger the euent of that warre, whereon depended the common cause of Christendome.

First of all they made meanes to the Pope, as well to draw some succors from him, as that hee by his authority should dispose other Princes to send them supplies. Micaele Suriana was at the same time Ambassador for the Common wealth at Rome, who augmenting the Popes good-will and disposition by sundry reasons, did continually sollicit him effectually to embrace the protection of the Republick in a time so dangerous, by setting before him the example of other Popes, who vpon other occasions, had readily ayded them against that common enemy of Christendom: Hee did likewise put him in minde of the Republicks benefis bestowed vpon the Sea Apostolick, for the conseruation whereof, it had often-times exposed his forces and State, against very mighty Princes: but hee did cheefly set before his eyes, the manifest danger which threatened other Christian Realmes, and especially the Churches territories, if the Venetian State, which all men thought to bee the Bulwarke of Christendome should bee over- 40 throwne and ruined.

By these reasons and diuerse others, the Pope beeing drawne to defend the Venetians, hee seemed to bee very zealously affected to the cause, and desirous to provide for the necessity of that warre, and to aide the Common wealth; yet neuertheless, excusing himselfe for that hee was not able to doe what hee would, hee bewailed the misery of his time, wherein the Sea Apostolick by sundry accidents was very bare of means, and especially by reason of the troubles in France, which threatening the city of Auignon had constrained him to be at great expences: whereupon although it was often propounded in the Consistory to embrace the Venetians defence, and to aide them; and that the proposition was approoued 50 by the Colledge of Cardinals, yet neuertheless, it tooke no great effect: at the first they were onely permitted to leuy vpon the whole Clergie of their State without any exception, the sum of an hundred thousand Ducats towards the expence of the warre. Hee did afterwards make a motion, to ioyn with all possible speed, the King of Spaines Gallies, with those of the Venetians, that they might Supplies of one thousand men sent into Cyprus.

The voluntary offer of Jerónimo Martinengo.

The death of Martinengo.

The Venetians implore the aide of Christian Princes.

Reasons propounded to the Pope to moue him to releue them.

make a mightie fleet, able to resist that of the Turkes, and to dispoine their first attempts: And in the meane time to make a league with the same King and other Christian Princes, whereby all their forces might continually be ioyned together, to make head against the enemies greatnesse. The Ambassador Sariana acquainted the Senate with his Holynesse proposition, who entreated them to accept thereof, and to referre the whole businesse to him; that hee would manage it as the common Father, with great affection, to the good of all Christendome, and to their owne particular desire and profit; the which the Senate very willingly did.

The Pope for the beginning of this Treay, sent Loonico de Torres, Clarke of the Apostolick Chamber, into Spaine to King Philip, to dispose him to ioyn his forces with others against Selim Ottoman the common enemy, vnto whom hauing related, from the Pope, as well the publicke interest of all Christendome, as his owne particular, hee found his Maiesty ready and well inclined to doe that whereunto his Holynesse exhorted him, referring neuerthelesse his small answer till his arriuall at Siuill, (for hee was then at Corduba, at the assembly of the Estates of Castill) but vpon Torres reply, that nothing would so much hinder that businesse as long delay; hee granted him, that his owne Gallies, with those of his Pensioners and Confederates, which amounted to the number of sixty five, besides those of Spaine, who by reason of the troubles of Ganado continued vpon those seas, should be brought into Sicily, commanding Gieuan Andre Doria their Admirall to obey the Popes commandement, concerning the time and meanes to ioyn them with the Venetians, that they might afterwards faile into the Levant: Hee did likewise obtaine a Commission to the Viceroy of Naples, and Sicill, to permit the Venetians to furnish themselves forth of these countreys with corne sufficient for the fleet: but as concerning the entering into the league, he answered, That it craued a larger and more mature deliberation for which hee referred him till some other time: yet neuerthelesse within a while after his coming to Siuill, he concluded it of his owne proper motion.

The King of Spaine answer to the Popes content.

The Venetians had enioyned Sigismond de Canalli their Ambassador with the Catholick King, to ayde and further the Treaty of Torres, who hauing well and dailie acquitted himselfe of that charge, returned to Venice: Leonardo Donato was sent thither in his place, who dealt to with the King, as hee continued him in that good desire and inclination.

Torres, hauing dispatched his businesse in Spayne, did for the same purpose make a iourney into Portugall, hauing first obtained letters of recommendation from the Kings mother, who lay then at Madril. Schastian the first of that name was at the same time King of Portugall, being seauenteene yeares old, bred and brought vp in Christian piety vnder the government of D. Luigi Gensabell a Iesuit, a man very famous and of great authority neere the King, by whose meanes the Pope presumed to obtaine of that Prince whatsoever he was able to doe for the profit and seruice of Christendome: Torres hauing requested this King to send the tenne Gallies, which were usually ready armed in that Kingdom, that they being ioyned with the King of Spaynes might altogether faile into Sicily. The King shewed great loue and reuerence to the Sea Apostolick, and seeming to be desirous to satisfie his Holynesse demand, in a matter so holy, iust and honorable, did to his great greefe excuse himselfe for that hee could not accomplish his good desire; saying, that his Gallies were at the same time vntready and disarmed by reason of the contagious sicknesse which had the yeare before beene at Lisbonne, and that it would be impossible to make them ready vpon a suddaine, or to be seruiceable that yeare: so as by this meanes Torres iourney into Portugall was to no purpose.

During this negotiating in Spayne, Giovani Michael being the Venetians Am-

Ambassador with the Emperor, a man of singular vnderstanding and well teene in affaires of importance, had already motioned the matter to the Emperor, telling him that the occasion was now offered which he had to often desired in their discourses together, how he might fearlesse enuade the Turkish States whilest they being busied at Sea might not haue leisure to succour them: and therefore he should not delay it till they had ended their warre and assured their Sea coasts at which time it was to be feared that they being freed from all other care, would seek to enlarge their Empire, by his losse and ruine: as for the small safety in the truce with them, their Example might giue him sufficient testimony thereof, Selim hauing broken it with them, and infringed his oath vpon none occasion, but only through a couetous desire to rule ouer the whole world. The Emperor gaue a willing eare to these remonstrances, with a ready answer, that he would neuer be wanting to the wealth and commodity of Christendome, but that he was desirous to see, how the King of Poland, the Muscouit, with other Christian Princes, and especially the King of Spayne would carry them-selues there-in, vnto whom hee would send an expresse messenger into Spayne to know his mind. As for Charles the ninth the French King, the Pope vsed all the meanes hee could by his Nuncio to draw him into the league, exhorting him to fauour and further it with all his power, notwithstanding all the domestick warres and broiles which had for certaine yeares molested his Kingdom: if nor with his forces yet at least with his name and authority; the which the King seeming not to be able to satisfie, and being likewise vnwilling to neglect the authority and exhortation of his Holynesse, he said, in manner of delay that he would see what others would do, who were more mighty, and free from all other letts; for he had at the same time sharpe warre in his Realme, where not long before the battaile of Montecour, was fought betwix his brother the Duke of Aniou, his Lieutenant Generall, and the Protestants; of whom the Duke of Aniou gaue the victory: But the Queene Mother who had the entier government and managing of affairs, making a more open excuse, alleaged, That the condition of other Princes was not like to that of hir sonne, because that others treated of continuing warre against their enemies whereas they made a proposition in France to breake the truce with a most mighty Prince their ancient freind, and therefore that the businesse deserved longer and more mature consultation.

The Venetian solicited the Emperor to take part in the first assault.

The Emperor a favor to the Venetian Ambassador.

The Pope solicited the French King to have a hand in this warre.

The excuse of the King and the Queene his mother to the Pope.

Yet neuerthelesse the King and Queene, gaue louing and kind speeches to the Venetian Ambassador residing in their Court, and besides diuers offers made to the Senate from them, by their Ambassador resident at Venice, the King did expressly send thither one of his Gentlemen to offer to the Signory that which the condition and misery of the time would permit his Kingdom, troubled with such greivous accidents, namely to be a meane to diuert that warre, and to compose that controuersie with the great Lord, making vse in that manner of that freindship, which he himselfe had not contracted, but hauing found it established by his Grandfather, and afterwards confirmed by Henry his father, he would vse meanes to preferue it, the which hee supposed would for that time bee to purpose, and redound to the profit of the Venetians, his ancient, and great freindes.

The French King offer to the Venetians.

The Senate did not thinke those offers of any force at that time, the preparations for warre being very forward on both sides, fearing least by an vncertain hope of peace the iudges of other Princes, who were already much animated to warre would be softened: The Italian Princes were much disposed to this league, as the Dukes of Vrbino, Sauoy, Florence, and Ferrara, who did all of them offer to spend their meanes and liues in that warre.

Tamas King of Persia was solicited to take armes and to reuenge the old and new wronges received from the Ottomans, and to this end Vintencio Aljesanckiri a Citizen of Venice was sent thither, who hauing dwelt a long time

The Venetians
join the King of Persia in a new war upon Selim.

at Constantinople could speake diuers languages. Hee being come to Casbin where the King of Persia lay, was by meanes of certaine Armenian Marchants brought in by night, according to the manner of the Contrey, although it was in the summer time, before Sultan Caydar Mirisi the Kings third sonne, who was at the same time his Lieutenent, with whom hauing a long time discouised concerning his comming thither, and telling him what great warlike preparations Selim made against the Venetians, together with the great prouisions of all Christian Princes to fight with him, hee entreated him in the name of the Senate to make vse of such an occasion, and to make warre vpon the Turkes in Asia, whilest the townes there should bee vnturnished of Garrisons by reason of the warre of Cyprus.

The Chancellor of Persia his answer concerning the Emperors demand.

Caydar lending a willing eare to this discourse, did dilligently craue to bee informed of the whole matter, not promising him any thing, but to procure him audience of the King his father. But Alexandri perceiving that they vsed many delays therein, being aduised and assisted by Coca Ali a marchant of Tauris, vnto whom (he comming with him from Venice) the busines had been recommended, he beganne to deale with the great Chancellor of the Kingdome, who after diuers ordinances, made a free answer, That his King was a very wise and discret Prince, who knowing that in a matter of so great importance it was necessary to proceed very maturely, he would first see the successe of the league, wherevpon he might afterwards more safely resolve.

Alexandri hauing receiued this answer, and perceiving that he could not bee admitted to speake with the King, left Persia: for he plainly discerned that Tamas, being very old, was altogether addicted to peace, and auoided all occasions which might cause the Turkes to suspect that he had any intelligence with Christians against him.

Such were the Venetians preparations, such their resolution, and thus did they treat with forraigne Princes, that being vnited together they might oppose themselves against that Common enemy: at what time the Turkes beganne to vse hostile actions, & staied diuers Venetian Marchants with their goods who traded at Narenta, and other places of Albania in the Turkes dominions; they did likewise vnload / although vnder another cullor / two Venetian shippes which were at Constantinople, not suffering them to depart from thence. Therevpon it was thought fit at Venice to doe the like by the Turkes subiects, and their goods, to the end that vpon all occasions the bodies and goods of those men might be answerable for their subiects.

The Turkes
preparations for the warre of Cyprus.

Whilest the Venetians were busied in their preparations, the Turkes at Constantinople did hasten the prouision of all necessities for their iourney, they did in their Arsenall build new Gallies, trimmed the old ones, cast new peeces of Ordnance: enroll great numbers of Pioners in Grecia, made huge proportions of Billets in Morea, sent fise and twenty Gallies to Alexandria, to fetch all prouisions made there for the Army, and Selim continuing his resolution to goe in person with the army, they prepared an infinite number of vessels called Mahonnes, and Palanderias, and made great prouisions of all things, according to the custome of that nation whenlo-euer their great Lord doeth goe vnto the Army.

But the Baschaes, Musapha, and Piali, with diuers others of the Councell vnto whom the enterprize of Cyprus was committed, consulting afterwards on what course were best to be held in that warre, and there being some contrariety found in their opinions, some stay was made of the businesse.

In the meane time, the Venetian Bailly that lay at Constantinople, being acquainted with all these proceedings, tooke great care how he might aduertise the Senate thereof, to write he durst not, fearing least his letters would bee intercepted, as some of his had already bene, wherevpon, knowing that the Bascha

Mahomet

The Bayly remonstrance to the Bascha
Mahomet.

Mahomet was euer against this enterprize, hee did hope by his meanes to obtaine his desire: Hee did by Ibrahim acquaint the Bascha, and afterwards himself by word of mouth, how ill beteeeming it was for the Maiesty and generosity of so great a Prince, to invade those on a Iudaine and vnlook for, who vpon his word and oath, thought themselves safe and firme, as though when time and occasion should bee offered, hee could want forces to employ against them, for the recovery of that which hee might iustly thinke did belong vnto him, against whom hee ought first to proceed by way of Iustice, and next by force, vntill first gentle meanes before hee did take Armes. The Bascha being moued by these reasons,

Selims friends advice is Venice whilste they surrender the Remnant of Cyprus.

perswaded the great Lord, to send some of his seruants to Venice, to demand the Realme of Cyprus, before hee sent his Army to enuade it, which counsell Selim allowed. Cubat Chiaus was appointed to that end, who some two years before had bene at Venice vpon other businesse: the Bayly vnder this coulor, tooke occasion to send one of his seruants to accompany the Chiaus, to conduct him safely thorow the Venetians territories, and to cause this negotiation to bee the more esteemed, Hee determined to send Lodouico Bonriccy, his Secretary, whom hee thorowly instructed with all matters; hee did likewise obtaine leaue of the Bascha to send his yong sonne Lodouico to Venice, fearing least hee should miscarry among those Barbarians, in such wretched times.

This proposition to send to Venice, did occasion an other good, for there was a suspension of Armes on the Turkes side, till the returne of the Chiaus, whereby the Venetians had time to man their townes with strong garrisons, and to provide for their affaires. The Chiaus being come to Venice, the Senate being before aduertised of the cause why hee came, and hauing resolved vpon an answer, commanded that no man should talke or conuerse with him; but being left alone with the Secretary Bonriccy, and two Dragomans, they decreed that without any other ceremony, hee should haue private audience; where hee comming into the Senate, and being placed in the vidual seate, vpon the Princes right hand, hee went and kissed his Gowne, and after diuerse reuerences, hee presented a purse of cloth of gold Tissue, wherein according to the custome of that nation, Selims letters were, and said: Most excellent Prince, this is a Letter from my Lord, when you are acquainted with his demand, I expect to haue an answer: Wherevnto the Prince answering that it should bee so, and the Chiaus standing still, perplexed in minde, because no other speech was vsed to him, added.

The Chiaus presents Sel-
ims letters.

My Lords, Mahomet the Visier Bascha hath commanded mee to tell you, that hee is very sorry, that an occasion is offered, that hee must needs breake off from you, hauing euer sought by all meanes to continue your friend: but complaints comming so often to the Porte, and from so many places, of the vnfriendly dealings of the officers belonging to this State, and especially of the kinde entertainment and reception giuen to the Western Pirates in Cyprus, who this very year, haue done great hurt to the Musulmans, hath taken such impression in the minde of the great Lord, and hath so prouoked him against this State, perceiving that speech vsed so often vpon these complaints to your Bayly, hath bene to no purpose, as his authority hath bene no longer able to keepe warre from being denounced against you: and because hee knoweth that yee cannot long hold out against the power of so potent a Prince, hee aduiseeth you as a friend to take some other course to shield you from so many dangers, and to this end he hath procured my comming hither, and offereth to doe all hee may, that yee may auoyde this mighty stroke of fortune, and continue your ancient friendship with the great Lord: and hauing ended his speech hee presented a letter from the same Bascha, containing in substance that which hee had spoken.

The Chiaus hauing deliuered his message, the Prince told him, that the Senate had resolved on an answer, the which should bee read vnto him, that hee might the better vnderstand and know their intention: Wherevpon hee com-

The Senate
answer to the Chiaus.

manded

manded Antonio Milladonna, Secretary to the Councill of Tenne, to read it, which in effect was thus. That the Senate did greatly marvaile, that his Lord being no way by them prouoked, nor vpon any iust cause, would violate and en-
 10 fering that oath, by which he had so solemnly confirmed the peace, and tooke for a pretence to make warre vpon them, that they should giue away a kingdome which the common-wealth had for many yeares lawfully and peaceably enioyed; the which hee might bee well assured that they would neuer part from; but seeing hee was determined to proceed against them after that manner, the Venetian Senate would not faile to defend that which did belong vnto it, hoping by so much more to bee the better able to doe it, by how much the iustice of their 15 cause would procure them all ayde and succour, both diuine and humane. They told him after wards, that his Lords letters being translated and read, hee should receiue an answer, and so the Chiaus without any farther discourse was dismissed.

The contents of Selims letters.

The beginning of those letters was stuffed with sundry complaints against the Venetians, for that they had disquieted the ancient bounds of Dalmatia, which by 20 conuention, made with his predecessors, had bene established betwixt both the one and other Empire: that contrary to the old and new agreement, the Admiralls of the Venetian Gallies had put diuerse Turkish Pirates to death, after that they had taken them alive in fight; but especially for that the Westerne Pirates were welcome into the Isle of Cyprus, who did continually disquiet his neigh-
 25 bour cities, and barred his subjects from their free nauigation: then toward the latter end hee craued, that if the Venetians were desirous to continue their ancient friendship with him, that they should surrender vnto him the Isle of Cyprus, to take away that cheefe cause which did entertaine those controuersies betwixt them; otherwise, they should prepare for a fierce warre by sea and land, for hee was determined to send his nauall Army with great forces to take that Island, and in other places to invade their dominions by land, hoping in God, the giuer of 30 victories, and in his blessed Prophet Mahomet, by whose fauour the Ottoman Family had obtained so great an Empire, to be victorious in that enterprife.

The Senates
answer to Selims letters.

The Senate made this answer to these letters. That the Venetians had euer 35 inuolubly maintaine peace made with the Ottoman Emperors, and contemned all other respects whatsoeuer, by refusing all occasions whereof they might haue made good vse to their owne profit: because that aboue all other things they thought it fit and becomming a Prince, carefully to keepe his promise, and they being desirous to auoyde all suspition of so great an infamy, had dissembled and 40 buried in silence, diuerse wrongs done vnto them, because they would not bee the first disturbers of the peace: But now perceiving that vpon no occasion, warre is denounced against them, at such a time as they least expected it, they would not refuse it, for the defence of their owne, and in particular for the defence of the Realme of Cyprus, the which as their Auncfours had enioyed it with so iust a title for so many yeares, they did likewise hope that God would giue them the grace to defend it valiantly against all those that would vnjustly take 45 it from them.

The Venetians
great preparations.

Warre being in this sort denounced against the Venetians, and by them en-
 50 tertained, the Senate made a decree to sell diuerse publick possessions, to accept of sundry loanes of money, to the great profit of those that brought them, and in a word to vse all meanes to gather great sums of money together: wherevpon for this purpose the number of the Procurators of Saint Marke was augmented, which is the cheef dignity next to the Duke, bestowing it vpon those that should lend twenty thousand Ducats: to the Common-wealth: they did likewise permit
 55 all young Gentlemen to enter into the great Councell before the time appointed by the lawes, who thereby might be capable to elect magistrates, and likewise to execute the like places themselves, so as they would lay in deposito cer-60 taine sommes of money in the publike treasury.

The

The surceale of armes had continued for a while till the returre of Cubar, and the end of his negotiation, but being come to Ragusa, the answer which he brought was soone divulged, wherevpon the souldiers that lay in the parts neere
 10 adioyning, not carrying for any others commandement being assembled in great numbers, did not only waste and spoile the champaigne country of Albania and Dalmatia which was subiect to the Venetians, but went and encamped before Dulcina and Antuari, who finding them to be manned with strong Garrisons and hauing no ordinance to batter them, they were enforced to retire.

It was expected in all places.

Now the Chiaus being returned to Constantinople, and the Senates answer
 15 being knowne, all men did greatly wonder at it: for the Turkes hauing seene in former time what deere account the Venetians made of the great Lords friendship, supposed that they would try all meanes before they would take armes against him. But Selim did not so much wonder as he did scorne and disdain, ac-
 20 counting himselfe highly wronged and contemned in his owne person, because that the vsuall ceremonies and entertainments done to Ambassadors had bene denied to Cubar, and for that they had not sent an expresse messenger to him with their answer, but had contrary to their promise, detained the Secretary Bonricei at Venice. In regard whereof his pleasure was, being so counselled by Mahomet, to haue Cubar come into his presence, and particularly to relate the Venetians
 25 speeches and entertainment giuen vnto him, together with their preparations for warre: which he vnderstanding from his mouth, was sometimes amazed at the report of the Republikes forces, repenting him in a manner of his determina-
 30 tion, and on a sodaine he would enter into rage and choller, being therevnto pro- uoked by his owne pride, and by the flattery of his counsellors: wherevpon, he placed gards about the Baylies house, that he should not goe abroad, command-35 ing the Bashas of Cairo and Aleppo to doe the like to the Venetian Consuls of Alexandria and Syria yet they were afterwards set at liberty, on condition they should not depart nor conuay their marchandize forth of the Turkes Dominions.

Selim is greatly discontented for the small respect and entertainments giuen to his Cruisers.

In the meane time Prince Loredan died at Venice, and Lodovico Mo-60 cenigo was chosen in his place, to the peoples great ioy and vsuall 65 applaude, presuming that they had a Prince, who was wise, discrete,
 70 and a louer of the poore, and would constantly oppose himselfe 75 against all those perils and dangers which did then threaten the 80 Commonwealth.

The

The Senate after this election having acquainted all Christian Princes with the coming of the Chiaus to Venice, together with their answer, went about to continue the former motions of the league. Therefore for the greater recommendation of the matter, they resolved to send an expresse Ambassador to the Emperour, and to that end they appointed Giacomo Soranzo, a man of great authority and reputation, who had a long time delt for the Commonwealth in Princes Courts; the Senate thinking it necessary, first to solicit that Prince, who already beganne to grow could in the businesse, to the end that by his example other Princes might be drawne into that vnion for Christendome.

Being come to the Emperors Court, he found that he did alleadge sundry difficulties, and that he was ready to send the tribute to Constantinople, which he vowed to pay to the Turke for the Realme of Hungary, the which he vied meanes to hinder, or at least to delay it till the finall resolution. Yet neuerthelesse the Emperour seemed to bee glad of his coming, either for his owne excuse or else because he desired to haue an expresse Ambassador to come from the Signory about that matter, to the end he might be present at the Imperiall Dyet which he determined within a while after to hold at Spire, and hee supposed that his presence would be the occasion of propounding and concluding so great and important a matter.

As for the Spanish Court there was no speech of the league, that King having sent backe the treaty thereof to Rome to D. Effuniga his Ambassadour and to the Cardinals Gramelle and Pacheco, but the Popes Nuncio and the Venetian Ambassador made earnest request, that the King would command Doria, that so soone as he should bring those Gallies, which he had appointed him into those seas; to goe presently and ioyne with the Venetians fleet, concerning which proposition those of the Kings Councell made sundry difficulties, some times alleading that it was against reason that the Admirall of the Kings Gallies should obey the Venetians Admirall: then they made shew to suspect that the Venetians went about to make vse both of the apparence and name of those forces to treat with more aduantage with the Turkes; and therefore they concluded that the treaty of the league ought first to take place, as most necessary.

Now at Rome, whether the treaty of the league had bene sent backe (as hath bene said) the Pope perceiuing that to particularize the conditions thereof, would breed a very hurtfull delay, he propounded, that seeing the King of Spaine and the Venetians were agreed to make that vnion, that without any more delay, they should publish the league, being made in the same manner as in the yeere 37, and that in the meane time their forces should ioyne together, to inuite other Princes to declare themselves, and thereby to affright the enemies.

During these practizes the Generall Zanne departed from Venice about the beginning of Aprill, and went to Zara, which was the Rendezuous of all the fleet, and for all the prouisions for warre, that so soone as things were ready they might from thence saile into the Leuant. But the fleet, to their great hurt, stayed there longer then was expected, tarrying for certaine Gallies, and for armes for the souldiers, and other warlike engines ordained in great number, for the souldiers did endure there sundry discomforts, and many of them grew sicke, by meanes whereof the Gallies were badly furnished with souldiers and mariners: yet neuerthelesse so soone as the Senate heard newes from Rome that the King had commanded Doria to ioyne with the Venetian nauall army, it wrote to the Generall, that leauing foure Gallies for the guard of the Gulphe, vnder the command of one of the captaines that had at any time bene an Admirall, he should speedily saile with the residue of the army to Corfou, and there to expect newes from the Gallies of Spaine, that he might afterwards ioyne with them at Messina, and the two fleets being so vnited should shape such a course as God should direct them.

According

According to this commandement Zanne departed from Zara the twelfth day of Iuly and failed to Liefina, where he found fixe great Gallies, and certaine ships which he ioyned to his fleet, and from thence, he went directly to Corfou. At the same time, twelve Gallies were in the Popes name armed at Ancona to be sent to the Venetian fleet at Corfou. For, after sundry propositions made in open consistory concerning the aide which the Church might afford the Venetians in that warre, it was concluded that twelve Gallies should bee armed by the sea Apostolike, but rigged by the Venetians. The Pope committed them to Marc Antonio Colonna duke of Palliano with title of General to the Church in that warre against the Infidels.

The Venetians seemed to approue the Popes choise and wrote to him about it, Colonna sent letters to Venice, wherein hee gratified their loue and good will towards him, which he promised in all points to answer to the honour and seruice of the Commonwealth.

The Turkes on the other side so soone as the Venetian fleet was gone from Zara, beganne to spoile and waste Dalmatia, with great troupes of horse and foot, where they tooke some castles. Now the Venetian Generall being come to Corfou with three score and tenne light Gallies (for the great Gallies and Ships staid by the way) he beganne to consult what was best to bee done (in the counsell, by the Senates appointment, besides the Generall who had two voices both the Prouidators of the army and Sforza Palauicin were present) all men were desirous that the fleet should without delay passe forward; but many things hindered this designe; first, because they had no certaine newes of the Gallies of Candy, which were in number twenty, vnder the command of Marco Quirin Admirall of the Gulphe and next because they had no certaine intelligence of the designes of the Turkish fleet; for it would haue bene a very rash attempt with halfe the forces to haue hazarded the whole fortune of that warre on the incertaine euent of one fight, seeing that by a little temporizing they might more commodiously assure the estate of that action.

And lastly because the sicknesse which first beganne at Zara, by reason of the miseries which the souldiers and mariners had there endured, was so mightily encreased, as great numbers daily died, whereby many Gallies were empty of men: this was the chiefe cause of the delay, and the captaines tooke great care how to make new leaues of men to furnish the fleet: To this end, commandement was sent to the Gouernors of Zant and Cephalonia to raise the speediest and greatest supplies that they possibly could.

In the meane time because the souldiers should not grow idle, the Generall resolved to send them to beseege the castle of Marguerits, a place of it selfe nothing famous, but very necessary for the obtayning of other conquests, in which action it was thought fit to employ them, till such time as the Gallies of the Pope and the Catholike Kings should arrive. The charge of this enterprise was giuen to Sforza Palauicin Generall of the Venetian troupes, who departing from Corfou with eight and forty Gallies, commanded by the Prouidator Celsi, with fise thousand foote and foure great peeces of ordnance, arriued by day breake in the Haven of Nissa opposite to it, where he speedily landed his souldiers, and willed them to march on a sodaine to assaile the enemies, thereby hoping with ease to surprize them and to seize vpon the place, and to this purpose, he sent certaine Harquebuziers before, and himselfe followed after with the residue of his forces: but hauing marched a great while through narrow and difficult waies, they did from farre descry the castle which they went to surprize, being seated on the top of an hill, in a place of very difficult access. Palauicin hauing well considered all matters and finding things to be otherwise then they had bene reported, thought it against reason, so hazard those troupes which were destined to greater achievements, and therefore on a sodaine hee turned backe again,

The Venetians
send an Ambassador to the Emperour to solicit him to enter into the league.

The Emperours
answer to the Venetian Ambassador.

The Venetians
propositions in the court of Spaine, which were difficult and dangerous.

The Popes propositions to delay.

The fleet receiveth great discomfort by their abode at Zara.

The Pope armeth
twelve Gallies, whereof Colonna is made General.

The cause which staid the fleet at Corfou.

The enterprise of the Marguerits is looken off in regard of the difficulty thereof.

again, although the Prouidator was of a contrary opinion, and countermanding the Harguebuziers that he had sent before, he marched backe to the Hauē of Nisla and returned to Corfou.

At the same time Marco Quirini came with his Gallies from Candy to Corfou, hauing by the way taken the fort of Brazza de Menia, which the Turkes held. He was presently commanded to go with twenty Gallies and scoure the Islands of the Archipelago: whereupon, he sailed to the Isle of Andros one of the renowned Ciclades. Within a while after, the Generall Zanne received commandment from the Senate to saile with his forces farther vp into the Leuant, and by assailing some of the enemies towāes to diuert them from the inuasion of Cyprus. 13
Whereupon he left Corfou and went to Modon where Quirin with his Gallies met him, and within two daies after he arrived in the Isle of Candy anchor'd in the Gulph Anfalca, which at this day mariners call the Hauē of Suda. The Generall being there desirous to make speedy prouision of whatsoever the fleet needed, found great difficulties in it, chiefly in recouering sufficient numbers of men to supply the places of them that were dead, whereupon, he sailed with forty Gallies to Candace the chiefe city of the Island, the sooner by his presence to hasten the necessary prouisions, leauing both the Prouidators and Palatinis in the hauē of Suda with foure score Gallies, enioying them to leauy men from all parts.

Now after that the fleet was sufficiently furnished with souldiers, mariners and other necessities, they vnprofitably spent the time and the best season of the yeere, expecting the Popes and Spanish Gallies, the which, according to the Venetians directions, being ioyned together, were to meet them in Candy. At the last, toward the latter end of August, Mare Antonio Colonna the Churches Generall, and Giovann Andrea Doria, the Catholike Kings, being arrived, the Venetian fleet was merueilous ioyfull of their comming: The Generall and fleet went forth of the Hauē of Suda to welcome them, where according to the manner they saluted with volies of shot; then all of them entring together into the hauē, made no long aboad there, but after some propositions made, the whole fleet retired to Sithy, there more maturely to consult what were best to be done to free the Isle of Cyprus from inuasion. 20

Whilest the Christian fleet had spent much time in preparing and vniting it selfe together, the Turkes with greater celerity had assembled all their forces, and being mighty at sea, had without any difficulty, prosperously pursued their enterprize, the which was more speedily performed, because that Selim, who said that hee would in person goe to the army changed his determination and resolved to remaine at Constantinople, by the aduise of Mahomet and Mustapha, towheole authority and counsell all the other Bashes condescended. Selim then tarrying at Constantinople made Mustapha his Lieutenant Generall in that warre, committing the whole enterprize by land to him, and all marine actions to Piali, Admirall of the Gallies. Piali within a while after departing from Constantinople with fifty five Gallies and certaine other vessels, Mustapha set saile with like number, vnto whome for an extraordinary fauour the great Lord had giuen the Imperiall Galley to transport him, which is of extraordinary greatness and most sumptuously decked, in which the great Turke embarketh himselfe when he goes forth on any enterprize. They anchored first at Negrepont, then at Rhodes, where hauing intelligence that the Venetian fleet lay at Zara, and could not depart from thence by reason of sicknesse and other impediments, and that they had no newes at all of the Spanish fleet: the Turkes being out of feare that the fleets would ioyne together, and supposing that they durst not come on any farther, determined to saile directly to Cyprus: But as the Turkish fleet passed along from Negrepont to Rhodes, Piali made an attempt to take the fort of Tina, which is an Island in the farthest part of the Archipelago, belonging to the Venetians, 20

The Venetian fleet beareth Corfou by the Senate's commandment.

The maines of the Pope, King of Spain and Venetians ioyne together.

Mustapha, Generall of the enterprise of Cyprus.

Venetians, and comming vnlooked for in a morning to that Island thinking to surprize it, it was discovered at sea by Ieronimo Paruta a Venetian Gentleman Governour of the Island, a valiant and discreet person, who of a long time hauing feared their arrivall, hee made prouisions of all necessities for defence. Hee perceiving the enemies for to bend their course thitherward, shot off a warning peece to aduertize those of the Island that were abroad in the country, that they should quickly retire into the castle, which being done in time, they prepared themselves to withstand the Barbarians assaults, which were very cruell, not onely once, but twice and thrice, in euery of which, they were 10 brauely repulsd, with great losse of their men, and were enforced to dis campe, after that they had with incredible fury wasted the whole Island, burned the Country houses, ruined Churches, and slaughtered all the cattails that were in that Island.

From Tina Piali went to Rhodes, where all their fleet lay which amounted to more then two hundred armed vessels, accounting an hundred and fifty Gallies, together with Fufts and Galeots, but in the great fleet were certaine Mahonnes, which are like to great Gallies, not altogether so bigge as a Gallion, fixe ships, and great numbers of other vessels, commonly called Caramuscolini, and some fifty Palandaries to transport horfe.

This fleet bending it direct course toward Cyprus was discried neere to Bafso on the first day of Iuly in the yeere 1570. which scoured all the coast from Limissa as farte as the Promontory commonly called the Cape of the Car: then landing part of their forces they burned and spoiled the sea coasts, taking many prisoners: the next day pursuing their journey, they went to Salines, where finding no resistance, they vnshipt their ordnance, and the rest of the souldiers who presently fortified their campe with deepe trenches and strong Rampiers, from whence they afterwards wasted and spoiled the country neere adioyning. Then marching to Leucara, nine miles from Salines they did easily make themselves Masters of the country and people, vnto whom Mustapha gaue great gifts 30 and goodly promises to draw on others, and especially those of the mountaines, seeking rather to winne them by faire meanes then by force.

In the meane time they dispatched foure score Gallies and diuers flat bottomed vessels to Tripoli, and to the Riuer of Caramania, there to raise other horfe and foot forces, which arriving in Cyprus, made vp the number (as most authors write) of fifty thousand foot, five and twenty hundred horfe, three thousand Pioners, with great numbers of horfe of carriage and thirty peecces of great ordnance with an hundred and fifty Falconets.

There were no sufficient Garrisons in the whole Island able to resist these forces: for the ordinary Garrison was but two thousand Italian foot men, and some thousand others sent from the firme land, with Martinengos two thousand souldiers, many whereof died by incommodious transportation; so that the greatest hope of being able to defend the townes and castles, consisted in the new supplies which those of the country had promised to leauy. There was no other caualery in the whole Kingdome but five hundred Stradiors which were kept there in pay by the Common-wealth.

Things being thus, and sufficient forces wanting to repulse so mighty an enemy, for the caualery was too weak to hinder his landing, and the infantry not sufficient to defend for any long time the two chiefe fortres which they held, Nicotia and Famagosta, and for to guard the mountaines and other passages of the Island hee being landed: therefore they resolved especially to defend those two cities.

After Bailione who by Martinengos death was Generall of all the forces in the Island, in the absence of the Prouidator (for Lorenzo Bembo died, not long 30
Kkkkk

The Turkes retired from Tina.

The number of the Turkish fleet.

The Turkish fleet landed.

Mustapha by gifts seeks to winne Cyprus.

After Bailione General in long Cyprus.

long before) and other Venetian Magistrates, called a councill, where the chiefe offices and command in that warre were distributed to sundry Cypriot Gentlemen, of honourable ranke, as well for their wealth as nobility, but finally experienced in martiall matters. The Count Roccas was made Lieutenant to Baillone, Giacomo de Nores Count of Tripoli, Master of the ordnance, Gionan Singlittico captaine of the Cypriot cavallery, Gionan Sosemene, captaine of the Pioners, Scipio Caraffa, and Pietro Paulo Singlittico captaines of the foot, who were appointed to guard the strong places of the mountaines, and others were appointed to other places.

They did likewise conclude in that councill to attempt to hinder the enemies landing; and to that end, the chieft of them went into the field with the greatest forces they could assemble, but, considering their enterprize to be to dangerous, and vnreasonable, the enemy having already landed part of his forces, they returned home to their Garrisons, so that the Turkes landed without any difficulty, which made them at first to suspect, that they did it for some pollicy, to draw them afterwards into an ambuscado, whereupon at their first arriall they were very wary, but running afterwards vp and downe the country, and finding no opposition, being thereby emboldened, their army did not onely aduance forward but went about in disbanded troupes, without Ensignes to robbe and spoile at their pleasure.

The Turkish captaines being vnwilling to loose time resolved to assaile one of the two chieft fortres of the Island. Piali was of opinion, to beseege Famagosta first, hoping quickly to take it, and that it being taken, Nicotia would of necessity yeeld, which had many vnprofitable eaters within the circuit of her walles, which being seated farre from sea, in the midst of a champaigne country, possessed by great numbers of enemies, could not bee releued, nor without new prouision long hold out the sege: that Famagosta was no great fort, but weak, and so defectiue as it would neuer endure one onely battery, and that they within it were not many, or so bould and valliant as to sustaine any assault.

Mustapha maintained the contrary, saying, that the reputation of so great an army as theirs, ought not to be blemished by attempting any meane enterprize, thereby to encrease the enemies courage, and diminish their owne: That the Geneuois for foure score and tenne yeeres had held Famagosta, at the same time as the Kings of the family of Lusignan commanded the Island, whereby might be gathered, that the taking of that city, would bee of no great importance for the winning of the whole Kingdom. That the Nobility, and very many of the people were retired into Nicotia, that all the wealth and munition of the whole Island was there, so as that onely exploit being well performed would end all the rest, and their first attempt giue end to all their designs.

These reasons forcible in themselves and strengthened by the reputation of the author, caused them to resolve first to beseege Nicotia, whither the whole campe marched the two and twentieth of Iuly, hauing first sent fūe hundred horse towards Famagosta, to cut off all correspondence and intelligence betwixt those two cities: the Turkes pursuing their journey approached neere to the walles of Nicotia. Great teare seized on the inhabitants when they perceived the enemy at their Gates, like men who wanting discreet fore-sight to provide for dangers a farre off, did extremely feare them being neere at hand, hauing alwaies beene incredulous that the Turkish fleet would come into the Island, though the Venetian Bailly at Constantinople, and the Senate, had giuen them many aduertizments thereof that they might provide for their affaires in time.

Nicolo Dandulo was at the same time Governor of the city, a man to weak

Piali is of opinion to beseege Famagosta first.

Mustapha maintained the contrary and his opinion is followed.

bo

to vndergo that burthen, which not defert but opinion had laied on him: yet to whom long experience had rather giuen ability to execute, then nature to direct. The sodainnesse of the danger had encreased his feare, and his feare the danger, for, at the arriall of the enemies army, the trenches were vnfinished, and the souldiers disordered, and the city vnvisited.

Now whilst those in Nicotia, being incompassed with many miseries, were busied in furnishing the city with necessities, and in consulting by what means to frustrate the enemies designs; they were so tedious in their resolutions, in regard they had no eminent Commander able to decide the controuersies which arose from diuersity of opinion, that the Turkes had time to pitch their tents, to plant their ordnance, and likewise for to fortifie their campe, which stretched it selfe from Saint Marins as farre as Aglangia, possessing the whole space opposite vnto foure Bulwarkes, and on the other side of the towne which was not enuironed by the campe both the Balthas did daily send an hundred foote and as many horse, that none might issue forth or enter into the City.

This City is seated in the midst of the champaigne, in an wholesome temperate aire: it hath great store of water, and the soile is very fruitfull: In former times it was nine miles in compasse about, but the Venetians being desirous to fortifie it, reduced it to three: it is proportioned like a starre with eleuen points, in euery of which is a bulwarke, made onely of earth, which were not yet finished when the Turkish army arriued: and the rules of fortification were so well obserued, as the greatest Ingeniers accounted it the most absolute peece in the world.

Howsoever, the City rather was vnfurnished of a skillfull Commander, and braue men, then of fortification. There were tenne thousand foot-men in the city, amongst whom were fūfteen hundred Italians and the rest were native Cypriots, namely three thousand Cercedes, two thousand fūe hundred of the city, two thousand new men enroled in the townes and villages of Cyprus, that were retired thither, and a thousand Nicotian Gentlemen, all with vnexperienced troupes, were for the most part badly armed.

They likewise sent to Famagosta for to entreat Baillone to come thither with some certaine troupes to command the city: but those of Famagosta hauing no superfluous forces, and being vn certaine whether the enemy changing his determination would on a sodaine come and assaile them, did constantly deny the Nicotians request, not suffering the aide they required, nor the captaine to goe forth of their city: vpon this refusal Baillone likewise excused his departure, adding that *Martinengo*s souldiers by wanting a captaine, said that they would obey none but him, so that his departure might breed some great disorder and confusion in the City. Moreover, there was store of ordnance in the towne, which wanted but braue men for to mannage it: There were many Pioners, for besides foure thousand vnder the command of Gionan Sosemene, as many more were come to the city; neuertheless, for all this great multitude of people, the captaines being diuided amongst themselves, this so necessary fortification was left imperfect, which did much weaken the forces within it.

On the contrary side, there was in the enemies campe such agreement, and obedience towards the captaines, as all military actions were speedily executed. Mustapha a couragious person and a great soldier, besides the ranke which he then held, had great credit and authority amongst the souldiers, in regard of the fame and reputation he had purchased for his command in Selims army before he was Emperour, when hee made warre on his brother Achomat, all men attributing

Kkkk 1

the

The enemies are encamped before Nicotia.

The situation of the city of Nicotia.

Disorder among the commanders in the city.

Mustapha his great credit among the souldiers.

the vnexpected victory which ensued, to his onely valour and prowesse: and therefore the souldiers being accustomed to martiall deeds, trauaile and danger, were growne much more active and valliant, hauing their captaines valour for their obiect, together with the hope of great reward: they were victorious.

His army was reported to be very strong, but his chiefe force were fixe thousand lanissaries, and foure thousand Spaches (these are horse-men, neuer out of pay, which some time when need is, fight on foote) all valliant men and bred vp in warre: Therefore by how much those of the city wanted humane aide against such forces, by so much greater was their recourse vnto God. For, day and night praiers were made in priuate Houses and Churches, and sollempne processions ouer all the city, which were performed with great deuotion and concourse of people, therein following the example and exhortation of Francisco Cantaren Bishop of Bassa.

Prayers and Processions in Nicotia.

Hee at that time was chiefe amongst the Clergy in that city (for Philippo Mocenigo Archbishop of Nicotia was then at Venice) did not cease to aide and assist the people as if hee had beene their owne pastor, and hauing on a time assembled the chiefe of the towne, in Saint Sophias Church, hee gaue them a brieft and learned exhortation befitting the time, from whence they departed so well satisfied and resolu'd, as they did put one another in good hope and comfort of a fortunate issue of that warre, and did brauely dispose themselves to defend their country.

The end of the eight Booke of the sixth Decade.

The

The Contents of the ninth Booke of the sixth Decade.

THE Turkes beseege the City of Nicotia, with their furious battery. The taking of the Bulwarke Constance, whereof ensued the Cities losse. The Barbarous cruelties committed at the sacke of the City. Therest of the Island yeeldeth to the Turkes, Famagosta excepted. The Turkes approach the City of Famagosta, with the inhabitants resolution. The sundry opinions of the captaines of the Christian army, who at last resolute to goe and fight with the enemy. Doria hauing intelligence of the losse of Nicotia, returnes home into his country. Many towne subjects to the Turkes yeeld to the Venetians. The Popes exhortation on for the conclusion of the league. The difficulties which arose in the conclusion of the league. The Emperour refuse to enter into the league. Supplies sent to Famagosta. Mahomet Basba propoundeth a treaty of peace to the Venetians. The Venetians are doubtfull and uncertaine either for peace or warre. The Emperour opposeth himselfe against the title which the Pope had giuen to the Duke of Florence. The Pope and Spaniards seeke to the Venetians, least they should make an agreement with the Turke. The league is concluded and signed, with the Articles thereof. Don Iohn of Austria is made Generall of the league. The meanes which the Venetians vsed to get money. What Selim promised to himselfe after the taking of Nicotia. The enemies are defeated in Candy. The Turkes spoile and waste the Islands of Zant and Cephalonia. And lastly the conditions of peace propounded to the Venetians by Mahomet Basba.

Kkkkk 3

The

The ninth Booke of the sixth Decade of the History of Venice.

Those of Nicosa
sawok certaine falled.

The enemy without any empiediment being come before Nicosa, sent certaine horse to make incursions neere to the city, to draw those within it forth to skirmish; the Italians would gladly haue fallied, but at first the Gouernor would not suffer them; yet being overcome by the importunities of all the captaines, he permitted Caesar of Vincenza, Lieutenant of the Count Roccas, to sallie with certaine horse, which being few in number could not execute any important matter, but onely sought to draw the enemy within the shot of the cities ordnance: and hauing done so two daies together, a captaine of a troupe of Stradiots, whose name was Andre Certese, was taken by the enemy, and being brought before the Basha, hee presently commanded his head to bee cut off.

The Turkes
build tues
the city.

The enemies afterward without any empiediment did build a fort on Saint Marins mount; some foure hundred and forty paces from the city: for although the besieged vsed all meanes to frustrate the enemies desaigne towards the curtaines of Podocatera and Caraffa (for so were those Bulwarkes called, by the name of those Gentlemen that had particular command in the building of them) and did continually with their ordnance play vpon that part, yet, they could not hinder the enemy, who wrought day and night, from executing his enterprize; who not satisfying himselfe with that one fort, did on a sodaine build three more in three other seuerall places, the one vpon a little hill at Saint Georges, the second opposite to the Bulwarkes Constantia and Podocatera, on a little rising, called Marguerits Mount, and the third on the top of the Mount Mantia, hoping with these fortes to batter the Bulwarkes, curtaines, and houses of the city.

The enemies
force batter.

They did afterwards make deepe and broad trenches which they brought vnto the ditch of the old walles and placed courts of gard in them, which could not bee hurt by the cities ordnance: then, for foure daies space, without intermission, from morning till night they furiously with all their ordnance battered the walles; but perceiving it to bee to small purpose, because the bullets for the most part fell vpon earthen Rampiers and made no breach, they ceased the battery, and fell to the spade and mattock, so as they presently came vnderneath the counter scarpes, thinking thereby to overthrow them: then they plaied vpon foure Bulwarkes, namely Podocatera, Constantia, Dauila, and Tripoli, all which they determined to assault at once, in which for a long time both sides fought valiantly, but in the end the Turkes were with great losse repulsed.

A force assault gum in four bulwarkes the time.

Mustapha wondering and raging thereat, being almost out of hope to take the City, solicited and animated his souldiers, to goe once againe to the assault, promising great rewards to such as should doe valiantly, and after that hee had made a speech to them worthy a Generall, hee caused a proclamation to bee made thorow the whole Army, that any three which should first

10

20 30

40

50

mount the city walls should be made Sangiacks, and if any Bascha dyed, hee that should first enter the city, should succeed in that dignity.

The souldiers being thus encouraged, the assault was resolved on: The next day early in the morning the Turkes marching by day breake in great silence to the same Bulwarkes, assailed the besieged on a suddaine and vnlookt for, hoping thereby with more ease to obtaine the victory, (as indeed it did). For the Turkes finding those that had the garde of the Bulwarke Constantia halfe a sleepe, and mounting furiously the Parapet, gaue them no time nor leasure to make any defence, who being drowned in slumber and feare, forgot to retire into the City.

An assault given to the Bulwarke Constantia.

The Turkes
take the Bulwarke Con-stantia.

The great opinion which the besieged had conceived of the arriual of supplies from the Common-wealth of Venice, which they so much desired, made them beleue, that the noise which they had heard the night before, whilst the Turkes were preparing for the mornings assault, was a token of the enemies discamping, in regard whereof, and because they were oppressed with long watchings, and intollerable labours, they had securely disarmed themselves, and fell to rest: The Turkes then in this confusion entring pell mell with the Christians into the last rampiers, there arose a great cry, accompanied with feare and amazement, wherevpon, many betooke themselves to open flight.

The Count Roccas quarter was neere to the Bulwarke, who by the suddaine noyse being certified of that which was done, did presently arme, and comming in among the thickest throngs, hee found so great disorder there, as notwithstanding all his meanes and perswasions to cause the souldiers to stand fast, and make valiant resistance, his labour was in a manner lost, to such a desperate passe were matters brought, and himselfe being shot into the head with an Harquebuzze, fell downe dead, wherevpon all those, that by his arriual had taken courage, and began by little and little to make head, leauing the defense of the walls, ran home to their houses to provide for the safety of their wiues and children. Pietro Pisani and Bernardino Polano Captaine of Salma, comming thither in hast, could not by their authority and example stay the disordered runne-awayes; among whom

The Count
Roccas slain.

Polano thrusting himselfe, and going about to hold them back by force, was together with them cut in peeces. Pisani perceiving his fellow to be slaine, did with the rest retire to the market place, whither from all parts the poore inhabitants came, who were not yet pursued by the Turkes, who hauing taken the Bulwarke Constantia, would before they went on any farther, make themselves maisters of all the rest, in which the Italian footmen did still fight brauely with the enemy: but in the end when they perceived their strong places to bee lost, and that they were at once assailed in front and on their backs, being vnable to make any longer resistance, they abandoned the walls, and making themselves way thorow the middle of the enemies, they retired to the market place, where they made head for a time, vntill that the Basha of Aleppo arriued, who entring the towne at the Bulwarke of Tripoli, went first to make good the walls, where hee made great slaughter of such as hee met with, and finding no more resistance, hee marched towards the market place, where seeing so many armed people to make head, hee caused three peeces of Ordnance to bee brought from the walls, and bestowing his shot among them, hee enforced them to quit the place, many of whom retired to the Pallace; whither the Gouernor, Bishop Contarini, and many of the chiefe Cittizens had already escaped, those which could not enter, running vp and downe heere and there thorow the streetes, were presently either slaine or taken prisoners.

All the bul-warkes are taken.

The City of Nicosa is taken.

They within the Pallace hauing received the Baschas word for the safety of their liues, so soone as they had opened the gates, the Turkes presently ranne in vpon them, who were able to make no resistance being vnarmed, where they were all murdered: therein, the Gouernor, Bishop, and common people running one selfe same fortune.

That

The City is sacked.

The number of the dead.

Cyprus yeeldeth to the Turkes, Famagosta
excepted.

That beeing done, and the Turkes freed from farther trouble, they ran confusedly and without Enseignes about the city, lacking houses, spoiling and ruining Churches, dishonouring wives, ravishing virgins, and putting all to the edge of the sword, without distinction of age or condition, so as that day, twenty thousand persons dyed by the hands of the Turkes: and those whom the cruel enemy left alive, rather to reserve them for some miserable punishment, then for any compassion towards them, were bound in chaines, and haled to prison over the dead bodies of their friends and kinsfolke. In this manner did this City in one day, taste the extremest of calamitie, which for a long time had liued in great pompe and magnificence, nay rather in all excess and dissoluteness, serving for an example of the inconstant mutability of humane affairs. The City was taken and sacked vpon the ninth day of September, and the fourteenth day of the siege.

The Turkes did afterwards with ease become Lords of the rest of the Island, Famagosta excepted. For the other townes following the victors fortune, did presently yeeld, and Cerina likewise as readily as the rest, notwithstanding that Giosan Maria Mudazzo Captaine of the Castle, and Captaine Alphonso Palazza beeing entreated by those of Famagosta, had determined to hold out and brauely to defend it. Those of the mountaines did the like, Scipio Caraffa, Panlo Singlittico, with diuerse other Gentlemen, and some Greeke Preilts, and great numbers of Countrey people, yeelding them-selues to Mustapha, vnto whom they sware fealty and allegiance; so that the Venetians possessed nothing in the Island but onely Famagosta, whither Mustapha determined to march, leauing 4000. footmen for the gard of Nicotia.

Mustapha, hauing taken order for Nicotia, marched towards Famagosta with his whole armie, and encamped at the village Pomodama, three miles from the City, causing his Turkish horse to make dayly incursions to the very gates, who bore the heads of the chiefe Nicotians vpon their lances points, to daunt the souldiers, and to diuert them from their resolution in sustaining the siege: hee did afterwards draw neerer to the City, making great trenches: but those within the towne falling to skirmish, did so disquiet the enemies, as they twise draue them from their trenches, and with their ordnance did ruine three Forts which they had almost finished in places very commodious for them; namely at Saint Georges, Perispolia, and at the Crane tower, which neuertheless, did afterwards do them great hurt, for they therein spent aboute fifty thousand pound weight of powder, which since then they wanted.

Now because winter drew neere, an vnfit season for a siege, which they perceived would prooue long and difficult, and that it behooued him besides to strengthen his Gallies, by reason of the intelligence hee received of the vnting of the Christian fleet; Mustapha being vnwilling to enterprize any thing, that might darken or eclipse his glory purchased at Nicotia, did often and in sundry sorts sollicite those of the city to entertaine some agreement, and to yeeld: He permitted Iohn Sofomene, who had beene taken at Nicotia to go to Famagosta, vpon his own word, to procure money to pay his ransom, that hee might exhorte them to a voluntary yeelding, and to tell them that they could by no means hold out long. But the Captaines, Magistrates, and people of Famagosta, resolving to defend it to the last man, would in no sort listen to his discourse, but instead of intreating the Senate to quit that city to the enemy, they humbly besought it to send them aid: and the better to acquaint it with what they needed, they resolved to send Nicolo Donato to Venice, with two Gallies, and with him Ieronimo Ragazzini, the Cities Bishoppe, who was well instructed of all matters, and very fit for such a businessse.

But it is now time to returne to the Christian fleet, which departing as hath beene beene said forth of the Hauens of Suda was comē to Sidhy, where the Captaines beganne to consult what was best to be done. Propositions were made by some of them to enuade some places belonging to the Ottoman Empire, and thereby enforce the enemies to leaue Cyprus to come to the relkew of his owne, affirming it to be the surest meanes to frustrate the enemies designs. The General Zanne was of a contrary opinion, perswading them to saile directly to Cyprus, alleading how that the fleet was chiefly destined for the defense of that Kingdome, which by directing their course elsewhere could not bee preferred from the danger which threatened it: That the only remedy was to goe and fight with the enemies fleet, because that vpon report of their coming, the Turkes would be enforced to quit the land enterprize and to retire to their navy for the defense thereof: which if they should not doe, they were then sure to find the empty Gallies in the Hauens exposed to their mercy: That it was most likely, that the Turkes, vpon intelligence that the Venetians forces and Gallies were vnted with those of the Pope and King of Spayne, would presently leaue Cyprus; not to fight, but to returne to Constantinople: and that thereby they might find meanes to encounter them by the way, & fight with them with great advantage: for though they were Inferior to the enemies in number of men and vessels, they were neuertheless without all doubt in goodnesse of shipping, and magnanimity and courage superior to them; beeing besides fresh and lusty, whereas the enemies could not but be much wearied and wasted with their exploits done since their arriual in the Island: moreover, to approach the enemies fleet, though no other profit should ensue thereof, would encrease their owne reputation, whereas on the contrary to turne away from such an enterprize would argue feare and cowardize, encrease the enemies courages and diminish their owne, especially they that haue the guard of the Fortes in Cyprus: That it was no found aduise to loose ones owne vpon hope to get it of another man; and least of all when as a weaker Prince, such an one as was the Common-wealth of Venice, could hardly defend it being gotten, or recover from the Turkish power and in the middelt of all his warlike countrey that which is lost.

These reasons beeing strong and forcible were approued by euery one, as agreeable to the Senates decree, namely to leaue all other enterprizes and to intend the voyage of Cyprus already resolved, wherevpon the fleet departed from Candy the eighteenth day of September to saile thitherward.

The whole fleet consisted of an hundred and fourescore light Gallies, namely an hundred and foure and twenty of the Venetians, twelue of the Popes, and fise and forty of the Catholick King: and besides all these, twelue great galleys, and foureteene Venetian men of warre, with great numbers of other vessels of burthen, which carried Munitions and other necessaries. In the whole Naue there were fiftene thousand mercenarie footmen, besides great numbers of voluntaries, and the most of them Gentlemen, and men of note, commanded by sundry Captaines of great experience and reputation. The fleet sailing with a faire winde towards Cyprus, did in three dayes, rid away three hundred miles, and arriued at Castel rosso, which is seated on a rock, opposite to Caramania, some hundred and fifty miles from Cyprus, where by reason of night that stole vpon them, and a tempest that arose, they were enforced to land in the Hauens of Vathi and Calamita, where the same night they receiued sorrowfull newes of the losse of Nicotia.

This did greatly trouble the whole fleet, wherevpon the next day a Council was called, to determine what was to bee done. Such as from the beginning had not approued that iourney, did then condemne it more then before: and Doria did openly protest, that he would returne home, and said, That he came from Candy, with an intent to releue Nicotia, which beeing lost, the cause of his iourney ceased, and that he knew none other reason sufficient to expose them to the Sundry opinions of the Logotanes, the Christian fleet.

The General is of opinion to meet with the enemy & fight with him.

The Number of the Christian Fleet.

Doria hearing of the losse of Nicotia, is desirous to returne home.

the hazard of a bataile, which in regard of the losse of that City was much more to be well considered: because that the enemies being then free from land actions, and growne more proud and insolent by meanes of the victory, would bee imbarcked in their Vessells, nor alone to repulse but to assaile vs; adding heerevnto, the vssitines of the season, winter drawing on, & the long iourney they were yet to make before they should arrive at their wished Hauen, and also his particular charge of preserving his fleet which was committed vnto him by the Catholicke King.

The Generall
of Provindar use reason, to Doria to persuade him to fly.

These reasons making him resolute in his opinion, he could not be diuerted from it by the Generall Zanne, nor by the Proudard Veniero, who being already imbarcked for Ciprus, seemed highly to allow of that iourney, each of them telling him that since they were come so farre together, he ought with them to run one selfe same fortune, and make prooffe of the hazards of warre, wherof they should not afterwards haue cause to complaine, thereby blotting out the infamy which all men might throw vpon them, for having such gallant forces and consuming so much time in vaine without attempting any memorable matter: but all these persuasions were to no purpose with him nor with the rest likewise who had noe liking to the iourney, who vpon *Doria*s refusal to goe on any farther, the Generall Zanne to his great griefe was enforced to permit it.

Doria returne neigh home.

The Christian fleet then departing from Castell-rosso, and comming all of them to Scarpanto into the Hauen Tritano, Doria on a foddaine took his leaue directing his course to wards Puglia, and from thence into Sicily, his only care being to retire safely into his Contrey.

Colonna and Zanne being desirous to exploit some worthy enterprize, remained still together. But having intelligence that Piali, with a great number of well armed Gallies was come from Cyprus to ouertake them, and finding themselves to weake for resistance, they weighed anchors and sailed into Candy to the Hauen of Canca, nor without danger of being assailed by the Turkish fleet, which hauing notice of the Christians departure sailed speedily to the Ile of Stampalia: and Piali determining to goe to Candy, in hope to find some assured booties on those Seas, could not execute his proiect by reason of stormes and foule weather, wherevpon he returned back, and went into the Archipelago: where hee entered the Hauen of Calegiera making a shew as if hee would winter there, but on a suddaine changing his mind, hee went with his whole fleet vnto Constantinople.

At the same time certaine Townes of Albania which were subiect to the Turke did rise against them, and being desirous to shake off their slauish yoke, they sent to request the Venetian Magistrates their nearest neighbors, to send them supplies of men and armes a iuring them that at the first sight of their Ensignes, they would speedily come vnto them and become their subiects, and for a sure testimony thereof, they offered to giue them their children in hostage: which request of theirs, though it could not bee granted, as befitting their need and desire, great numbers neuerthelesse of inhabitants of the black Mountaine, and neere to Boyan, called at this day the countrey of Drina, and other places belonging to the Marcovichians, did submit themselves to the Venetians, so that the Gouernors of Antiuari, Bulcigna, and Budua, did in the name of the Venetian Commonwealth, receiue the oath of allegiance of more then an hundred townes and villages. The Christians of Zara were in armes, nor so much in hope to make any new conquest, as to repulse the enemies, and to free the countrey from their continuall incursions: But there was no memorable matter done, in regard both parties were apter to robbe and spoile then to fight.

Diners places swayed to the Turks yield to
the Venetians

In the meane time, the renewing of the league was treated at Rome, whither so soone as ample commissions were brought from Spayne and Venice to their Agents and Ambassadors for the conclusion thereof, the Pope having called them before before him beganne to exhort them all to enter into league against the common enemy, telling them that the cause was common, (although that in respect of present losse it did more neerely concerne the Venetians), in regard the quarrel was betwixt Christians and Infidells, and that if his owne presence should be necessary, his age should not hinder him from the iourney: That he would entreat, sollicite, and admonish the Emperor and all other Christian Princes to enter into the league, for which he promised continually to pray vnto God that it might please him to grant it victory ouer his enemies.

The Pope exhortation for the conclusion of the league.

The Ambassadors and Cardinals seemed to be greatly moued by this exhortation, giving his Holinesse many thanks for it, each of them promising to proceed therein charitably, speedily and sincerely, as became a matter so important, holy, and desired by their Princes, as well in respect of their owne particular interest, as for the Common good of all Christendome: these words being often re-iterated by them did not produce effects conformable thereto, but euery of them aimed at his owne particular profit, which being sundry, brought forth different opinions, breeding extreame and important delays in the conclusion of that businesse, wherein diuers monethes were already vainely spent in idle and needlesse disputations.

The Pope had appointed fve of the greatest and noblest Cardinals of the Colledge to bee present in the name of the Sea Apostolick at the treaty of the league, to wit, Alexandrine his Nephew, Moron, Cefis, Graffi, and Aldobrandino, betwixt whom and the two Spanish Cardinals, with the two Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice, the treaty hauing bene begunne to be decided, they presently fell into sundry difficulties: for euery of them aiming to haue the league concluded to his owne particular profit, propounded very strange matters, as it often happeneth in such cases: But the Pope who proceeded therein very sincerely, his ayme being only for the good of all Christendome, went about sometimes to moderate the excessive demands of the Spaniards; protesting that if they did not presently conclude it, to reuoke all power and authority granted to their King to leuy money: Then turning his speech to the Venetians, he exhorted them to harken to an agreement, though it were somewhat to their disadvantage, promising neuer to faile them in any aid or relesse possible.

Long deliberations were used in the conclusion of the league.

The Cardinals likewise that were his Holinesse Commissioners, speaking now to the one & then to the other, did all they might for the ending of the businesse, but especially Cardinall Moron, a man well experienced in the managing of most important affaires, and very eloquent, who allowing the propositions of the Venetians Ambassador, as those which tended to the vniuersall good, went about to draw the Kings Ambassadors from their owne priuate interest, and to make them capable of truth which hauing done by a very eloquent remonstrance, and they vnable to make any reasolable answer, fell to new excuse, saying that they would write thereof into Spayne and expect a more particular and expresse commission from their King.

The Spaniards
take excuse.

The Spaniards added to the former difficulties which they had propounded, That the Venetians should be bound on paine of Ecclesiasticall Censures to obferue in euery poynt that which should be resolved on in the league, as though they had suspected the Venetians loyalty, which had like to haue broken off the whole businesse: They did moreover strue about a General to command the Army, the Spaniards arrogantly crauing not only to appoint a Generall (which was freely granted) but a Lieutenant, who in his absence should haue the same authority in the Army, there by wholly distrusting the Venetians, which suspicion still encreasing, did much coole the treaty of the league, which was begunne with such earnest heate.

The difficulties, responded by the Spaniards.

The Senate being highly displeased there-with did expressly send a new Ambassador to Rome to acquaint the Pope with their earnest desire to see the league concluded

cluded, together with their firme resolution to continue the warre. Gionan Sereno was deputed to this end, who comming to Rome, and finding the same difficulties, his arrival and speed could doe no greater good, so as to all mens griefe time was vnprofitably spent, which rather craued the execution of matters already resolved, then consultation about new.

The Emperour
referred to consider the league.

The league was at the same time propounded in the Emperours Court, where it had no better successe for the Emperour vnder sundry coullors hauing spent many monethes before he would giue any certaine resolution, being still desirous to gaine time did in the end declare, That hauing Truce with Selim for eight years, three of which were hardly expired it would be against his honor not to keepe his word; and though he were desirous to doe otherwise, yet he could not without the consent of the Princes and Estates of the Empire, neither did hee intend to doe it without the aduise and Councell of his owne particular States of Austria, wherevpon he craued time to thinke thereof, and to see the resolution of others, the which peradventure by reason of the accident of Nicotia, might alter, and that hee would not consult on a matter of so great importance, but maturely and at leisure: By this answer it was easily perceived, that hee had no great inclination to intangle himselfe in that warre: the like did the other Princes and Common-wealthes of Germany. For the Emperour in the diet of Spyrha-10 uing propounded to call another assembly to consult particularly on matters be-20
longing to the league, answer was made, that when his maiesty had beene molested by the Turke they had not suffered him to want any aid or succour, but that then they would not but vpon vrgent necessity fall againe into so dangerous and difficult a warre.

The Senate hauing notice of the Emperours resolution and perceiving that it was to no purpose any longer to entertaine an Ambassador thence, called him home, the like they did to Antonio Tepelo appointed for the same purpose to goe into Poland, who so soone as they vnderstood the Emperours resolution they sent back for when he was halfe way on his journey being assured that although the Polanders were a warlike nation and enemy to the Turke, yet they would not take armes vnlesse all Germany did the like. Such end had the negotiation of the league for that yeare.
30

The Venetian
Generall resolueth to sail and to Cam-
bray.

Now to returne to the fleet, the Venetian Generall came to the haven of Cania as hath beene said, as well in regard he was to neere his enemies & farre from his freinds, as for the season of the yeare vsfit for marine actions, thinking it folly then to goe to releue Famagosta, whither for that time hee only re-40 solved to send sixteen hundred footmen in three shippes, with twelue Gallies for their conuoy, vpon intelligence he had receiued how that eight Turkish Gallies lay at anchor not farre from thence, to keep all releefe from it. The Prouidator Venieri made intreaty that for more assurance, hee should send thither as many more shippes and soldiers, seeing that in the defense of that City, the whole 50 hope of the conseruation, or rather recovery of that Kingdome consisted; which being not effected by reason of sundry impediments, Venieri in regard thereof, or rather in regard of the indisposition of his person, remained in Cania.

The Marquis
Rangon Pater was in excess.

Lodouico Mar-tinengo, a supplies to Famagosta.

The Marquis Rangon Palsuicin was chosen to command those new supplies, but absolutely refusing to goe thither, said, That hee came to goe vnto Famagosta, if that Baillone were not there, or else vnto Nicotia, but the one being lost and Baillone remaining in Famagosta, hee was quit of his promise: but this excuse seeming vnworthy for so great a soldier, especially at such a time, hee lost his former reputation and shortly after his life in conceipt thereof Lodouico Martinengo Captaine of them at Armes and then 60
Gouernour of Cania, was elected in his stead Captaine Generall of those supplies, who freely accepted that charge.

The

This being done, the Generall thought it fitte, for the ease of the Island to depart thence, and leauing Quirini in Candy, with the Gallies of the Island, and three great Gallies, hee sailed with the rest of the fleet to Corfou, being by the way by a terrible tempest driuen into the Hauen Vatica. There hee wayted for the Senates commandement to know what hee should doe, eyther to itay there, or else (as himselfe aduised) to passe on farther into Dalmatia, there to tinnie his Gallies, and furnish the fleet, with many things which it wanted.

Colonna preparing for his departure to Italy, was by reason of foule weather enforced to tarry a whole month in the Hauen of Calopa, from whence tired with long stay, hee set sayle, and in his journey encountered many misfortunes. For his owne Admirall Galley strucken with lightning, was in an instant burnt, himselfe hardly escaping into the Galley of Francisco Troni, the which not long after being by the same tempest driuen on shoare, was there bearen in peeces: but the weather waxing faire, hee arriued at Zara, hauing escaped two wonderfull and notable dangers: from whence hee wrote to the Senare, acquaint-20
10
ing it with that late accident; then hee directed his course towards Ancona, and from thence rode poste to Rome, to yeeld an account to the Pope of his iourney.

Colonna escaped with two great dangers as hee returned homeward.

The Generall Zanne within a while after fell sick, as well by reason of the great 30 trauailes hee had sustained, as with griefe of minde: Wherevpon hee besought the Senate to giue him leaue to come home to prouide for his health, which being granted, Sebastiano Venieri was chosen in his stead, who remained in Can-die; hee was speedily commanded to sayle from thence with two Gallies to Corfou to take charge of the fleet, the which by the Senates Decree was to 40
Winter there, and to be supplied with all necessities. And the Senate fearing least Venieri should be gone to Cyprus before hee could receive his Commission, it determined to create a Prouidator Generall at Sea, who in 50
Venieri his absence, should haue as ample authority as the Generall, and when Venieri should bee in the Army, to hold the chiefe place next him. Augustino Barbarico, a man of singular wisdom and integrity of life, was by a generall consent chosen, on whom it seemed the Common-wealth might safely rely and build vpon.

Sebastiano Venieri is made Generall at Zanne his stead.

In this manner, and with such successe, ended the first yeare of this warre, begunne with greater resolution then successe. Now the vnhappy losse of Nicotia, with other euents, cleane contrary to all mens hopes, greatly perplexed the Senate: so as vpon sundry occasions, it was much distracted. For on the one side, the earnest desire to recouer their reputation, and to be reuenged for injuries receiued, did prouoke them to renew the warre in fiercer manner 40 then before, and to make new prooffe of their fortune and valour: but on the other side, considering their enemies power, and the vncertainty of other Princes ayde, who were all addicted to their owne particular interests; they were transported with other thoughts, and some-times changed to accept some honorable conditions of agreement, from which they knew by intelligence from their Bayly, that the Turkes would not much start: and in regarde they still held the City of Famagosta, the report which was spread abroad euery where of the league, and of the Confederates great forces, together with the vncertaine successe of that warre, did put them in good hope and comfort, the more easily to obtaine peace and quietnesse, and to reduce their affaires to their former State:
50

Besides, the great difficulties which hindered the conclusion of the league, the bad presage and ill successe of so vnfortunate and vnluckie a beginning of warre, and the confluence of so many aduersities, did take away from the mindes of the most generous, all hope of any future successe.

LIII

away

The Senators being thus irresolute a very fit occasion was offered them with their honors to negotiate a Peace. For the Bascha Mahomet still desiring to compose this warre in friendly manner, was willing to renew the motion of peace, the successe of that warre in no sort liking him, for if it should prove unfortunate it would encrease the danger of their Empire, if prosperous the authority & reputation of his enemy Mustapha.

The Bascha Mahomet reneweth the treaty of peace.

Mahomet then being mooued by these reasons did oftentimes discourse with the Venetian Bailly concerning the treaty of peace which was broken off, going about to draw from him whether he had any commission to deale therein: at the last taking occasion through the ordinary complaints made at the great Lords Port by the freinds and kinsfolkes of those Turkes that were imprisoned at Venice, or whose goods had bene seized there at the beginning of the warre he began to deale with the Bailly to vie means to the Senate that the Ottomans subjects so imprisoned might bee set at liberty, and their goods restored to them, saying, That it was against all equity, the Venetian Marchants living at liberty and enjoying their goods ouer the whole Ottoman Empire, the subjects of the Turke should bee dispoiled of their goods, and kept in miserable bondage and captiuitie.

The Bascha in speaking heereof told him that his Lord was vexed thereat, and that hee did not only with him to write to Venice, but to send an expresse messenger thither, to treat of that business more effectually. Ibrahim vsed the like speech to the Bailly, wishing him to incite the Senate to send a messenger of purpose to Constantinople, to the end that vnder colour of this treaty concerning Marchandize, some meanes of a Generall Agreement might bee propounded.

The Bailly vpon this assurance, and by the Baschas permission dispatcht his owne steward with one of the Dragomans to carry letters to Venice, which the Baschas selfe had dictated to him concerning the affaires of Marchants, acquainting them afterwards more particularly what hee had done, and with the Baschas intention.

Grassiman a French-man departed at the same time from Constantinople, hauing bene Agent for the most Christian King there; who arriuing at Venice, told the Senate that the Bascha had vsed diuers speeches to him concerning the treaty of peace, and that he brought letters from the great Lord and the Bascha to his King to that end, knowing very well that they would not take it in bad part that the most Christian King, as friend to both sides, should mediate such an agreement.

Although the Senators did sumwhat suspect these propositions, fearing, that they were rather made to delay the preparations for warre, then to lay downe Armes, and enter into some honorable accord; Neuertheless the sundry accidents of those times did much perswade to hearken to those Treaties, chiefly for that at the conclusion of the league a new difficulty arose about the time when it should beginne. For the Spaniards, would haue let slippe all that cheefe part of the Summer, and not haue had it to bee mentioned in the capitulations therein contained, and that it should not bee in force till the year following.

The Venetians
great doubts & perplexities.

The Venetians on the contrary fearing that they should not bee able to repulse the first attempts of that mighty Army, which the Turkes were said to haue prepared, and which was ready to march, had very earnestly written to the Pope, that hee by his authority would remouee that difficulty, giuing him to vnderstand how that by his Councell they had embraced warre, dismissed the Chiaus from Venice, and contemned all other means of agreement propounded

The Venetians
request to the
Pope.

oftentimes by their Bayly: that they had likewise by his aduise and counsell, so long wayted for the Spanish Gallies, as in the end, their ayde was more in name then in effect: and yet they had euer shewed themselves ready to conclude a league suitable to his intention, and to the present need of all Christendome. But all these intreates and pursutes did not produce such effects as the time required: For the Pope being of him selfe well disposed, and wholly inclining to the generall good, knowing that the Venetians were agreeable to his will, confessed that their request was iust and honest, exhorted them to continue steadfast, and not to giue place to these first accidents of warre. And yet his Holynessee being ouer-credulous, and suffering himselfe to bee carried away by those, who for their owne particular interest fauoured the cause of the Spaniards, was eyther remisse, or did not constantly with his authority withstand such impediments, as were perceiued eyther to weaken the league, or delay the conclusion thereof.

The Venetians were likewise much grieved to see the Pope at that time entangled in other affaires: for the Emperors Ambassadors protested, that vlesse hee did reuoke and disanull the new title which hee had bestowed on the Duke of Florence, their Maister should bee enforced to maintaine his owne dignity, with that of the Empire, by all meanes possible: The Pope though by Nature timorous, would not for all that retract that which hee knew hee might doe, and was well done, but made preparation by temporall armes to defend his owne authoritie, and that of the Sea Apostolick: Therefore hee speedily leuied forces, provided armes, money, and all other necessaries for warre, causing Proclamation to bee made in all places vnder the Churches iurisdiction (to the particular hurt of the Venetians) that it should not bee lawfull for any, without exception, to leuy Souldiers forth of that State; and therevpon hee imprisoned Pompeo de Castello, and Giovan Aldobrandino, who being Pensioners to the Venetians, had in their name enrolled footmen in the Churches territories, whereby all men thought that Italy would fall into a dangerous warre. This made the Senate resolute to send the Secretary Formentis to Rome, to appease this new stirre: but his departure was delayed, and Commission sent to their Ambassadors there, to make the same request to the Pope, and to put him in minde of the miseries of the time, the greatnesse of the present dangers which threatened Christendome, together with the remedy (if there were any) alone residing in him. Wherevnto though the Pope gaue a willing care, hee neuertheless excused himselfe by reason of his owne necessity, and did still pursue his priuate designs, leauing the euent of the common warre very doubtful.

The Emperor
will not allow of the Popes
new title gi-uen to the Duke of Florence.

These troubles caused the Venetians to welcome the arriual of these men from Constantinople, and likewise vpon so faire an occasion carefully to thinke on the treaty of peace, because they dayly saw their hopes more and more to decline, and the cause to cease for which they had first neglected it. They determined then to hearken to the treaty of peace, and so much the more willingly as it was offered from the Turkes: neuertheless, because they would not seeme too greedy of it, nor inuade the Turkes thereby to insigne it vpon euery trifle, without motioning peace at that time, they gaue Commission to Giacomo Ragasson, a man well experienced in such businesses, to goe to Constantinople, to treat of the enlargement of prisoners, and restitution of Marchants goods taken on eyther side: and besides, the Councell of Tenne gaue him another secret Commission to giue to the Bayly, which in effect was, that if afterwards the Turkes did motion peace, hee likewise should seeme to desire it, and enter into farther discourse thereof, if he should perceiue that it might take effect on reasonable & honorable conditions for the Common-wealth, namely

The Venetians
refuse to hea-ken to peace.

The Articles of peace proposed by the Venetians.

LIIII

of

of recovering the Realme of Cyprus, in paying some great tribute to the Turke for it, or else that they might still keepe the City of Famagosta, or by quitting it to the great Lord, to haue some other State else-where in counter-change, and also for the restoring of their ancient confines of Albania and Dalmatia. They did impart as much to Ragasson, and gaue him power to speake thereof, if the Turke, who had first craued to haue one sent thither of purpose (for the Bayly was imprisoned) if for any other respects they should refuse to treat with him.

Ragasson his departure from Venice to Constantinople, was presently diuulged in the Courts of Princes, but they assured them (as indeed it was so) that they had sent him for the dispatch of businesse belonging to particular marchants, without any other commission at all: yet euery man suspected that hee had some other secret Commission to treat of peace, the which they were rather induced to beleue; because that the Venetians had occasion thereby to seeke to assure their affaires, having had but an vnfortunate beginning in their warre, perceiuing their hopes daily to vanish.

The Pope and Spaniards sought to the Venetians to conclude the league.

The Pope hauing a share in this suspicion, and beginning to shake off his feare of the Emperours armes, did hotly reuiue the Treaty of the League, beeing thereunto prouoked by the Spaniards, and determined to send Marc-Antonio Colonna to Venice, who beeing wise and polittick, and very gracious with the Venetians, might with his speech interrupt the practises of peace, and by granting them somewhat, which had bene denied them before, to induce them to consent to the speedy conclusion of the league.

Colonnas remonstrance to
the Venetian
Senate.

Colonna beeing come to Venice, and often-times brought into the Senate, did vse all good meanes and offers, to perswade them to embrace the league, labouring to let them see how profitable it was for the Common-wealth, and how that his desire to serue at once the Pope his naturall Prince, the Catholick King, vnto whom hee had vowed and dedicated his seruice, and them selues likewise, vnto whom, in respect of the trust they had reposed in him, hee was no lesse bound then to any other whatsoever, did make him more earnest in that businesse, beeing not able to bridle his loue, nor conceale that which reason commanded him to vtter, and hauing by a long Oration particularly acquainted them with the preparations of the League, hee did earnestly entreate them to embrace it.

The Senators answer to Colonna.

Colonnas authority and eloquence was of force to haue perswaded the greatest part of the Senate to this confederacie, but the importance of the businesse, the experience of the former yeares successe, the quality of the generall propositions, and they vncertaine, and the hope that the Treaty of peace might haue more prosperous successe, held the Senators in suspence: wherevpon, by a Decree of Senate, Colonna was answered in generall termes, how that their actions might testifie their disposition towards the league.

At the last, time pressing them to make a speedy resolution, and Colonna hauing receiued new instructions from Rome, whereby all matters were granted them, concerning their forces, time when to employ them, and likewise for the increase of the number of their Gallies for the first yeare; the Pope did besides particularly promise to permit them for five yeares space to leuy three tenths vpon the Clergie of their State: these things beeing considered by the Senate on the one side, and the practises of peace on the other, by the commissions given to the Bayly and Ragasson, made the Senators very doubtfull, Peace and Warre beeing at their own choyce and liking: wherevpon the Senators were of contrary opinions concerning the continuation eyther of the one or other, not growing to any certaine resolution. Especially two of the most principall and eminent in the government of the Republique, dissented farre

in

in opinion; the first (which was Paulo Trepulo, a man very famous, and much practised in the government of the Common-wealth,) said, That without relying on Mahometts goodly propositions, which rather tended to deceive and lull them a sleepe, then benefit them, they ought without longer delay, to embrace the league, in regarde the conclusion thereof was certaine, and the euents of the Treatie of Peace most vncertaine. Andria Badoario, a man of equall authority, was of a contrary opinion, saying, That seeing they had motioned peace, and had to those ends giuen ample Commissions and instructions, they could doe no lesse then expect an answer, and not make such haste, or rather precipitate themselves into the conclusion cleane contrary. Both of them were attentively heard, and their reasons did in such sort moue the Senators, as they Trepulos opinion tends to warre.

Badoario is of a contrary opinion.

10 still continued irresolute. But at last the most part inclining to the conclusion of the league, the better to raze out that note of Infamy, wherewith the former vnhappy euents of warre had blotted them, they all on a suddaine altered their opinions, and refused to send ample power and authoritie to their Ambassadors at Rome, in their name to conclude the league, and presently gaue Colonna a pleasing answer, who suddainly returned to Rome, where the Pope hauing notice of their resolution, called the Ambassadors of the Catholick King and Venetians into the Consistory, where causing the Datary to read the Articles, agreed vpon betwixt them, hee was the first that swore (laying his hand vpon his brest)

Warre is resolved at Venice.

The league
against the Turke concluded.

20 strictly to obserue them: The Cardinall Pacheco likewise swore in the behalfe of the Catholick King (Granuell beeing gone to Naples) the Ambassador of the same King did the like, and those of the Venetian Common-wealth in their Princes name swore on the Euangelists.

Then the Pope commanded, that the next day after diuine seruice was solemnly celebrated, and the Procession ended in Saint Peters Church, it should bee published, notwithstanding that the Venetian Ambassadors were of opinion to deferre the publication thereof, till the Emperor were acquainted therewith, that his intention might be knowne.

30 The particuler Articles of the league were these: Betwixt Pope Pius Quintus, premising for the Sea Apostolick and his successors, with the content of the whole Colledge of Cardinalls, Philip the Catholick King, and the Duke and Senate of Venice, a league and perpetuall confederacie hath bene made, to abate and ouer-throw the Turkes power, who of late haue with a mighty Armie, enuaded the Realme of Cyprus, a countrey very commodious for the conquest of the Holy land. That the Confederates forces shall consist of two hundred light Gallies, one hundred ships of warre, fifty thousand footmen, Italians, Spaniards and Almaines, foure thousand five hundred horse, with Artillery and Munition proportionable to such forces: all which shall bee employed, as well for defence of the Confederates states, as to assaile the enemies, and particu-
40 larly for the enterprises of Argier, Tunis, and Tripoli: That all these forces shall bee vnited (in the month of May next ensuing, or at the beginning of April) at Otranto, to passe into the Leuant against the enemies, as time, and the counsell of Capraines shall thinke fit. That these forces neuertheless may bee changed, by increasing or diminishing the prouisions for warre, as necessity and the quality of the enterprise shall require: wherevpon a yeerely meeting shall bee at Rome in Autumne, there to consult what is best to bee done. And if it shall there bee concluded, not to attempt any thing that yeare in common, yet it might bee lawfull for euery of the confederates to execute their particular 50 enterprises, and especially for the King of Spaine, to enterprise those of Argier, Tunis, and Tripoli, in which, so that there bee no mighty Turkish Army abroad, the Venetians shall bee bound to ayde the King with fifty Gallies for that purpose.

The Articles
of the league.

That the King likewise shall bee bound to ayde the Venetians, whensoever they

LIII 3 will

will enterprize any thing in their Gulph against the common enemy, on this condition neuertheless, if he which shall craue this aide, haue far greater forces ready. That all the Confederates shall bee reciprocally obliged to defend the States of any one of them whom the Turkes shall enuade, and in particular the Citties and other places belonging to the Church.

That for the expence of warre, the Catholick King shall pay the one halfe; and the other moyety beeing deuided into three parts, the Venetians shall pay two, and the Pope the third: they shall bee bound to giue the Pope twelue Gallies ready rig'd, and munitioned, which his Holynesse shall man for the seruice of the league. That generally each of the Confederates shall bee bound to contribute for the common necessity, whatsoeuer hee shall abundantly haue, and others want, and afterwards shall haue it allowed in their accounts. That the store-houses for Corne shall bee euery where open for the common good, and that graine may bee taken forth of commodious places, so that hee from whom it is taken, haue first made his owne prouision. That at Councils and consultations the Commanders of the three Confederate Princes shall bee present, and what the most of them resolu on, shall bee concluded: Neuertheless, the execution of matters determined, shall remaine to the Generall of the Army (who was presently named) to wit, Don Iohn de Austria, and in his absence Marc Antonio Colonna with the same authority, though at the same time, hee retaineth the title and ranke of the Churches Generall. A place was referred for Maximilian of Austria the elect Emperour, the most Christian King, and the King of Portugall, to enter into this confederacie, when they should thinke it fitte, and to all other Christian Princes likewise, that had a desire to enter into it. There was no particular mention made of places which should bee conquered, for that was referred to bee disposed off in the same manner, as in the league of the year 1537. wherein was expressly mentioned, If any strife should arise betwixt the Confederates, the Pope as Vmpier and Iudge should decide it, without any breaking off, or preiudice to the confederacie, or stoppe to the execution of matters by it established.

These Articles (as hath beene said) beeing sworne to and signed by the Ambassadors, were within foure moneths after, as the same Princes had decreed, read, and ratified a new. But because the Confederates were not tyed to obserue all that is aboue mentioned, till the year following, it was agreed vpon in another writing, that the same year in the moneth of May, foure score Gallies, and twenty ships of warre, should meete at Ottoranto to ioine with the Venetian fleet, not comprehending in that number those of the Pope, Duke of Sauoy, and Knights of Malra.

During these treaties of peace and league, the Venetians with a generall consent, made speedy prouisions for warre: they had not forgotten the affaires of Cyprus, and especially the conseruation of Famagosta, on which depended the hope of all fortunate successe. Marc Antonio Quirini beeing chosen for this purpose, departed from Candy with foure ships to carry supplies thither, for whose conuoy twelue galleys were appointed. Hee beeing come neere to Famagosta, caused his ships to saile some-what before in the enemies view which were in Constantia, himselfe keeping toward the land: So soone as the enemies descryed these shippes, they sent forth seauen Gallies to inuest them, which beeing perceived by Quirini, hee suddainly aduanced with his Gallies, to get betwixt them and home.

But the Turkes, hauing discovered the Venetians galleys, and altering their purpose from offending others to saue themselves, did speedily make to the shore from whence they came, so that they had time by help of those of the campe, who in great troops came to their aid, to escape to land, & forsaking their galleys, some Don Iohn de Austria General of the Army.

Some particular treaties.

Supplies sent to Famagosta.

Flight of the enemies Gallies.

of them were sunke by Quirini's ordnance, who perceiuing some signes of a future tempest gaue speedy commandement that the ships should bee rowed into the Hauen, that he might safely land his supplies consisting of fixteene hundred foot, with great store of munition & victuals, which did much incourage those of the city, who infinitely commended his care and diligence; and whilest hee remained there, hee tooke a ship of the enemies and some other smaller vessels laden with munitions and victuals which were going to the Turkish army, and hauing intelligence that the Turkes had builded certaine fortes at the Rocks of Gambella, he sailed thither with his Gallies, and on a sodaine razed them.

These things beeing fortunately performed, Quirini supposing his longer stay there to bee to small purpose did on the sixteenth day of February 1571. arrive with his Gallies in Candy. The Senate beeing very carefull to prouide for Famagosta, sent two other ships thither with eight hundred footmen and great store of munition, vnder the command of Honoreo Scato, with letters to the inhabitants full of hearty affection, highly commending their constant loyalty, intreating them still to persist in their owne defence and by no means to rely vpon the word or promise of those Barbarous infidels: The like letters in effect were written to Buillone, wherein his valour was much commended, as worthy of his Ancestors, and the loue which himselfe and predecessors had euery borne to the Common-wealth, promising highly to recompence him.

When these last supplies arrived at Famagosta, they made vp the whole number of foure thousand Italian footmen, eight hundred of the Islanders which are termed Legionaries, and three thousand Citizens and country people, with two hundred Albanefes.

At the same time the rebellion of the Albanefes against the Turkes did still continue, diuers of the countries of Ducagina, Pedana, Ematia and Sadrina, comming dayly to make sundry offers to the Agents of the Common-wealth, wherevpon, the Proudard Celsi was commanded to saile to Catharra with tenne Gallies, but Celsi falling sicke by the way, Nicolo Suriano, who was Lieutenant of the Gulphe, was commanded to take that charge vpon him, and with foure Gallies to enter into the Riuer Boyan to backe the rebellion of that people, and carefully to obserue whether he could with good successe make any attempt vpon Durazzo, Scatar, or Alexia which the chiefe of the Albanefes had propounded. Suriano hauing continued certaine daies in those confines, perceiued very well that the deeds were not answerable to their words, and that it was in vaine to make any attempt vpon the enemies territories without sufficient forces for that purpose: the Senate neuertheless beeing vnwilling to omit any thing which it knew might auail the Common wealth, chose Giacomo Malatesta for Gouvernor Generall in Albania, who comming to Catharra was desirous to make incursions into the enemies country, where hauing taken a great booty, and heedlessly returning homewards through a valley, hee was assailed by the enemies, and beeing wounded in the thigh, and beaten from his horse was taken prisoner and carried to Rissana.

In regard of the great expences which the Venetians were to furnish, which would monthly amount to three hundred thousand Ducats, the Senate sought by all means to raise money; wherevpon it againe encreased the number of the Procurators of Saint Marke, they likewise fold the pastures and void grounds, and the pawnes and pledges of La Zecca were opened vpon sundry conditions. Prince Moceniga in that and all other matters shewed himselfe very carefull and vigilant to make speedy prouisions of all necessities; and being present on a time in the great councill, whither all Gentlemen that haue voyces in the creation of Magistrats doe usually come, he made a briefe but important speech, exhorting all of them to bee willing to releue their deereft country in that time of need and warre, either with money, aduise, or any other thing which it might want,

euery

The Venetians raise the forts at Gambella.

More aide sent to Famagosta.

The number of soldiers in Famagosta.

The Albanefes rebel against the Turkes.

Prince Moceniga his remonstrance to the great councill.

every man according to his power and meanes, saying that they could neuer doe it in a time more convenient, and thereby should not onely preserve their wealth, but their honor, children and liues, all which would be expoid to great danger if the insolent enemy should prooue victorious.

His words being pronounced with much earnestnesse did greatly moue those of the assembly, and encouraged them boldly to continue that warre, with hope of better successe, whereupon, whatsoeuer was requisite for the furnishing of the Nauy, or for prouision of victuals, and money, which is the strongest sinew of warre, was presently determined and concluded.

Whilest the Venetians were thus busied in their preparations, the Turkes on the other side raised new forces to pursue the course of their victory. Selim had receiued such content for the taking of Nicotia, the newes whereof was brought to him by Mustapha sonne, together with many rich presents, as hee was desirous all other things laied aside to intend onely the ending of that enterprise, notwithstanding the great report which was made of the Christian fleet, the which after the conquest of Cyprus he promised to him selfe to defeat, and then presently to become Lord of all the Islands belonging to the Venetians, most commodious (as he said) to open a passage to the city of Rome, chiefe of the Romaine Empire and belonging to him as to the greatest Emperor, and of a long time promised by their Prophets to the Ottoman family.

Selim ruminating on these vaine and idle thoughts commanded his fleet, that so soone as Cyprus should be furnished with sufficient supplies, then to fight with that of the Christians, and afterwards pursue other enterprises as occasion should be offered. And according to his owne proiects hee sent twenty Gallies from Constantinople vnder the command of Casatebey, who by the way meeting with the Gallies of Chios and Rhodes, sailed altogether towards Cyprus, to keepe out all reliefe from Famagosta. After his departure from Constantinople thirty other Gallies came to him, and being come to Finica to leaue souldiers, he went from thence into Cyprus, where making some aboade, hee sent his Gallies in the meane time to Tripoli, to take in new supplies and munitions: then his Nauy being furnished with all necessaries he left Cyprus, leauing Armat there with twenty Gallies, tenne Mohannes or flat bottomed boates to transport horse, fise ships, with many other vessels for the guard of the Island, himselfe taking foure and fifty Gallies with him, and went to meet Portan, newly made a Basha in Pial's stead, who being come from Constantinople, and by the way ioyning the Gallies of Naples in Romagna and Misteline with his forces, was with an hundred Gallies at Castel rosso, the Rendezuous of the whole fleet, whither within a while after Pluzzili came from Argiers with twenty of his owne Gallies, and diuers other vessels belonging to Pirates, and not long after, Hassan sonne to Barbarossa came thither likewise with twenty Gallies.

The whole Turkish fleet being in this sort vnited, to the number of two hundred and fifty saile, went directly to the Isle of Candy and entred into the Haven of Suda, and sayling afterwards towards Cania, it landed great troupes of souldiers neere to the city, who presently falling to booty, did pural to fire and sword. Against these the Prouidator of Cania sent great numbers of souldiers of the cities Garrison with diuers of Quirins Gallies which were then in the Haven, who enforced the enemies to retire, and our men being presently backt by three hundred Corficans, conducted by Colonel Iustinian, the enemies were put to rout and with great slaughter beaten to their Gallies, not daring to assault the castle. The enemies fleet departing from Candy, where it had done infinite harme, sailed to Ceriga, where it did the like, and from thence went to Lunca, where hauing trimmed their Gallies, they made incursions into the Isles of Zant and Cephalonia, and the inhabitants being retired into the fortes, all the villages and country houses were burned, and the whole country wasted.

The

The Turke being not satisfied with setting forth a fleet, had likewise raised a land army, vnder the command of Achmat Basha, determining to enuade the Venetians both by sea and land, in regard the treaty of peace was wholly broken off, and no hope of agreement left. For so soone as Ragasson came to Constantinople, the Turkes hoping by accord to obtaine that which they could hardly get by armes, he was together with the Bailly brought before Mahomet the Visier Basha, who beganne highly to extoll the power of the Ottoman Empire, and to relate the great Lords designs against the States of the Venetian Common-wealth, who resolved to enuade them by sea and land; That Selims intent was to propound peace on very hard conditions, neuertheless hee would find means to moderate that great seuerity, provided likewise that they would consent to what hee should tell them, which in effect was, that the Bailly should perswade the Senate freely to surrender to Selim the entire possession of Cyprus, as a State iustly belonging to the Ottoman Empire.

The Bailly perceiuing thereby that the treaty of peace could not bee continued to the honour of the Common-wealth, aduised Ragasson to leaue Constantinople (which hee did) the other businessse concerning merchants remayning likewise imperfect, which once was concluded, but presently reuoked, by reason of some false reportes brought from Syria and Alexandria, so that Ragassons iourney was altogether vaine.

Basha is Mahomet the Visier is the Chief of the Senate.

The end of the ninth Booke of the sixth Decade.

The

The number of the Turkish fleet.

The Turkes are put to rout in Candy.

The Turkes waste the Islands of Zant and Cephalonia.

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the sixth Decade.

TH E Spaniards absolutely tell the Pope and Venetians that they will not ioyne their forces till Don Iohn's arrival. The great progression of the Turkish fleet. The league is concluded at Rome and published at Venice. The Turkes take Dulcigna and Antivary. The Venetians great preparations so soone as they heard that the Turkes were come into their Gulphe. The enemies come before Mandracchia, with their base retreat. The Pope soliciteth Christian Princes to enter into the league. The arrivall of Don Iohn and the Spanish forces. The Turkish army before Famagosta. Marc-Antonio Bragadino Gouvernor of Famagosta. The enemies at one time batter the city in five severall places. The besieged make a counter-battery. The Turkes give many fierce assaults to the city. The citizens by reason of extreme want are enforced to yeeld upon composition. Mustapha his perfidious cruelty; His impiety against the dead. The union of the Christian fleet, with the number of the vessels. The Christian fleet resolueth to fight with the Turkes. The famous battaile of Lepanto, where the Turkish fleet is defeated and put to rout. The number of the dead on both sides, with the number of the enemies vessels that were taken. The great ioy at Venice for newes of the victory. Don Iohn retireth to Messina. The Venetians take the fort of Marguerites. The Christians enterprize upon Saint Maor is bootles. And lastly Marc-Antonio Colonna his magnificent entry at Rome.

The

The tenth Booke of the sixth Decade
of the History of Venice.

TH E Confederates nauall army which should haue met at Otranto in May, there to haue ioyned altogether, came not thither at the latter end of Iune, neither was there any tidings of it. The conclusion of the league hanging in suspense, and the Venetians fearing that they should not bee strong enough of themselves, to incounter and repulse the enemies fleet, which was reported to bee farre greater then those of the former yeere, determined to set forth threescore Gallies of the best in all the fleet at Candy, to employ them for the releefe of Cyprus, or other places as need should bee, to hinder the enemies navigation vpon those seas, and to cut off the rereward of the Turkish Gallies which should lagge behind the fleet, and in a word to take hold on all occasions which time should offer. Such was the State of the Venetian fleet for that time, the greatest part whereof remainyng at Corfou, did daily expect the arrivall of the Spanish Armada.

The Pope and Venetians made earnest request that the Gallies of Naples and Sicily which were ready might goe to Otranto, but the Spaniards would not heare of it, resolving to tarry for Don Iohn's arrivall. The Turkes on the other side hauing intelligence that the forces of the Christian Princes were not yet vnited, departing from Candy did boldly saile forwards, the great Lord hauing commanded them to seeke out the Christian fleet and fight with it, and in the meane time to waste all places by the way belonging to the Venetian State. The Generall Venetian hauing intelligence of the enemies course and designs, and knowing that nothing could hinder them from passing forward, resolved to saile with the fleet to Messina, fearing (as it was very likely) that if the enemies fleet should come neerer to Corfou, his owne Gallies would bee exposed to sundry perils and dangers, and if the Turkes should come and lie betwixt the Pana and the Merlieres, hee likewise feared that they would hinder the vnying of the Confederates forces.

Whilest these determinations were made abroad the league on the second day of Iuly was with great solemnity and concourse of people published at Venice, after the celebration of Masse in Saint Markes Church by Don Guzman de Silva Ambassador for the Catholike King, in the presence of the Duke, Senate, Princes Ambassadors, and great numbers of Prelats, who together with the whole Clergy going afterwards through the city in Precession, came into the great Market-place which was richly hung with tapistry and other costly ornaments, whither so soone as the Prince came to the vsuall place where proclamations are made to the people, the league was by an Herald published with great silence, which being done, the ordinance were shot off, drummes beaten, and trumpets sounded to the great ioy and content of all the people.

The Venetians expect the Confederates fleet.

What moved the Generall Venetian to saile to Messina.

The league is published at Venice.

The

The Pope subdueth the King of Portugall to enter into the league.

The league being in this sort published, they hastened the preparations already begunne, and solicited other Princes to enter into it, that they might the better encrease their forces. Whereupon the Pope determined for that purpose to send his Nephew the Cardinall Alexandrine into Portugall, supposing that the forces and territories of that King would bee fit to afford aide and reparation to the league, hee being Lord of many armed vessels, and his countries of the Indies confying upon the Turkish Empire: in respect whereof the Senate likewise resolved that Antonio Tepulo then Ambassadour in Spaine should to the same end goe to the King of Portugall to bee there in the name of the Common-wealth at such time as the Popes Legat should treat of that business.

The Venetians will not heare of peace.

The Venetians, the league being thus concluded, were so bent to warre, vpon hope to encrease their forces by the assistance of other Princes, as they would not harken to any discourse of peace: for the most Christian King having dispatched the Bishop of Aix to Constantinople, chiefly to negotiate some accord, and hee comming to Venice acquainted them with the zeale and affection of his King towards the good and profit of the Common-wealth, together with his Commission to procure peace betwixt the Turkes and them; The Senate thanked him, and without giuing farther care to his propositions called in the Confederates Ambassadours that they might heare his message; this they did to take away all ieaousy and suspicion, and to animate them to warlike preparations like themselves.

The Turkes
come before Dulcigna.

The Turkish fleet in the meane time came still forward into the Venetian Gulphe, none daring to oppose it: on the other side the Sangiacs of Scopo, Durazzo and Ducagina, taking five thousand men, tenne cannons and many other lesse peeces with them, came neere to Dulcigna, hauing enforced the country people to quit the straight passages which they guarded, wherevpon the inhabitants resolved to abandon the city and to retire to Catharra: but Nicolo Surianna, and Sciara Martinenga comming with new forces, did confirme and encourage them to defend their city, although it were not strong either by art or nature.

Dulcigna yeeldeth to the Turkes in composition, wherewith badly satisfied.

The enemy being encamped before it, after that hee had made a battery and a reasonable breach, the Ianissaries prepared for the assault, wherevpon Martinenga being out of all hope to hold out long without fresh supplies did speedily send for the French men which hee had brought thither, with whom for a time they valliantly defended it: but the enemies fleet approaching, and Surianna in that respect being with his Gallies enforced for to quit those seas, all the inhabitants and souldiers being affrighted, and wholly despayring to hold the towne any longer, craved a parley, the battery hauing continued for the space of twelve daies, and the accord was made with the Bassa to depart with their liues and goods, with promise to giue them foure ships, to transport those to Ragusa that were willing to depart, and good entertainment to such as would still remaine there, and that the souldiers might depart with their armes and ensignes.

The city was deliuered to the Turkes, though that the conditions were afterwards badly obserued, because that since then, some contention either true or feigned arising therevpon betwixt Pertau and Achmas Bassas who were come to that seege, they tooke occasion to deale cruelly with those poore wretches, who relying on their word had submitted to them, for they caused all the inhabitants in a manner to bee imprisoned, and did put diuers valliant Albanese souldiers to the sword, that were come thither to defend the city: onely they kept their word with the Governour, Martinenga, and some few other of the chieffest, who were safely conducted to Ragusa.

Dulcigna

Dulcigna being taken, the enemies fleet sailed towards Antiuari, where the inhabitants were much daunted with their neighbours misfortune, though they feared not the fleet, the City being foure miles from sea. The Governour hauing intelligence of the enemies approach, did without waiting for their comming, send the Cities keyes to the Bassa by some of the principall townsmen, in regarde whereof hee was afterwards by the Senate condemned to perpetual banishment.

In the meane time, newes being brought to Venice, how that the enemies with a mighty fleet were come into their Gulphe, the whole City was much terrified, especially when it vnderstood, how that in all places where they came, they left terrible scarres behind them, the Venetians presently began to fortifie all passages, and especially the Porte of Saint Nicholas on the shoare, opposite to which is a very strong Castle builded, and well stored with ordnance, the defence whereof was committed to Lodouico Grimani, with certaine foote companies, and furnished with expert Gunners: they afterwards gaue Vincento Morosini, one of the chiefe Senators charge of all the Fortifications along the shore, with six other Gentlemen of the order of Senators to assist him, namely Daniele Venier, Marco Iustumiano, Ieronimo Contarini, Francesco Michaele, Lorenzo Soranzo, and Andrea Bernardo.

These men caused a mighty Iron chaine to bee drawne from the aforesaid Castle to the opposite shore, the which embarrad the whole Channell, and behinde it they placed three great Gallies, and a certaine number of light ones, which were well stored with Ordnance. All other passages were likewise assured: they did moreouer place sundry corps de Guard in diuerse places of the city, and in a word omitted nothing which was necessary for the preservation and defence thereof.

But it was knowne within a while after, that all these speedie preparations were altogether vnecessary: For Vluccali, Admirall of that fleet, after that hee had wasted, (as hath beene sayd) the Isles of Lisena, and Curioles, went back againe to ioyne with the Bassa, who with the residue of the fleet, lay at the mouth of the Channell of Catharra, where making some aboade, hee summoned the Castle to yeeld, and yet made none attempt vpon it; because peradventure hee was vnwilling to performe any great enterprise, or else feared the vnion of the Christian fleets.

Wherevpon hee departed thence, and sailed to la Valona, where hauing reinforced his Armie with diuerse troopes, brought to him by the Sangiac of Bosina, and sent forth certaine Gallies, truly to discouer the estate of the Confederate nauall Armie, hee bent his course towards Corfou; and comming to Paxu, hee sent first to view Mandracchia, and the Gallies going vnto Butintro, the Captaines coasted vnder and downe the Island, and heedfully obseruing the situation thereof, could not agree vpon that which they would haue done.

In the meane time, diuerse souldiers which were in the Fusts going on shore to get pillage, fell into an Ambuscado of certaine troopes of horse belonging to the garrison of the City vnder the command of Captaine George Mormori, by whom all the enemies were eyther slaine or taken, and among others Cassan, surnamed Bassa, a Renegado of Candy, a man very famous, not so much for his experience in marine matters, as for his notable cruetie.

In the end, the whole fleet drew neere to the Island, and yet as they passed along many Cannon shot were bestowed among them, which did no great harme thorow the fault and small experience of the Gunners. And comming to Potama, great numbers of soldiers were landed, who assaulted the towne, our men who

M m m m m had

The enemies fleet retireth forth of the Gulph of Vea-
nice.

The Christians
surprinsome of the enemies by ambuscade.

The Turkes
come by late MADRACIA

had seized on the passages of the mountaines being to weak to hinder their passage, Phillippo Rancone with foure hundred footmen garded the Towne, part of his forces were Greekes and the rest Italians, who perceiuing the enemies great numbers, beganne to retire towards the plaine, where finding other supplies sent from the Caille, he made a stand, and caused the Turkes that followed him to doe the like:

But the day following, greater numbers being landed, together with sixe hundred horse which they had taken in at Butrinto, they gaue an assault to the Caille Saint Angelo, and finding it to be a farre difficulter enterprize then they had imagined, gaue it ouer: but being desirous before their departure to leaue some token of their barbarous cruelty behind them, they burnt many Country houses, and diuers Churches, ruining the Villages and Vineyards nere to the City, and the third day after they departed from the Island.

The Venetians did with great griefe endure all these miseries and calamities, still trusting to the aid of the league, and yet they receiued not thereby the profit and commodity which they had hoped for, for which their great losse they had altered their former designs, and in a manner engaged their forces: because that a decree being made that the Gallies of Candy should faile towards Messina, there to ioyne with those Confederates, they were doubtfull of the successe of Famagosta, hauing receiued no newes whether it had been releued or not: and for that on the other side their Generall, by waiting for Don Johns arrivall, was an idle Spectator of all those wronges and outrages which the enemies had done vnto them and yet durst not see foreward to take reuenge.

The Venetians
complaints to
the Pope.

Therefore they resolu'd to shew vnto the Pope, how that by his meanes they had entred into that warre, and had refused all meanes of Agreement, therein to obey the authority of the Sea Apostolick, and not to seeme likewise to distrust other Christian Princes, that they for their partes had not withstanding all expenses and dangers provided what fouer was necessary for the vnion; and, they did not see that the Confederates effects were correspondent to their diligence and industry: so as that league which had bene made for the honour and glory of Christendome, did more dishonour them, and in particular did great harme to their Common-wealth, by reason of the losse of Famagosta, which yndoubtedly would shortly ensue, except it were speedily releued.

Their complaints being propounded to the Pope who found them very iust and reasonable, he speedily dispatche a Post to Don John, writing by him to his Nephew the Cardinall Alexandrine, who was in Spayne, earnestly to pursue that businesse according to his former instructions.

The King of Spaines answer to the Cardinall Alexandrine.

The Legat Alexandrine was honorably entertained by the Catholick King, who in smooth termes acquainted them with his earnest desire therein to satisfie the Pope, hauing determined for that purpose, that Don John with the Spanish Gallies should goe and spend the winter in Sicily, thereby to bee readier to execute that which should bee concluded at Rome. And although hee had often by letters in former time exhorted the Emperor to enter into that vnion, hee would expresse neuer the lesse send Don Pedro Faffarda to him, to entreat him from him to condescend thereto.

The Emperor
is doubtfull.

Hee being come to the Emperors Court found him very doubtfull: for hee receiued many messages and letters from the Bascha of Buda who exhorted him to obferue the peace, promising him faire and Kingly neighborhood and freindship: on the other side hee had Intelligence of the Turkes warlike preparations, who remaining till then at Scopia held all men in suspense to what place hee determined to bend his course: in the end hee resolu'd to send the accustomed tribute to Constantinople, being assured that it could in no sort hinder the league league, nor keepe him selfe from entering into it, when time should serue, whereas on the contrary, by delaying it any longer he might receiue some great losse, because that Selim doubting his loue and good meaning, might assaile him on a sodaine.

The Emperors
resolution.

These things did greatly trouble the Venetians, who knew very wel that peace with the Turkes, in the warlike and mighty Northerne Prouinces, would greatly prejudice the league, and precipitate the state of the Common-wealth into greater danger: in regard whereof the Pope and the Catholike Kings Agents, propounded to the Emperor, that they would giue him out of the Confederate forces, twenty thousand foote, and foure thousand horse, to enuade the enemies on that side, and that the other thirty thousand which remayned (according to the treaty of the league) would suffice for the execution of their Sea actions.

The Emperors Ambassador resident at Rome, had oftentimes assured them, that the Emperor wanted no good will to warre on the Turke, but meanes; and therefore if the Confederate Princes would promise him aide, he would without all doubt enter into the league; and that all Germany being at last prouoked by necessity and shame, would ioyne in that warre and by their example, Poland and Muscouy would doe the like.

The leagues offer for to the Emperor.

Neuer the lesse, all these offers were vaine and to no purpose, because that the Emperor making many excuses, continued his former resolution to send the tribute to Constantinople. In the meane time the Gallies of the Pope, Venetians, Florentines and Malteses met at Messina, where with great earnestnesse they waited for the arrivall of Don John, who departing from Cathalogia with seauen and twenty Gallies and five thousand Spanish foote-men, did at last arrive on the last day of Iuly at Genoa, where making short stay, leauing Doria with twelue Gallies, to make provisions for the fleet, him selfe went to Naples, where hee was entertayned with great magnificence, and receiued the standard of Generall for the league which the Pope sent him: and within a while after leauing thirty Gallies to conuoy the shippes, hee went with the residue of the fleet to Messina, where he knew that the Generalls of the Pope and Venetians expected him.

Hee was accompanied by many great Lords of Spaine, namely by Don Bernardin de Requesens great commendador of Castill, Don Auares de Bassam Marquis of Santa Cruz, Don Iuan de Cardona, Earle of Piega, Antonio Doria, Carlo d'Angulo Duke of Sessa, Ferranti Loffra, and the Marquis of Treuic, who for Nobility, and the Kings fauour, were very famous: These were of Don Johns Council for warre.

The arrivall of Don John with the Spanish
fleet.

Now so soone as Don John arrived at Genoa hee dispatche Micacle de Montca de the Kings councillor to Venice, to acquaint them with his coming and to gratifie the Senate for the good opinion it had conceived of him, and to promise that he would in such sort manage all matters, as they should not bee deceived in him: being very desirous speedily to execute some notable enterprize vpon the enemies.

The offer of Don John to
the Venetians.

These newes, pleasing to all men, did awaken their former hope. The Turke then departing with his whole fleet (as hath bene said) from Corfou returned to Butrinto, where remayning for a time to receaue some intelligence of the Christian fleet, and a new commission from Constantinople, hee went afterwards to Preueze, where the Bascha receiued certayne newes of the taking of Famagosta, and a particular commission to goe and seeke the Christian fleet to fight with it.

The Turkes after the taking of Nicosia had deferred the siege of Famagosta, by reason

M m m m m

reason of winter and other discommodities, vnfitting for a seage: but so soone as it drew neere towards the spring, they speedily provided all necessaries for it, as ordnance, munition, and other war-like engins, which were sent to them from Syria and Caramania: fifty thousand Turkes came thither like-wile, many of whom took no pay, but onely serued in hope of booty, the Baicha hauing craftely giuen forth, that the spoyle of Famagosta would be farre richer then that of Nicolia.

The enemies army being thus provided, and strengthened, did about the middest of Aprill approach the city, hauing brought fiftene peeces of battery from Nicolia, and making great trenches, one part of the army encamped in the gardens, and the other at Percipola: Then on the five and twentieth of the said moneth they made platformes whereon to plant the ordnance, with deepe and broad trenches for the Harquebusers, so close together as it was impossible to anoy them, hauing ordinarily (but especially in the night) forty thousand pioners at worke.

The enemies intent being discovered, they of the towne began to rampier vp all places which they thought the enemy would batter: there was euer a strong gard on the way couered with the counter-scarpe, for the better defence thereof, and they raised new flankers; they did after wards on that side of the wall which was battered make a trench twelve foote in depth, and breadth, with small loope-holes for the Harquebusers, from thence to defend the counter-scarpe.

Marke Antonio Bragadino was Governour of the City, who together with Astor Baillone did carefully provide what-so-euer was necessary without any confusion at all, being a man that well knew what did belong to his place. Antonio Bragadino lay in the Castell raising new flankers to defend that side of the Arsenall. The Knight Gorta was Maister of the ordnance, who being slaine in a skirmish, the Governour gaue his company to Neslor Martinenga. Moreouer, three Captaines were appointed, to take charge of the fire-works, each of them hauing twenty soldiers vnder his command, chosen out of all the companies, to bestow those fiers when neede should be, all the ordnance was brought to those places where they expected the battery.

Besides, they made diuers sallies to molest those abroad, and to hinder their works. At the last they cleared the city of all vnprofitable eaters, which were in number eight thousand persons, who retired into the villages, the Turks doing them no harme: The rest of the people being numbred amounted to the summe of seauen thousand seruicable men, namely three thousand five hundred Italian foot, and the rest Greekes.

Bragadino dayly perceiuing the dangers to encrease by reason of the enemies approaches, exhorted and encouraged his soldiors, telling them that the time was now come to manifest their singular valour and generous courage by brauely defending that City, so farre remote from other parts of Christendome, against the power of the Ottoman Empire, in so iust a quarrell as theirs was, and to cast away all feare, hoping onely that God, who is the giuer of victories, would giue them good and fortunate successe.

This speech caused every man to encourage his fellow cheerefully to entertaine labour and danger. Three hundred of the beleeged with sword and target, accompanied with as many Italian Harquebusers made a salley, who at first did put the enemies to flight, but at last were so roughly charged, as in their retreat they lost thirty of their men, where-vpon it was concluded to make noe more sallies.

The enemies being by little and little come to the toppe of the counter-scarpe, and hauing ended their fortes which were tenne in number, beganne the battery with three score and foure cannons, among the which were foure

The enemies
army before Famagosta.

The care of those within the City for their fortifications.

The number of seruicable men in the city

Bragadino exhortations to his soldiors.

The enemy's make five batteries at one time.

foure Basiliscos of an exceeding bignesse did beat the Gate Lemissa, cuen to the Arsenall.

They beganne to batter it in five severall places at once, the one at the Tower of the Arsenall on which five Canon from the fort of the Rock continually plaid, the other against the curtaine without the Arsenall which was battered by eleuen peices; the third was out of another Fort with eleuen Cannons vpon the Tower of Andrazzi, and two Cavaliers above it: the fourth plaid vpon S. Napes great Tower with the foure Basilisks; and the last was against the Gate Lemissa battered from six fortes with three and thirty Cannons, where the Generall Mastapha was in person. At first they began rather to batter the fortifications of the Citties Ordinance, then to ruine the walls, by reason that it did much anoy them; where-vpon the beleeged, so soone as the enemy had begunne the Battery, quartered themselves vnder the wall where they continued till the end: Brigadino kept the tower Andrazzi, Baillone that of St. Nape, and Tepulo that of Campo-santo, that they might be present at every action, to reward the valliant and rebuke cowards. The charge of the Ordinance was committed to Lodovico Martinenga, and six other Captaines were appointed vnder him to command the Canoniers and to furnish them with what they wanted.

Captaine Francesco Begone commanded the Tower of the great Cavalier of the Arsenall: Pietro el Conte lay at the Courraine of the Cavalier Del Volto, and at the Tower of Campo-santo, Neslor Martinenga had charge of the Cavalier of Campo-santo, of that of Andrazzi and of the Curtaine as farre at Saint Napes tower, together with that Curtaine which lieth neere the Gate Lemissa: Horatio Valazari had the guard of the Ravelin & Curtaine towards the Bulwark, Robert Malucuzzi commanded the Cavalier of Lemissa which was more anoyed then all the rest.

Besides, so soone as the battery beganne, Brigadino commanded wine, cheefe, and powdered flesh to be carryed to the Italian and Greeke soldiors and Gunnors vpon the walls, so as the soldiors spent but two Venetian soules a day in bread, and were payed every thirty dayes. The beleeged did for tenne daies space make so furious a counter-battery, as they made fiftene of the enemies peices of Ordinance vnseruicable, and slew thirty thousand of their men, so that they were not safe in their forts: but the beleeged foreseeing the want of powder were enforced to limit, how many shottes a day every peece should make, namely thirty, which must bee made in the Captaines presence, for feare of shooting in vaine.

The Famagostans being thus carefull a Fregate arrived from Candy on the 29. day of May, which encouraged and told them that they should speedily be releued. The enemies in the meane time hauing by force and great slaughter of their men wonne the Counter-scarpe, did beginne to digge downe the earth neere to the wall of the Counter-scarpe, which the beleeged did day and night carry in: the enemies perceiuing it, made certaine loope-holes from which to beat them in flank, to hinder their works, (which tooke effect) wherein they afterwards threw so much earth as it filled vp the Dike; then hauing perced through the Counter-scarpe, they made a passage through the Dike euen to the wall, which they fortified with wooll sacks and fagots: so as they could not be anoyed but from above, and that sildome.

The enemies being come so neere the walls began in sundry places to vndermine, where-vpon the beleeged make countermines the charge where-of was committed to the Knight Maggio, they threw fire-works vpon the enemies, which did greatly anoy them; some of these mines did no good, the rest tooke effect, as that at the Tower of the Arsenall, which with great noyse brake the wall which was of a wonderfull thicknesse, and threw more then the one halfe of it to the ground, carrying with it part of the Parapet.

This breach caused great numbers of Turkes with their Ensignes to mount

The diligent care of the Captaines of the City

Every Captaines charge.

The beleeged make a counter battery.

They want powder.

The Tower of the Arsenall is shott downe by a mine.

M m m m m 3

mount it. Pietro el Conte with his company had the gard there, who did brauely at first sustaine their assaults, whither other Capitaines with their companies coming to second him; the Turkes were roughly repulsed; the assault hauing continued aboute fure howers.

The enemies were repulsed from the breach.

The beleeged in this action lost aboute an hundred and three-score men; and many were wounded there. Marco Cruellatore and the Knight Maggio did afterwards in all parts, where they perceaued mines to be made, make places of refuge well flanked with barrells full of moist earth, and ladders full of straw, the Greekes for that purpose bringing willingly what-so-euer they wanted, for the speedy reparation of the Parapets, ruined by the enemies artillery, which plaid vpon them day and night without intermission.

These reparations were to very great purpose because that the shot lighting on no solide substance did no other harme then carry away with it some of those sakes, and others being presently put in their place, the breach was still stoppt vp. The enemies, pursuing their former designs, gaue fire to the mine of the rauling of the Rocks, which made a very great breach; where vpon, they presently gaue a furious assault, Mustapha looking vpon and encouraging them. Count Hercules Martinenga and his company did brauely withstand them, till the other Capitaines came thither, and then the enemies were repulsed with great losse: the like happened at the Arsenall, where after an assault, which lasted sixe howers, the Turkes, to their great shame, were enforced to retire: the Bishop of Limissawith the crosse in his hand, came to the assault to encourage his countrymens the like did many valiant Ladies, bringing armes, stones, and scalding water to the soldiers.

The Turkes in the presence of the Generall
Mustapha, gaue a furious assault and were repulsed.

The enemies being by these meanes, and by the singular valour of the beleeged, so often repulsed, and out of hope that way to take the City, began to build other forts neerer to it, from whence they might with more ease beate downe the defendants fortifications and safe places of retreat, and taken from themselves all impediment: and hauing to this end built seauen forts, they planted great store of ordnance in them, from whence they continually shot, keeping them still in alarm and made shew (especially in the night) as if they would giue an assault, whereby the beleeged had not a moments ease, nor any meanes to rest, but onely to the heat of the day.

The great labour and trouble of the beleeged.

The Turkes at last perceiving that breaches of the mines were not sufficient to open their passage, fell to vndermining the walls, so as they reduced the Raulin to so small a space, as the beleeged were enforced to giue themselves scope with boords and other matter. Then the Knight Maggio perceiving that of necessity they were to abandon the Raulin, being no longer able to keepe it, hee made a mine there, that he might quit it to the enemies great losse.

An assault gi-uen in foure seuerall places
at one time.

Mustapha perceiving that the wall might bee mounted in sundry places, resolved at one time to giue an assault in foure seuerall places, namely at the Raulin at Saint Napes tower, at that of Andruzzi, and at the Curtaine and tower of the Arsenall; in all which they fought continually for sixe howres space, in three of which the enemies were brauely repulsed, but the fourth, which was the Raulin, was of set purpose forsaken, to the great hurt both of the Turkes and Christians. For, it being assaulted those within it being not able with their armes to stirre vp and downe, by reason of the small roomes, and going about to retire as it had bin already determined, the enemies mingled them selves among them, where vpon, fire being giuen to the mine, it blew vp a thousand of the enemies; and two hundred Christians. Mustapha him selfe was present at euery assault, where he encouraged his soldiers, rebuked some, and promised rewards to others according to their deserts. The Raulin being lost there was no more betwixt the assailants and the beleeged then the thickenesse of the places of retreat, made (as hath bene said) with runs and sacks full of earth, and straw, so that those of the campe, and the cities

cities soldiers, did often times take together according to the manner of war, the Turkes flourishing and bragging, and the Christians deciding their vanity, and amidst their selfe the enemies brought from Christian slaues they had in their Camp to propound to them some particular agreement, as they had already oftentimes done by letters to the Gouvernour and propley to arrows, which were neuer answered nor any consent giuent to come to parley.

The Turkes perceiving that their cunning tricks were to no purpose, did againe turne to force, and came to a new assault by means of the Raulin which they had already wonne, where on both sides was a braue fight, but most of all to the honour and reputation of the beleeged, for, valourous and brave Raisone the colour of being more courageous in deedes then words, encouraging his Soldiers in the form of ranks, did himselfe take from a Turkish Enleigne-bearer, an Enleigne wherein the Armes of the Venetian Common wealth was painted, which they had wonne at the taking of Nicolia, and Lodouico Martinenga on the other side, who had the guard of that quarters, oftentimes refreshing his men in the fight, putting new in their stead that were hurt or tired, still exhorting them to doe worthily, did that day purchase the fame and reputation of a discrete and valiant Captaine.

This attempt of the enemies, hauing no good successe, they invented another way, yet vnpractised, they did cast a great heape of wood called Leglia which is very apt to burne, against the gate of the Raulin with store of pitch, tapers, which they set on fire, it burnt so fiercely as it was impossible to quench it, this fire lasted five dayes, by means whereof the beleeged were enforced to retire farther in by means of the great heat and smoke.

Another inu-ention of the enemies to take
the City.

Notwithstanding all these discomforts, labours and troubles, these valiant men did still continue the defense of their Citie, determining to hold out euen to the last Man: but all things failing, fauing hope and courage, and all manner of victuals being very scarce, they hauing already eaten asses, horse, dogges, cats and hauing no more bread nor corne to make any, drinking nothing but water, perceiving besides that three other mines were making towards the Caualier of the gate, that of all the Italian soldiers there were only but eight hundred in health, and they so tired and spent with long watching and continuall trauell sustained in fight in the heat of the day, and the most part of the Greekes being slaues, the cheefe of the Citie determined to present a petition to the Gouvernour, wherein relating the want and misery wherevnto they were reduced, they besought him, in regard they had freely exposed their liues and meanes to maintaine the Citie vnder the obedience of the Common wealth, that he would by yeelding on honorable conditions, preserve the honour of their Wiues and Children, which would bee exposed eauen as a Prey vnto the enemies, if they should enter by force.

The cheefe of the beleeged enforced them
to yeeld.

Vpon this Petition of the People, the Magistrates and cheefe Captains consulted what was best to be done, their opinions being very different: for some thought it fit to continue their defense, and to dy with their swords in their hands, rather then to yeeld, or else to fall forth in the night, and on a suddaine to assaile the enemies, and with their blood by dying to reuenge their death: That they could not beleue that the Turkes would oblerue and performe any accord they should make with them, perceiving that necessity had rather induced them therunto then any free motion, that their yeelding would wrong and impair the honour and reputation which till then they had gotten. Others on the contrary said, That it did not becommen them, vnto whom the guard and conseruation of that Citie had bene committed, to shew themselves more cruell towards the inhabitants, then the very Turkes, because that there was nothing more certaine, then that the Capitaines of the Camp did only propound an accord because they would preserve the Citie from being sacked, and so saue the inhabitants liues.

The Capitaine
andry opinion was.

to

knowing that if their soldiers should once enter by force; it would then bee to late to hold them backe: besides, as it was not the part of a valliant man safely to yeeld for feare of death, in like manner to lose his life rashly and vnprofitably, proceeded rather from foolish obduracy then from magnanimity. These reasons with diuers others being alleaged to the same purpose, did after a long consultation preuaile, and they resolu'd to yeeld on honorable composition. In this manner on the first day of August, after sundry treaties it was concluded, by meanes of an Italian ensigne which was prisoner in the campe, that ther should be truce, and vpon giuing of hostages on either side, began to treat of the particularities of accord for the city. Hercules Martinenga and Mattio Celsi, a Cittizen of Famagosta, were giuen in hostage for those of the City, and for the enemies, Mustapha his Lieutenant, and the Lieutenant to the Aga or Captaine of the Janissaries, whome Bailone with certaine horse and two hundred Harquebusiers went to receiue at the gate: our men were like-wise honorably enterstayned by the enemies, Mustapha his Sonne comming forth to meet them, with great numbers of horse and foot, who brought them to his father, who hauing entertained them, bestowed on them two rich gownes imbrodered with gold, and then sent them to lodge in the Aga's Pauillon.

It is a thing to be wondred at that those in the City which had sustained so great labour, misery and calamities, in sted of reioycing for that their troubles would shortly end, were sad and melancholy, as men foreseeing their future wretchednesse. The Commissioners seemed easily to grant what-so-euer was propounded to them, which in effect was, That the soldiers should bee safely conducted into Candy by the Tur ish Vessells, carrying along with them their armes and baggage with fiew peeces of ordnance, and three horse belonging to the three cheefe Commanders: That the inhabitants that were desirous to depart, might doe the like, and those that would tarry behind should haue assurance giuen them to enioy their goods and to liue in their Christian Religion. These Articles were in one day propounded, signed and granted, and counter signed by Mustapha with his owne hand: wherevpon for the execution thereof, forty Vessells of all sorts were on a foddaine sent to the Hauen, where the sicke men began to be embarked, the rest standing vpon their guard to hinder the Turkes from enterprising any matter contrary to the accord, till such time as they were all shipt, the Turkes neuer the lesse dealing curteously with them both in word and deed. Yet so soone as the enemies came into the city, they began to wrong the inhabitants, and to commit violence, wherewith Bragadini hauing acquainted Mustapha, entreated him that for the performance of his owne promise, and obseruation of the articles, he would command the soldiers to cease from farther violence, and to send more ships to embarke the remainder of the Christian soldiers. Nesfor Martinenga was sent on this message to the Bascha, who courteously entertained him, and graunted his demand, seeming to be very desirous to know Bragadini and to conferre with him, as with a valliant and noble Captaine, of whome him-selfe had made tryall.

Bragadini giuing credit to these sugred words, leauing Tepulo in the city, did the ending of the same day, being accompanied with Bailone Martinenga and Quirini, goe to the Bascha's tent, attended on by sundry Capitaines, and Greeke Gentlemen all on horse backe, with some forty Harquebusiers on foote. Bragadini tooke formeost vnder a crimson Vmbrella or Canopie, clothed in purple, wearing his vsuall robe of Magistrate, who being come to the Bascha's Pauillon, left their weapons at the doore, and being entred were curteously enterstayned by Mustapha, who caused them to sit downe, where after they had discoursed on sundry matters, the Bascha dissembling that which hee had already determined in his mind thought it time to put it in execution, and the better to bring it to passe, he craued caution for the vessells he lent them, wherevnto Bragadini hauing

made

made answer, that no such thing was mentioned in the Articles, and that therefore they were not tyed there vnto, and besides, he had no man there with him whome he could leaue behind for that purpose. Mustapha pointing to Quirini, said, let this man be a pledge, Bragadini constantly maintayned the contrary, and told him that he could not iustly detainey any of them: the Bascha waxing impatient, and being no longer able to master his choller, did fiercely thunder many iniurious speeches against them, accusing them that they had during the truce contrary to the law of armes put diuers of his Turkes to death, whome they had taken prisoners, (which was most false) and rising from his state, commanded them all presently to be manacled: then thrusting them forth of his tent, he caused his soldiers to murder Bailone, Martinenga, Quirini and all the rest before Bragadini's face, who was referred to a greater torture, hauing before his death endured many martirdomes: they caused him twice or thrice to offer his necke, as though hee would haue cut off his head, which he most courragiously presented to them, they would not at that time put him to death, but did only cut off his nose and eares.

Count Hercules who had bene sent as an hostage, being like-wise manacled, was hid by Mustapha's Eunuch till his Maisters fury was past, whose slaue he became, after wards. All the Christian soldiers were presently taken and bound, not distrustling any such perfidious cruelty. Those which were already shipt had no better vantage, for being dispoyled of their goods, they were all made Gallie-slaves.

Two daies after, Mustapha entred the City, where he commanded Tepulo to be brought forth of prison whether hee had committed him, and presently to bee hanged at the yards arme of a Gallie: Then causing Bragadini who was wounded and dismembred to be brought before him, hee adored him, though hee were weak and feeble) with two baskets full of earth, the one before, and the other behinde, and willed him to carry them to the breach, making him to kisse the ground as often as hee passed by him: then sending him to the Hauen into a Gallie of Rhodes hee caused him to be bound in a chaire, with a crowne at his feete, and in that manner to be hoisted vp to the maineyard of the Gallie, that hee might bee the better discerned by the slaues and Christian soldiers that were in the Hauen, at the last, the noble Gentleman being brought backe to the cities Market-place, with drums and trumpets in the view of all men, was stript forth of his clothes, and was there most ignominiously laid a long vpon a scaffold, and most cruelly dead a liue, who without any murmuring, taking his martir dome patiently, did onely take the Bascha with his perfidious cruelty and periury, hauing his hart list lifted vp to God, beseeching him to giue him grace to die constantly for his holy faith and religion, and then so soone as the executioners with their bloody kniues were come as farre as his naule, his blessed soule leauing his fraile earthly mansion flew vp to heauen. His skinned was presently stuf with straw, and carried all along the coast of Syria, in his returne towards Constantinople, proudlie and vainely gloriously shewing it to the whole world: the body was cut in foure quarters, and set vp at the foure principall batteries.

It was not certainly knowne why Mustapha vsed such barbarous cruelty: Some said, that hee hauing taken the spoyle from the soldiers which hee had promised, went about to satifis them by the punishment of a few, in reuenge of the great multitude which hee had lost at the seage: others say, that hee being provoked by their obstinate holding out, and for that hee had lost some of his deere friends at that seage, whome hee loued, had sworne to bee reuenged. There bee like-wise which say, that Mustapha was of so cholericke a nature, as being once moued, he would for the time be like a mad man, and that hee was provoked by forme and disdain, when hee saw Bragadini and the rest to come to his Pauillon attended by troupe of soldiers, and in such stately manner, as though hee

had

The beseged resolue to sell on compositionOf Ages giuen on both sides.The articles of the capitulation
etc.Mustapha's signed curtesieBragadini come to Mustapha histories.

had bene a conqueror and not conquered. But this occasion beeing to idle of it selfe to cause him to commit such cruell and barbarous actions is not very credible; for he being moued by his owne wicked and diuillish disposition, did vse like cruelty towards the dead. For comming into the Cathedrall Church of S. Nicholas, he caused the toombs and monuments to be opened, and the bones of the dead to be throwne heere and there, he ouerthrew Altars, and Images, with other brutish and cruell actions, for which his owne soldiers did much condemne him. Hauing in this manner conquered the city, he presently caused the Dikes to be clesed, the forts that were abroad to be razed, the trenches to be filled, and whatsoeuer within the walles had bene ruined to be rampierd vp againe, so as in a short space the City was restored to her former beauty, and made stronger then before.

The Batha hauing left the Bey of Rhodes Gouvernour there departed from Cyprus on the twenty fourth of September, and returned victorious and triumphant to Constantinople where with great ioy he was welcomed by all men, notwithstanding that his victory was bought at a deere rate: for in that warre he lost about fifty thousand men, and among others many excellent Captaines, and great numbers of his best soldiers. But now to returne to the Christian fleet.

The triumvirate Admirals D. Iohn Sebastiano Venieri & Marc Antonio Colonna, meeting after some delay all at Messina in Sicily, after ioyful & mutuall gratulation of their so happy and desired conuention, leauing those Ceremonies, they proceeded to the more essentiall parts of the businesse. They first priuately consulted how to employ those forces to some honorable and comodious end, that the successe of the warre might counterpoize the charge and expectation. This Council consisted of some few of the most select and eminent of the Army, both for authority and iudgement, as principally D. Iohn Generall, Sebastiano Venieri the Venetian Admiral, Marc Antonio Colonna, the Popes Admirall, Bernardino de Requesens Great Comendador of Castile and Lieutenant Generall of the Army, and Augustino Barbarico Prouicator Generall of the Venetian fleet.

The proposition was whether they should seeke to oppresse the enemy by maine battaile, or defend their owne territories, wherein various opinion interchangeably vttered, Bernardino de Requesens, D. Iohns Oracle, being inuited by the rest, with cleere voyce, graue countenance, and significant gesture said thus.

Your Highnesse (most excellent Prince) in commanding mine opinion before these more sufficient, obserues the order of feasts, where the courtest meates are tasted first. My Councell may perhaps be lesse pleasing, yet as holtsome as some other. The question is whether wee shall assault the enemy by sea, or keepe him from infesting vs by land. This will best be resolued when we haue made true discouery and comparision of his forces and our owne. If we be stronger, it is more honorable to iurnate, if weaker more safe to repell; what the number of the aduerser Gallies is we may see, how those Gallies are fortified and man'd we may coniecture, and how those men are fiesht and confirm'd with late victories wee need not doubt. Let vs take heed that while wee seeke to reuenge our harmes, wee doe not aggravate them, nor lose in struiuing to recover. It were a shame to returne so great a fleet without some notable effect: but it were both shame and vtter vndoing not to returne it at all. The Common wealth were better want the interest then the principall. This fleet is the surest Anker of our hope, and to lose it would indanger the wracke of Italy. Let vs not therefore offer to fight, vnlesse some advantage of place, or time on our side counterpoize the odds of strength on theirs: or to persister with hazard of our fleet something of greater importance (if any can be) then the fleet it selfe. The storminess of winter will shortly calme the fury of this Turkish navy.

navy. In the meane time it wilbe a degree of our victory to limit and stop the course of theirs. This, most excellent Generall is mine opinion, to which I am not yet so wedded, but that any cleerer iudgement may diuorce me.

This was of some cooler tempers heard with applause, but of the noble Venieri and Barbarico, not without disdain, which yet was modestly oppugned by Barbarico as followeth.

I deny not (most excellent Generall, and you my noble Lords) but that this speech of D. Bernardino de Requesens is inriched and strengthened with forcible argument: wherein if there yet be any defect, it proceeds not from too little iudgement, but too much care and rendernesse of the Christian State, a zeale which not onely excuseth, but almost iustifies and endears his error: I confesse, that to oppose against a stronger, a weaker power were to betray it. But wherein appears it that we are the weaker? If they exceed vs in number of Gallies, we excell them in strength and swiftnesse: if they vs in multitudes of men, we them in courage, and discipline: He thinks their victories haue added much to their courage, I thinke deduc'd more from their strength. Questionlesse our men in Cyprus and other places held their Altars, liberties, wiues, children, wealth, countries, and liues at to high a rate to deliuer them vp gratis. They haue found the Christian markets deare, nay happily their victories may beget ours, breeding in them not animosity, but security and presumption, euer their owne traitor. Was this fleet built and ty together with so much care, cost, and difficulty, presently to dissolue and break vp, as if we meet but to salute, or went to sea onely to purge and returne? or shall we stay only to looke on our enemies, as if we could destroy them like Basilisks? But winter will coole their heate: were not we better quench it now that it may not breake out againe the next spring? Will not this crocodile which deuoures vs both by sea and land, famed with Christian blood and spoile, wax stronger by a yeeres growth? If we be to weake for him now; How shall we resist him then? How shall we looke our Country, nay Heauen in the face, or lift vp our eyes to it, not daring to lift our hands against their enemies? But I surfet your eares with perfwation needlesse to such a iudgement and resolution. Your fathers Imperiall Maiesty displaid in your brow promifeth the same magnanimity in your brest. There is I know to much Cesar in you to haue the patience not to fight. Make hast then Illustrious Prince to reape this mature and fruitfull victory with your sword.

This was the sence of his spech which the speakers reputation and gracefull deliuey gaue more life and strength to. It was afterwards more amply and methodically confirmed by Cornia a Spaniard. The sympathy betwene whose tongue, and the Generals care farthered perhaps his resolution to fight, willing that so noble a councell might be rather attributed to one of that nation then to Barbarico. Cornia his speech was in effect this.

There are three motiues (most magnificent Generall) which without imputation of feare, or omission of duty, may induce a Commander to decline battaile. First, disproportion betweene the benefit of victory, and preiudice of overthrow on either part. In this respect, the Duke of Alua did politickly abstaine from encountering the Guyse in Naples, where the French could loose but their army, but the Spaniard his army and Kingdome of Naples.

Secondly if he foresee an easier, cheaper, and safer meane to dissolue the aduerser army, then by battaile. Thus did your Highnesse father Charles the fifth, of sacred memory, breake the neck of the Protestant army in Germany.

Lastly the inequality of strength. He being the weaker and likely to miscary in the attempt, whereof there are so many Presidents that we need alledge none. But neither of these can be applied to diuert vs from battaile, wherein if we preuaile wee recover our owne againe, and happily Greece for forbearance. If fighting valliantly we be ouercome, yet shall we in the conflict so farre weaken

Great implayt
against the dead.

The Defeat
of the Turkish fleet.

The uniting
of the Confederate
fleet.

The Advice
of
D. Bernardino de Requesens for fighting or not fighting with the enemy.

Barbarico is suspect of swaying to fight.

Cornia is speech confirming Barbaricos.

and maine the aduerse fleet, that we shall sooner arme a defensue nauy, then he an offensue, and easlier secure our own then he make any farther impressiō on it.
 Touching protraction. The winter will in deed dissolue his fleet, but so, that it will bud forth againe the next spring; perhaps grow greater and get the start of our nauy. His being vnited by nation, ours by combination.
 Touching inequality of force, it is probable we exceed them more in men then they vs in vessels. For he must needs consume many men in taking so many strong townes and forts, and employ many in keeping them. Neither are the skars of the late pestilence yet healed among them; Therefore my aduise is, the Gallies of Candy being come, that you hasten to Corfou, by which they must needs passe, 10 least hauing intelligence of your resolution to fight, they prevent the danger of encounter, and carry from you the fruits of their owne victory, and opportunity of ours.

Don John after this serious consultation concluded to assaile the Turkish fleet & attempt to intercept their haruests of Cyprus, and other Maritime parts of Chri-stendome ere they should house it. Therefore departing from Messina on the 17-of September, being at sea, he composed his Gallies to that forme of battaile he ment to oblerue in fight: so marshalling and exercising them before, that every squadron might know his place, and every Galley his squadron, and bee able to transforme themselves into all figures, without confusion, when occasion should require. Two daies after they arrived at the Cape of Colonnae, where they came to anchor by reason of a contrary winde, as also for that they were there to take in fresh supplies of footmen. In the meane time they dispatched Gill-Andrada with three other Venetian Gallies to Corfou, to make certaine discovery of the Turkish fleet, of which three, that of Caterino Maripietro presently returned to conduct Paulo Vrsino and the Colonel Aquaviva to the Nauy, bringing newes that the Turkish fleet had passed along in view of Zant, and were entred into the Gulph of Lepanto.

The Turkish
 fleet in the Gulph of Le-panto.

Hereupon, though with much difficulty, by reason of contrary windes, they put to sea, and the seuenteenth of September arrived at Corfou: from whence the last of the same month they set saile and came to anchor in a safe and spacious Roade at the Gamoniffes, where Giovann Andrea Doria being by the Generall commanded to suruey the army, finding some Venetian Gallies not compleat in men, distributed amongst them certaine companies of Spanish and Italian souldiers, whereof Matius Tortona commanded one band. He a man of a turbulent insociable nature being vpon some occasion aboard Calergo the Candiot fell at difference with some of the company, proceeding from words to blowes. Veneri not farre off, informed of the tumult, sent first one of his captaines, who, not pre-uailing, was seconded by the Admirall of Veneri his squadron, who ouer confidently interposing himselfe in the quarrell became a sharer amongst them of some blowes, and in conclusion was dangerously wounded, which Veneri interpreting an intollerable contempt of his authority, iealous rather of the States dignity then his owne, commanded Matius and his Enseigne to bee apprehended, and according to martiall severity in case of mutiny presently hanged at the yard arme of the same Galley to deterre others from like insolence.

An accident which had like to haue bred great mischiefe.

This priuate sparke of dissention had like to haue kindled a generall flame through the whole army and haue turned their swords, now drawne against the common enemy, vpon their owne bosomes. For the Generall naturally partiall to the Spanish, and perhaps enuious of *Veneri*s Authority, as his Coriuall in honour, considered only the severity of the punishment but not the capitalnesse of the crime exacting it, so that now the combustion furuiued the Author, and the discord bred in an inferior member of the army was ascended to the head, and endangered the whole.

Don John complained that his authority was more contemned by Veneri then

then Veneri by Tortona, for which if the counsell of warre gaue him nothono-rable satisfaction, he would take it himselfe, and teach him that though he respected the honor of the Venetian Estate, he would not neglect his owne. To these coales the friends of Tortona and maligners of Veneri (a very base office) ser-ued as blowes.

Don John his objections against Veneri.

Veneri on the other part protesting that he did it not to blemish the reputation of the Generall, but to preserve his owne and prevent the sodaine contagion of the mutiny, desired Don John, would make his reason, not his affection iudge of it, and consider the party executed not as a Spaniard but mutineere. Affirmed that if the Generall should take this iust, though seuer execution, as an occasion to breake the league which was applied as a meane to keepe it, it would be manifest, that not deuotion induced, but ambition diuerterd him from this honourable action. As for violence, hee should finde him as dangerous an enemy as otherwise a necessary friend.

Veneri his answer to them.

Colonna Admirall of the Popes Gallies, a man worthy so eminent place, wisely foreseeing what this might grow to, as a man equally beloued and louing both parts, nobly vsed his intercession to suppress, or at least cōpound the strife, Chiefly importuning Don John, in whom hee found greater obstinacy of discontent and estrangement, telling him the act was iust, though sodaine, like the occasion, and that suddainnesse necessary in dangers of so swift extention, as hauing once got the start, remedy could hardly ouertake them. That mutiny in an army was of as instant conueyance as a Gangrene in the body, if the parts infected were not presently cut off, it endangered the whole. That it was no intrusion on the Generalls authority, for an vnder Admirall in his owne squadron to execute a priuate offender. That in deed hee had no cause of offense, or if hee had cause, yet no leisure to entertaine it. That the enemies strength could not so much endanger them as their owne diuision weaken them. That as nothing could heape more honour on him then the suppressall of the enemy, so nothing could lay fowler aspersion then to loose this opportunity of doing it. Therefore if hee could not caffer his passion, hee should employ it against the common Aduersary.

These perswasions, strong but not bitter, deliuered by a friend, though for a reputed enemy, mooued him to abstaine from the effects of choller, though not to extinguish it. So that distast of Veneri, he communicated al important designs and consulted with Barbarico.

From hence they held on their course to Cephalonia, according to their former resolution, and on the fourth of October passing the Channell of Viscarda, on the fifth they anchored in the vale of Alexandria. Where Gill-Andrada, and Giuan Baptista Contareni brought letters from Paulo Contareni, Prouisor of Zant, confirming their intelligence of the Turkish fleet. Hereupon by vniseñt of the whole counsell of warre and earnest desire of the souldiers they hasted to the Gulph of Lepanto to fight with the enemy. And drawing neere vnto the place, Don John commanded the decks to be cleared, chests stowed, those cabins which might bee impediment to the valliant taken downe, the rest that might bee recepracles to cowards lock'd vp, leauing neither excuse for his men nor aduantage for his enemies. And as hee prepared all essentiall for hee neglected no imaginary or opinionate part of defense or offense. Therefore knowing that strength was the beauty of an army, but brauery the Enseigne of that strength, his men were armed richly, and his Gallies surable to his men, both carrying the badge of triumph, and a face of victory, displaying magnanimity and confidence, not effeminacy, like a bright but dreadfull flame.

And now, that hee might husband the small remainder of time to the vtmost minute, he caused victuals to be proportioned to his men moderately not super-fluously, farre from the swynish custome of some northerly nations, who as if wine were the nurse of valor as oyle to a lampe, against any sea fight knock the heads out of their barrels, and drinke the wit out of their owne heads and so reele aboard, sometimes stumbling vpon victory but neuer vpon honor, which must euer be deriued from vertue, not vice. This noble temperate capitaine vnderstood drunkenesse could not be the fountaine of resolution, and therefore distributed so much to his souldiers as might strengthen their bodies, not weaken their iudgements, and breed courage in them, nor rage; which with more speed then ceremony ended, the Heroick Generall, with countenance and habit becomming such a place and person, descended into his Barge, in which he passed through the fleet, being arranged in forme following.

The order and forme of the Christian battaile.

It consisted of foure distinct partes principall, viz. Two wings, the maine battaile, and a reservation of Succors. In the right wing were contained three and fifty Gallies, whereof Gionan Andrea Doria was Admirall, bearing in his maine top a Greene flag. The left wing was composed of an equall number of Gallies commanded by Augustino Barbarico with a yellow flagge on the starboard side of his toppe. In the maine battaile were included three score and one Gallies wherein Don John the Generall was himselfe, distinguished by a sky-coloured flag. The two wings and the maine battaile were one hundred sixty seuen Gallies strong, so placed that the two wings carried forwards the body with equall pace, one not forsaking the other: yet betweene all three was there sufficient distance to admit three or foure Gallies a breest without falling foule either of themselves, the wings, or maine battaile: as well to giue way to those supplies of reskewes which should be needfull in any part, as to transforme the whole battaile it selfe into any figure without confusion. Aluarez de Bassan Marquis of Santa Cruz bearing a white flagge in his poepe, conducted the reservations of succor, consisting of thirty eight Gallies, out of which were deducted eight, commanded by Don Juan de Cardona, precursor of the whole fleet, who running twenty or five and twenty miles before the rest, by swift Fregats, signified vnto the Generall whatsoeuer was necessary to be known in their discouery, with commandement when they deseried the Turkish Nauy to retire and impe themselves to the wings in equall diuision: Cardona into the Right.

The Galeasses and Argozies were halfe a mile before the Gallies, two before the right wing, two before the left, and two before the middle battaile, euery Galeasse a mile from each other: the first were commanded by Ambrosio and Antonio Bragadini, the second by Iacomo Guori, and Antonio Duodi, the third by Andrea Pisaro, and Pietro Pisano. The vse of these greater vessels (being fortified with plenty of ordnance and lined with multitude of smal shot) was to receiue the first fury of the enemies fleet passing by, that being weakened and disordered by them, the next charge might be more safe and easie.

And in respect they were huge and vnwildy vessels vnapt for oares, euery Galeasse was towed by two seuerall Gallies whensoeuer they were becalmed and had lost the vse of their sailes. The Galeasse of Antonio Duodi was towed by the generall and Colonna. The Galeasse of Iacomo Guori by Sebastian Venieri and Christoforo Liemi. The Galeasse of Ambrosio Bragadini by Augustine Barbarigo. The Galeasse of Antonio Bragadini by Antonio Canalis. The Galeasse of Andrea Pisaro by the Prior of Messina. The Galeasse of Pietro Pisano by Gionan Andrea Doria. The generall like the heart in the midst of a body was seated in the midst of the battaile, guarded on the right side by Marcus Antonia Colonna the Popes Admiral, and on the left by Sebastian Vinieri the Venetians high Admirall. Colonna was flanked by the Admirall of the Geneuois, whereof Hector Spinola was capitaine, assisted with the Prince of Parma.

Venieri was flanked with the Admirall of Sauoy, commanded by Liemy, accompanied with the Prince of Vrbin.

A sterne the Generall, Colonna and Venieri were backt with a Galley named the the Prince of Spaine, and an other belonging to the great Commendador of Castile.

The right side of the maine battaile opposite to the wing was strengthened by the Admirall Galley of Malta commanded by the Prior of Messina. The left side was guarded by a Galley called the capitaine of Petro Lomeline, commanded by Paulo Jordano Orsino.

In the right wing John de Cardona seconded Gionan Andrea Doria. In the left wing Augustino Barbarico was supported on one hand by Marco Quirini, and on the other by Canalis. Yet was the whole fleet though distinct in order so intermixt in nation, that neither the Spanish, Venetian nor Popes Gallies could respect their particular safety.

The particular names of euery Galley, his place and capitaine of the Christian fleet may be found in this Catalogue.

These Gallies and captaines went before the fleet for discouery.

Gallies.

Captaines.

1. The Saint Magdalen of Venice. Marco Contareni.
2. The Sunne of Venice. Vincento Quirini.
3. The Admirall of Sicily. Iuan de Cardona Admirall of the Sicillian fleet.
4. The Vice-Admirall of Sicily. David Imperiali.
5. The Admirall. Marco Cigogna.
6. The Ioannica of Sicill. Petro Francesco Maripietro.
7. Saint Caterina of Venice.
8. Our Lady of Venice.

The Gallies and captaines of the left wing.

Gallies.

Captaines.

1. The Admirall of Venice. Augustino Barbarigo Prouidator Generall of the Venetian fleet.
2. The Vice-Admirall of Venice. Antonio Canalis an other Prouidator likewise of the Venetian fleet.
3. The Fortune of Venice. Andrea Barbarico.
4. The

- | | |
|---|-------------------------|
| 4. The Archer of Naples. | Martino Pyrola. |
| 5. The Trebble hand of Venice. | Georgio Barbarico. |
| 6. The double Dolphin of Can- dy. | Francesco Zeno. |
| 7. The Lion and Phoenix of Can- nia. | Francesco Mengano. |
| 8. Saint Nicolas of Cherfo. | Colanes Draft. |
| 9. The Victory of Naples. | Oetavio Roccardi. |
| 10. The Lomelina. | Augustino Conuiali. |
| 11. The Elengina of the Popes. | Fabio Valciari knight. |
| 12. The Lady of Cania. | Philippo Polani. |
| 13. The Sea-horse of Candy. | Antonio de Cubellis. |
| 14. The double Lyon of Candy. | Nicolo Fratello. |
| 15. The Lion of Istria. | Dominico de Tucco. |
| 16. The Crosle of Cephalonia. | Marco Cimeras. |
| 17. The Saint Virginia of Cepha- nia. | Christofero Crissa. |
| 18. The Lion of Candy. | Francisco Bonaccio. |
| 19. The Christe of Candy. | Andrea Cornelio. |
| 20. The Angel of Candy. | Gionan Angelo. |
| 21. The Piramis of Candy. | Francesco Buono. |
| 22. The Lady of Candy with the Armed-horse. | Antonio Eudomeniano. |
| 23. The Christe raised againe of Venice. | Simone Gora. |
| 24. The lesser Christe raised a- gaine of Venice. | Frederico Renieri. |
| 25. The Christe of Corfou. | Christofero Condocollo. |
| 26. The Christe raised againe of Cania. | Georgio Calerga. |
| 27. The Christe of Venice. | Bartholomeo Donato. |
| 28. The Christe raised againe of Vegia. | |
| 29. The Retimana. | Nicolo Auonali. |
| 30. The Christe of Candy. | Gionan Cornelio. |
| 31. The Christe raised againe of Cania. | Francesco Zancaruolo. |
| 32. The Rodus of Cania. | Francesco Molino. |
| 33. The S. Euphemia of Brescia. | Horatio Fijogna. |
| 34. The Lady Marquis of Do- ria. | Francesco Spedra. |

Before these went Ambrofio Braga-dino with his Galeaffe.

35. The

- | | |
|--|---|
| 35. The fortune of Andrew. | Gionan Lodouico Belui. |
| 36. The Arme of Cania. | Micaele Vixamano. |
| 37. The Sea-horse of Venice. | Antonio Canali. |
| 38. The Christe of Cania. | Daniele Calefattio. |
| 39. The Arme of Venice. | Nicolo Lipomano. |
| 40. Our Lady of Zant. | Nicolo Modono. |
| 41. The Christe raised againe. | Francesco Zancaruolo. |
| 42. Our Lady of Venice. | Marc-Antonio Pifano. |
| 43. God the father in Trinity. | Gionan Contareni. |
| 44. The flame of Naples. | Iuan Cuenas. |
| 45. The Saint Iohn of Naples. | Garcia Vargaro. |
| 46. The enuy of Naples. | Torribio Acauesjo. |
| 47. The valliant of Naples. | Micaele Quixada. |
| 48. The Sancta Iacobea of Na- ples. | Monferatto Guardiola. |
| 49. The Saint Nicolaico of Na- ples. | Christofero Mongiua. |
| 50. The Christe raised againe of Venice. | Gionan Baptista Quirini. |
| 51. The Angell of Venice. | Vinfredo Iustimiano. |
| 52. The Saint Dorotea of Venice. | Paule Nani. |
| 53. The Admirall of Venice. | Marc-Antonio Quirini Prouidator of the Venetian Nauy. |

In the maine battaile were these capitaines and Gallies.

Gallies.

Captaines.

- | | |
|-----------------------------------|---|
| 1. The Admirall of Lomelina. | Paulo Iordano Orfino, Admirall of that fleet. |
| 2. The Master Lomelina. | Petro Baptista Lomelino. |
| 3. The Admirall Bandinella. | Bandinello Saulo vice-admirall of that fleet. |
| 4. The Master of Genoa. | Pallerano. |
| 5. The Toscano of the Popes. | Metello Caracciolla knight. |
| 6. The Sea-man of Vincenza. | Iacomo Dressano. |
| 7. Our Lady of Venice. | Gionan Zeno. |
| 8. The Saint Ieronimo of Lefina. | Gionan Balzi. |
| 9. The Saint Ioannica of Venice. | Gionan Antonio Colleone. |
| 10. The S. Alexadrica of Bergamo. | Georgio De Aesté Admirall. |
| 11. The Admirall Marina. | Ieronimo Canali. |
| 12. The Logge of Venice. | Bertuccio Contareni. |

N n n n n 3

13. The

13. The Mongibello of Venice. Francisco Dandolo.
14. The Virgin of Candy. Cypriano Marini.
15. The temperance of Giouan Andrea Doria. Vincenzio Pascalic.
Roccano Fulvio.
16. The good fortune of Naples Baccia Pisano.
17. The castle of Spaine.
18. The victory of the Popes.
19. The Piramis. Marc-Antonio of Saint Vliana. 10
20. The Christe of Venice. Ieronimo Contareni.
21. The Saint Francis of Spaine. Christofero Gualches.
22. The peace of the Popes. Iacomo Antonio Perpignano.
23. The Pearle of Giouan Andrea Doria. Giouan Baptista Spinola.
24. The wheele serpentine of Venice. Gabriele Canali.
25. The Piramis of Venice. Francesco Buono. 20
26. The Palme of Venice. Ieronimo Venieri.
27. The Admiral of Gyl. Andrada. Bernardo Cinoguerra.
28. The Granado of Spaine. Paulo Boteino.
29. The Admirall of Genoa. Heffor Spinola accompanied with the Prince of Parma.
30. The Admiral of Venice. Sebastiano Venieri Admirall of the Venetian fleet.
31. The Galley Royal. Don Iohn of Austria General. 30
32. The Admirall of the great Commendador.
33. The Popes Admirall. Marc-Antonio Coloma.
34. The Admiral of Sauoy. The Lord Lieny accompanied with the Prince of Virbin.
35. The Grifonia of the Popes. Alessandro Negroni.
36. The St. Theodora of Venice. Theodoro Balbi. 40
37. The Mendoça of Naples. Martino de Caide.
38. The mountaine of Cania. Alessandro Vizamano.
39. The Saint Iohn Baptista of Venice. Giouan Mocenigo.
40. The victory of Giouan Andrea Doria. Philippo Doria.
41. The Pisana of the Popes. Hercole Lotta.
42. The Figuera of Spaine. Diego Lopes de Diglia.
43. The Christe of Venice. Georgio Pisano. 50
44. The Saint Iohn of Venice. Daniele Moro.
45. The Florence of the Popes. Tomaso de Medici.

The

46. The George of Naples. Eugenio de Vargas.
47. The Maister of Naples. Francisco Benauides.
48. The Moone of Spaine. Emanuele Aguilar.
49. The Passara of Venice. Lodouico Pasqualigo.
50. The Lyon of Venice. Pietro Pisano.
51. The S. Ierome of Venice. Gassparo Mari Pietro.
52. The Admirall of Grimaldi. Georgio Grimaldi Admiral.
53. The Maister of Dauid Imperiali. Nicolo Luciano.
54. The S. Christopher of Venice. Alessandro Contareni.
55. The Iudith of Zant. Marino Sicuro.
56. The Larmelina of Candy. Pietro Gradonico.
57. The middle Moone of Venice. Valerio Valereffa.
58. The Doria of Giouan Andrea Doria. Iacomo Casali.
59. The order of Saint Peter. Santabio.
60. The order of Saint Iohn. Lodouico Tessera.
61. The Admirall of Malta. The Prior of Messina Admirall.

The Right wing.

- | 30 | Galleys. | Captaines. |
|-----|--------------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| 1. | The Admirall of Sicill. | D. Iuan de Cardona Admirall. |
| 2. | The Piedmontan of Sauoy. | Octauio Morero. |
| 3. | The Admirall of Nicola Doria. | Pandolpho Polidoro. |
| 4. | The Force of Venice. | Reniere Zeno. |
| 5. | The Queene of Candy. | Giouan Barbarico. |
| 6. | The Nino of Venice. | Paulo Polani. |
| 7. | The Christ raised againe of Venice. | Benedetto Sorance. |
| 8. | The Armed mā of Retima. | Andrea Calergo. |
| 9. | The Eagle of Retima. | |
| 10. | The Palme of Cania. | Iacomo Medio. |
| 11. | The Angel of Corfou. | Stellio Carchiopulo. |
| 12. | The Saint Ioannica Arbera. | Giouan de Domeni. |
| 13. | The Lady Fraucia. | Lodouico Cypico. |
| 14. | The ship of Venice. | Antonio Pasqualigo. |
| 15. | Our Lady of Candy. | Marco Fesearint. |
| 16. | The Christ of Crema. | Francesco Forneri. |

17. The

- | | | |
|------------------------------------|---------------------------------|----|
| 17. The Saint Vittoria of Crema. | Euangelisto Zorlano. | |
| 18. The Maister of Grimaldi. | Lorenzo Trecchia. | |
| 19. The maister of Marini. | Antonio Cornili. | |
| 20. The Margaret of Sauoy. | Battaglino. | |
| 21. The Diana of Genoa. | Giouan Georgio Lasagna. | |
| 22. The Gingana of Naples. | Gabriele Medino. | |
| 23. The moone of Naples. | Iulio Rubbi. | |
| 24. The fortune of Naples. | Diego Madra. | 10 |
| 25. The hope of Naples. | Pietro Busto. | |
| 26. The Fury of Lomelina. | Iacomo Chiappio. | |
| 27. The Maister of Lomelina. | Georgio Greco. | |
| 28. The Negrona. | Nicolo Costano. | |
| 29. The bastard Negrona. | Lorenzo de Turri. | |
| 30. The fire of Candy. | Antonio Buono. | |
| 31. The Eagle of Candy. | Ieronimo Georgio. | 20 |
| 32. The S. Christopher of Venice. | Andrea Trono | |
| 33. The Christ of Venice. | Marco Antonio Lando. | |
| 34. The Hope of Candy. | Ieronimo Contarini. | |
| 35. The Royalty of Padua. | Patara Buzacarino. | |
| 36. The Saint Iosefica of Venice. | Francesco Ofeda. | |
| 37. The Resolute of Naples. | Giouan Caraffa. | |
| 38. The Sicilia of Sicilia. | Francisco Amadea. | |
| 39. The Maister of Nicola Doria. | Iulio Centaurio. | 30 |
| 40. The Eagle of Corfou. | Pietro Buono. | |
| 41. The S. Trifonica of Catarra. | Ieronimo Bazanteo. | |
| 42. The Tower of Vincenza. | Lodouico de Portu. | |
| 43. The S. Mary of the Popes. | Pandolfo Strozzi Knight. | |
| 44. The S. Ioannica of the Popes. | Angelo Bisalio Knight. | |
| 45. The Maister of Nigroni. | Lodouico Gamba. | |
| 46. The Admirall of Nigroni. | Giouan Ambrofo Nigroni. | |
| 47. The Monarca of Iohn Andrew. | Nicolo Garibaldo. | 40 |
| 48. The Hand-maide of Iohn Andrew. | Nicolo Imperiali. | |
| 49. The Admirall of Giouan Andrea. | Giouan Andrea Doria. | |

The Referuatiou for succour, placed behind as a Garde, are these Capraines and Galleys.

Galleys.

1. The Saint Ioannica of Sicily.
2. The Buccana;

Captaines.

Giouan Pietro Morilo.

3. The

- | | | |
|------------------------------------|----|--|
| 3. The Leena of Naples. | 3 | Pietro de Lagia. |
| 4. The Constancie of Naples. | 5 | |
| 5. The Marchesa of Naples. | | Iuan Machado. |
| 6. The S. Barbera of Naples. | | Iuan Ascaleo. |
| 7. The S. Andrea of Naples. | 7 | |
| 8. The S. Caterino of Naples. | 7 | Iuan Rufio de Valasques. |
| 9. The S. Bartilmeo of Naples. | | |
| 10. The S. Angelo of Naples. | 10 | Iuan de Ripe Melino. |
| 11. The Terrana of Naples. | | Marco Molino. |
| 12. The Christ of Venice. | | Giouan Loredano. |
| 13. The double hand of Venice. | | Aluarez de Bassan Marquis de Sancta Cruz. |
| 14. The Admirall of Naples. | | Giouan Baptista Contarini. |
| 15. The Faith of Venice. | | Catarina Mali Pietro |
| 16. The Pillar of Venice. | | Lodouico Bulbi. |
| 17. The Magdalen of Venice. | | Giouan Bembo |
| 18. The Lady of Venice. | 20 | Filippo Leo. |
| 19. The Menidus of Venice. | | Giouan Baptista Benedetto. |
| 20. The Hope of Venice. | | Pietro Badoario |
| 21. Saint Peter of Venice. | | Christofero Lachico. |
| 22. Saint George of Sabenica. | | Georgio Cochio. |
| 23. The Saint Michael of Venice. | | Daniele Trono. |
| 24. The Sibilla of Venice. | | Luigi de Hereda. |
| 25. The Crane of Spaine. | | Vaschedo Coronado. |
| 26. The Admiral of Vaschedo. | 30 | Antonio de Ascoli. |
| 27. The Suprana of the Popes. | | |
| 28. The Occasion of Spaine. | | |
| 29. The Maister of the Popes. | | |
| 30. The faire wether of the Popes. | | |

The Generall descending (as hath beene said) into his Barge, passed thorow his fleet, taking a short but exact view of the forme of his battailes, and by breecfe, but effectuell speech, breathed courage into his men. His Oration was to this purpose.

Braue, intuincible spirits, whom gracious Heauen hath held worthy to bee his Champions: to whom the Angels will not bee idle spectators, but actors and assistants in this sacred Tragedy. Nature I know hath giuen you the strongest temper of valor, and Denotion set to keene an edge on that temper, as I need not whet by any farther incouragement. Onely let mee tell you, you now haue faire occasion to vsheath and vse it. Let Victory set such a glosse on it, as no rust of forgetfulnesse may euer eate out. Now bring this darke halfe Moone, which seeks to eclips the bright funne of heauen, to such a waine as shall neuer fill againe. Let hir not any longer vsurpe domination of the Sea. Our enemies exceed vs in numbers, made vp of cyphers and shadowes of men, but let vs excell them in resolution, the effence of Soldiers. They are imprisoned and immured by shores and rocks, as much as I should say, victory cannot escape vs. They must fight because they cannot flye, wee because wee must ouer-come: Wee haue necessitie of conquest; the danger mixt with it, doth but season and ennoble it. Who would triumph

" triumph ouer woemen, Wee are to share the whole wealth of nature:
 " the earth to the furuiours, heauen to the martirs. Euen the scarres of the wound-
 " edd will be beautifull becaufe honorable, who would ingratefully refuse to bleed " for that louing God which hath not refused to dye for him. Courage therefore " diuine Champions, forget not that fom of ye are Romaines, and which is more all " Christians.

This speech was euery where answered with applausue and hopefull conclamations. In which resolution wee will leaue them a while, to view the countenance of the aduerse Nauy. The Turkes in the same time vfed circumspection and prouidence nothing barbarous. For hauing intelligence by spies, fugitiues, and prisoners not only of the conuention of the Confederate navy, but their approach beeing now in the Gulph of Lepanto, Mehemet Bey was dismissed with 60. Gallies to Aspropicio a neighbor City to bring from thence competent supplies of victuall and men, in which businesse he vfed such celerity that in short time he returned, bringing with him plenty of victuall and munition besides ten thousand Ianizaries two thousand ordinarie soldiers and two thousand voluntaries, with which multitude and false supposition of our paucity they were not so cōfirmed, but that they stood posselt of a certaine farall ominous misdeeming the event. In which respect the high Admirall Ali Bascha, though by his owne inclination and his maisters command he stood resolute to fight, called a Generall Councell to deliberate so important a designe: Most of them perswaded to giue battaile, but Partan Bascha Generall of the land forces earnestly oppugned it, on the contrary part Hassan Bascha sonne to Barbarossa sometime Viceroy of Algier a young man yet of great spirit and worthy so noble a father whose magnanimity he seemed to inherit, licensed to speake with braue countenance and apt gesture spake as followeth.

The speech of Hassan Bascha persuading to fight.

" Most exalts and victorious Prince, the Turkish Nation hath euer so nobly be-" hauled it selfe that it is a question whether their fortune hath bred their greatnesse " or their valour commanded their fortune. Once it may be affirmed that if our " starres haue fauored vs, wee haue not forsaken our selues, nor shamed them, but " magnified their influence by our actions. Our Predecessors haue left vs ample " territory, wherein wee haue not been vnthrifits but haue so husbanded it that if " they made little, much, wee haue extended much almost to infinite. So that if we " hold on this course of victory, Alexander neuer stood more then wee, in need of " new worlds: which if these prying inquisitiue Christians had not discovered to vs,
 " our valour ere long would want work. Yet let vs not seeme so glutted and cloyed
 " with conquest as to refuse to accept this one triumph more. Let vs fill both the hands " to counterpoize that other balance of land victories. Let vs fill both the hands " of our Emperor, one with spoiles of the land, the other of the Sea. These feeble " tired Christians haue been but our Porters. They are now ready to deliuer it. Let " not vs disdayne to take it of them least they couzen vs now, as they did my father
 " about thirty yeares since, and ran away with their burthen. Wee haue Gallies e" nough not only to stowe their wealth, but if need were their Gallies. There" fore most inuincible Admiral let vs preuent their flight by speedy assault.

This speech vttered by a man whose performance had euer heretofore bene correspondent to so confident a perswasion, not only encouraged but inflamed many of the hearers, whereof Vluazzali Generall of the forces of Barbary could not containe him selfe, but with many earnest and pregnant arguments auer'd the same: alleging besides the opportunity, the necessity of obtaining the great Lords command. Caisbeg the Sanzach of Smirna echoed Vluazzali.

Yet many the grauer and aduiseder Captaines dissented from this more hotte then deliberate determination, especially Mehemet Bey the Sanzach of Negropont which if not eloquently, yet truly demonstrated the danger of fight as followeth.

I am sorry (magnificent Allis) that at this time the Councell of Illustrious Hassan is rather to bee admired and applauded for greatnesse, then followed for soundnesse, fitter to set our tongues on worke then hands: I meane to bee answered then executed. It is most true, in rayling the Ottoman Empire, that the Turkish valour hath euer guided their fortune: but as true, their wisdom hath directed their valour, else had they neuer created this world of their greatnesse out of nothing, or made it of Attomes and so slender principles. They haue not by poasting to the end of their desires lamed or tyred the meanes that carried them, but by going soe fater, haue gone farther. Greatnesse is steepe and high, not to bee ascended but by leysure. Those that strue to rise violently fall precipitately. Such was the suddaine floud and ebbe of the Goths, such the inundation of Tamberlan. One Kingdome is a sufficient croppe for one yeare. After that rate wee may soone begger Christendome, and perfect the Turkish Monarchie. As wee haue worne Cyprus, and may keepe it, so wee may lose both that and our selues too, in seeking to get more. If you conceiue the Christians haue come so farre, but with resolution to fight, or to fight, but with probability of preuailing, you must thinke them either foolcs or cowards. But if after so familiar and long hostility, ouer-ualleuing our selues, hinder vs not to know them, wee must needs confesse their swords and wits as sharpe as ours. Not their Pusillanimity, but diuision hath ruined them; and our multitudes rather wearied then conquered them. From Prenuza themselves departed, not wee draue them: at least the shame of flying then, will excite them to fight now. Our oddes of strength is vncertaine. If they bee the weaker, supplies may strengthen them. If wee the stronger, many accidents may weaken vs, but none strengthen. Therefore my councell is, that wee go home while our way is open, and wee haue our welcome in our hands, and not let hoped defraude vs of certainty. Yet is mine opinion euer subiect to your correction.

This speech was highly approoued of Partan Bascha, Siroch, and Carabey. Yet fate, and their Emperors expresse command, vrged publicly by Vluazzali, so farre carried them against their owne iudgements, that they resolved not onely to hazard battaile, but seeke it. To this end hauing distributed those foureteene thousand foldiers where they found most need, They weyed anchor, and came to Galanga, about the euening the seuenth of October, and there stayed. There supplying their Gallies and themselves, with whatsoever was requisite for the encounter. Now drawing neere, the Admirall neglected nought that tended to the augmentation of the strength, or ostentation of the brauery of his Gallies and men. One principall care was, the fastning of his slaues, least their bodies his, but mindes his enemies, might instead of necessary instruments, be conuered to dangerous bosome aduersaries: knowing that desire of liberty and reuenge, two violent appetites, would make them apt to snatch at any opportunity. Hee caused their allowance of dyet to bee augmented, so cherishing their bodies, that they might bee apt for labour, and mixed hope of future lenity, with feare of present punishment, that stubbornnesse, a thing inuincible in the obdurate minds of slaues, might not hinder the utmost extent of their strength. Hee likewise keeping good aduises at sea, to preuent suddaine inuasions, drew forth his fleet to order of battaile, that both his men and Gallies, when need required, might not bee to learne their duty or order: which hee neglected not continually to practise, as hee approached the Christian fleet, till hee had brought them to perfection therein.

The eight of October very early in the morning, hoping vnexpectedly to haue come vpon the Christian fleet as they were at anchor, they hoytyed their sayles halfe mast high, so to hinder their discouery, and with a gentle gale sailed towards Cephalonia. Both fleets were within twelue mile of one another, yet vnder-scryed, by reason of certaine points and head-lands diuiding and shadowing them.

That

They first kend the Christian Nauy cleere of the Cruzulares, which had somewhat disordered them. And seeing Andrea Doria stand to sea-ward, vainly imagined hee had fled, as vpon the like reason the Christians were deluded with the like conceit of them, which opinion as it begat contempt of the aduerser part, so it bred confidence in themselves. The place where the fleets met, serued aptly to fight, but not to flie. The Gulph being in circuit not about two hundred and fifty miles, immured with rocks, shores, and Islands so thick, that to flie, threatened well nigh as much danger as to stay. On the North, they were shut in by part of Albania, extending from Saint Maura to Lepanto foure score miles. On the East they were embarred by Morea stretching seauenty miles from the mouth of the 10 Gulph to Cape Tornazzo. On the south the Isle of Zant opposed it selfe. 25. miles in length. the west was closed vp by Cephalonia and Saint Maura, the one being 40. the other 15. miles long on that coast. On the coast of Albania, scarce a mile from the maine, were the Rocks Cruzalares of an equall bignesse, but the lesse more dangerous. Heere againe the Christian fleet before concealed by interposition of headlands bewrayed truly hir owne greatnesse, which though inferior to the Turkes, yet exceeding their expectation did somewhat shake their former resolution: yet hope, shame, and which was more then both, necessity, spurring them forwards, they approached in forme following.

The order of the Turke
fleet.

They diuided their fleet which consisted of two hundred and seauenty vessels, Gallies, Galeots and Foists, into foure battailes, correspondent to that of the Christians. In the middle battaile was the high Admirall Ali Bafcha, and therein were conreynd foure score and ten Gallies, in the midst of whom, in a rich and well fortified Galley was he himselfe, flanked on the right side with Partau Bafcha, and on the left with the Treasurer of the Nauy, who were likewise assisted each of them by three Admirals. The right wing consisted of fiftie Gallies, whereof Mehemet Siroch had the charge. The left wing included nineteen Gallies, conducted by Pluzzali. The Reservation for supplies was a mixture of ten Gallies and twenty Foists, commanded by Amurat Dragut Rais. Hee himselfe in a beautifull and well armed Galley, sometime Admirall of Constantinople. 30 Their maine battaile was opposite to ours. Their right wing to our left, and their left to our right wing. Every battaile distinguished by different Flagges, very curiously and richely wrought. Every priuate Galley adorned with Pendants and Enseignes of great worth, and beauty, which serued rather to breed appetite in the couragious and greedy Christians, then feare: The Galeasses they did rather wonder at for hugeness of Bulke, then doubt for offence or danger in seruice, thinking them fitter for burthen then fight, wherein notwithstanding the horse of the Greekes lay buried their greatest mischeefe: neither could they yet entertaine an assurance that their aduerser fleet would assaile them, being (as I may say) affraid not to hope. Yet did not this distraction make them neglect all possible meanes of their owne safety or enemies harme. All vnecessary things they stowed in hold, all needfull for offence or defence provision. Every Capitaine encouraged his souldiers, euery soldier his fellow; and custome of victory kept out all conceits of being overcome; each one cheerefull in himselfe the remembrance of the Christians flight at Preuezes vicinity of place bringing it to their apprehension. The very wind seemed to whisper in their eare secret argument of preuailling, to which their credulitie harkened. But soone was that Argument confuted, when the wind which till now had bene partiall to them, became a newtrall to both, and a flat calme giuing as it were attention to the 50 voyce of the Cannon. And not onely the wind, but the Sunne seemed now to bandie against them, for hauing with too much light blinded the Christian Nauy, at the instant of ioyning battaile, remooued that preiudice to the Turkes.

And

And not onely the winde but the Sunne seemed now to bandie against them, for hauing with too much light blinded the Christian Nauy, at the instant of ioyning battaile, remooued that preiudice to the Turkes. And the winde as if awakened, and come to doe seruice to the God who made it, breathed a gentle gale from the West, which aptly serued to carry the mists of the water and smoake of the Ordnance vpon the Turkes, whose battailes contained these particular Captaines with their Gallies.

10

The Turkes diuided their fleet into foure Battailons.

The right wing.

1. The first was the Admirall of Mehemet Siroch Gouvernor of Alexandria.
2. The second Galley of Alexandria, was gouerned by 20 Caras Tubat.
3. Bagly Saraf.
4. Giafer Chiagey.
5. Osman Celebin.
6. Perusio Reis.
7. Bink Cufapogli.
8. Osman Occan.
9. Driuis Aga.
- 30 10. Baiazer Siman,
11. Osman Ali.
12. Deli Aga.
13. Dardagan Bardanbely,
14. Casti Cuian.
15. Iusuf Aga.
16. Iusuf Magar.
- 40 17. Calafa & Cheder.
18. Mustafa Genouell,
19. Dermigy Pery.
20. Mar Altan.
21. Cheder Aga.
22. Soliman Bey.
23. Hibraim.
24. Saban.
- 50 25. Caiacelebin,
26. Cheder Siman.
27. The Sonne of Cara Mustafa.

All these had Gallies of Alexandria.

Their Gallies were of Constantinople.

□□□□

28. Turan

28. Iuran Saba.
 29. David Iufuf,
 30. Solac Rais.
 31. Arnaut Ferrat.
 32. Iuzel Memy.
 33. Schender Selim,
 34. Lumag Iufuf.
 35. Bardach Celebni,
 36. Bagdar Afau.
 37. Guzel Allibi.
 38. Brufali Piry.
 39. Rodle Ali.
 40. Aga Bafcha with the Admirall of Constantinople, 41. Sinaman Mustafa.
 42. Giegjore Ali,
 43. Amurates Reis,
 44. Calepi Memy.
 45. Marul Mustafa.
 46. Heder Lumet,
 47. Sinaman Deruis,
 48. Meminey Durmis.
 49. Algagias Sinan,
 50. Adagi Ruffan,
 51. Chingeuey Mufara,
 52. Iufuf Celebni,
 53. Tufer Mustafa.
 54. Ali a Genowefe and Pyrate Captaine of fmall Galleys.
 55. Megil Reis with a fmall Galeaffe,
 56. Mehemet Bey, with the Admirall Galley of Negroponto.

The Battaille had thefe Capitaines and Galleys.

1. Affam Bey the Gouvernor of Rhodes,
 2. Deli Chiafer the warden of Rhodes,
 3. Occi Rais,
 4. Postunag Ogli,
 5. Calefaft Ogli.
 6. Gazizy Reis,
 7. Dromus Reis with an Admirall Galley of Constantinople,
 8. Herbercy,
 9. Caragias Rais,

With Galleys of Rhodes.

10. Ocean

Their Galleys were of Tripoli in Barbary.

These commanded ouer Galleys of Despotado, in old time Actolia;

10. Ocean Rais,
 11. Deli Piry,
 12. Giafer Aga:
 13. Bachian Rais,
 14. Coz Ali,
 15. Colach Rais,
 16. Oluz Rais.
 17. Affan Baffa, sonne
 18. Caruf Rais.
 19. Alman Rais,
 20. Gungli Ogli,
 21. Arnaut Celebin,
 22. Magar Ali,
 23. Giafer Celebni,
 24. Deli Celebni,
 25. Deli Affan.
 26. Caraperi Aga.
 27. Sinan Rais
 28. Carau Mustafa.
 29. Sali Arauar.
 30. Preuil Aga captaine
 31. Balahzi Ogli.
 32. Bararzi Mustafa.
 33. Sinan Baly,
 34. Agdadi Rais.
 35. Two sonnes of Ali, in a Galley of Constantinople.
 36. Ofman Rais in an Admirall of Constantinople.
 37. Deli Iufuf
 38. Ferat Baly,
 39. Cuiacelebin.
 40. Bagdar Rais.
 41. Haluagi Mustafa.
 42. Giaur Alli Mustafa, Admirall of fmall Galleys.
 43. Caracoza with Galleys of Valona.
 44. Mamatre Saderbey Gouvernor of Mitilene.
 45. Aly Bafcha high Admirall of the fleet,
 46. Portau Baffa, generall by land with an Admirall Galley.
 47. Mustafa Efdey Treafurer,
 48. Marmari Rais.

with Galleys of Constantinople.

Their Galleys were of Naples in Romagnia.

with Galleys of Mitilene.

with Galleys of Mitilene.

00000 2

49. Alci-

49. Alciogoli,
 50. Caras Deli.
 51. Ferat Ceragli.
 52. Tramontan Rais, with an Admirall of Constantinople,
 53. Sulimun Celebni.
 54. Deli Ibraim.
 55. Murat Coroslaa,
 56. Denur Bali,
 57. Caby Heit,
 58. Murrat Trasf Scribe } with Galleys of Constantinople.
 of the Arsenall,
 59. Peruis Sinam,
 60. Dardagan Bali,
 61. Giafer Caran,
 62. Deruis Sach.
 63. Curbaly.
 64. Giafer Aga, the captaine of Tripoli in Barbary,
 65. Carau Hamat,
 66. Rustan Cialmagi,
 67. Durmis Ogli,
 68. Schender Dernigi, } These Galleys were of Tripoli,
 69. Maumet Alis.
 70. Afis Cluega Gouvernor } of Callipolis,
 71. Selim Siach,
 72. Heder Baschi, } These Galleys were of Calipolis.
 73. Sicun Mustafa,
 74. Salu Rius,
 75. Dely Ischender,
 76. The Lord of Marue with an Admirall Galley of Constantinople.
 77. Peruis Lahumagi,
 78. Hafuf Bali,
 79. Siran Bardachi, } Their Galleys also were of
 80. Iusuf Cinigi, } Callipolis,
 81. Piri Begogli, with an Admirall Galley of Constantinople.
 82. Deli Ofmun,
 83. Piry Sinan,
 84. Demir Celebni,
 85. Deruis Hidir,
 86. Sinan Mustafa,
 87. Hafirgy Rais. } with Galleys of Constantinople.

88. Afcy

88. Afcy Ogli.
 89. Caiar Saraf,
 90. Agadi Ahameth,
 91. Ofman Seher.
 92. Deruis Celebin,
 93. Giafer Rais,
 94. Dardagan the Gouver-
 10 nor of the Arsenall.

The left wing.

1. The first was an Admirall, whereof was Capitaine Carau Hozias,
 2. Catalus a Pirate,
 3. Chiazell Sinam.
 4. Chior Mehemet.
 5. Hignau Mustafa.
 20 6. Cademly Mustapha,
 7. Vschiusi Memy.
 8. Carau Morat. } With Galleys of Narolia.
 9. Paffa Deruis,
 10. Iagli Ofman.
 11. Pifman Rais.
 12. Tasciuis Sifman.
 13. Iefil Hogli.
 30 14. Cara Cialibina, Capitaine of small Galleys.
 15. Suizi Memy.
 16. Magli Rais. } They had small Galleys, and did obey
 17. Ofey Affan. } Cara Cialibin, 18. Cumigi Hafuf. } These two had Galleys of 19. Cadeh Sidir, } Constantinople.
 20. Ofman Rais,
 21. Caraperi a Pirate, and also Capitaine of small Galleys.
 40 22. Iulio Peruis,
 23. Calobodan Soliman,
 24. Iachuli Mamat, } These had small Galleys, and were com-
 25. Sayr Giafer, } manded by Caraperi their Capitaine,
 26. Chior Memy,
 27. Chiusuel Giafer, with a Galley of Constantinople,
 28. Ramazzan,
 50 29. Calemy Memi,
 30. Giefman Ferrat,
 31. Hiupris Affan,
 32. Zambal Murat.

Ooooo 3

33. Sarma.

33. Sarmafach Rais,
 34. Tunis Suliman,
 35. Calepi Iufuf.
 36. Techedel Affan.
 37. Cyan Memij.
 38. Ofman Bagli,
 39. Caragial with the Admirall Galley of Algeirs.
 40. Caraman Ali. 10
 41. Alman.
 42. Sinam Celebni.
 43. Agdagi Mustafa.
 44. Daglias Ali,
 45. Seirh.
 46. Perius Selmi.
 47. Murat Deruis,
 48. Hes Ogli. } These had small and also some common
 49. Machazer Ali. } Galleys of Algier. 20
 50. Ioias Ofman.
 51. Sali Deli.
 52. Nafur Fachir, with a Galley of Constantinople.
 53. Gymongy Mustafa.
 54. Rustan Cinigi,
 55. Bali. 30
 56. Daud Ali.
 57. Sitinau Rais.
 58. Carum Hidir.
 59. Magar Ferrat,
 60. Arnaut Alis,
 61. Natis Rais,
 62. Curmur Rhodo,
 63. Cos Cluagin,
 64. Cluffy Memi. } Their Galleys were of Negroponto. 40
 65. Caram Bey with the Admirall of the sonnes of Pluzxali.
 66. Deli Murar,
 67. Abazar Rais,
 68. Scin Schiander.
 69. Alman Balli,
 70. Affan Suumbar,
 71. Seit Aga,
 72. Affan Sinam,
 73. Cumy Falagan,
 74. Ofman Gynder. } They had small Galleys of Valona. 50

75. Derman

75. Derman Bey.
 76. Iufuf Alis.
 77. Caran Alman.
 78. Murat Bialfan.
 79. Carabiney gouernor of Suriafaro. } Their Gallies were of Suriafaro.
 80. Calau Bastagi.
 81. Carabi. 20
 82. Giafer Hedi.
 83. Ferrat.
 84. Memy Beogli.
 85. Ofman Piry. } These Gallies were of Constantinople.
 86. Piry Rais.
 87. Calam Rais.
 88. Talaragi Rais. } These Gallies were of Constantinople. 20
 89. Rus Celebin.
 90. Tutar Ali.
 91. Pluzxali King of Algier with an Admirall Galley.

The Battaille of Succors.

1. Was an Admirall Galley of Constantinople gouerned by Amurat Dragat Rais.
 2. Caram Casti. 30
 3. Haliam Rais. } These were Foists.
 4. Abdula Reis, and that was a little Galley.
 5. Aligau Affan.
 6. Cus Ali. } These were also Foists.
 7. Ginzel Ali.
 8. Curtat Celebin.
 9. Deley Bey.
 10. Saudagi Memi, this was also a Foist. 40
 11. Dardagno Reis, and he had an Admirall of Constantinople.
 12. Deli Dorni, and he had a Galley.
 13. Cuidar Memi the Gouernor of the Isle of Scio.
 14. Shetagi Ofman.
 15. Haeder.
 16. Delius Heder.
 17. Armar Memy. } These had Foists. 50
 18. Sufan Reis.
 19. Gyafer Bey.
 20. Cabil Sinam, his was a Foist.

21. Amurat

21. Amurat Reis.
 22. Sariogi Grafer } These were Foits.
 33. Mor Ali.
 24. Piali Murat and this was a small Galley.
 25. Caragiali Rais.
 26. Murat Alias. } These were Foits.
 27. Iumez Alias.
 28. Atlan Sinan a Galley of Constantinople.
 29. Bostagi Murat a Foit.
 30. Deli Suliman, this was an Admirall Galley of Constantinople.

10

All things thus disposed of, Ali Basha, richly clothed and armed after the Turkish manner, in the poope of his Galley, thus spake to the Captaines and Commanders of the nauy there assembled to receiue direction.

Ali Basha his speech of encouragement to his captaines and soldiers at the instant of battail.

MOST Heroick Captaines, and Inuincible Ianizars, the scourge of the Christian, and right hand of the Ottoman Empire, we haue heretofore taken pains to fetch our slaues, our enemies haue now brought them vs. Despayring their successe on land, they are come to try the same fate in an other element, as if there were important difference to burne on shoare, or drowne at sea. They haue changed place but not spirit. The same effeminacy which they had in other parts they haue transported hither, constant only in their vices and vanities. Magnanimity and the effect, Honor, are not more inherent or hereditary to vs, then cowardize and feruility to them. We much exceed them in number, but more in weight of sufficiency: we were fouldiers even when children, they children now they are men. What are their souldiers but players, minstrels and tumblers, a multitude of vngeit Eunuches? what is their Generall but a youth, fitter to leade a maske then an army? what are both but the remainder of this yeceres victory, whereof Cyprus was the late rich earnest? neither can they so soone forget to yeeld, nor we to ouercome. Therefore be confident braue fellows in armes, that not resolution but their destiny hath brought them hither. Italy is the gate of Christendome, and Venice the key of Italy, This fleet is that Barre which if we can either breake or put backe, all flies open, and we shall goe beyond Cesar in the VVest, Alexander in the East, making the rising and setting of the Sunne the confines of the Turkish Empire. Come on then, let vs fill the sea with their bodies, our Gallies with their wealth, our selues with honor and felicity of both.

40

The memorable battail of Lepanto.

The Christians hauing in all respects provided for so great an attempt, as farre as humane wisdom or strength extended, considering this fleet to be their Arke, God himselfe being interested in the controuersie, ceased not with humble but importunate inuocation to implore the aide of Heauen, which by their Priests and Churchmen was confidently promised, Their deuotions concluded, and both battailes now facing each other, the charge founded by a cannon from Ali the Turkish Admirall, & answered by one from each wing, with barbarous clamors, after their custome, which they thinke awakens the courage of their owne, and amazeth and terrifieth their enemies, swiftly made towards the Christian fleet, who in a contrary manner made trumpets, drums, fifes and other such martial music the delightful Prologue to a more dreadful scene. Venierri backt his Galley with two other of Giuan Loretano and Catarini Malipietro. Colonna did the like with two other.

And

And now being within distance of their ordnance, the Turkes passing by the Galeasses were vnexpectedly torne by their great shot, which brake forth on all sides like thunder and lightning out of some darke cloud: they being high and close, infinitely spoyled the naked Turkes and Rowers, and made as it were that breach at which the Christian fleet entred. For it disordered them then when they had no time to reforme themselves. In which confusion yet desperately passing the Galeasses, they ranne vpon a sharper point of danger. For the winde resisting the swiftnesse of their approach, staied and set them vp as dead markes to the Christian ordnance, which had more certaine ayme at them lying still, then in motion and course. Besides, it did benight them with smoake, augmenting the terror of those inuisible mischiefs which they felt, but could not see to shun or reueng. The horrible noize of some commanding, others answering, the crack of Gallies, foule of each other, terrified both the Turkes which suffered, and Christians which but heard it; victory appering to them in a dreadfull countenance. In some Gallies, the officers slaine, the slaues brake lose and like Lyons slaughtered their keepers. In others, the powder taking fire casually, seemed to rebell against them too; shooting their bodies vp in the ayre as sacrifices to that Christ whom they blasphemed. Here men fallne ouer-board wanted Gallies, here Gallies emptied of their companies, wanted men, and stord like dead bodies without soule, which Mehemet Siroch, now finding himselfe a truer Prophet then he desired, obseruing with-drew himselfe from the body of the fleet thinking to circumvent the Christian left wing: betwixt whom and Syrach, Augustino Barbarico interposed his Squadron, wherewith he shut vp his passage, the callier by reason of a Promontary called Mahanguli extending it selfe on that part. Marino Contareni resolute to be a sharer with his vnkle Barbarico both in honour and danger, followed and vnited himselfe to that Squadron, betwixt whom a cruell fight was maintained on both sides. The Turkish left wing commanded by Plazzali, and confronting our right was very neere to haue ioyned with Doria, who considering himselfe inferior in number of Gallies (he hauing but fifty, his enemy ninty) vrged it not. Plazzali balancing with the fortune of the Christian his owne oddes of strength, was contented likewise to abstaine. Doria after some suspense stood out to seaward with certaine of his Gallies a mile from the remainder.

In the meane time, Don John Colonna and Venierri the confederate Admirals in exact order incountred the middle battaile of the enemy, exchanging in the approach three or foure vollies of great shot, with much disaduantage to the Turkes. The Christian vessels being snugge and stooping from the ordnance of the Turkes higher Gallies, and many of their peeces choaked with Christians bullets casually shot into their moutthes and there sticking. Which difficulties bred rather fury then despaire in them, and induced them with violence of oares to make hast to grapple, that there fighting hand to hand, the difference might be decided by pure valour. And beeing now come neerer, swarms of arrowes and small shot interchangeably stung both sides, and artificiall fiers reciprocally lightned euery where. At last boarding, death and wounds, drest variously, were the entertainment of that hostile and vnwelcome visitation. Whence sprung such a deluge of bloud that this might haue bene more properly called the red sea. Now Siroch perceiuing himselfe not only frustrated by interposition of Barbaricos Squadron, but distressed by the vnresistible force of it, persisted in fight, to saue his honor though not life, vining his utmost incouragements to reuiue the languishing hope of his men, wherein by speech, but more by example, he so farre preuailed, that desperation supplying the want of resolution, they had now recovered, not onely hope of resistance, but victory: For after doubtfull and vnequall conflict in many parts, here number oppressing valor, there valor counterpoizing the ods of number, especially in the Gallies of Barbarico and Ciconia, Barbarico whilest with inuincible courage he still ran to the weakest part, like the vital

vittall spirits in the body, was vnfortunately and mortally wounded by a farall Turkish arrow in the left eye, himselfe being in deed not onely the eye but the very heart of his Squadron. He falling downe, gaue demonstration that the life blood of an army runnes in the veines of the Commander. His owne men shrunke back, the Turkes intruded and prest in his Galley, which had beene then taken, but that Frederico Nani and Siluiso Porcia came in to her reskew. These heroick gentlemen growing vp like Hidraes heads in the roome of Barbarico, repeld the Turkes and recovered the former hope of victory. Porcia received a wound in his thigh, the honorable badge of his valor.

In an other part, Ciconia opprest with multitude of Turkish Gallies, was as I may say refined with wild fire, and his face beautified with an eminent skar, but was at last preserued by speedy supplies, being so farre from yelding either to wearinesse or torment, that after this he boorded and tooke a principall Galley, and one of their Imperiall Enseigns, which in the Venetian armory serues now to display the inuincible courage of the taker. But Siroch inuironed with danger and mischiefe on all sides, hauing no meanes to satisfie his desire of reuenge on a desperatly ranne vpon Glouan Contareni (whose kinsman was before not idely slaine) with such violence, that he had almost stem'd his Galley; which he obstinately perseuering to boord, was there mortally wounded; as before in iudgement, so now in valor hauing manifested himselfe a compleate and absolute fouldier. He falling, bred like amazement with the Turkes, as the fate of Barbarico had with the Christians: his men slaine, wounded and dismailed left their decks naked to their thronging enemies, who rushing in, were like to haue made the Galley a common sepulchre to both; For thee, being shot betwene winde and water was now ready to sinke. The Turkes leaped ouer-boord, hoping by swimming to finde the land more mercifull to them then the water. Siroch was taken, not quite dead, but his wounds ferched, and found incurable, in pittie, not cruelty he was dispatch't. His death, though it were deere bought, was a mortall wound to the Turkes whole Nauy. For those that were before busied with his incounter, this right wing, or arme, now cut off, conuerted their forces, though much enfeebled, against other members of the fleet, assisting where they saw need and had opportunity. Besides, the battaile of succors continually supplied and releued impartially all parts distressed.

Now the two Generals, Don Iohn and Ali Bascha meeting like two furious Currents, began so cruell a fight in the midst of both fleets that the rest seemed but spectators to them two. The Gallies incircling them were the Theater, these two the Stage. Contrariety of Religion, emulation of honor, anger, hope, and feare producing admirable effects in both. While the Bascha made violent impression on the prow of Don Iohns Galley, she by others was likely to haue beene entered on the poepe, which scene was preuented by those that back't her, who boording these boorders tooke their Gallies, but with great slaughter and difficulty. The Turkish Admirall knowing the fortune of the day to depend vpon his successe, desperatly contended to inforce Don Iohn, wherein he so farre preuailed, that he compelled him to bring out of hold his fresh reseruations, to exchange place with his wounded and wearied men vpon the hatches, which strang and vnexpected supply as it were new borne out of the wombe of the Galley to defend their mother, bred amazement, and by amazement hastned the destruction of the fainting Turkes. The Bascha shot in the head, his Galley soone yeldd; himselfe being yet aliue presented to D. Iohn, had his head strooke off, which, mounted on the point of a pike, he held vp in publike demonstration of victory, a gratefull object to the Christians, but dreadfull to the Turkes. The same cause bringing forth at once most contrary effects, extremity of hope and feare, which yet lesse dismailed them, not discerning it a far off, then the aduancement of the Crosse royall in sight of their Admirall Galley. That was seene throughout the fleet, and the farall signification

signification easily interpreted. Now they all fly, but so confusedly, that while they thin the pursuite of one Galley, they fall foule vpon an other. Besides, Marco Quirini and Antonio Canali intercepted many of the Gallies flying, and men swimming to the shoare. In this memorable fight many notable captaines on either side were taken and slaine, whose distinct Catalogue enuies at the end of the battaile, not yet absolutely ended. For Vluzzali foreseeing now to late this generall ouerthrow, studied how he might in some measure reueng what he could not prevent; therefore houering aloofe from the fleet to expect some straglers of the Christian Nauy, at last found opportunity to cut off certaine Venetian Gallies which at first had followed Doria, but now desirous to haue beene sharers in so noble a victory, were retrying to the maine battaile: them he chased, fetched vp and boorded, yet they brauely repelling him, and Doria wheeling about to assaile him abast, knowing it dangerous for him to perseuer in fight where his owne force would continually decrease, and his Aduersaries be augmented, by consequence of reskew from all parts of the army, executing his most mischiefe vpon those Venetians, he with faile and oares stood off to sea, towing after him the Gallies of Pietro Bua of Corfou, of the Prior of Messina, and Lodouico Cipico of Trahù, Benedetto Soranza, mortally wounded and opprest by multitude, fighting valiantly to the last was slaine, and his Galley taken. But so, that such getting in conclusion proued their losse. For many of the enemies thronging into the Galley, either by casualty or desperate malice of some captaine, she fired, and they perished in a wretched mixture of death, burning, and drowning. It seemed that the fury of the slaughtered Turkes suruiued and was vntied in Vluzzali, who alone gaue all three battailes some taste of his diuillish rage. Notwithstanding, all those Gallies which he had taken, were recovered, but that of Pietro Bua of Corfou, in whose purchase he had a very hard bargaine. The night was his best protection, which shaddowed him from the pursuing Christians. Who now despayring to fetch him vp, whom they could not see to follow, gaue ouer the chase and stood back to the fleet, and Vluzzali escaped with about thirty Gallies. Many which could not swim being aliue, as if death had taught them that skill, floated being dead. And the sea glutted with multitudes swallowed, spued their carcases vp againe. Many laboring in the water for life, found now more safety in their wracks then before in their Gallies, and sometimes a Turke and Christian, laying hold of one planke, began a priuate fight, while a third tooke benefit of what they strove for; the sea in the meane time prouing victor of both. Here a tired Christian calls to his friend for helpe, here a Turke implores it of his enemy. Lamentable and confused cries come from both, when now the billow began to roare louder then all. For the nauy was yet scarce collected and reduced to a safe Hauens, towards night, when there arose so fodaine and violent a storme, as if the battaile had not now beene ended would haue beene a cruell stickler in it.

To conclude, the insolent enemies being thus ouer-throwne, and their spoile gathered, the next care was to cure the wounded men and repaire the bruised and torne vessels. Wherein the Commanders testified no lesse industry then in preparation for the fight, and valor in it. It is hard to resolute which of the three Admirals D. Iohn, Venieri, or Colonna merited most applause, they all did what could not be exceeded by any other, not equalled but by themselves. The former distast twixt Don Iohn and Venieri, as it had beene proudly pacified by mediation of Colonna, so was it in the conquest nobly forgotten of themselves, D. Iohn toward the beginning of the battaile being endangered by inequality of number, Venieri with his owne danger brauely reskew'd, like two fierce mastiues iarring betwene themselves, when the Beare comes, forget priuate strife to assaile the common enemy, which noble curtezy the General gracefully and publicly acknowledged, honoring him with the title of father, and which was more, father of the victory. The whole army in vntied voice gratified the diuine mercy for so great preferua-

tion;

tion, and eleuating their victorious hands to heauen, acknowledged them to bee strengthened by it. Euery man congratulated the safety of his liuing friend, yet moderately lamented the fate of those dead, the sorrow of their death being dried vp with ioy of the cause. Those bodies which were recovered were honorably buried: the rest detained by the sea, were yet eternized on the shoare. To reapeate the noble actions of euery particular man were a labour worthy Plutarke, euery life would be an history. But amongst the most eminent shines the noble indifference of the Marquis de Santa Cruz, who disposing of the reueration of succors distributed them not by his owne affection but other mens necessities, bewraying at once excellency of iudgement, courage and celerity. 10

Many circumstances gaue lustre to this victory, but nothing more then the sight of the Christian fleet not many yeeres before from the same place, the infamy of the one glorifying the other and seruing as a soile to it, as shaddowes set forth and enlighten any bright picture. It was a pleasing consideration to those who had bene in that fugitiue navy to thinke that after so many yeeres they should finde their honor where they lost it. To this they added remembrance of the like battaile betweene Augustus Cesar and Marc-Antony many hundred yeeres before fought in the same place, as if destiny had made it a stage for great actions, and this battaile had bene but the second part of the first.

The totall number of the dead in the Christian army were 7656. others say 7566. the chiefe of the Venetians were Augustino Barbarico Prouiditor Generall of the Venetians fleet, Benedetto Sotanza, Marin and Ieronimo Contareni, Marc-Antonio Lande, Francesco Bicono, Iacomo de Messa, Casimir Maripietro, Gionan Lovedano, Vincenzo Quintini, Andrea and Georgio Barbarici all of the degree of Senators. Of Romans, Hiracio Caraffa, Ferrante Bisballo, Virginio & Horacio of the noble family of Yrfini in Rome. Of the Spaniards, Iuan and Bernardino de Cardona, of the knights of Malta were many slaine, amongst whom these three were most famous, Iohann Spart Commendador of Moguncia. Ro: of Hamburg Commendador of Heimmendorf, and Francis Drost, by nation Germans. The chiefe men wounded were, D. Iohn the Generall, Venier the Venetian Admirall, Paulo Iordano, 30 Marco Molino, and Troyle Sauallo and well nie seuen thousand priuate men. This losse of it selfe great, was lessened by comparison of the Turkes, who were reported by some Authors to haue bene dismembred of 29000. of their bravest fouldiers slaine and taken: some affirme it lesse, some more. But the multitude of their Gallies taken, wracked, and dead bodies floating on the sea (carrying with it a resemblance of the generall deluge) acknowledge it to be great. Amongst those slaine, the most eminent was Ali Balha the high Admirall Generall, one of great magnanimity and worthy such a place. Mehemet Bey alias Siroch Gouernor of Alexandria a man of singular iudgement and valor, fighting to the last, not (as others) that he saw not, but contemned the danger. Hassan Balha the valiant sonne of his valorous father Barbarossa, and many others equally valliant, noble, and deere to the Emperor their Master. The most welcome prisoners were Achmat and Mahomet sonnes of the Generall Ali Mehemet Bey Gouernor of Eubcea, and three thousand and odd vulgar fouldiers. There escaped Partan Balha who since others would not follow his counsell in abstaining from fight, made vse of it himselfe. Vlazzali a desperate and subtill Renegado who fought, but so alwaies that he might flee, and as the Parthian horse-men, did most mischief in flying. There were taken 130 vessels. Whereof 117. were Gallies, 13. Galeots. Some report, 160. some more, some lesse. The escape of the rest making the number of such as were taken vncertain. The Galley of Cleopatra was not more rich, curious or beautiful then the Admirall Galley of Ali, neither did the beauty of it better become peace, then the strength warre. There was much treasure and many things of great value found in it, which the noble Generall, not basely conuerted to his priuate vse but distributed to those who most deserved it. Amongst these, a Macedonian by whose 50 whose fortunate hand the Balha died was worthily the greatest sharer. And because Don Iohn held gold to poore a reward for such vncostimable merit, he approched those other guists with honor, and knighted him. But the munificent Venetians thinking this a petty remuneration, nothing equivalent to the dignity of their state, gratified him with an annuity of 300. Ducats.

The most esteemed spoile of the Turkish fleet were the enfranchised Christians, in number 1200. words are but mute expressalls of the wretchednesse of their captivity (being at once compelled to suffer for, yet doe against their Religion) Nothing could equall it but this ioy of their enlargement, which was such as that of Jonas may be apprehended at his birth and resurrection out of that monster. 10 Neither was this excessiue gladnesse confined to their owne breasts, but at their arriual multiplied by diuision among their friends and kinsmen. Of whom these liuing martyres received such welcome as was given to the three Ebrew Salamanders coming out of the furnace. They seemed but then married to their wiues, and their children new borne to them: Embracements were now in stead of fetters, and kisses of blowes (blessed exchange!) And now they wept for ioy that they had no contrary cause to weepe. The misery past seemed to sweeten their present felicity, so that this day was with all deuotion, magnificence and exhilaration celebrated as the Saboth of their slauish labours. The nineteenth of the same month Vesfredo Iustiniano arrived at Venice with aduertizement of victory 20 to the Senate. Neuer any musick so pleased their eares as that newes, no Oratory could be so harmonious as the plaine relation of it. The only word of victory was the Epitome of all Rhetorick. The death of particular men seemed only a letting blood for the generall health. No man grutched to bestow a sonne or brother towards this common sacrifice. Euen the heroick Barbarico was rather enuid then lamented, they which honored him alieue, being dead welny adored him: so that sorrow was now banished out of Venice, and confined to Constantinople.

The gratulatory Ambassadors of all neighbour Princes flocked thither, acknowledging the Venetians their protectors and champions. 30

The time of the yeere, and weakenesse of their fleet and men, moued the Generall D. Iohn to desist from pursuing the victory any farther. Therefore he proceeded to diuision of the spoile, which was thus proportioned.

The Popes share was.

Gallies. 21.	Whereof 19. ordinary, 2. Galeots.
Ordnance. 54.	Whereof 9. great, 3. murderers, 42. smaller peeces.
Prisoners. 881.	Amongst whom were Achmat and Mahomet the sonnes of the Generall Ali Balha.

The Venetians share was.

Gallies. 44.	Whereof 39. ordinary and a halfe, 4. Galeots and a halfe.
Ordnance. 131.	Whereof 39. and halfe great, 5. murderers and an halfe. 86. smaller peeces.
Prisoners 1162.	Of all sorts.

The Spanish share was.

Gallies. 64.	Whereof 58. Gallies and a halfe, 6. Galeots and an halfe.
Ppppp	Ordnance

Ordinance 214

Whereof 58. great peeces and a halfe, 8. great murtherers and an halfe. 128. smaller peeces.

Prisoners 1713.

Of all forts.

The Remainder were distributed among the assistants.

The diuision concluded not with equality, yet generall satisfaction; the Venetians thinking they had the more honor, though the Spaniard the more luggage. Venieri indefatigable in doing nobly, and exasperated with the yet smarting blow of Cyprus, esteeming one Christian Kingdome not to be counteruailed with many barbarous fleets, extolled highly the magnanimity of the General, hoping that praise would haue spurred him forward in to faire and open a way of victory, proposing the rescue of Greece, an action which would more immortalize him then the conquest of Tunis had done his father, whose Genius he said would not enuy to see it selfe exceeded by him, which was not equalled by his Predecessors. This, much enflamed the hot-aspiring minde of the youthfull Prince lately fled, in so much that they proceeded to consultation how they might perfect this trophie whole hardest worke (the foundation) was already laied: when the secret maligners of Venieri hauing now againe by his meanes leisure and security to oppose themselves to any designe of his, diuerted D. Iohn from so braue a resolution. Therefore making Aprill the time, and Corfou the Rendezuous of their next yeeres conuention, they dissolued the Navy. Don Iohn returning to Messina.

This abrupt departure in the eye of expectation, appeared a running away, or tergiversation (I had almost said Apostasy) from victory, whom he seemed to leaue vnkindly, delyring him to stay longer. All men greued to see hope pregnant and great, likely to bring forth faire issue if she had gon out her time thus miscarry. The death of Ali by a Grecian, that miserable nation interpreted an Omen of ensuing liberty; and in opinion manumized, after they found themselves thus deluded, groaned as vnder a new subigation. Vpon intelligence of the ouer-throw, they had taken heart and would haue taken armes too, had they beene offered: It greued him now to dismisst that resolution so necessarily entertained. They desired if D. Iohn would not himselfe, only to let his shadow (his fame) fight for them, while he stood by. That he would doe them the grace to eternize himselfe by their deliuey. And being certified of his returne cried out that he at once for-sooke himselfe and them, their liberty and his glory being the Twinnes whereof he was in labor, and that it was but a little greatnesse which one victory could fill. And surely had this opportunity beene well improoued, there might haue beene farre more made of it. For though that ingenious Turke to expresse the inequality betweene the losse of our Cyprus and their Navy, said, That Selim had cut off the Venetians arme, they, but his beard; insinuating, That timber growes, but not Kingdomes; and ships might be built, but not Islands: yet is it manifest that the chiefe strength of this Samson lay in this haire, and that if hee had beene assailed ere it grew out againe, the razor which cut his beard might haue cut his throat. Thus much the Tyrant himselfe vnwittingly acknowledged by the intended massacre of the Christians vnder him, cunningly fathered on reuenge, but begot by feare. He knew captiues of the quality of fire, as dangerous as seruiceable. It is true that the next spring, his fleet (not as it might haue beene quite rooted out) budded forth to his former height: his Arsenals spawning shoales of Gallies, yet barren enough in marriners, the eye of a fleet; without these his Gallies were blinde, not directing, but grasping their way: his expertest Pilots, old naturall sea-men, begot as it were on Marmaites, and nurs't vp in the armes of the sea, perished in the last bartail; these fresh multitudes did not man but fraught his vessels.

But

But these publike considerations were lesse potent to moue D. Iohn to persist, then other private respects, to reduce him from this honorable expedition. Therefore the noble Venieri, whole actiue vntired spirit, neither the yeeres winter, nor his owne, could benumbe, was excited, not deterred, by his departure, so far from being retrograde in his course of victory that he determined to goe a step farther: and knowing that the terror of the late ouer-throw had much shaken and made a breach in the Turkish courage, he thought good to enter it ere time or supplies should repaire it. Being in this deliberation, Philippo Bregadino Prouidator of the Gulphe arriued with sixe Galleasses and ten Gallies, and after consultation, strengthening his owne fleet with this addition, and both with his owne reputation, he sodainly dispatch't Quirini, associated with many braue captaines to Marguerita, which Venieri his fame deliuered vp to them; but finding it vntenable they razed it.

Venieri taking this as an earnest of some farther successe propounded an expedition for Saint Maura, which many of the councill of warre oppugned, alledging the strength of the place, the vnaptnesse of the time, and disproportion of their owne powers to both; yet he full of hope and courage, resolving, where-soeuer the impediment were, it should not be in himselfe, proceeded thither, and hauing better viewed the impregnablenesse of the place, hee thought it a part of wisdom, next the not vndertaking a dangerous attempt, speedily to lay it downe, and therefore returned to Corfou.

Colonna leauing D. Iohn (on whom all supreme and exquisite honors were heaped) at Naples, from thence with great magnificence passed towards Rome: by the way, all mens eares and eyes taken vp and referred sly for this obiect. E-nery tongue being a Preface to the voluminous praises dedicated to him afterwards at Rome. Venice held the enemy at the armes end but had he euer closed with Italy, Rome would haue beene shrewdly griped. This Ague of feare thus shaking her, imagine how welcome the Physitian was that cured her. To haue secured her from mischiefe, had been meritorious, but to returne it thither whence it came, was an infinite obligation: Arriuing therefore at Rome, long after himselfe, his fame had out-stripped him, and raised the spirit of that ancient city in a shape of triumphe to see her aged glory in this bright Glasse of victory, and entertaine her new champion. The city seemed to be turned inside outward: their rich rapilties now beautifying the walles without, the streets strewed with flowers as at a marriage. At last came Colonna accompanied with the chiefe Senators and attended by the most eminent captiues, in number 160. suted rather to his fortune then their owne, very richly, yet in their countenances retayning a maiestick sorrow. Thus passing through many triumphant Arches erected in his honor, he came to the Popes palace, at whose feete prostrating both himselfe and his dignities, and deliueyng up the sonnes of Ali, late likely to haue arriued in a lesse welcome manner, he was most graciously entertained. His Holinesse applauding his proceeding generally. But quite contrary was his opinion of Doria: whom he said behaued himself more like a Pirate, or newtrall, then one of the Christian party:

The end of the tenth Booke of the sixth Decade.

PPPPP 2

The

The Contents of the first Booke of the seuenth Decade.

10

TH E farther expectation of al men after the famous victory of Lepanto. The Venetians preparation against the spring. The Emperor beeing solicited by the Pope and Venetians to enter into the league refuseth it. The French King, Kings of Portugall and Poland doe the like. The Spaniards seeme unwilling by reason of the troubles of Flanders. The Venetians great preparations to passe into the Leuant. The Turkes scoure the seas whilest their fleet is making ready. The death of Pius the fifth, with the creation of Pope Gregory the thirteenth. Don Iohn his allegations for his stay at Messina. Souranza comming thither solicits Don Iohn to depart and unite himselfe to the Venetian fleet. The cause of Don Iohns delay. Souranza bringeth supplies to Corfow. Jealousies betwixt the French and Spaniards by reason of the troubles of Flanders, with the French Kings complaint against the Duke of Alua. The Spaniards are iealous of the French. The Pope and Venetians send Ambassadors to the most Christian and Catholike Kings to remooue their distrusts. Vluzzali General of the Turkish fleet putteth to sea. The Senats resolution perceiving the delays of the Spaniards. Don Iohn certifieth Marc-Antonio Colonna of his departure: The Christian fleet notwithstanding leaues Corfow. Vluzzali determineth to fight with the Christian fleet: The Christians resolute to assaile the Turkes. The enemies alter their purpose and refuse battaile: The death of Sigismond King of Poland. The Venetian General intending to give battaile encourageth his soldiers. And lastly the retreat or rather flight of the enemies.

The

The first Booke of the seuenth Decad of the Historie of Venice.

10

TH E victory of the confederate Princes over the Turkes, who by their fortunate successe had till then made themselves terrible to all nations, had begot such expectation and hope in most men, as they supposed a fit occasion was now offered to reuenge all former wrongs: and that the Ottoman Empire forsaken of her late felicity would be ouerthrowne by the power of Christian Princes, perswading themselves that the onely report of the arriual of the Christian fleet was sufficient to open a way to gallant enterprises and conquests, and to cause the inhabitants of the Prouinces posselt by the Turkes to reuolt, who did deadly hate their religion, customes, and government: But the discreeter sort were not transported with such idle suppositions, nor fed with such vaine hope, considering the cunct of things by reason, and not by affection, knowing that so long as the Turkes land forces (the true foundation of their Empire) were vnshaken, there was no likelyhood at all to preuaile against them, nor to hope on the peoples reuolt who commonly are wont to produce cleane contrary effects, and especially in the Ottoman Empire, where subjects are poore and needy, wanting commanders, armes and meanes, so that their commotions can not greatly hurt the Turkes, or profit others: and that the Greekes, accustomed of a long time to seruitude, had lost the greatest part of their ancient generosity.

*Small hope in the reuolt of
the Turkes
subjects.*

The Venetians vpon these considerations were carefull to make new warlike preparations, to augment the number of their Gallies, to refresh their army with new souldiers, and generally to provide whatsoeuer should be necessary, that they might speedily send their fleet into the Leuant against the Turkes.

*The Venetians
preparations
against the spring.*

But Christian Princes (shutting their eyes in regard of their owne particular affections) did not apprehend the fit occasion offered to abate the power of so great and terrible an enemy, and in a man ner enuying one another they discouraged thereof as though it had bene a forraigne warre (wherein notwithstanding consisted the common safety) and reiected the good fortune which the former prosperous successe did promise them: for the Empetor being entreated and solicited by the Pope and Venetians to embrace the cause, and being likewise perswaded by the Catholike King, who to that end had sent Don Pedro Falsardo to him, still persisting in his vsual delays, and irresolutesse, alleadged new but greater difficulties, and wanting will, was very glad to entertaine any excuse to free himselfe from it: therefore he demanded to haue ready money giuen him in steed of those soore forces which they offered, and sufficient caution for it in some free townes of Germany, adding farther that he would be assured of the continuance of that supply for a long time, and that to those ends they should insert more strict and expresse obligations in the Articles of the capitulations: this hee propounded onely for a shew, knowing well enough that they would neuer be granted; and it was likewise knowne, that hee had prepared the

The Emperors excuse to free himselfe from cursing into the league.

Ppppp 3

tribute.

tribute, and already made choice of a messenger to carry it to Constantinople. Charles the French King on the other side, solicited by the Pope, not to be wanting to all Christendome in such an expedition, answered that he would first vnderstand the Emperours resolution, and so soone as his forces were ready, hee would not faile speedily to send, his aide to ioyne with the land-troupes of Germany, vnder the conduct of his brother the Duke of Aniou, but that hee neither could, nor ought, to suffer his sea-forces (farre inferior to those of Spaine) to ioyne with them.

At the same time the Cardinall Alexandrine hauing executed his commission in Spaine, was by the Popes commandement gon in Portugall, from whence they hoped to procure thirty vessells of warre for service of the Christian fleet: the King did honourably entertaine him, yet hee could draw nothing from his Maiesty but generall promises, whereby he saw, that the King inclining wholly to the enterprise of Barbary against the Moores, did not greatly respect matters farre from home. Not long after, Antonio Tepulo hauing accomplished his Ambassage into Spaine, went thither likewise, verily perswading himselfe that the newes of the late victory would the easier haue induced that King to embrace the league, wherein a very honourable place was referred for him, the Confederates fortunate successe inuited him thereunto, together with his owne interest, that the vnbredid greatnesse of the Turkes might be abated; whom (not without cause) hee might feare would prouee bad neighbours to his Indies. All this could not procure the King to incline to the league, nor could the Ambassadors draw any other promise from him, then this, That hee would the next yeere send foure thousand foot men to the seruice of the league, and ioyne some few of his owne vessells to the Confederates fleet, the which he could not then doe, because that certaine French Protestants of Rochell, did ordinarily make incursions vpon his territories and sea coasts, whereby he was enforced continually to entertaine certaine armed vessells, to resist them and the Moores of Fesse, and of this by letters he certified the Senate.

Tepulo in the end, because his Ambassage should not be fruitlesse, told him, that he might assist the common cause of Christendome against the infidels by other meanes, not hindring himselfe at all, namely by causing his officers in the Indies to acquaint the Persians, sworn enemies to the Turkes, with the vniou of the Christian Princes, with their late victory against Selm, and with their designs, and afterwards by sending certaine numbers of Portugall Harguebuziers from the red sea, vnto the confines of the Turkish Empire, to keepe them busied in sundry places, or at least to amaze and hold them in suspence. The king promised so to doe, adding therevnto that they should stop their commerce from Ormus and Bazzana, and the transportation of metall through the Persian seas, which abundantly was brought to them from China.

The King likewise gaue meanes to the Cardinall Alexandrine, to conuey certaine Breefes to the Persian King, Prester John, and some other Kings of Arabia written vnto them by the Pope, wherein he solicited them to take armes against the Turkes, the which letters tooke none effect, nor were euer answered.

The Pope likewise solicited the King of Poland, with whom at the same time the Cardinall Commendone remayned, who promised to draw that King into the league, in regard of sundry accidents which happened, besides the victory, the Turkes meaning to bee reuenged on the Polakes, for that they had fauored the Valachian, to the preiudice of the Ottesman Empire, and for that purpose had in hostile manner entred Prussia, Padolia, and Russia. But the King falling sicke during the treaty and not being able to bee present at the negotiation, it was referred to some Lords of the Kingdom, who did finally affect that war, being vnwilling to contribute (according to their custome) towards the expence of forraign war: As also because that at the same time they had intelligence that a Chiaus

The King of Portugall answer to the Cardinall and Venetians.

The King of Portugall's promise.

The Pope solicits the King of Poland.

was coming from Constantinople to their Court, to treat about that contention, all the Popes endeuor & authority could not make it fort to any good effect.

After this manner were matters handled in the Court of Christian Princes, who seemed already to decline from their former hope, and knew, that for the abating of the Turkish power the Sea-forces were not sufficient, but that a mighty land-Army was needfull: and that therefore it especially imported them to haue the Emperor to enter into the league, all men holding it for certain, that Poland, Muscouy, and the other northerne Prouinces, apt to take Armes against the Turkes, would presently yeeld to the authority of the Empire: this being considered by the enemies they vsed all meanes to preferue the Emperor Maximilians freindship, thinking the danger, which threatened them, not to be small, if all Germany should league it selfe against them.

Therefore Mahomet Bascha had writen to the Emperor, and had particularly acquainted him with the battaile, making the ouerthrow farre lesse then indeed it was, and the power of the Ottoman Empire very great, requesting him not to breake the truce for other mens pleasures, but to preferue his inuiolate freindship with Selm, which being once knowne, would continue for euer. But that which did herein most trouble the Pope and Venetians and made them to feare, was, their suspicion, that the Spaniards would not shew themselves so ready to pursue the course of the victory, as the imporrancy of the cause did require: because that diuers of the Catholick Kings courtiers murmured against D. Iohn for hazarding the Kings forces in battaile, seeing that his maiesties interest was vnlike that of the Venetians where-vpon they were differently to bee managed: and for that afterwards when they vnderstood, that the Duke of Sessa, a noble and famous Gentleman, came to command in the Army in stead of the great Commander Requesens who went to be Governour of Milan, they inferd there-vpon, that the Catholick King would not haue D. Iohn attempt ought without his aduise and Councell.

Now the greatest let then found in pursuing this warre of the Leuant, was, the bad successe of the affaires of Flanders, where they daily grew from bad to worse, nor without some suspicion that the Protestants of Germany, England and France would fauour and assist that rebellion: so, that a fit and conuenient opportunity being made to vniue the Nauies and put to Sea, notwithstanding that Leonardo Cortisen the Venetians Ambassador with D. Iohn, did sollicite this vniou and shipping of the soldiers, all his pursuits were in vayne. The Venetians alone, not loosing time, spared neither cost nor labour, but fought to make vfe of the victory, and with great speed trimd their Gallies, augmented their number, made new leuiues of soldiers to compleat their army, that it might speedily bee ready to saile into the Leuant. And because that D. Iohn and the Spaniards had entertained some distast of the Generall Veneri (as hath beene already said) the better to take away all occasion of hatred and diuision, they chose Iacomo Foscarini their Generall who at that time was Provider or Generall in Dalmatia, who hauing notice that hee was elected, and receiuing the Common wealthes stander from Lodouico Grimani who succeeded him in Dalmatia, he departed from Zara on the first day of Aprill with nine Gallies and went to Cortou, where taking charge of the fleet, which at that time consisted of 40. Gallies, he made a General review, and sent for great numbers of footmen vnder diuers Captaines from Brindisi, he stored the Gallies with victuals, armor, munitions and all other necessaries: this being done, the Generall Veneri with some Gallies retired into the Gulph, there to execute some Noble enterprize, if occasion were offered.

This in effect is all that was done by the Christian Princes. The Turkes after the battails losse, were by so much more afflicted, as inured to victory, they could not entertaine conceit of contrary successe, and contemning the Christian forces, they came rather to spoile then to fight: but this vnexpected ouerthrow made Bascha Maomet sollicits the Emperor.

The Pope and Venetians doubt.

The Turkes opinion of the Christian forces, the battaile.

made them more circumspect, wherevpon Selim who then lay at Constantinople, fearing least some innouation might happen at Constantinople, presently went thither and shewed himselfe to the people, dissembling as much as in him lay, his discontent and feare. The Bascha neuerthelesse were very carefull to provide all necessities for the army, so as it seemed they were in hope to reforme their former error, and to recouer their lost reputation: they repayed their old Gallies, built new, enrolled great numbers of Mariners, sent for soldiers forth of the Prouinces to come to Constantinople, so that vsing industry and speed to the hurt and wonder of the Christians, Carassali departing forth of the streight of Gallipolis with threecore armed vessels, began to scoure the Seas, and to wait the Islands of Tino and Corigo, whilest Vluccali prepared a great fleet: for they had determined being once vnto to passe on, and to inuade the Isle of Candy, or else face the Venetians Navy, frustrate their designs, and assure the Seas belonging to the Ottoman Empire. These prouisions and the Confederates delaies and irresolutions, had much imboldened the Turkes, and although in the beginning they had sundry times conferred with the Venetian Bailly concerning peace, and seemed to be very desirous of it, they neuerthelesse delayed the certaine resolution thereof till the arrivall of the Bishop of Aix Ambassador to the most Christian King, whom they knew at that time to be come from Venice: towards Constantinople vpon important affaires, supposing that hee brought some particular commission with him concerning that businesse, and that by his mediation together with his Kings authority, they might the easier establish and conclude some honorable agreement: but the condition of matters being afterwards changed when they came to treat on particulars, they propounded very vnusuall Articles, being desirous to make peace as though they had been victorious not vanquished, menacing the Venetians with losse and destruction: The Confederates neuerthelesse being no whit moued by these nor other great mischeefs, went very slowly to work, as though the enemies had been wholly defeated, that they had no more cause to fight, and as if at their own pleasure they might haue enjoyed the fruit of the Victory. All men did wonder at these delaies, and presently discoursed thereof: A rumor was spread abroad, that the French did no longer in secret but openly assist the Flemmings who determined to inuade the territories of the Catholick Kings: that to this end, they prepared fifty shippes of warre at Rochell, which should be commanded by Philippe Strozzi: and elsewhere other stirs and rumors of war were reported to be currant in the Realme of Nauarre.

These soe important and dangerous reports, held the Spaniards in suspense, and would not suffer them to employ their sea forces, in which their greatest hope consisted in forraine enterprizes, fearing not to haue them again at their need, for the defense of their owne territories. Many alleaged other reasons which moued the Spaniards not to set forth: But whatsoever the true occasion was, it was after the Spannish manner kept very secret: for they, making no shew to feare the French, or that they had giuen ouer the enterprize of the Senate for any other respect, they did still affirme the contrary, promising from day to day to come to Corfou: all this they did very cunningly, knowing well enough that if the Venetians should suspect that the Confederates went about to forsake them, it would enforce them to make vse of the present time, and to agree with the Turkes: a matter which would greatly preiudice the Spaniards, who resoluing for to continue perpetuall enemies vnto the Turkes would alone bee constrained to make head against the forces of so great a Potentate.

After this manner did the Spaniards at the same time beare themselves, not bewraying their inward intentions, but temporizing in conclusion did nothing.

The treaty of peace broken.

Rumors diuulged by the Spaniards.

The Spaniards
feare least the Venetians
make peace with the Turkes

In the meane time Pius Quintus dyed generally lamented, a man of great Sanctimony and zealous of the common good of Christendome, the onely instrument of the preleruation and augmentation of the league.

Death of Pius Quintus.

These newes flying to Venice, the Senate presently by letters sollicitd the Colledge of Cardinals, not to suffer the league, which his late Holinesse had chearfully to dye with him, knowing how mortall delay was to it, and how preiudiciall the dissolution, to the common good: the Colledge reloued to continue the preparation for warre, and instantly committed the managing of the businesse vnto the former Commissioners, who then presently went to land with it.

The Venetians
solicite the Cardinals in the way of the league.

10 The Papacy was not long vacant, for the same day the Conclaued elected Inigo Boncompagno Cardinal of Saint Sixtus, a Bolognesse & doctor of the lawes long resident and very famous in the Court of Rome intituling himselfe Gregory 13.

His Coronation solemnized he confirmed the league in the former condition but concerning the conuention of the fleets there arose many delays and difficulties: for D. Iohn only seeking procrastination, grew scrupulous of his departure, saying his commission extended no farther, but every day expected a more ample, wherewith hee hoped ere long to satisfie them: by this meanes was the great preparation of the Venetian frustrate, and D. Iohn perseuering in these protractiōns, wrote to the Generall Foscarini that his onely stay was for the Duke of Sessa, who if he came not very speedily, himselfe reloued without him to come to Corfou: hee likewise taxed Collonna, because his expectation of the Florentine Gallies, made him delay his ioyning with the fleet. The Senate had enioyned the Generall Foscarini not to attempt any particular enterprize till the Spanish Gallies were arrived, lest he thereby should hinder the common cause of the league.

The enterprize
vpon Castile was postponed to the same.

At the same time Sciara Martinenga of Bressia a man famous for his martiall experience, and Gouvernor Generall of Albania propounded the enterprize vpon Castile: to the Senate, a matter greatly desired by the Venetians, not so much for facility of conquest, the towne being small and badly inhabited, as for the commodious situation thereof, lying at the mouth of the Gulph of Catharra.

The Senate in some sort desirous to let the enemies seele the fury of their Armes committed this attempt to Martinenga, who told them that he had already sufficiently viewed the place, and that the execution thereof was easie. Hee imbarcked himselfe and five thousand footmen at Chioggia, among whom were many Frenchmen, gallant fellows and good soldiers, hee directed his course towards the Gulph of Catharra, carrying with him a commission from the Councell of Tennesse the General Veneri to aid and assist him in that enterprize, whom meeting by the way neere to Silena they sailed together towards the mouth of the Gulph, where landing their soldiers and attempting to surprize the Towne, the alarme was so whor ouer the whole Countrey, as multitudes of Turkes coming to defend it, Martinenga and the Generall were enforced to quit the enterprize and to retreat, the one to Zara, and the other with his French forces to Catharra.

The attempt
vpon Castile
was in vaine.

After this manner did the Christians affaires languish, and were nothing answerable to the reputation which the late victory had gotten them, their fleets and soldiers remaying idle at Corfou and Messina, being spectators of the enemies insulting braues at sea, their number and victuals daily diminishing: D. Iohn still remaying at Messina and vsing his former delays, did infinitely discontent the Generall Foscarini, who sometimes determined of him selfe to attempt somewhat vpon the enemy, but at last making a vertue of necessity and knowing his owne forces alone to weake for any great enterprize, he was enforced to spend the time in expectation of the confederates arrivall. And yet he did by all meanes auoide any

any occasion that might discontent the Spaniards, or giue them cause of any suspicion, that they might haue no lawfull cause to bee wanting to the common cause.

Foscarini being thus perplexed, thought it best to send the Prouidator Soranza to Messina, who was newly come from Candy, hoping that by his wisdom and discretion, Don Iohn being put in minde of his former honor, might bee speedily induced to depart. Soranza departed from Corfou with twenty five Gallies, hauing foule weather all the way: at last arriuing at Messina, hee was honorably entertained by Marc-Antonio Colonna, excusing himselfe and imputing it to the tempest, that he had not met him farther at sea: they both went to Don Iohns 10
 Pallace, and at the gates were receiued by the Count of Piega his chiefe Steward, and principall Gentlemen of his household, conducting them into the Princes, presence, who with all honorable curtesie welcomed him, seeming highly contented with his comming: Soranza began to acquaint him with the cause of his arriuall, together with the state of matters, and incredible desire of all men to see him at Corfou: he informed him of the great number of Gallies, soldiers, abundance of victuals and munitions, wherewith two and twenty ships were laden: that they onely wanted the conuention of the fleets, which they all desired in so important an action: in regard whereof hee was sent to acquaint him with the state of the Venetians navy, and to waite vpon him to Corfou. That the Venetian Captains, 20 who had a long time bin in readinesse, would attempt nothing without his presence, notwithstanding that they had beene often inuited thereto by report of the enemies weaknesse, and by their wrongs and spoiles committed in the Islands vnder their dominion: That the Senate, and euery particular man, desired to haue the glory and honor of all enterprises bestowed vpon him: for which cause especially they had hitherto kept their whole fleet in harbor, being wel assured that his arriuall at Corfou would be no longer deferred, & that his own present comming to Messina, was rather to honor: then hasten his departure: saying that nothing would be more dangerous to the league, then continuation of delay. Marc-Antonio Colonna, did in the Popes name second Soranza, telling him how much his Holinesse desired the prosperitie of the league, and conuention of the fleets. 30

Don Iohn seemed not to distaste this motion, excusing his delay by sundry impediments hapned, promising euery after to vse all possible speed, and to take order for the present rigging of an hundred Gallies which should bee man'd with forty thousand footemen of severall nations. But the effects were not answerable to his words, for at that time there were but three score Gallies in the hauen of Messina: and of those which the Duke of Sessa was to bring from Spaine, there was no newes at all: Besides, the old soldiers refused to go any farther, vnlesse they might receiue certaine moneths pay which was due vnto them for their former seruice. Yet they dayly fed the Venetian Prouidator with sundry hopes and faire promises: and the better to beguile him, they imbarcked three thousand Italian foot in thirty Gallies vnder the conduct of the General of Naples, giuing it forth that they were to goe before to Corfou, there to expect the remainder of the fleet.

In these delays did they waste time, and halfe Iune was spent without any exploit vpon the enemy, or any certaine hope or resolution what to do: his Holinesse solicitations being therein of no more force then that of the Venetians: for the Pope hauing often by letters, and lately by his expresse messenger the Bishop of Odiscalca hastned Don Iohn: he went about to satisfie him with good words, & faire promises, so far, as the navy was blest by his Holinesse Nuncio, processions and prayers appointed to be made, and a day prefix taken for their departure.

In the end, D. Iohn knowing no more how to excuse his delay, being on euery side solicited to depart, the Marquis of Santa Cruz, arriuing with the Gallies of Naples, and Don Iuan de Cardenas with those of Sicill, his owne Admirall Galley being 50

Soranza is honorably entertained by Don Iohn at Messina.

His Remembrance to D. Iohn.

The Spaniards delays.

The true cause of Don Iohns delay.

being likewise ready, was constrained to discouer the truth of the matter, which was, that hee had receiued expresse commandement from Spaine, not to carry the fleet into the Leuant, by reason of the Kings doubt of the French, which had restrayned his commission and forces in a place from whence hee might easily depart (if need should be) to defend the territories of the Spanish King.

Soranza vnderstanding the true cause of D. Iohns delay, and perceiuing his own earnest soliciting to be in vaine thought it fit before his departure, at leastwise to trye if for the honour of the league he would lend him part of his navy, which being ioyned to the Venetians at Corfou, might preferue the glory and reputation 10 which it had formerly wonne: yet because he would not bee seene in it himselfe, he caused Colonna to demand it, wherevpon the Councell being often assembled, they at last resolued to lend him 22. Gallies and 5000. foot: but because many of them were to be drawn from the Garrisons of Calabria; their departure was yet longer delayed. Gilles Andreada Knight of Malta had command of the Gallies as Generall to the King, and Vincenzo Turtanila Count of Sarna commanded the soldiers.

With these Gallies and those of the Church, 13. in number, eleven of the Duke of Florence, and two of Michaele Bonello brother to Cardinal Alexandrine, the Prouidator Soranza returned to Corfou, and by the way Marc-Antonio Colonna, 20 displayed the ensigne of the league, and held the place of Generall.

The Intention of the Spaniards published, it was euery where reported that the whole force of the league would not for that yeare make any expedition into the Leuant: and yet the Spanish Ambassador at Rome had intelligence that notwithstanding the affaires of Flanders a journey might be made into the east, and therefore that his Kings Gallies should direct their course to Affrike, and likewise to releuee Sicily. Muleassan King of Tunis his pursute with D. Iohn to excite him to this enterprize, was cause that al men beleueed this report: and yet mens discourses were different for though the warre of Flanders was not new, the accidents 30 were so, which enforced the Catholick King to haue a care of the preservation of those Countreies where the enemies forces and disorders were very much augmented For Count Nassau hauing at the beginning of the yeare taken Mons in Henault, and not long after the City of Valenciennes, his whole forces consisting of forraigne soldiers and for the most part French, this bred great distrust and ieaoulzie betwixt the two mighty Kings of France and Spayne, so as the Duke of Alua, then Governour of the Low-Countreies, did speedily aduertize his maister thereof, the like did he to the Pope and Venetians, amplifying the matter more then needed, wherewith Cardinall Granuell and the Spanish Ambassador that were at Rome, wrote speedily to D. Iohn, willing him not to depart from Messina, all 40
 Spaine being in alarme, which did likewise put some ieaalous distrust in the French, least the Spaniards with their navy should invade Prouence, wherevpon they beganne to fortifie Marcellles, and other important places, placing in them strong Garrisons.

Vpon a rumor spread abroad that the Duke of Alua should publicly say that hee accounted warre to bee open betwixt Spaine and France, the most Christian King was moued therat, & made many complaints by his Ambassadors not onely at Rome and Venice, but in Spaine also, being partly greeued that his chiefe officers did affirme so important a matter, which as himselfe desired, hee supposed others would doe the like: in part like-wile going about 50 to iustifie his owne actions, from which it seemed that the Duke of Aluas suspicion proceeded, causing him to vse such speech.

The Christian King affirmed, that those French which had followed the Count Nassau at the taking of Valenciennes, were indeed his subiects, but all of them of the

D. Iohn lets dett the Venetians 22. Gallies.

the Protestant faction, and by consequent disobedient rebels to the Crowne of France: that hee had euer beene greatly greued for the troubles in Flanders, as one that in his owne kingdome had too much experience of subiects rebellion, and whose part it was to roote out, and not by such examples to cherish the boldnesse of vassalls against their Prince; being as desirous of the wealth of Christendome as any other liuing, although his owne particular troubles would not at that time permit him to shew it in effect: and seeing with his owne forces hee could not assist them, his meaning was not to hinder the good intent of others: that he had some armed vessels ready, not to assaile or offend any one, but onely for the safety of his owne seas infested by Pyrates: the number of his vessels being insufficient for any great action.

The French King forbiddeth his subiects to goe into Flanders.

These or such like discourses did the French Kings Ambassadors by their maiesties commendement vse in Spaine, Rome, and Venice: and to giue the greater credit vnto them, they were by Edict euery where published, with a prohibition to all French men, on grieuous penalties, not to passe with their armes into Flanders: and not satisfied here-with, his most Christian Maiesty, seemed at the same time to incline to the league, whereupon, the Cardinall Lorraine, by his commendement, did often conferre with the Venetian Ambassador, resident in his Court concerning that businesse, whom hee went about to perswade, that the French King was wholly bent to procure the peace of Christendome, with a singular affection toward the Crowne of Spaine.

It is concluded by the Protestants to moue the French King to warre.

All this notwithstanding, the Spaniards were no better satisfied then before, saying, That the French did but this to color their practices, and to open themselves a way to assaile the Catholick Kings territories in sundry places: That they had certaine notice, how that the King of Nauarre, and the Admirall Coligni, did openly vrge the most Christian King to vndertake that warre, whom hee must needs please, in regarde of his owne particular interests, the chiefe Lords and Princes of his Court, mainteining that France would neuer bee at quiet, vnlesse the King did resolue vpon some forraigne enterprife, wherein to employ both Catholicks and Protestants, and among others, that of Flanders seemed the easiest for many respects: That he might make that warre with some color, by reason of the claime of the Crowne of France to those Countries: in which warre without all question the Queene of England would willingly haue a share, in regarde of her disast of the Catholick King: That the marshall of Montmorency went into England to none other end, then to conclude the League with the English, and that both of them together being freed from other troubles, might the eallier enuade the Netherlands: Besides, that the French Kings league with the Turke, made them to suspect, that hee went about to procure the Turkes Army to enuade the Catholick King, as they had done in former times, especially seeing it was reported that the Turke had giuen the city of Tunis to the French King, and promised with his forces to defend it against the Spaniards.

The Spaniards are jealous of the French motions.

The Pope being greatly moued at these delays, as well for the common interest of Christendome, as his owne reputation, which hee accounted to bee much blemished, in that hee at his first comming to the Papacy hauing freely confirmed the league, the Nauy should now become idle and vnprofitable, or else be employed to any other end, which the King of Spaine could not doe, it being set forth at the Clergies cost, by permission and authority of the Sea Apostolick, onely against the Turkes. This caused his Holinesse to send new messengers to Don Iohn, to command him speedily to depart and ioine with the Venetians fleet: and on the other, hee counselled the Venetians to dispatch speedy Ambassadors to the French and Spanish courts, to roote out all suspicious doubts, and distrusts betwixt those Kings, and particularly to incite the Catholick Maiesty, to send away his fleet without any more delay, according to the articles of the league.

His

His Holinesse sent his Nuncios for that purpose, Antonio Maria Saluati Bishop of Saint Pepsito the French King, and Nicolo Ormaneto Bishop of Padua to the King of Spaine. The Emperor likewise vied meanes to anone these two Kings, being moued therevnto by sundry particular respects of his owne: but the Venetians more then any shewed themselves earnest and ready in this businesse as well in regard of their owne interest, as for that they were loath to giue the Pope any cause to suspect, that by not stirring in so important a designe, their mindes were turned to peace, and thereby to disaste him of the league.

They then according to his commendement chose two Ambassadors, namely, Giovane Michele for France, and Antonio Tepulo for Spaine, who made haft to those Courts. Michele being come into France did briefly acquaint the King with the Senates desire to see a firme and assured peace established betwixt Christian Princes, that being afterwards vniued, they might turne their forces vpon the common enemy: he told him that the Venetians were much discontented with the rebellions of Flanders, and with the incalzies which therevpon arose betwixt his Maiesty and the Catholick King, which if they should haue lasted, could not but haue procured great hurt to Christendome: but by how much the matter was great and important of it selfe, by so much the lesse could the Senate be induced to beleue it, being well acquainted with his Maiesties discret loue and affection to the common good: And because the persuasions of those, who are enemies to peace, and who for their owne particular interest, are wont to diuert Princes from their good and honourable deaignes, the Senate would not be wanting therein following the custome of their ancestors) to employ in that businesse, the fauour which it particularly presumed to haue with his Maiesty, to exhort him to stop his eares to such inducements, and if peraduenture he had already entertained them, that it might please him in the behalfe of Christendome, and for his particular loue to their Commonwealt to casser them, to the end that the Catholick King freed from that doubt, might freely harken to the enterprises of the Lewant, and obserue the Articles of the league.

Ambassadors sent from Venice, to France and Spaine.

The Venetian Ambassadors discourse to the French King.

The King gaue a willing eare to this discourse, saying that the Senate was in no sort deceiued of his exceeding loue towards their Commonwealt, and least of all, in beleening that he was desirous of the wealth and aduancement of Christendome: that the troubles of Flanders had neuer pleased him, that he had vsed all possible meanes, to keepe his subiects from being adherents or supporters of those Rebels: but that the condition of those times, and the present wretched estate of his Kingdome would not permit him to tame the insolency of some that loued inuouation, who were not to be wondered at, if after they had raised troubles in his owne Realme, went about to doe the like in his neighbours Dominions: that it had neuer beene by his consent, for that would haue hurt the Catholick King, and done no good to France, but on the contrary, would haue procured new troubles which might easily incite the Catholick King to an agreement with the Flemings, and afterwards to make warre vpon him in Daulphiné, or in the Kingdome of Nauar, by which meanes, in seeking to carry the war into a foraine country, he might be enforced to bring it into his owne, at such a time when the forces of his Realme were wasted and diuided by long ciuill wars. The Queene mother being present at this discourse, who at that time had great authority in managing the affaires of the Kingdome, desirous to preferre peace, would needs with her owne hand write to his Holinesse to assure him of her willingness in all things to follow his aduise and counsell: and that if her sonne the King had raised forces, it was not done with an intent to hurt any but only to serue and defend himself from the Spaniards who were reported vpon no iust cause to haue taken armes.

The French Kings answer to the Venetian Ambassador.

The mother Queene of France writes to the Pope.

The Catholick King on the other side, before Tepulo his arriual at his Court, resolued to write to Don Iohn, That all other respects laid aside, hee should make haft with his Gallies to ioine with the Venetians and with them to saile

The Catholick
Kings resolution before the Ambassadors
arrual.

Tepalolis suite to the King of Spaine.

The Spanies resolution when they perceived the Spanis delaties.

Colonna his aduice.

General Fos-carini his answer to Colo-
na.

into the Leuant, being hereunto moued by intelligence of the French Kings affection towards him, or else, for that he did not much feare his power, hauing recouered Valenciennes, or because he would not so much honor the French, as to haue it said, that for feare of them he had giuen ouer so important an enterprize, as that against the Turkes, or (that which is most like to be true) because, as became a wife and vertuous Prince, he would in no sort omit that wherevnto he was obliged by the league: but whatsoever it were that caused this resolution it is certaine that it proceeded from his owne proper motion, and that he did write so to Don John, before he acquainted his counsell therewith, fearing lest they should propound some difficulties, which might haue diuerted him from it as in former times.

Antonio Tepulo in the meane time being come into Spaine and aduertized of the Kings determination, did not speake any thing of the French iealozies or vniing of the Nauies, but only intreated the King to permit D. John, in regard the time of yeere was almost past for sea-affaires to winter in the Leuant, moued therevnto by sundry reasons which much imported the Venetian Commonwealth. The King neuerthelesse alleading many reasons to the contrary, would not grant his request, either of his owne proper motion as being vnwilling to hazard too much on fortune, or else being so aduised by such as were not greatly affected to the league. Now, whilest the confederate fleet went slowly forward, the great and mighty Turkish navy scoured the sea. For Vluzzali being made General there of, besides the gallies which he had received of CARAZZANI, had with great speed rig'd and man'd an hundred others, with all which, departing in great pompe and magnificence from Constantinople, he had already past the Streight of Gallipolis and came forward intending to waite and spoile the Isle of Candy, and other places belonging to the Venetians, according as he should haue intelligence of the progression of the Christian fleet: certaine newes being at that time brought to Venice of the stay and delaties of the Spanish fleet, which did much discontent them, and made them wonder that the Spaniards, who at first had been so desirous of the league, should after such a fortunate and vnhop'd for successe (fearing some vncertaine and remote dangers) wholly deprime themselves of the present and assured beauty thereof. The Senate not being able to discover wherevnto those delaties tended, thinking it vaine to expect their assistance any longer, determined to write to Generall Foscarini that without any longer expectation of the convention of the fleets, so soone as the Prouidator Souranza should returne to Corfou, he should put to sea, to encourage their subiects, and assure their owne territories, & proceeding warily, to embrace such occasions as God should offer him, for the honor and profit of the Commonwealth. Foscarini receiuing this commandement & tired with his idle aboad there, so soon as the Prouidator Souranza & Colonna came to Corfou, propounded the departure of the navy into the Leuant, wherevnto all men consenting, they began to consult about their iourney. But Antonio Colonna did freely and with great affection vtter his good meaning towards the affaires of the league, and in particular to the profit & aduancement of the Venetian Commonwealth, much bewailing the time lost and the diminution of their forces: neuerthelesse he willed them to hope well, assuring them that the Spanish Kings intention was honorable, and the Pope very earnest in soliciting him, and that Don John with the residue of the fleet would shortly meet them: yet though the Popes subiect, and seruant to the King of Spaine, he was resolved to spend his life in that enterprize, it importing the Venetians particular seruice, whom hee knew were more interested in that warre than any other.

Generall Foscarini replied, that the State was well acquainted with the Pope and Catholike Kings loue, and they of the States affection and inclination to the league, as the proceeding herein testified: but Colonna's vertue, zeale to the common good of Christendome, and particular affection to the Venetian Commonwealth, was not only manifested to themselves, but to the whole world, by

10

20 30

40

50

10

so many noble seruices in aduancement of the league: yet himselfe could not choose but lament, that so many fayre occasions presented, they had imbraced them as they deferred. But since it was fruitlesse to call backe time past, and they not able to remove the impediments detaying D. John in Sicely, the onely remedy hereof is to redeeme delatyes past with present expedition, and to set forward against the enemy inferior to themselves both in number and valor. And seeing it hath pleased the diuine providence, conducting humane actions in by wayes to vs vnknewne) that the confederate fleet should bee thus disioyned, let vs see if wee can set vpon them diuided, which they would shunne if we were vnited: If wee can enforce them to retire, it will bee much to vs to haue in this sort maintayned the reputation of the league and confirmed our owne estates without the Spanish ayde. Colonna approved the opinion of Foscarini, confirming it by many arguments: not-with-standing he aduised him to conduct the Gallies and Galeots altogether, the Ponents then seruing them fitly for their course.

Gil Andrada stood newtrall betwixt these opinions, onely saying they ought to proceede circumspectly, and not without necessity or aduantage hazard so important an attempt, adding that further intelligence was requisite, by which they were to direct their proceeding: but highly commended the counsell of Colonna for carrying all their force vnited and well furnished, not exposing themselves to casualty, concluding that their opinions should sway his.

Thus resolving to leaue Corfou, the fleet consisted of six score and six Gallies, six Galliaffes and twenty shippes, and in euery Galley an hundred and twenty Souldiers: it was diuided into three battailles; in the mayne lay the three Generalls with five and forty Gallies: the rest were equally distributed into two wings, the Prouidator Souranza conducting the right, and Canalis the left; reseruing place in the vanguard for the Gallies of Candy hourly expected, each squadron towed two Galeasses, and part of the shipping so disposed, that when need required they might affront the Galleis, yet not to fight without those vessells. The fleet being ready to depart, a Fregate from Palermo came to the Venetian Generall, sent by Phleido Ragazzon, certifying him that a Galley from Spaine was come to D. John at Messina, bringing commandatory letters from the King that hee should without any more delay ioyne his whole fleet with that of the Venetians: This was afterwards confirmed by D. John's owne letters, written to Marc-Antony Colonna. Although these newes were pleasing to euery man, yet did they not hinder the resolved departure of the fleet: For vpon the 28. of Iuly the three Generalls left the Gamoniffes, where they had tarried for the Prouidator Canalis who was gonneto Ottaranto with sixtene Gallies, to take in three thousand foot, vnder the command of Collonell Horatio Aquasina, sonne to the Duke of Atria: which at their arrual were distributed among the fleet. Before their departure from the Gamoniffes, Giouan Mocenigo with his Galley was despatch't to Candy to acquaint them with the comming of the Christian fleet, and to make discovery of the enemies, of whom no newes could bee heard. The fleet then vnder sayle, the Prouidator Quirini returning from Candy with 30. Gallies, came to it at the entrance of the Channell Viscarda, from whence with a fayre winde (though the towing of the greater vessells did hinder the way) they held on their course to Zant, where hauing no newes of the enemies, and enforced to spend two dayes there, inaking in fresh water, they sent forth 3 other Gallies to discover vnder vnde, those of Angelo Sarrana, Philipo Leone, Venetians, and that of Romegas a knight of Malta.

Vluzzali at this time ankored vnder the Castle of Maluesia with 200 Gallies, and many other lesser Vessells, hauing intelligence that the Christian fleet fought him, which disvnted he thought durst not haue departed fro Corfou, & therefore had sent certaine Gallies to wards the Promontory of Malas, whom hee presently called Colonna's opinion concerning the sitting forward towards the enemies.

Gil Andrada his opinion.

Don John certifying that the Venetians that bee with Phleido Ragazzon.

The fleet departing not without Canalis.

called back, & stayed in this place to receive more certaine newes of the enemies. And being truly aduertized that it made towards him, and that already it was come as farre as Cerigo; in number of small vessells it was inferior to his, but superiour in greater, he determined to put to sea and encounter them. And calling vnto him the cheefe Commanders of his fleet, he encouraged them to battaile, telling them how faire an occasion was offered to purchase immortall glory and credit with their great Lord by breaking the Christian small fleet, which was so audacious to come and seek them, thinking thereby to avoid the spoile of Candy: that his meaning was to leaue the haven, to order his navy, and to fight with the daring Christians: this said, he confirmed his words with shew of performance, and presently prepared all necessaries for the fight, directing his course towards the Cape of Malca. In the meane time the two Gallies of Sarizana and Romegas returned to the fleet at Cerigo, bringing certaine newes that Vluzzali lay in the haven of Malueta with 200. saile: Heerevpon, the three Generalls considering that it would redound to their dishonour not to fight with the enemies being so neere, determined with one consente to saile to the Cape of Malca, and to offer the enemies battaile. According to this resolution the whole fleet went to the head of Cerigo called Dragoniera, a the neereft place to the Cape of Malca, from whence they might view the enemies countenance, and entertaine any offered occasion. There early in a morning on the seauenth of August the watch discovered the Turkish navy, sailing towards the Channell of Cerigo, which being but some miles from the fleet they easily supposed that it was coming directly to vs ward to fight: the three Generalls commanded the ensignes to be displayed, tromps sounded, and disposed all things in readinesse for the fight: the fleet being thus arranged in the Dragonieras, and made towards the Cape of Malca, to be in a more commodious place to offer battaile to the enemies, who at first made shewing acceptable, but when the Turks came neerer they altered their course and went to the Hanes Island which is a rocke neere to the Promontory from whence they came. I know not whether they did it for feare or else because Vluzzali had no commission nor intent to fight, but only made a shew thereof to maintaine his owne reputation: Some thought that Vluzzali like a skilfull Seaman made that retreat to get a westerly wind, which at that time of yeare is wont to blow in those quarters, that he might afterwards by the advantage thereof inuest our navy: which being prevented by the Christian Captaines, and a fourth east wind arising Vluzzali was enforced to alter his determination, and being come to the point of the life of Cerigo towards the west, he hewed the Channell which lies betwixt the Hanes Island, and that of Cerigo, and therein that large space of Sea of ten miles, and turning his prowes towards the Christian fleet, he diuided his navy into three great squadrons, consisting of equal number of vessells, and there attended them. Both fleets were resolved, the one not to fight without the Galeasses, and the other not to come neere those his vessells, who the yeare before had done them such mischief. This day of the enemies did profit our men, who thereby had time to order the fleet in better forme; and within a while after, the wind proving favorable to them, they set forward and came so neerer to one another, that the Turkish fleet from both sides, but our men being scared of wind, could not come forward without deciding the great battaile from the life. The Turkish fleet consisted of 200. saile among which were 160. well armed Gallies, the rest were lesser vessells implect among them. That of the Christians exceeded not the number of 127. light Gallies, but they had six Galeasses, and 22. shippes of warre excellently armed. Both these fleets for many weekes were thought to be in a running squall, Vluzzali meaning nothing lesse then to fight, yet fearing by open fight to dishonour his great master, and for unwilling to enable the Christian glory like a pollingue captaine, made those of their ships intended for stemming dangers to fight he did delay the Christians and still keeping the prowes of his Gallies vpon them by little and little he gaue back; and by the approach of night, and by a warlike stratagem which hee vsed (for hee sent one Galley bearing a lanthorne a contrary way, to make them think that he followed with the rest) he escaped at his pleasure. About the same time Sigismund King of Poland dyed without issue male, wherevpon Charles the French King desirous to procure that Crowne for his brother the Duke of Anjou, sent his Ambassadors thither. But to returne to the enemies. They were decried the next morning sailing towards the arme of Meina. Our men hauing kept at Sea all night failed to Cerigo, enforced to take in fresh water, and to refresh their tired rowers, where continuing all that day and a peece of the next, spies brought word that they had discovered the enemies not farre from thence, wherevpon they speedily imbarcked their soldiers and went to meet them: but their labour being fruitlesse, they lay all night at Sea in order of battaile, and the next day which was the tenth of August by daybreak they descried them at the Cape of Matapan, lying with the prowes of their Gallies to land ward. Vluzzali perceiving that the Christians had discovered him, shot off certaine warning peeces to call his men aboard, and ordered all things for battaile. The Christians approaching the Turks came forth of the Haven with their fleet diuided into three battailes, whereof the left wing was a great way extended to the Sea, the right wing kept neere to the maine, wherein was Vluzzali him-selfe, coming on faire and softly, somtime purposely steering his course to draw the Christian Gallies from the Galeasses and shippes. The Turke fearing nothing more then the Galeasses, commanded both his wings to fetch a great compass about, the one towards the right, and the other towards the left, alooff from the Galeasses and shippes, which being prevented by the Christians, by turning their wings likewise in manner of a Cresent, their mayne battaile fronted that of the Turkes. The wings of the Turkes fleet being thus diuided from their battaile seemed very advantageous for the Christians, which Generall Foscarini (ready to lay hold on any faire occasion) perceiving, requested Collonna and Andrada, that not tarrying for the shippes and Galeasses, they would with him vpon the sodaine assaile the enemies battaile, deprived of the wings, hoping to breake it ere they could arise to rescue it, and with couragious speeches entreated them to follow his counsell. The Generalls encouragement and aduice was ioyfully receiued by all the hearers, but Collonna and Andrada said, that it was dangerous so to doe, for feare of drawing the enemies three battailes vpon them at once, being not able to resist them without the help of the Galeasses and shippes, and that therefore without those vessells they would by no meanes hazard the fortune of the battaile. The wings of the Christians in turning about to confront those of the enemy, were somewhat disordered, which the Turkes perceiving went about with certaine Gallies to circumuent the stragglers, which Souzanzer noting, went against them with foure Gallies, and made a fierce fight, in the midst whereof, fearing to be enclosed with forty of their Gallies making towards him, he was presently relieved by 20. Gallies and two of the Galeasses, whose murdering shot made such hauck among them, as in a small time 18. of their Gallies were rent and torne, whereat the Turkes being amazed returned as though they had rather fled then retreated. One of Souzanzer's Gallies was shot through in this fight, him-selfe returning againe to his Squadron. The Christians had determined not to ioyne battaile without their Galeasses and tall shippes, which Vluzzali well vnderstood, as well by the fugitives and his owne spies, as by their manner of sayling. And he him-selfe though he were willing to fight, yet the better to frustrate the Christians designs, who drew with them their Galeasses and other greater vessells, he sent his vessells of burthen to Malueta, whereby he freed him-selfe of a great burthen, and made him-selfe apt to take or leaue fight at his owne pleasure. The day growing to an end, Vluzzali perceiving that he had done enough for that time, both for the allaying of the Christian heate, and encouragement of his own soldiers, in seemly order as one not afraid, failed with his whole fleet together to Corona. And the Christians retired to Cerigo.

The end of the first Booke of the seventh Decade.

The Contents of the second Booke of the seventh Decad.

VLZZALI determineth to assaill Don Iohn ere hee should come to the fleet. Difficulties made by those of the Christian Navy to meet with Don Iohn to free him from that encounter. Don Iohn with the Spanish forces comes to Corfu. The resolution of the Confederate Captaines. Vluzzali resolves not to fight with the Confederats. Those of the league resolve to assaill the towne and Castle of Modon. The Confederate fleet staies in the Haven of Nauarin. Nauarin is besieged. The Confederates raise their campe from before Nauarin, and determine to returne into the West. Vluzzali after the retreat of the Christian fleet returneth to Constantinople. Don Iohn returnes to Naples, and Collonna goeth into Spain. The Venetians complaine to the Pope of the meane proceeding of the Spanish fleet. The State of Dalmatia during the warre. A fort builded by the Turkes at Catharr is raised by the Venetians. Conference of peace with the Venetian Bayly at Constantinople. Peace or warre is propounded in the councill of Terme. The Princes of Christendome having intelligence of the Venetians practises of peace with the Turke goe about by their offers to interrupt it. Of what efficacy the oration of Prince Mocenigo was concerning that subiect. The causes moving the Senate to condescend to peace. Peace is made betwixt the Venetians and Turkes. And lastly the Articles thereof.

The

The second Booke of the seventh Decade
of the History of Venice.

VHILEST the Christian fleet remained at Cerigo, it had intelligence that Vluzzali had taken one of our Flegats which had acquainted him how that Don Iohn was coming to the fleet, where-upon hee prepared to meete him. Colonna and Gyl. Andrada being moued at these newes, propounded, that all other matters being laid aside, they were to depart thence with the greatest number of Gallies to meet with Don Iohn and free him from that danger. This councill was reiected by the Venetian Capitaines, saying, that to chiew an vn certaine danger, they exposed the fleet, and all the force of the confederats to a manifest perill; seeing that the great vessells could not faile from Cerigo by reason of a contrary winde, nor yet remaine there in safety, the Gallies being reduced to a smaller number with sundry other allegations, which were not allowed by Colonna nor Andrada: for they thought that they might safely carry away an hundred Gallies with them to Zant, and at one time secure Don Iohns arrival, and yet fend the great vessells to Candy which was an easie matter to be done, they saying that this was the best aduise for the easie conuention of the confederate fleet.

Whilest this important businesse was vnresolved, a Fregat opportunely arrived from Don Iohn aduertizing them that hee could not depart from Messina till the first of August. Though this newes did cleere the former difficulties among the Capitaines, yet did it not wipe out discontent from their mindes: for they like-wise vnderstood, that Don Iohn had no meaning when he should arrive to go farre with his Gallies, but by letters expresse commanded the Admiralls, to come and meete him; which by reason of contrary winds especially, they being to carry along with them so many great vessells, could not be done without much losse of time, danger and distast to those Islanders subiect to the Venetians, forsaking them at such a time when the enemy was so strong at Sea and at their doores. Not-with-standing, they generally resolved to obey Don Iohns command: but it being an impossibility to carry the great vessells with them, they determined first to leaue them safely in Candy, and from thence to direct their course to Zant. Next, the lesse this resolution was not afterwards affected, by reason of new intelligence of the enemies fleet, which was descried nor farre from the Cape of Malea, which verily perswaded them that they were going to intercept D. Iohn, where-upon the Christian fleet dislodged, and went to the arme of Meina from whence Vluzzali was newly departed. From thence being fauored with a faire South-East wind, within three daies they arrived at Zant, where contrary to their hope not meeting with Don Iohn but receiving a new commandement to come to him to Cephalonia, they were enforced to leaue the great vessells there, though in great danger to be taken by the enemies, who vpon the least inckling thereof would

Quirini safe conducts the great vessels to the fleet.

not have failed to returne to sea on them: which being likely to happen, some of the cheefe of the Spanish fleet were of opinion, that seeing it was an hard matter to secure them, to send backe to haue them burnt; But Generall Felcarin deserting this counsell, sent the Prouidator Quirini thither with fūe and twenty Gallies to safe-conduct them to the fleet.

*The number of the confederate
fleet.*

*The order of the confederate
fleet.*

From Cephalonia they went to Corfou, whither Don John was come on the ninth of August with fifty fūe Gallies, thirty three shippes, and fūeteen thousand foot-men, who though at first he could hardly dissemble his discontent, for that they had not waited his comming, but had like to haue inforced him for want of sufficient forces to haue gone alone into the leuant, and to remayne idle at Corfou, to the derogation (as he said) of his reputation and greatnesse, was neuertheless at last content to forget what was past, and seemed very carefull and desirous to enterprize any honorable or important action, for the profit and seruice of the league, much amplifying it in words, because it was publicly reported thorow the army, that he came but onely for a shew, and not with intent or commission to exploit any thing, and that he had euer vsed delays and excuses, elschewing all occasions of assailing the enemy, or of employing him-selfe in any certaine enterprizes, which suspitions did dayly more and more encrease, all men perceiving, after so many delays, that he referred all resolutions to the arriuall of the Duke of Sessa and his Gallies from Spaine. But the Venetians told him that their forces there, were more then sufficient, for, vnited, they amounted to the number of a hundred ninety foure Gallies, eight Gallies, besides forty fūe ships, to meet thirty Spanish and fūeteen Venetians. All these Vessells before their departure from the Gomenisses were drawne into forme of bataille: The three Generalls lay in the maine with 62. Gallies; the Marquis Santa Cruz conducted the right wing, and the Prouidator Souranza the left, and in each wing were fifty two Gallies: Petro Iustiniano Generall of Malta commanded the vanguard with sixe Gallies, Iuan de Cardona and Nicolo Donato led the rereward with twenty two Gallies, Don Rodrigo de Mendoza, and Adriano Bragadino had charge of the shippes, determining neuertheless to carry them to Zant, and there to leave them, intending to vse some of them for the transportation of victuall and munition. In this order the fleet departed from Paxu on the eleventh of September, vncertaine as yet what course to hold, vnlesse it were to set forwards to incounter with the enemy, who, by their Gallies sent to discover, were reported to lie at Modon and Nauarine, diuided and in great want of all necessaries, especially of men, most of whome were dead, and gone away, wherevpon they remained safely there till the arriuall of new supplies.

*The confederate
fleet arrive.*

These newes did greatly reioyce the whole fleet: thinking that a fit occasion was offered to ouerthrow the enemies, presuming that the Turkes hauing intelligence of the conuention of the Confederate fleet, much superior to theirs in strength, would according to their custome returne to Constantinople to winter in the streight, hauing gotten honor by twice confronting the Christian Navy, and making shew to fight. Some of Don Johns Councillors did afterwards make vse of these reasons to impair the credit of their former intelligence, confirmed by many euident signes: wherevpon by giuing too great authority to those men, their departure was delayed, to the great preiudice of the enterprize, and yet every man in conselt, that the onely hope of happinesse consisted in the speedy execution thereof, not giuing the enemies any time to fle or vnite themselves because a suddaine and vnlookt for assault would more terrifie and disorder them.

The Captaines then presently determined to set forward, and sayling on their course vnderfired from Zant, to fall suddenly on the Isle Sapienza, seated betwixt Nauarin and Modon, to shutte vp the enemies passage, and keepe them from helping one another. But the execution of this designe was retire to the dunk.*

*The enemies

Quirini increases the fight.

*Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayen in the confederate
fleet.*

so long delayed, and the fleet went so slowly for ward, as when by day brake it should haue bene at Sapienza it was scarce come to Prodaua, where being distressed by those of the Castle of Nauarin, the Turkes that were their had time to retire in safety to Modon, passing along in the view of our Nauie, which seeing them come forth, and doubting that Fluscali would offer them bataille, ordered all their squadrons, and after some small stay, our vanguard set forward, and equalling neere to the enemies, discharged their ordnance vpon them, to draw them to fight; but the Turkes hauing noe such intent, and finding no aduantage, retired vnder the protection of the Castle of Modon. After the enemies retreat their arose great doubts and difficulties among the, Captaines concerning their proceeding, thinking it a dangerous and impossible matter, to enter into the Channell of Modon to fight with the enemies fleet: the entrance whereof, narrow of it selfe, was flanked with great store of ordnance, wherevpon the Generall knowing that the enemy could not be enforced to fight, determined to retire to Sapienza and to enter the Hauens, the two wings being gone afore. Fluscali perceiving the Confederates retreat, came forth with fifty Gallies to assault our Vanguard which lagd behind; but so soone as Don John espied him, giuing signall to the fight hee turned his prowes towards the enemies; Fluscali who came not forth to fight, perceiving our battailes ranged on a sodaine returned from whence hee came, doing it very aduisedly, as well because night approached, as by reason of a great fogge that arose, which enforced our men to keepe aloofe to sea ward, the thores on both sides belonging to the enemy.

The next morning the sea being calme, the Confederate fleet went to the Gulph of Coran to take in water at the mouth of the river Panisus, some foure miles from Coran, and to conuoy those that went for water (it being in the enemies country), they landed certaine foot-men, conducted by Francisco Andriani campe Maister, to intercept whome, and for the guard of Coran Fluscali altho he sent thither a thousand five hundred Janizars and two hundred horse, with whom they often skirmished, among whome the valor and prowesse of Charles of Lorraine Duke of Mayenne, did shew it selfe, who at that time accompanied with six French Gentlemen was in the army as a Voluntary.

Our men hauing waied returned to the Gallies, and before their departure bestowed certaine cannon shot vpon the forte of Coran, and sailing neere to the Isle of Guprate passed along in the enemies view, diuided into three battaillons one after another, because the place was very narrow, and came againe to the South East side of Sapienza, comming to an anchor right ouer against Modon. But all men perceiving that to tarry long in that place, hoping to draw the enemies forth to fight, was but lost time, and very dangerous, the Venetian Generall made a proposition to land tenne thousand foot, to seize on the hill at the point of the Channell, from whence it was most likely to annoy the Turkes for that the place was weakly garded, which would not be defended by Fluscali who would not vnmanner his Gallies for feare of greater danger, the enemy being so neere him.

The Spaniards reiectred this proposition, saying that they ought not to weaken the fleet by vndipping such multitudes especially the enemy being so neere, wherevpon Felcarin perceiving all his propositions to be crost, and considering that the long the fleet would be dissolved without any notable exploit, resolved that it was a matter of so great consequence, where hope of good successe was greater then the danger, to hazard the entering of the Channell of Modon, and therein assault the enemies: this being by him like-wile propounded hee offered to expose himselfe formost to the danger, and to lead the way to others: though at first hee had allowed this, and some haue to him the honor of the first charge, yet hee did not suppose effect, so as the fleet without doing ought, and departed thence, and went on to the large and spacious Hauens of Nauarin, free from the danger of the Castle thor,

Exceeding
of the Turkish
fleet.

shot, seated on an high place farre from thence: our men lying there, the enemies fleet was as it were beleeged beneath Modon, so as it could not returne to Constantinople, but indured much scarcity, and was in danger of shipwrack, and that which was worse, it could not come forth but our men might at their pleasure fight with it.

The Turkes in the meane time sent diuers Harquebusiers that knew the wayes, who coming vp by the mountaines neere to Nauarin, attempted to annoy and hinder our men from taking in water. Heerevpon wee landed fise thousand foot vnder the command of Paul Iordano Vrsino, who repulsing the enemies feured the Contrey, whereby matters were brought to such a passe, as there was no doubt made but that the Victory would ere long fall to the Confederates: This was rumord ouer Christendome, and almen reioyced thereat, nor as a thing hoped for, but already effected. In the end, the enterprize vpon Nauarin was propounded: but considering afterwards that if it should succeed prosperously, it would not greatly profit the common cause, they turned to that of Modon, on whose conquest depended their cheafe hope; because that the enemies fleet being driuen from thence could not auoid fight: therefore they determined to assault the Towne & Castle of Modon, assaulting it at one time by land and sea, and to the end that the soldiers which lay in the shippes might bee employed in that enterprize, Giovann Moceniga was presently sent vnto Zanx to fetch them to 20 the fleet.

A vaine and unprofitable engin

In the meane time Joseffo Namello the Florentine made an engin, by ioyning foure Gallies together, on which were planted tenne Cannons, fortified with Parapets, wherewith to approach and batter the Castle of Modon, and at the same time to secure the passage of the other Gallies, which being by this engin defended from the enemies ordnance, might enter the Channell and come to the assault. But so soone as it was finished, they perceiued many defaults in it, which made it vsueruicible: for first, they could not guide it on the water, next, the weight of the burthen and ordnance was likely to sinke it, neither could they make it ankorable by reason of the Seas great depth: but the greatest difficulty 30 was to bring it to the place appointed, whether it was to bee towed by the Gallies, which being not able to make way, were exposed to the mercy of the enemies ordnance, planted at the mouth of the Channell, which would easily haue sunke them: so that despairing of the seruiceableness thereof, and hauing intelligence that the Beglarbey of Grecia was coming thither with a thousand horse to frustrate their desaigne, they gaue ouer the worke.

That which most tormented the Venetians, and frustrated their hope, was a rumor spread through the fleet that the Spaniards victuals would not long hold out, who said, that in regard thereof, it behooued them to provide for their departure and being desirous to leaue some token of victory behind them, which might encourage the inhabitants of Morea, and put them in hope of better successe, they determined to beleage Nauarin, so often before propounded, and still reiected, in regard of the small reward of the conquest.

The situation of the Castle of Nauarin.

The Castle of Nauarin in old time called Pila, is seated on a mountaine topp, which extending towards the South-east, makes the Haven like to a semicircle, and is stronger by situation, then art: This, the Turkes carefully garded, for the commodiousnesse of the haven, lying in the very hart of Morea. There are two wayes leading to the Castle, that on the left hand, is not farre from the Sea, the other behind it towards the firme land, lies by a lake not farre from thence, and is very narrow and hidden.

The Prince of Parma had charge of this enterprize, who landing two thousand Spanish and Italian foot and tenne peeces of battery, took the open, and plaine way to cut off supplies from the enemies: but he either neglected or knew not the other narrow secret way: Iuan de Montado, and Morillo the Calabrois went 40 after afterwards to make good the passage: but they were on a suddaine assailed by great number of enemies, and with great difficulty came off.

By this meanes about two thousand Turkes came to releue the Castle, who being maisters of that narrow passage, did at their pleasures, not onely put in what supplies they thought good, but had leisure to leaze on certaine high places, commanding the wayes, from whence with their small shotte they still annoyed our men, busied in planting the Ordnance, lying open also at the same time to the Castles shot, so that in three dayes they could hardly plant two Canons, and the danger more and more increased, the soldiers wanting rampiers to defend themselves; and the enemies numbers still augmented, with whom to their owne great disadvantage they were daily enforced to skirmish. This did greatly trouble the confederate Generals, who knew, that to quit the enterprize, would blemish their reputation, and to continue the siege, would not much auale them; but their greatest difficulty was want of bread, which Don Iohn and his faction daily amplifying, said, That of necessity they were to depart.

And yet it seemed strange and incredible to most men, that the Spanish Navy coming lately from Sicily with so many ships, which is the Magazin or Granary of Italy, should in so short time want bread: or if it were true, that scarcity might easily haue bene supplied, by sending to Tarento for certaine vessels laden with Bisket, which the Spaniards themselves reported they had left there.

The Venetian Generall, that he might cut off all occasion of the Spaniards departure, offered Don Iohn part of his owne Store, earnestly entreating him to accept his offer, telling him that the rest of his Nauie might bee easily supplied by those vessels before mentioned. It is not certainly knowne why the Spaniard refused this curtesie, who stopped their eares against all reasonable persuasions which might delay their departure: which they onely intending, disamped from before Nauarin, leauing a safe and open way for Vluzzali to conduct his fleet to Constantinople, and the Honor to bee accounted a skillfull and valiant Captaine. Yet Don Iohn did what he could to cause Generall Foscarin and the Venetians to 30 consent and bee well pleased with his departure, assuring him of his earnest desire to purchase honor and reputation, whereof Fortune had bereft him, by taking from him the meanes to fight with the enemy; yet, it by the way he did chance to meet with those ships of supplies, he would then willingly embrace any occasion whatsoeuer, to doe some notable seruice to the league, ere hee returned with his fleet into the West: and that though he now wanted opportunity, hee hoped the next yeare to recompence that, which necessity had enforced him to loose.

The Venetian Generall perceiuing his resolution, consented therevnto, because hee would not giue an occasion to the enemies to thinke that the league was broken, as also for that hee knew himselfe alone too weak to attempt any great matter. Yet, when our men thought least of it, they were more likely then euer, to giue the enemy battaile: for at the very instant, when the confederates were vpon departure, they had intelligence that a Spanish ship come from Corfou, was in fight with certaine Turkish Gallies, not farre from Sapienza, wherevpon all things being put in order, the fleet speedily left the Haven of Nauarin, to rescue the shippe, and to fight with the enemies. Ere our men could get out of the Haven Vluzzali with three score of his Gallies, came forth of the channell of Modon, to rescue those that were in fight, and to secure others which hee had sent to scoure the seas. So soone as Don Iohn saw Vluzzali, hee commanded the Prouidator Soutanza, to meete him with a certaine number 50 of Gallies, to hinder his coming on any farther, & the Marquis of Santa Cruz, and the Prouidator Canale with their Squadrons, to charge the enemies with fise and twenty Gallies, who discrying our fleet, left the ship, and betooke themselves to flight.

The Turkes
coming to re-leue the castle doo much annoy
the christians.

The confederates disamped from before Nauarin.

Don Iohn
excuses.

When

When Vluzzali saw the Prouidator comming towards him he made a stand, but at last turning his prowes, without any farther delay, he retired vnder the Castle of Modon, being still pursued by our Gallies, who beeing come neere to the towne, bestowed diuers Cannon bullets on it.

The Gallies, which fought with the shippe, beeing light and able to make way, escaped with ease, one excepted, commanded by the Sanzach of Mitelene, nephew to the famous Barbarossa, who fighting longer then any of the rest, and his slaues in hope of liberty rowing slowly, was taken by the Marquis of Sancta Cruz: but night approaching, they gaue ouer farther pursute.

Then D. Iohn founded the retreat and commanded euery one to returne into the haue of Nauarin, beeing vnwilling to leaue the engin behind, that the enemies might not terme his departure a flight: then the greater vessells beeing forth of the Haue, and a faire southeast wind blowing he willed them presently to saile to Zant, and himselfe the next morning directed his course thither with the whole fleet, being so desirous to returne home as going a neerer way through the Channell of Giscarda, contrary to the aduise of the skilfullest Marinners, who counsell'd him to goe to Cephalonia, he escaped a great danger neere to the Gulph of Larta, and there lost one of the Popes Gallies, which was broken to peeces vpon the Rocks of Paxu.

Vluzzali after the Confederates departure, freed from all hinderances in his journey, did without any order put to Sea and came vnto the Cape of Malca, where by reason of a contrary northerne wind he was enforced to continue certaine dayes: but in the end hauing a faire Gale, he sailed to Constantinople with an hundred Gallies, where he was with all honour entertained, the Turkes openly terming themselves Conquerors, for that they had defended Morea and their other territories, dared (as they said) the Christians oftentimes to battaile, & lastly diuen them forth of their dominions, secured the Sea, and made it nauigable.

The Confederates in the meane time arriued at Corfou the twentieth day of October, who though their fleet were augmented with thirteene Gallies, and certaine shippes laden with wheat brought by the Duke of Sessa and Iohn Andrew Doria, did neuertheless continue their former difficulties, and delays: for diuers enterprizes were daily propounded in the Councel, without any resolution at all, and among others that of Saint Maura, where vnto D. Iohn seemed to incline: but the Duke of Sessa by his authority dash't it, saying that the time of yeare was vnfit to beleage townes, or to be at Sea with fleets in an enemies Contrey. The Spaniards in this manner reiect'd all enterprizes, determining to returne into the west after that the Confederates Fleetes had bene vnited for the space of fifty dayes.

D. Iohn first went to Messina and there left part of his Gallies he carried the rest to Naples where he dismissed his Italian footmen, and sent the Spaniards and Almaines to Garrison. Collonna by the Kings commandement went into Spaine; to yeeld an account to his Maiesty of matters past, and with him to consult on the next yeares war, where he so wisely and nobly behaued himselfe as he got much honor and reputation. The Gallies of the Pope, King of Spaine, and Venetians, remained idle at Corfou, lying rigg'd all winter, that they might be ready at the spring to set forward against the enemies.

This was the successe of the yeare 1572. nothing answerable to the great hope which all men had conceiued of abating the pride and insolency of the Ottoman Empire, wherevpon so soone as the Confederates were gone home the inhabitants of Morea who had made insurrections in the Christians behalfe, and expected the successe of the fleet, hauing neither forces in the field, nor strong places for defense, run ning into the mountaines for feare of the Turkish violence, were enforced to yeeld themselves to their mercy, and againe to submit their necks vnder the yoke of a cruel bondage, which they could neuer since shake off.

The

The Venetians made great complaints to the Pope of the Spaniards delais, and slow resolutions, but especially of their vnreasonable departure from before Nauarin: they were made by a sollemne Ambassade; sent, according to their custome, to offer their obedience to his Holinesse in the States name. The Pope in their behalfe presently sent Gionan Claudio Gonzaga his Chamberlaine to D. Iohn, to perswade him to tarry there where he was and to expect a Commission from Spaine to returne to winter in the Leuant, the Pope hoping easily to obtaine so much of the King of Spaine, seeing that the troubles of Flanders were brought to some good passe: wherevpon his Holinesse did expressly send the Lord of Lansan into Spaine, whose labour was fruitlesse, for the Catholick King, hauing already flatly answered the Popes and Venetians Ambassadors, that hee would no more send his fleet so farre from home, would by no meanes alter his resolution, and D. Iohn, notwithstanding the Popes entreaties, well acquainted with the Kings pleasure, pursued his journey into the West.

In the meane time Generall Feneri, old and sickely, by reason of his former traualles, obtaining leaue of the Senate, returned to Venice, with fame and glory great numbers of Senators going to meet him with the Bucenrauro as farre as Saint Anthonies Church, which is the very farthest part of the City, where hee was honorably entertained and welcomed according vnto his merit.

During the enterprizes in the Leuant, Dalmatia was not altogether freed from warre: for though there was no forme of an army there, yet the Turkish Caualtery, of the neighbor Governments, wasted and spoiled the Countrey doing much hurt to the Venetians subiects, wherevpon the Stradiots and foot troops of the Garrisons did often fall to stop their incursions: yet the Turkes and Venetians were of one opinion, that to make any great warre in Dalmatia would not bee to much purpose, the Turkes fearing if they should send any great Army into that Prouince, they might giue the Emperor occasion of suspition, and cause him to embrace the Confederates party, and to make warre in Hungary.

The Venetians of the other side bending all their desseignes on the Leuant, thought that the successe of the affaires of Dalmatia and Albania depended wholly on the warre, knowing very well they could doe little good there, by reason of the strong Garrisons which the enemy ordinarily kept in those Countries: as also for that they hauing, by the industry of Lodouico Grimani, and Iulio Pompeo, wonne the towne of Macarica of some importance, by reason of the trade of Marchants, and fortified it, had bene within a while after enforced to abandon the same, beeing to weak to defend it against such huge numbers of enemies. The like successe had the conquest of the fort of Cliffs.

Neuertheless the Turkes omitted no opportunity to annoy the Venetians: and being not then strong enough to take Cities, they inuented other meanes to hurt them: as that enterprize vpon the City of Catharra, which they refused to get by long seage, keeping victuals from it by land did testifie: They often likewise attempted to shut them from the passage to the Sea, by building a fort at the mouth of the Channell, but the Venetians did still hinder their worke, till the arriuall of a Turkish Sanzach with great forces, who finished it within three miles of Castel-nouo. The Senate aduertized thereof, and moued with the danger, threatening the City of Catharra, wrote to Generall Foscarini that he should send forces to raze that fort. He, though it were in the midst of winter, did neuertheless send the Prouidator Souranza thither with two and twenty Gallies and six Galeasses, with whom went Paulo Vrsino, Pompeo Collonna, Moretta the Calabrois and other famous Captaines with 4000. foot, with whom Nicholo Suriana Captaine of the Gulph ioyned by the way with foure Gallies. All these vessells arriuing at Igniffa, they landed the soldiers: part of them went with Pompeo Colonna

Rrrrr to

The Venetians
expressed to
the Pope.The Venetians
expressed to
the Pope.The Venetians
expressed to the Pope.The Turkes build a fort against Catharra.

to seaze on a hill not far off, to stop the passage of those which should come from Castelnouo to releue the Fort, and the rest went with Nicholo Gambaro, to a certaine place neere at hand, whither some companies of soldiers of the Garrison of Catarra were to come, with other forces assembled by Zacharia Salmone Prouidator of the City: After this Soumarza entering the Channell with 18. of his best Gallies, his Squadron going formost, passed along beyond the fort, from whence though they made many shot vpon the fleet, yet did they no great hurt to it, which went and lay in a safe and commodious place to batter it by land and Sea.

It was 150 paces square euery way, without any flankers, but so built, as on the one side it battered the Gallies entering into the Channel, and on the other plaid vpon them beeing entred, it was wellprouided with ordnance, and maned with two hundred soldiers. The Venetians refused to batter it at one time by land and sea. The morrow after their arriuall early by day breake they beganne their battery, and within a while the soldiers went to the assault with ladders, which the enemies for a time defended, but beeing at last enforced to quit the place, the Venetians tooke it.

There were found in it diuers small peeces of ordnance and 18. great peeces, which the Prouidator presently sent to Venice, and by a mine ouerthrew the fort to the foundations, which beeing speedily done, and leaving a sufficient Garrison in Catarra, hee returned with his Gallies to Corfou where the fleet remained. Diuers consultations were made at Rome that winter, concerning preparations for warre against the next Summer, knowing what time they had given the enemies to repaire their losse receiued at the battell of Lepanto: therefore they concluded to augment the Confederates force, to the number of 300. Gallies & 60000. footmen: there was likewise a proposition made to send a hundred Gallies betimes into the Leuant, not staying till all the fleet were vnited, which should be at Sea before the enemies, who as it was reported, did intend to keepe all supplies from Candy, and to wast the Venetians Sea-coasts: But all these propositions vanished into aire.

The Venetians, not meaning wholly to depend on fortune, did speedily place strong Garrisons in the Castles and forts of the Island, and sent many foot-companies thither, in the meane time earnestly soliciting the Pope to augment the force of the league, and that it would please him to assist them with certaine summes of money toward their great expence, putting him in mind how that his Predecessors, had in former times vpon lesse occasion given leaue to sell Church-poseessions. His Holinesse not altogether granting their demands, did permit 100000. Ducats belonging vnto the tenthes of the Clergie vnder their Dominions.

At the same time diuers Conferences had beene held at Constantinople concerning peace: for the Turkes hauing intelligence of the vniing of the Christian fleet, and doubting the successe of warre, had oftentimes motioned peace to the Venetian Bailly there: the Visier Bascha seemed then, more then euer, desirous of it, whose authority and reparation had beene much augmented since the battell, wherevpon contrary to the opinion of others, he dissuaded the great Lord from warre. He thought it then a fit time to motion it, whilst Selim danted with the vnlookt for losse of the battaile seemed to incline to peace: and that the Venetians likewise vpon some aduantage might win with for it.

This inclination of Mahomet once knowne, the people, who by reason of the difcomodities of war did greatly desire it, bruted it abroad ouer the City, that the force of the Confederate Princes was great: These rumors being entertained as true and worthy credit, by those who wisht for peace, and beeing related to Selim, induced him to permit it for to be motioned vnto the Bailly Mahomet there.

therevpon, began freely to conferre with him, making vse therein of the helpe of Orinbey the chiefe Dragoman, and Rabi Salomon a Jewish Phisition, who beeing familiar in the house of the Visier Bascha, were often employed in affaires of great importance.

The Bailly hauing aduertised the Senate heereof, it seemed not greatly to like of the motion, desiring rather to continue warre; prouoked therevnto on hope of better successe, making account that their late victory would giue greater reputation to the Confederate forces: Yet when they considered how many notable opportunities they had lost, and spent much time vnprofitably, they were willing to change their opinions, and with new resolution to lend an eare to these motions of peace, the better to secure their owne, exposed to the vnertaine euent of fortune. This was propounded in the Councell of Tenne, that it might with more secrecy and greater speed be effected.

In this Councell the Senators were at first of various opinions. For many of them were posselt with their former hotte inclination to warre, by reason of the promises of Christian Princes, who doubting this treaty, did then more then euer, promise to assist the league: Wherevpon Lorenzo de Priuli sent Ambassador into Spaine instead of Leonardo Donato, Secretary Perez, and Doctor Velasco, who at that time managed the most important affaires of that Court, visited him more then ordinary, making such impression in the new Ambassador, as themselves desired, and vsed all their skill to perswade him, that their King had euer stood affected to the league, and at that instant more resolute then euer to pursue the warre, affirming that his Maiesty had written to his officers in Italy, to make speedy preparations, and to auoyde the long delays of the precedent yeare: and that Don John on the other side had promised to ioyne with the Venetians, with the onely force of Italy, not tarrying for that of Spaine. The Emperor likewise, who by no offers could till then be diuerted from his resolution, suspecting only that the Venetians had an intent to make peace with the Turke, told the Venetian Ambassador resident in his Court, that he would ioyne with the league. These new offers caused the Venetians to proceed slowly in the treaty of peace already propounded, but Prince Mosenigo, euer inclining more to peace then to the league, assembling on a time the Councell of Ten, spake to them in this manner.

When at first we determined to take armes for our own defence, and with a generous courage embraced warre against Selim, I do not thinke it was done with intent to continue it long, but onely to make prooue of fortune, to manifest the valour of our own Common-wealth, the strength of Christian Princes, and to purchase to our owne State and all Christendome greater safety against the power of that insolent common enemy. It is certaine that war is ordained for peace, and that the end of our dangerous traualles is quiet and safety. I now suppose that experience of matters happed at that time, may more then sufficiently instruct vs what our condition will be, if wee continue warre any longer, what end wee may hope thereof, and what recompence for so great expences, & traualles. The first yeare, vainly presuming to ioyne our force with strangers, for the releefe of the Kingdome of Cyprus, we lost the famous city of Nicosia: neuertheless without declining from our former resolution, we continued our warlike preparations, drawne to it by hope of entering into a strict confederacy with Christian Princes, thereby to recover our late losse. God, miraculously gaue vs such a victorie ouer our enemies, as wee could not haue desired a greater; and yet I know not by what fault or misfortune of our owne, the city of Famagosta was taken, and we enforced to quit the entire possession of that kingdome, to the vanquished enemy: but the ioy and contentation of winning the battaile, tooke from vs the feeling of a greater and more certaine losse: Wherevpon with like speed and earnestnesse, we made great preparations the third yeare, augmented our Army, and spared for no cost: Wee may now percieue what good all this hath done vs.

The Senate at first makes no account of peace.

Peace is propounded in the Councell of Tenne.

The Spaniards conference with the Venetian Ambassador.

The Emperor seeks to hinder peace.

Prince Mosenigo his oration to the Councell of Tenne.

The Venetians take the fort.

They ruine it by mine.

Motion of Peace at Constantinople with the Venetian Bailly.

" Our Gallies haue bene a long time idle at Corfou, expecting the Confederate
 " supplies: and then when we hoped most, that all difficulties being taken away, our " forces would ioyne, & set forwards against the enemy, we were enforced to leaue
 " our Islands at their prey, & to call home our fleet, with greater blemish to our re" putation, & expence of lost time, then the uniting of our forces would haue pro" duced vs: and lastly, when fortune hath offered vs many vn hoped for faire occa" sions, to ouerthrow our enemies, we haue bene constrained to omit them,
 " beeing forsaken by our friends, who vnseasonably dislodged from the Hauens of " Nauarzin, with no honorable, but a very preiudicious resolution. But what need
 " I to rehearse things so lately done? Wee are reduced to such extremity, as wee
 " are not able alone to maintaine warre against the Turkes, and wee know by ex" perience, that the company of others, who should ayde and assist vs, is rather a
 " burthen and impediment to vs: at first, it promisseth much, but afterwards it
 " growes cold, and in deed, doth rather encrease, then diuert our dangers. Wee " were perswaded that there would not onely be a sure correspondency, betwixt the " Pope, Catholick King and vs, but that the confederacie of these three Poten-
 " tates, would haue incited all other Christian Princes to take armes with vs against " the common enemy, especially after that notable victory, which all men thought " would haue procured the Turkes finall ruine, but beeing now confirmed by 20
 " sundry proofes wee may perceiue, that this opinion was rather conceiued accord" ing to our owne desire, then the certainty of the matter.
 " Shall wee still then continue in the same error, and ground the conseruation
 " of the State, and the whole fortune of our affaires, on vncertaine foundations, " and hopes which haue so often deceived vs? Questionlesse, it was a generous " resolution, not to grant the insolent demands of Selim, constantly to maintaine
 " the cause of Christendome, in no sort to degenerate from our Ancestors, who
 " haue euer brauely pursued those enterprises, by which they hoped to purchase
 " greatness and glory to their Common-wealthe, but now, when wee haue cou-" rageously taken armes, and with fortunate successe wonne the battaile, hoping " for greater matters, (I know not by what disaster) wee can reape no fruit
 " thereof, and in fighting wee hazard all, and by winning gaine nothing: to con" tinue still the same designs and dangers without any profit, after that the op" portunity, which together with the victory offered it selfe for the execution of " some great enterprize, hath already escaped vs, will bee rather thought obsti-
 " nate rashnesse, then any zeale to Christian piety, or desire of true honour.
 " If wee consider the quality of our forces and State, wee shall easily perceiue,
 " that there is nothing more hurtfull or ill becomming it, then to draw the warre
 " out in length. Because that our affaires doe still impair, the leagues forces
 " depending on sundry counceils, and many times on contrary respects, and al" though they are great, doe neuerthelss become vaine and vnprofitable: and " then the difcommodity of maintaining them for our part, is very great, by reason " of the excessive expences wee are to bee at for want of men, and especially Row" ers. Most part of whom the late warre hath exhaust, not to bee supplied but " with great cost, and vncertaine whether with any: But if wee shall view our owne
 " estate, in a true, not flattering glasse, wee shall discern it to bee rather great
 " then strong, at least not equivalent to such an enemy. An other maine confi-" deration, is the distraction and remotenesse of our territory, neerer danger then " succour, requiring diuerse Armies to secure so diuerse places. How then is it " probable continuance of this warre shall not more weaken vs, then the ene" my? prosecution of the late victory in deed gaue vs some hope, for so wee " might haue dispatched it? But how this opportunity is lost, and the effects of loo" sing it are experience doth teach vs. Now our hope is fledde to the enemy. Can " then any man doubt, but that wee should welcome peace offering hir selfe to vs?
 " Since

Since we cannot protect our State by warre, why should we not by peace; wee know that the Balcha Mahomet, alwaies inclining to amity, hath vsed their late ouerthrowes as inducements to draw his master to entertaine milder conditions.
 Yf we now reiect his offer, he may perhaps reiect vs hereafter. Who could haue imagined that the Turkes out of the wracks and ashes of their last Fleet, could so sodainly haue raised another, and with it not only secure themselves, but inuade vs? what clearer demonstration can we haue of their Potency, or more infallible prediction of the warres event? if after ouerthrow they could doe all this, what might we expect after victory? I would entreat those which stand for war to satisfie me if domestick occasions implo y the aid of Spaine at home, or any priuate respect diuert it to Affrick, our props then failing, howare wee able of our selues to stand? Dependance vpon others may make vs neglect our owne strength, and when danger is at our doore, it will bee to late to call for helpe from Spaine, Portugal or Germany: or for them to prevent those Mischiefs which wee already suffer.

These infirmities the enemy discovering, he will grow more insolent, and bee so farre from offering that he will not accept any conditions of peace. It is pollicy therefore, my noble Lords, since we haue not reaped the fruit of victory, to pro-uide that we vndergoe not the calamities of ouerthrow, that the expence of so much blood, time and treasure, may purchase safety, though not conquest. Wee must not to confidently rely vpon the hazard of battaile, whose event is euer vncertaine, som-times not greatly profitable. Let vs rather trust to the cleernesse of reason then blindnesse of fortune, alwayes an enemy to great actions. Peace may perhaps set open some fairer breach to warre hereafter. The world can make no dishonourable construction hereof, nor our Confederates condemne vs, but themselves, wee hauing alwaies bene as foreward in the warre as they backward, Who can tax vs beeing neglected by others if we secure our selues?
 We follow but the president of the Spaniards, and end the warre as they shunne
 it. Nay one of the Catholick Kings chiefe Counsellors hath made our Apologie herein, who suspecting this treaty, affirmed, his master had no cause to censure ill, if the Venetians without violating his, entertained the Turkes freind-ship vpon honorable termes. If this peace should soone breake, yet we should get breath; a thing necessary to the weaker and wearied party: All things vnder the Moone are infected with her mutability, mens counceils and actions alting like themselves.

Let vs then imbrace this meanes of our safety; God in whose protection this State hath euer bene, hath vsed this scourge of war to discipline, not wound vs, and will at his leisure open some vnexpected way of farther happinesse.

The Princes speech together with his authority was of great force: wherevpon the Senate sent presently a new commission to the Bailly to reuiue the treaty of peace with ample power to conclude it on the aboue mentioned conditions.
 The great & sundry difficulties arising about the renewing of the fleet did much farther this resolution, in respect of the great numbers that were dead: the like did newes from Flanders, where by reason of new rebellions, and aid, which the Germanes were ready to send them, all places were in vpror, in regard whereof the Spaniards had turned all their designs thither: moreouer, the Senate at the same time had intelligence that a Chiaus from Constantinople arrived at the Emperors Court, whom, (though it was afterward knowne that his coming was Concerning Moldauia) they suspected came to craue passage for the Turkish army which was laid to bee coming into Frioul.

These aduertizements did coole their heate who were yet willing to continue the league, so as with generall consent euery one inclined to the treaty of peace:
 The Bishop of Aix, Ambassador for the French King, was presently acquainted with this determination, he was lately returned from Constantinople to Venice,

The Senates
 resolution to
 peace.

Causes moving the Senate to imbrace peace.

The Bishop of Aix, Ambassador for the French King
 at Constantinople.

where he receiued a new Commission from his King, to returne to the great Lords Porte, and in his name to further this treaty, whereunto his Mailler had often aduised the Venetians to hearken.

The Bayly having intelligence of the Senates determination, was comanded so soone as the French Ambassador should arriue at Constantinople, to conferre with him concerning the treaty of peace, and as occasion should bee offered, to make vse of his Kings mediation and authority. The Turke in the meane time having notice, that the Bishop was to returne to Constantinople, presently suspected that hee brought new conditions of peace more aduantageous for them, whereupon, their former treaties with the Bayly were by little and little neglected, cunningly going about to temporize, concealing their owne intentions. This delay did greatly preiudice the businesse: for they who for their owne particular interest, were desirous to hinder it, alleadged sundry difficulties, especially to Selim, telling him that all things were ready; that it was neither profitable nor honorable at that time, to speake of any accord; whereby the state of the treaty grew every day from bad to worse, the Turkes propounding very vnreasonable conditions, thereby manifesting how carelesse they were of peace: Therefore they committed the Bayly to straighter keeping, muring vp the windows of his house, placing strong guards about it, handling him very roughly, thinking thereby to enforce him to reueale his latest and most secret Commission, or else, the treaty of peace being broken, to hinder him from aduertising the Senate of their warlike prouisions; or rather, (which is most likely to bee true) to barre his conference with the Bishop, thinking by this meanes more easily to draw from the French Ambassador, ignorant of what was past, the new conditions which they supposed hee brought with him. So soone as the Bishop arriued, they conferred with him, and found that he had no other then a generall Commission: but the Visier Batha suspecting that the French for their owne particular interest, would haue an hand in this treaty, & by this good office, bind the Turkes to fauour and assist the Duke of Aniou, the French Kings brother, in the election to the crowne of Poland, would in no sort vse him as an instrument, but effect it by the former meanes and mediation of those whom hee had first employed, namely Ozimirbey and Salomon, therefore he renewed his treaty with the Bayly, and after sundry propositions and answers from both sides, peace at last was concluded about mid March, whereby confirming all articles contained in the old Commission, sauing that the castle of Siponto, which the Venetians yet held, should be surrendered to the Turkes.

As for other townes of Albania and Sclauonia with their confines and territories posselt before the warre, should remaine vnto those, who then held them: that all marchants goods should bee restored on both sides; and that the Venetians beside should be bound for three yeares space, to send an 100000. Ducats yearly to Constantinople, which the Turkes for their owne greatnesse and reputation made most account of. Peace in this sort being concluded and signed by Selim, the Bayly dispatched his sonne Francesco to Venice, who arriued there on the fifteenth of Aprill, where it was presently published.

The end of the second Booke of the seuenth Decade.

The Turkes
deale roughly with the Venetian Bayly.

Peace concluded betwixt
the Turkes &
Venetians.

Articles of
peace.

The Contents of the third Booke of the seuenth Decade.

Pope Gregory is displeased for that the Venetians made peace with the Turke. The King of Spaine is highly pleased therewith: The Pope being satisfied by an Ambassador sent of purpose from Venice, in open consistory doth approue what they had done: The Venetians and Turkes are iealous of each other. Peace is ratified with the Turke. Henry Duke of Aniou is chosen King of Poland, and goes thither: Don Iohns voyage into Affrike where he takes Tunis. The death of Selim the Turkish Emperor. The death of Charles the ninth French King. The King of Polands secret departure towards France. Great triumphs made at Venice at the reception of Henry King of France and Poland. Amurath the Turkish Emperor enuades the Empires territories: Amurath confirms peace with the Venetians. A great plague at Venice, with the Prince and Senates vow to appease Gods wrath: Great charity of Cardinall Borromeo. The lawes of Venice are reformed, and a new order taken for the government of matters. The Pope sends a golden Rose to the Venetian Duke: The Venetians decree concerning the Citizens particular expences. The Venetians solicited by the Persians against the Turke will not agree to it. Contention betwixt the Venetians and knights of Malta. The death of Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and creation of Sixtus the fifth: A Dutchesse is cruelly murdered in Padua.

The

The third Booke of the seuenth Decad of the Historie of Venice.

10

Sundry opi-
ons concern-
the Venetians
peace

PEACE beeing published, men did differently censure thereof, measuring it by their owne particular affection: Many, had regard to their owne interest, and others, persecuting in their former hope, that warre would haue procured much good to Christendome, did taxe the Venetians for making peace:
but grauer and more iudicious spirits, measured future things by experience of matters past, saying that therein they were to be approued, at least not condemned requiring it for the conseruation of the State, which without this only remedy (Peace) was exposed to very dangerous hazards. But the Pope more then any seemed to be displeased therewith, and at such time as the Venetian Ambassador came to acquaint him with it, commanded him forth of his presence, and would for that time admit no excuse. The Cardinals and others of his Court following his President discoursed thereof after their owne various passions.

The King of Spaine is not discontented with the Penians.

The Catholike King, knowing by experience how much it importeth Princes to desire the preservation of their owne States, did with great iudgement and modesty seeme for his part to bee well pleased therewith, saying, that he doubted not, but that the occasions which moued the Venetians to doe so were of great importance, hoping that as himselfe had freely imployed his forces for the seruice of Christendome and particular profit of the Venetian State, they likewise in acknowledgement of his loue would be ready to doe thelike for him when need should bee: and generally all Spaniards as well at Rome as in Spaine approued it.

Many discourting why the Spaniards did so modestly carry themselves therein, said, that in accusing the Venetians, they feared to vrge them to iustifie their owne cause, and to taxe the actions of some of the confederates the precedent yeere: others said, that though the league were broken, they would not for all that wholly forsake the Venetians friendship, whom in other matters they might neede. But I thinke they did it of their owne proude nature beeing willing to let the world see that they did not greatly care for the breach of league, accounting themselves strong enough without it to make head against the Turkish force.

Now the Pope continuing his displeasure, the Venetians did not shew themselves stubborne, but determined to send an expresse Ambassadour to Rome, honorably and reuerently to appeale and dispose him to receiue their iustifica-tions. Nicolo de Ponte was chosen, a man of great yeeres and authority, and at that time Procurator of Saint Marke. Hee beeing arriued at Rome and hauing audience, acquainted his Holinesse with the iust occasions which had moued the Signory to accept the Turkes offered peace: Hee told him that all their sea coasts were in very great danger by reason of the enemies might-ie preparations, the Venetians friends and Confederates delaying their aide,

that

The Venetians
send an expresse Ambassador to the Pope.

The Ambassadour excuses to
the Pope.

that the burthen and expence of that warre had for three yeeres space benee very greuous to them and their subiects, who were able to vndergoe it no longer: That the Venetians so long as hope of happy successe did comfort them in their miseries, had contributed more then they were tied towards the expence of warre, but all faire occasions being omitted, they saw no reason to continue it any longer:
And seeing that the Common wealth perceived by many experiences, that it could not prelerue it selfe by any better means then peace, his Holinesse ought not to take it in bad part, if fitting it selfe to time, it sought means to temporize with so potent an enemy, thereby to imploy the remainder of her forces in some more prosperous action for the aduancement of Christendome, and seruice of the Church, as it had often done in former time. That Pope Paul the third, perceiving that they had in vaine taken armes against Soliman, did himselfe aduise the Venetians to peace, the league beeing then as now. That the Senate for di-uers reasons did not impart this their desigine to any of the confederates, proceeding therein by the rule of State, and by the same which the Catholike King, a very wise Prince, had vsed: who at that time when he detained his fleet did not acquaint the Venetians with the cause.

These reasons did somewhat satisfie the Pope, who beganne more mildly to treat with the Venetian Ambassadors. The Senate in the meane time had speedily dispatched Francesco Barbaro to Constantinople, to carry newes of their consent and confirmation of peace, till that Andrea Badoario, appointed to goe thither as Ambassador, should be ready to depart to Selim for the sollemn confirmation of the Articles, and with the vsual presents.

Barbaro made great hast as befitte the importancy of the businesse, and in 14 daies arriued at Constantinople which was at the beginning of May: his ar-riual was very gratefull, because that the Turkes hauing daily intelligence of the warlike preparations made at Messina, beganne to suspect that the Venetians had cunningly made this treaty to delay their warlike provisions, that they might with more ease surprize them vnawares, and that which confirmed them in this opinion was, because they had no notice of the coming of a Venetian Ambassador. This fondainly caused them to prepare the fleet which had benee disarmed, nowwithstanding that the time was too farre spent for such actions, Mahomet with sundry difficulties hauing till then deferred it to take away all occasions that might frustrate peace.

At last toward mid Iune, the Bathas Fluzali and Piali went to sea with an hundred and fifty Gallies, thirty Foists, and ten Mahonnes, and sailed to Negropont, where they made some aboard, expecting the issue of the treaty of peace: and Piali hauing intelligence from the Sanzbec of Chersega that the Ambassador and the new Baily were arriued in Dalmatia and on their way towards Constantinople, did with the whole fleet saile to Modon, and hearing that peace was established with the Venetians, he turned his forces vpon the Catholike King, scouring the sea coasts of Puglia, where he burnt the city of Castris.

The Venetians being aduertized that the Turkish fleet was abroad, and that they intended not to obserue the peace, and what themselves had done was interpreted as a colour to deceiue, were possessed with the same ielozies as the Turks, wherevpon notwithstanding the Ambassador was already in Dalmatia, the cunct of his Ambassage was held very doubtfull; and a decree being made that Generall Felcarini leaving sixe Gallies at Corfou should bring the rest of the fleet to Zara, and vnrig it, they neuertheless deferred the execution thereof, and sent him word to disarme only tenne of the worst, and to re-enforce the rest, which being done there remained with him foure score and twelue seruicable Gallies:
But this did farther encrease the Turkes ielozies. All these shaddowes of false suspicion being vanished, and the Senate supposing that the Commonwealth was out of danger, being vnwilling any longer to continue so great a charge,

The Turkish fleet departs from Constantinople.

charge, sent word to the Generall, that he should vnrigge his Gallies, and returne home to Venice. By this time the Ambassador Badoaro arrived at Constantinople, where in few words he told Selim, That by how much the Prince and Venetian Senate had beene greeted with the breach of friendship betwixt the State and the Ottoman family; by so much more was their ioy then complete, because all controuersies ended, they were now reuined as before, their subiects enjoying peace, quiet and free traffick: hoping that peace and friendship now renewed, would be of long continuance, which the Venetians for their parts would be very carefull to obserue, intreating Selim to doe the like for his part, as became a vertuous and iust Prince.

Selim made no other answer, but briefly seemed to allow that which the Ambassador had spoken, and ratified and confirmed the Articles before concluded with the Baylie. In this sort, after that warre had continued foure yeeres, peace was established with the Turke.

The same yeere 1573, in March, Henry Duke of Aniou, brother to Charles the ninth French King, was elected King of Poland, that Kingdome being void by the death of Sigismund Augustus the last of the noble family of the Jagelons, who had borne that crowne for the space of two hundred yeeres; and because succession hath no place in that Realme, being an elective Kingdome, after Sigismunds death, which happened in Iuly in the yeere 1572. The Lords and Barons of Poland proclaimed a generall assembly at Varsovia in Aprill next ensuing, there to proceed to election of a new King. After this election posts were dispatched into France to giue Henry notice thereof, whilest Ambassadors were making ready to receiue and conduct him into Poland.

Italy being now freed from the dreadfull Turkish warre was likewise hatched an other in her owne bowels, for the Duke of Vrbino going about to lay some new impositions vpon his subiects, they denied to pay any thing but that which they had granted to Duke Francesco Maria when he entered into the State; and therevpon tooke armes, protesting neuer heldest that they did it not against their Prince, but onely to defend their ancient priuiledges: The Duke on the other side raised an army to enforce them, and the matter would haue proceeded to battaile, had not the Pope quenched this flame, making them friends: but the Duke entering afterwards with a power into Vrbino, beheaded some of the chiefe of the sedition, and banished others, confiscating their goods, and then built a Citadell at the Cities charge, the better afterwards to containe them in their obedience. Don Iohn of Austria being at the same time in Sicily with a gallant Navy, and vnderstanding that the Venetians had made peace with the Turkes, did by King Philips permission passe ouer with his forces into Affrick, to seate the sonne of Mulefsem in the Kingdome of Tunis, who for his intelligence with Christians had beene expelled by the Turkes, and had honorable entertainment giuen him by the King of Spaine in Goletta.

Being come into Affrick he landed his souldiers and in order of battaile marched to assault the City of Tunis, where no resistance being made the Christians without any slaughter entered and sacked it: then Don Iohn causing a fort to be built nere to the City, placed Gabriele Serbellone the Milanois in it with three hundred Italians, and himselfe with the fleet returned into Sicily.

About the beginning of the yeere 1574. the Venetians hauing intelligence that Selim armed at Constantinople, fearing that he would not obserue peace, suspected that hee ment to enterpris vpon Candy, wherevpon they leauied 12000. foot-men to guard it, and rigged their fleet, making Iacomo Sauranza their Generall: but these preparations were needlesse, for Selim turning his desires vpon Affrike to be reuenged on Don Iohn, ratified the peace, and tooke from them all suspicion of being invaded by him, sent Sinan Basha with a mighty army into Affrike to recover Tunis and raze Goletta, the which in one month he

he did. Selim perceiuing all things to succeed according to his desire, intended to breake his word and oth with the Venetians, and to invade the Ile of Candy; but whilest he made his preparations, death overthrew his vniust and proud designs, God to providing for the quiet and safety of Christendome: Amurath his eldest Sonne succeeded him in the Empire.

In the meane time Henry of Aniou entering Poland, did vpon the confines in great power and magnificence meet with the chiefe of the Kingdome, who conducted him to Cracouia, where with royal solemnity he was crowned: and whilest he busied himselfe with enquiring of their manner of gouernment, beginning by little and little to order the affaires of State, the Queene his mother sent a speedy messenger to him from France to aduertize him of the death of his brother King Charles, and to aduise him to returne into France with all possible speed, to receiue the crowne, and to remoue those troubles wherewith by his brothers death she was entangled.

The King acquainted the Polanders with these newes, telling them that hee was of necessity to returne into France to order the affaires of that Kingdome which were much embroiled. But the Lords which were then with him at Cracouia, answered that his departure could not be treated of but in the Generall Councill of the whole Realme, who would send him so well accompanied, as he should terrifie those that durst make any resistance. The Generall Estates of the Kingdome were to the same end summoned to Cracouia: but the King againe solicited by his mother to make hast, and on the other side perceiuing that the Polanders did not proceed with such celerity as his affaires required, and that they were vnwilling to let him goe, resolved in secret manner to depart, and in disguise by night leaping on horse-back, him-selfe with three more, went from Cracouia, and with great speed hastened towards the confines of the Empire.

His departure was not long concealed, for the Earle of Tericenia the Kings Chamberlaine, with other Lords, coming to his chamber and finding him not there, did presently take horse, pursuing the same way that hee had taken, meaning to slay him and bring him backe, but the King made such speed as they could not ouer-take him till he arrived in the Empires territories, where they earnestly entreated him to returne with them, which he not granting, they went back againe to Cracouia.

The King in the meane time pursuing his iourney came to Vienna where the Emperors sonnes met him, and within a while after, the Emperor himselfe, who very magnificently entertained him.

From thence he sent word to the Venetians that he determined to come and see their City. Archduke Charles accompanied him through his Countrey, vpon the Venetians confines, he met with a gallant troope of Noblemen who came to waite vpon him with eight hundred souldiers; the next day foure of the chiefe Senators of Venice came to him as Ambassadors, and intreated him to come and view their city, where all men with great desire expected him; which he promising to doe, the Duke of Neuers who was then in Italy came likewise to him, and so altogether arrived at Maguera, the farthest place of the firme land on the lakes, where hee met with threecore Venetian gentlemen which came to waite vpon him, and entering into a Gondola, prepared for him, together with the Dukes of Ferrara and Neuers, attended by infinite numbers of Gondolas, hee came to Murana, where the next day hee was visited by the Prince and Senate with fourecore Gallies, then being conducted to Lia, hee went into the Bucen-tauro, and with him the Prince and Senate, from thence with great magnificence he was brought to Venice, all that Channell betwixt Lia and the city being full of boates made in fashion of sea monsters, wherein were all the youth of Venice, richly attired, with infinite numbers of Gondolas who rowed before and on euery side of the Bucen-taure, which was gently towed to Venice, where the King spoken to Selim.

The Ambassadors

An. 1573.

Henry Duke of Aniou chosen
king of Poland.

Troubles in the Dutchy of Vrbino.

Don Iohn
goes into Affrick.

The death of Selim Emperor of Turky.

The King of Poland returnes secretly into France.

The entertainment giuen to
the French
King at Vienna in Austria.

The Dukes of Ferrara and Neuers come with King Henry to Venice.

The French
Kings magnificent reception at Venice.

King remaying certaine daies the Signory shewed him all pleasures and delights that could be imagined: and at his departure, the Prince and Senate accompanied him three miles from the city, wheretaking leaue of each other, the King embraced the Prince, giving him great thanks for his royall entertainment, which hee promised neuer to forget, and in so saying gaue him a diamond of great valew entreating him to weare it for his sake.

After his departure, whilest with his friends the Prince celebrated the day of his election, fire by negligence had like to haue consumed the dukes pallace, who was enforced to with-draw himselfe to the house of Gian de Legge, knight, and Procurator of Saint Mark: this fire besides the present great hurt it did was by some interpreted as a bad preface.

The death of Cosmo de Me-dicis his great Duke of Tuscany.

Troubles in Genoa appeared.

An. 1575.

The Venetian
scare.

The Turke
array in the Empire confines.

The cause why Amurath hated the Emperor.

Amurath confirms peace with the Ve-
netians.

The same yeere died Cosmo de Medicis the first great Duke of Tuscany, a Prince of rare and excellent iudgment: Francesco his eldest sonne succeeded him. There arose likewise great troubles in Genoa, betwixt the antient and moderne nobility, which continued the remainder of that yeere, and most part of next 1575, till that the Pope, Emperor, and King of Spaine, whom they had made vmpiers of their controuersies, made them friends.

So soone as Amurath had possesst himselfe of his fathers Empire, following the president of his Ancestors, hee murdered all his brethren: and to let the world see that he was a souldier, commanded Vlazzali to prepare a mighty fleet: This did greatly trouble all Christian Princes, especially the Venetians, who fortified all their sea-coasts against the fury of this barbarous enemy: but they were soone freed from this feare, by a great plague and dearth at that time in Constantinople, which enforced the new Emperor to abandon his warlike designs, and to seeke means to redresse the miserie and calamity of the chiefe cite of his Empire: yet, to confirme mens opinions, conceiued of his new enterprises, he commanded (truce beeing not yet ratified with the Emperor) that his Garrisons neere to Hungary, should enter into the Empires territories to waste and burne the country, where the Turkes did not only execute many hostile and bloudy actions, but tooke diuers castles of the Empire, carrying away with them many Christian prisoners: whereof the Emperors Ambassador complaying to Amurath, he willed him to write to his Master, that if he ment to haue truce with him, he should resolute pay him tribute for all his dominions, otherwise, hee would in person come into his country to ruine him.

Amurath was incensed against Maximilian, because that the Polanders, determining to elect a new King by reason of King Henries departure, he was one that laied claime to that crowne: and because the house of Austria and the Ottoman family had of a long time hated each other, Amurath would by no means haue him for his neighbour, and therefore invaded him, to diuert him from those thoughts, sending word likewise at the same time to the Polanders, that if they could not agree about the election of their King, they should choose Stefano Battori Prince of Transilvania, threatening if they did not so, to waste and spoile their country.

Whilest the Turke stood on these termes with the Emperor and Polanders, he sent one of his Chiaus to Venice to promise and ratifie both by word and writing perpetual peace with them: This Ambassage was entertained with wonderfull ioy, they being thereby freed from great care and expence. At the same time an exchange of prisoners, taken at the battaile of Lepanto (which were now at Rome) was granted, for Christian prisoners held by the Turke, among whom was Serbolone, and many others of note.

Toward the latter end of this yeere, the pestilence which had much afflicted the city of Trent, bewraied it selfe in Venice, where by reason of cold weather, it brake not forth much that winter: but the spring following the yeere 1576. it beganne to rage, and with the heate so increased, as there died that yeere about above three score and ten thousand persons: and no humaine remedy appearing, the Prince and Senate had recourse to God, and meeting altogether in Saint Markes Church, the Prince in all their names made a sollemne vow to God to build a Church and dedicate it to the worlds Redeemer, beseeching him with heart and mouth, that it might please him of his infinite mercy to heare them, and to appease his wrath, by restoring them to their former health. This gracious God heard their humble and deuout praers, and from that time the sicknesse beganne to decrease, so that the City in March following was wholly freed from that scourge: wherevpon, a goodly Church was builded at La Zuecca, and dedicated to the Redeemer, where now the Capuchins abide: whither the Signory and Clergy doe yeerely goe in procession every third funday in Iuly to giue thanks vnto God, for his mercy and fauor shewed vnto them.

The city of Venice was not alone infected, but diuers other townes of the Marches of Treuifo and Lumbardy, but especially the city of Milan, where Cardinall Borromeo, Archbishop of the place, a Prelate of holy life, spared neither his means nor life for the releefe of his flock, exposing himselfe without feare to all dangers that were offered.

Things thus variably changing, Lodouico Mocenigo Duke of Venice decessed, in Iune, the yeere 1577. hauing gouerned eight yeeres, hee was honorably buried in the Church of Saint Iohn and Paul, vnder the great Gate, neere to Loredana Marcello his wife.

His funeralls ended, all men were desirous to acknowledge the vertue and deserts of Sebastiano Venieri, who when he was General had renounced the Christian Commonwealth by so notable a victory; and though hee had competitors, did neuertheless merit to be preferred before them all: wherevpon the forty one being assembled (of which number himselfe was one) they without any contradiction chose him Prince.

The Prince & Senates vow to God

Great charity of a Prelate

HIS election published, the people were very ioyfull of it. But that which seemed most strange, and therewithall pleasing, was, that amongst such multitude of all sorts of people as went to congratulate his new dignity, ten Turkes who were then in Venice, came and kissed his feet, saying aloude, This is that invincible Generall, who by defeating our fleet and vs, hath iustly purchased to himselfe this deserved crowne, unto whom we wish a long and happy life. The Prince thanked them and with a liberall hand rewarded them.

Not long after, five correctors of the lawes were created, who had authority to order the affaires of iustice. For sundry corruptions by long continuance crept into pleas, did much confound mens sutes, to the prejudices of iustice: These five were Giouan Donato, Iacomo Gussone, Francesco Venieri, Iustinian Iustiniame, and Lodouico Micaele, all Senators of great reputation. Then vpon intelligence that the Turke rigged certaine Gallies at Narento to send into the Adriaticke Gulph (contrary to the treaty of peace made with the Venetians) to defend his owne subiects trafficking on those seas, whom the Vσκοques of Segna robbed, the Venetians sent foure well armed Gallies thither, who cleered and defended those seas from their thefts and robberies, whereof the Turke hauing notice called home his owne Gallies forth of the Gulph and freed the Venetians from all feare and suspicion.

Price set vpon all wares.

The Senate perceiving that the prices of all things were excessive in Venice, either by reason of the late sicknesse, or vpon some other occasion; a decree was made to reduce all wares to the old price appointed by the lawes; and to see it effected, five Senators were appointed, namely Marco Iustiniame, Lorenzo Bernardo, Sebastiano Barbarico, Nicolo Quirini, and Lodouico Contareni.

Three Senators were afterwards deputed to take order for the discharge and payment of the States debts, occasioned by the last warres: the Senat was desirous (it hauing beene propounded by Giouan Francesco Priuli, a wise and veruorous Senator) to pay euery man his due, and to that end, they appointed the said Francesco Priuli, Antonio Bragadino, and Iacomo Gussone.

The Pope sends a golden robe to the Venetian Prince.

At the same time, Haniball of Capua elected Archbishop of Otranto came to Venice as the Popes Nuncio, whose arrivall was pleasing to the Senate, for the memory of his dead vncle, who in former time had beene Legat there, as also because that by his comming the passage towards Romagna was opened, which till then had beene shut vp by reason of the late sicknesse; his presence likewise brought content with it; for hee presented the Prince with a robe of gold from his Holinesse, which is a giuft which Popes are wont to bestow vpon Princes which are their greatest friends and favorites: Pope Alexander the third in the yeere 1577, honoured Prince Sebastian Ciani with the like giuft, and the ceremony of presenting it was magnificently performed in Saint Markes Church, fifteene daies after, vpon the one and twentieth day of Iuly, a publike proclamation was made, wherein the City was declared to be cleere and sound from all infection: At which publication the Prince and Senate went to visit the new Church built in honor of our Sauour at La Zucca.

Not long after, Ormanetta Bishop of Padua being dead, the Pope bestowed that rich Bishoprick on Frederico Cornare the Bishop of Bergamo, and that of Bergamo vpon Ieronimo Ragazzone Bishop of Nouara: it did highly content the Senate to see one of those Churches restored to the family of Cornares, who for a long time had gouerned it, and the other to a house so well deserving of the Commonwealth, for Ragazzone was brother to Iacomo and Placido Ragazzoni, beloued of the Signory for their good seruice done to the State.

This ioy, the fate of Brescia did greatly lessen, where the plague dayly consumed sumed multitudes: wherevpon in Iuly the Prince and Senate for three daies made sollemne processions, praying vnto God for their health.

The same yeere sundry prodigies were scene, a great Comet ouer all Europe, and at Rome a globe of fire in the ayre like to a great tunne which arising ouer the gate del popolo, vanished ouer Castle Angelo: besides a cleere light was scene in Romagna at midnight, which notwithstanding the darkenesse shined so bright as that men did as easily see to read as at noone day, these were interpreted signes of future misery.

Not long after, newes was brought to Venice of the death of D. Iohn of Austria who deceased at Namur in the beginning of the yeere 1578. at which time likewise Prince Venieri oppressed with old age, and surprised with sicknesse (then when he thought to celebrate the birth day of Princeesse Cecilia Contareni his wife, for which Francesco Morosini his sonne in law a noble Gentleman prepared great triumphs) departed this mortall life on the third of March, being generally bewailed of the whole City hauing gouerned the Commonwealth eight months and twenty daies. The ceremonies which were wont to be made in the Church of Saint Iohn and Paul, were by reason of the great raine performed in Saint Markes, his body was afterwards buried in the Church of Maran. The Archduke of Austria craued his picture of the Senate, together with his coate armour which hee wore vpon the day of the battaile of Lepanto, which the Senate willingly granted.

The funerall ceremonies ended, and the Senators after the vsuall manner proceeding to a new election, Nicolo de Ponte a very graue and noble Senator, foure score and eight yeeres old, and Procurator of Saint Marke, being a learned man which in his youth had read publicly at Venice, was chosen. In his time the Commonwealth was peaceable, the Turke turning his force vpon the Persian.

Brescia afflicted with the plague.

Sundry prodigies scene in the ayre.

HE same yeere the great Duke of Tuscany discovered a conspiracy against himselfe and his brethren made by certaine Florentine Gentlemen, who were apprehended and publicly executed, and not long after Iane of Austria his wife died in child-bed, a very vertuous Princeesse. The yeere following 1580. though there were fierce wars both in the East, and Netherlands, men fearing that it would likewise renue in France, the Venetians were quiet over their whole dominions.

The second yeere of Prince Pont his Soueraignty, an accident happened at Venice very pleasing to the Senate. Francesco de Medici great Duke of Tuscany a very potent Prince was desirous to marry for his second wife Bianca daughter to Bartolomeo Capello a Venetian Gentleman, and to that end sent Mario Sforza to Venice to acquaint the Senate and her father therewith. The Senate sent for Bartolomeo and his sonne Vittorio whom they knighted, then adopted the great Dutchesse Bianca daughter to the Venetian Signory, in the same manner as in former time they had done Catherina Cornaro Queene of Cyprus: the State then and afterwards shewing great signes of ioy, but chiefly vpon the arriual of Don John de Medici the great Dukes brother, sent to Venice to conduct her to Florence, and Giovann Micaele and Antonio Tepulo were sent Ambassadors to the great Duke in the Senates name to congratulate his marriage, and to be present at Florence at the great Dutchesse coronation.

They likewise sent Marco Iustiniano Ambassador to Charles Philibert the new Duke of Sauoy, to bewaile with him the death of Emanuel his father, a great friend to the Venetian State. And because Philip had obtained the crowne of Portugall by the death of the Cardinall King, the Senate appointed Vincento Tromb, and Ieronimo Lippomano both Knights and noble Senators, Ambassadors to his Maiesty, to reioyce with him in the Senates name for his happy fortune.

Ambassadors sent to the King of Spain.

Now because peace had in Venice begotten excesse in the expence of priuate Citizens which commonly carrieth sundry mischiefs along with it (for there where frugality and parcimony hath place, religion, vertue, and modesty doe flourish) a decree was made, that superfluous expence in garments, feasts and womens lying in, should be moderated.

Decrees as gainst the Penians superfluous expen-ces.

They abolished the vse of all sorts of pearle, true or counterfeit, onely women were permitted to wear a small earkanet of them about their neckes: costly skinnies, and furs were wholly forbidden to bee worne, together with the vse of any gold or silver lace vpon garments: Moreouer, it was not lawfull for any Curtezian to wear any precious iem, jewels of gold or silver, or to vse any tapestry: Great penalties were imposed not onely vpon the transgressors of this decree, but on workmen which should make or sell any of these prohibited things: and excessive expence was not onely forbidden in womens lying in, but likewise the vsuall visitation of friends, vnesse they were neere kinsfolke, and to preuent all deceit herein, the mid wiues were enioyned within three daies after any woman was deliuered of child to aduertize the Magistrate thereof. An other decree was made against superfluous diet, restraining it within the bounds of modesty: peacocks, partridge, fasant, and all dainty fish were bannished from the tables of delicious Epicures, Iesters and Buffons from their houses. It was likewise forbidden not to serue double messe of fish or flesh into any banquet, and a commandement to all Cookes to giue in the names of such to the Magistrate as had hired them to dresse any, together with the order therein obserued.

A Decree as gainst superfluous diet.

All Gouernors of townes, and Iudges of Prouinces were likewise enioyned, not not to bestow any excessive cost in garments, houshold-stuffe or seruants, because that modesty and proportion in gouernors, is an assured bridle to hold back subiects from doing euill. For, where every man is suffered to liue after his owne pleasure without order of law, there of necessity must all mischiefe and riot abound: for this cause the State enacted great and grieuous penalties vpon the transgressors of these so holy and wholefome decrees: For it auails not a Commonwealth to haue good lawes, vnlesse subiects doe obey them, and Magistrates see them severely executed.

Whilest the Senate were making these wholefome lawes, the Persian perceiuing that he had to doe with so potent an enemy as the Turke sought to weaken him by busying him in more places then one, and to that end did the same winter send an Ambassador to the Venetians, requiring that of them which they had propounded vnto him, for during the warre against Ottoman, hee intreated them to enuade the Turke now that hee was busied in Persia, promising so streightly to enclose them as they should neuer escape from thence, thereby hoping wholly to roote out the tyrannous memory of the Ottomans who went about to make themselves absolute monarkes of the whole world.

The Venetians dismissed this Ambassador with an ambiguous answer, as men that had no intent to entangle themselves in a new warre, without likelihood of great aduantage, and assured hope of victory. In this manner ended the yeere 1580.

The yeere following 1581. Pope Gregory the thirteenth perceiuing that because the course of the sunne had not bene rightly obserued, the Equinoctiall of the spring had gotten tenne daies before the course of the sunne, whereby the feast of Easter (on which all other mouable feasts depend) was not celebrated at the iust time appointed in the primitive Church by the councill of Nice, which in congruity if it were not reformed, the holy daies of winter would be kept in summer, and those of summer in winter, he sent for the skilfullest Astrologians of Europe to come to Rome, and commanded them after exact calculating the course of the planets, to refferre the Equinoctiall of the spring to the 21. day of March, as it had bene in old time decreed by the fathers of the said councill of Nice, and to finde out some meanes and rule, that the same inconuenient might for ever be remooued: These learned men did what the Pope commanded, by referring the Equinoctiall to it true place, and by taking away for once, tenne daies from October: His Holinesse assured that this was the onely true remedy, approued it, and by his iniunction commanded it to be obserued over all Christendome: only the Greekes and some other nations would not entertaine this reformation, which was disuiled by Lodouicus Lilius a very famous Mathematician, and divulged over all Christendome by his Holinesse command.

The same yeere there arose some contention betwixt the Venetians and knights of Malta, because that those knights scoured the seas to surprise the Turkes, whom some times they tooke in the Venetians seas, whereat Amarath being incensed, sent them word that if they would not take order that his subiects might safely passe through their seas, himselfe would send a mighty fleet to secure them. The Venetians complained to the great Master of Malta, intreating him not to permit his vessels any more to trouble the Turkes on their seas: but the Malteses making no account hereof, the Venetians tooke from them a ship of warre which they sent into Candy, and not long after tooke two Gallies from them, which being brought to Corfou, all the Turkish slaues in them were set at liberty, and the empty Gallies restored to the knights. The Venetians the same yeere to satisfie the Turke did publicly behead Gabriele Heme a Venetian Gentleman.

This Heme in a Galley of his owne had in the Archipelago fought with a Turkish Galeot which was going from Argier to Constantinople with the

A Persian Ambassador sent to Venice.

Upon whose occasion the Pope caused tenne daies to be taken from the yeere.

Contention betwixt the Venetians and Knights of Malta.

A Venetian Gentleman is executed to satisfie the Turke.

vice-queene of the same Kingdome, and a sonne and daughter of hers, which carried rich presents to Amurath, all the Turkes both men and women in it he put to the sword setting all the Christian slaves at liberty.

Beside the execution of this gentleman, the Venetians, to appease the Turke, were enforced to send home foure hundred Turkish slaves in stead of so many Christians which the said Heme had set at liberty, and to pay him in ready money the sum of 800000. Ducats.

But to giue this yeere a more pleasing farewell, the Prince of Mantua did with great solemnity and magnificence marry one of the daughters of Francesco great Duke of Tuscany: and Catherina Infanta of Spaine was by King Philip her father promised in marriage to the Duke of Sauoy.

Not long after, Pope Gregory the thirteenth died in the foure score and third yeere of his age: his funeralls ended in Saint Peters Church, where he was buried in a chappel which himselfe had built, the Cardinals entred into the Conclau, where after twelue daies, they elected Cardinall Felix Perretti of Montalto a Castle in the marches of Ancona, a Monke of Saint Francis order who tooke vpon him the name of Sixtus the fifth.

The same yeere on the fourth of Iune, Nicolo de Ponte the Venetian Prince, died, being ninety foure yeeres of age, having gouerned seuen yeeres and odde months, he lies buried in Saint Maries Church: his funeralls ended, and the forty one proceeding to a new election, Pascale Cigogna, Procurator of Saint Marke, was chosen Duke on the eighteenth of August of the same yeere.

A Dutchess is overthruwn in Padua.

This time there happened a tragickall act in Padua a towne vnder the Venetian Signory, into whose territories presently vpon the election of Pope Sixtus the fifth, Paulo Jordano Vrsino Duke of Brasciano retired himself (jealous of the Pope who suspected that the Duke had put a kinsman of his to death before his Papacy, hauing married his widow Victoria Corembona a beautifull Lady)

Lady) and there dyed, not without suspition of beeing poysoned, for which losse the Dutchesse beeing extreemly greued, retired with two of her bretheren to Padua, vnder the protection of the State of Venice, till such time as she pleased to returne home to her father at Eugubia. Lodouico Vrsino kinsman to the deceased Duke, lay at that time in Padua, for whose sake the Senate gaue him employment in a journey into the Leuant: this man, either of himselfe, or prouoked by others, did on a night with diuerse armed men, go to the Dutchesse houle, whom hee cruelly murdered, together with one of her bretheren.

The report of this murder beeing carried to Venice, the Senate sent Commissioners to punish the Author and complices of this homicide. Vrsino having notice heereof, and certaine of his letters intercepted, which discovered the fact, so as hee could not deny it, resolved to defend himselfe in his houle with fifty of his owne followers, determining to hold out till the last man: but the Magistrates enuironing the houle with their gardes, and perceiving that hee would not yeeld, caused a Cannon to bee brought, wherewith they battered and beat downe part of the houle, killing some of the defendants. Lodouico at last perceiving longer resistance to be vaine, yeelded himselfe, who beeing imprisoned, together with some of his complices, and found guilty of the Dutchesse murder, himselfe was strangled in prison, and his adherents publicly executed.

The murderers are put to death.

The end of the third Booke of the seventh Decade.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the seuenth Decade.

Henry the third, French King, is slaine by a Monke. Henry of Bourbon King of Nauar is proclaimed King of France, Foure Popes dye in lesse then a year. The Venetians are iealous of the Turkes and Milanefes. The building of the Bridge of Rialto. The conuerſion of Henry of Bourbon French King, hee ſends a ſollemne Ambaſſage to Rome, where Pope Cleinent the eight refuſeth to giue him his bleſſing. All the Citties of France yeeld to Henry the fourth. The Venetians ſend Ambaſſadors to him. Pope Clement bleſſeth the French King. Peace betwixt the French and Catholick Kings. The French King marrieth the Lady Mary of Medicis Princeſſe of Florence. Peace betwixt the French King and Duke of Sauoy. The Venetians cleere the Adriattick Seas from Pirates. A decree of the Venetian Senate againſt the Clergies purchaſing of lands. An other Decree concerning building of Churches. The creation of Pope Paul the fifth. Hee complains to the Venetian Ambaſſador againſt the Senates law, forbidding the Clergie to purchace lands, or to build Churches without licence. The Popes reſolution vpon the Venetians reſuſall. Hee ſends two Iniuñtions to them concerning that buſineſſe, with the Senates answer. Excommunication againſt the Venetians is publiſhed at Rome. They make two Declarations vpon the Popes excommunication. The Pope and Venetians warlike preparations againſt each other. The French King is a Mediator for Peace betwixt the Pope and Venetians, and to that end ſends the Cardinall Ioyeuſe to Rome. The Pope after ſundry difficulties conſcends to reuoke his cenſures, and to giue the Cardinall Ioyeuſe ample Commiſſion to doe it. The ſubſtance of the Articles whereby the Cenſures were reuoked. And laſtly the reuocation of them by the ſaid Cardinall in Venice.

The

The fourth Booke of the ſeuenth Decad of the Histoꝛie of Venice.

HILEST the Venetians, and generally all Italy enioyed peace, France and the Netherlands were afflicted with warre: And Henry the third French King beeing treacherously slaine by a Monke, the cheefe of the Army as well Catholicks as Protestants, proclaimed Henry of Bourbon, King of France and Nauarre, as first Prince of the bloud, and next heire to the Crowne.

- But to returne to the Venetians vnto whom our History doth chiefly belong.
- 20 The year following 1590. there was a great dearth of Corne ouer all Italy, but the Venetian Senate made such speedy prouiſion of graine from England and Poland, as during that time of ſcarcity, Bakers ſtalls and markets were better ſtored with bread, and the price thereof cheaper then in any other City of Italy, where men could not buy as much as they pleaſed, though in Venice no man was limited. The ſame year on the 27. of Auguſt, Pope Sixtus the fifth dyed, hauing held the Papacie five yeares, four months, and three dayes: Twenty dayes after, Cardinall Giuan Baptiſta Caſtagna a Romaine, was created Pope, intitling himſelfe Urban the ſeuenth, putting all men in hope of an happy gouernment: but he enioyed the Papacie onely twelue dayes. After his death the Sea was vacant
- 30 aboute two moneths; in which interim, more then ſeuen hundred Bandetti ſpoiled the countrey round about Rome: againſt them the collidge of Cardinals, and great Duke of Tuſcany ſent forces. At laſt the Conclau choſe Cardinall Nicolo Sfondrato of Milan Pope, intitling himſelfe Gregory the foureteenth.
- Toward the latter end of this yeare, there was in Venice a Greeke called Marto Bragadino Mamagna, one that had bene a Monke famous for opinion men had of him, that he could tranſmute quick ſilver into gold, the people were not alone bewitched with this golden dreame, but the Nobility, and ſome Princes of Italy, ſought his frienſhip, hoping by his meanes to turne mountaines into gold: but this Impoſtor beeing no longer able to conceal his deceit, fled from Venice into
- 40 Bauaria, where the Duke diſcouering his couſenage, imprifoned and condemned him to be hanged, but the priſoner making ſure to bee beheaded, the Duke granted his requeſt. The Venetians hauing carefully provided for the famine (as hath bene ſaid) were the year following 1591. much perplexed, hauing intelligence that the Turke made great preparation for warre. They ſent forces into Candy and to other places, confronting the enemy: but they were ſoone freed from that feare, being aduertised that the Turke did it at the requeſt of the French Kings, to inſelt the Spaniard, they did afterwards fortiſie Breſſia and Bergamo, ſuſpecting the great forces which were in the ſtate of Milan: they did likewise build that goodly bridge ouer the great Canall of the City, called the bridge of Rialto.
- 50 In the meane time Pope Gregory the fourteenth dyed, the tenth moneth and tenth day of his Papacie, hee was a great fauourer of the French league, to whoſe ayde he ſent forces vnder the command of his Nephew Hercule Sfondrato Duke of Mont marcian at the charge of the Sea Apoſtolick; but after the Popes death their pay beeing no more curreant, thoſe troopes by little and little diſbanded.

Pope Sixtus death, with the creation of Pope Urban
the 7.

Creation of Pope Gregory
the 14.

The decree of a Greeke.

The Venetians are ſet on of Turke and Milan ſen.

The building of the bridge of Rialto.

The death of Pope Gregory
the 14.

The

The Creation
and death of Pope Innocent
the 9.

The Sea was vacant thirteen dayes, at the end of which Cardinall Gionan Antonio Fajchinetta the Bolognesse was created Pope, assuming the name of Innocent the 9. at first he seemed to fauour the league of France, but his designs were vain for he liued but two monethes and one day after he was made Pope.

The Cardinalls went into the Conclau at the beginning of the yeare 1592. and elected Hipolito Cardinall Adobrandino nominated Clement the 7. who seemed willing to aid the French league with men and money.

The Creation of Pope Clement the 7.

At the same time Candy was miserably afficted with the Pestilence, where in a short space dyed twenty thousand persons: one thing is worthy to be noted, that toward the latter end of August, when the sicknesse beganne to decrease, there was scene in a night on the east side of the Island a great cloude of fire which giuing light for an houres space as if it had beene noone dayes, did to the great terror of the beholders runne through the ayre as farre as Spina longa, and there fell into the Sea, wherefor a long time it burnt in the water, and at last it vanished.

A Prodigie.

Now the City of Venice hauing beene (as all men know and as wee haue declared in the first booke of this History) builded by those, who flying from the fury and incursions of barbarous nations, retired into those lakes where it now standeth, and in the same manner as it beganne, hath still daily augmented and increased, so as till this day many famous men, learned in all arts haue come thither from all parts of Christendome as to the Sanctuary of the Muses, where those which are excellent in any art whatsoeuer are so honored and cherished by the nobility, as they presently forget their native Contrey, making their perpetuall abode there: where vpon it came to passe the same yeare that certaine fauorers of learning hauing honorable command in the City propounded the building of an Academy there, where by turnes they would meete, and read publick lectures in that art which euery man profest, and to this end nine gallant spirits ioynted together (Pompeo Limpia de Bari, Lucius Scaranus de Brindiz, Fabio Paulino de Vidua, Gionan Baptista Leone, Georgio Contareno of Venice, Guido Cassano de Serauall, Theodore Angelucio de Bella forte in la Marca, Vincensio Galieno the Roman, and Gionan Paulo Gallacio de Salles) and laid the foundation of this vertuous work, choosing a fit place for the purpose, where continuing their ordinary lectures the glory and reputation of this Venetian Academy extended so farre, as diuers notable men haue since then come thither, whereby it is daily much beautified and augmented.

The Institution of the Venetian Academy.

This ended this yeare. At the beginning of the next which was 1593. though the Venetians sought to satisfie the Turke, by keeping the Vicoques of Segna from scouring the Adriatick Seas, yet, not relying on their perfidious promises, beeing aduertised that they made great preparations by land and Sea, they re-enforced the Garrisons of Candy, which were much weakened by the late pestilence: then perceiuing that the Turkish Army, which came from Constantinople, made incursions through Croatia and approached the Contry of Frioul, belonging to their state, resolved to build a fort vpon the Confinies thereof, at all times to defend the Contry from the Turkes incursions, they committed the building thereof to skilfull Ingeniers, and to some of the cheefest Senators which son that it is seated in a goodly soyle tenne miles from Vdina, and within halfe a mile of the Emperors territories, was called Noua Palma.

The same yeare, Henry King of France and Nauarre, after sondry battails and ouerthrowes of his enemies did through the instruction of the Arch-bishop of Bourges and sundry Doctos of Paris require to bee reconciled vnto the Roman Church, and on the five and twentieth day of Iuly made publick profession thereof, in Saint Denis Abbey, before the said Arch-bishop, accompanied by the Cardinall Bourbon Archbishop of Rouen, nine Bishops, and diuerse diuerse other Prelates and Religious men, protesting to liue and dye in the sayd Catholick religion, and to maintaine it with, and against all men: hee made profession of his faith, accomplished all ceremonies requisite in so solempne an acte, and then receiued absolution, to the wonderfull ioy and applause of the people.

Not long after this publick conuersion, the King sent the Duke of Neuers and other Prelates to Rome, by them to present his obedience to the Pope, and to witnesse his desire to imitate the example of the Kings his Predecessors, and by his actions, like them, to merit the title and grade of the Churches eldest sonne, and to intreate his Holynesse to approoue his conuersion, and to honor him with his blessing.

A full mne Ambassade from France
to Rome.

The Pope after sundry honors done to the Duke of Neuers, would not at first endure to heare tell of the King, notwithstanding that the Duke and Prelates, which accompanied him, assured him that his conuersion was true and vnfeigned, and therefore humbly besought his Holynesse to beleuee it, which hee refusing to doe, would neither absolve the King, nor ratifie that which had beene done at Saint Denis. The French in the meane time perceiuing that the King had abjured his former errors, and was become a Catholick, and afterwards crowned and annointed at Chartres with the holy oyle, according to the ancient custome of the French Kings: all rebellious cities, one after another, returned vnder his obedience. The Venetians sent Ambassadors to the French King, to congratulate his conuersion, and to reioyce with his Maiesty for his happy successe, in recovering the greatest part of his kingdome.

The Venetians
send Ambassadors
to the
French King.

At the beginning of the yeare following 1595. Amurath the Turkish Emperour dyed, Mahomet his eldest sonne succeeded him, who calling all his brethern into his chamber, caused them to bee strangled in his presence.

The Pope beeing aduertised of the French Kings good successe, who still humbled himselfe to the Sea Apostolick, and had againe sent Dauid du Perron Bishop of Eureux to Rome, to procure his absolution, was willing to grant his request, notwithstanding many were of contrary opinions: Wherevpon, comming one Sunday morning beeing the eightene of September, in his Pontifical bus into Saint Peters Hall, hee approoued King Henries abjuration, with all ceremonies therein requisite, receiuing him to fauour, and into the bosome of the Church, with his blessing Apostolick, inioyning him due penance: which done, Drums and Trumpets sounded in signe of ioy, and Cannons thundred from Castile Angelo, all men reioicing at his good fortune, (the Spanish Ambassador excepted) who in his Masters behalfe protested, that the same act could not preiudice his Kings titles.

The Pope bless eth and absolveth the
French King.

During these solemnities at Rome, Pascale Cicogna Duke of Venice dyed, beeing foure score and five yeares old, hauing gouerned the Common-wealth nine yeares, one moneth, and fifteene dayes, hee lyes buried in the Church of Santa Maria de Cruciferi.

Marin

The Cardinal of Florence Legat in France.

MARIN GRIMANI Knight and Procurator of Saint Marke, succeeded him; being beloued of all men for his rare vertue and charitie to the poore. The Pope in the meane time to confirme what hee had done to the most Christian King, sent the Cardinall of Florence his Legate into France, who was honorably entertained at Paris, where hee made some aboades; for open warre being denounced betwixt France and Spaine, the Pope became a Mediator of peace: and to that end sent the Generall of the Fryers, a Sicillian, with ample Commission, together with the Legat, to treat of peace betwixt those two great Kings; hee had received the like authority from the King of Spaine; and in the end, after sundry goings too and fro, peace (which all men desired) ensued, the year 1598.

The Venetians
defeat the Turkes.

Henry the 4. motioneth a marriage with the Princess of Florence.

The Kings
marriage celebrated at Florence.

The Venetians perceiving that the Vicoques did not giue over their robbing the Dalmatian and Histrian seas, sent certaine Gallies thither, vnder the command of Giovann Bembo their Generall, assisted by Colonell Pierconte Gabutio & his troopes, who defeated these theeves, and cleared the seas. Heerein, during peace did the Venetians busie themselves, whilst the Turke envaded Hungary and Transilvania. But the Vicoques in the year 1599. continuing their incursions, the Venetians sent Nicolo Donato, who succeeded Bembo, against them, together with the same Colonell Pierconte Gabutio and his Regiment, who entered and wasted their countrey, rooke diuerse of their Castles, and slew many of them.

Henry the fourth French King, vpon diuerse iust and reasonable causes, hauing obtained the Popes dispensation, to repudiate his wife the Lady Marguerite of France, sister to the late King, and to marry an other by whom hee might haue issue, craued the Lady Mary of Medicis, Princessse of Florence, daughter to the late Francisco great Duke of Tuscany, and Neece to Ferdinand de Medicis, now great Duke, a Princessse beside her youth, endowed with rare beauty, wisdom, and many excellent parts. The great Duke perceiving how honorable this match would bee to himselfe and the whole family of Medicis, did willingly consent thereto, wherevpon so soone as it was determined and concluded, a great Lord of France was sent thither, who in the Kings name married her at Florence, honoring her as his maisters wife: Then all things prepared for the journey of so great a Princeesse towards the latter end of the yeare she embarked hir selfe and traine in the great Dukes Gallies, sailing to Marfeilles, where arriuing, she remained for certaine daies, receauing magnificent entertainment, till she might further know the pleasure of the King her husband, who at that time made warre vpon the Duke of Sauoy, for recouery of the Marquisat of Salusses, which that Duke had seized on during the ciuill warres of France: His Maiestie hauing intelligence that the Quene his wife was arriued at Marfeilles, sent word that shee should come to Lyons, whither himselfe came in post, and consummated the marriage begun at Florence.

Italy in the meane time was in all arme, because the Count Fuentes being by King Philip sent Lieutenant Generall to Milan, made great leues of soldiers both Spaniards, Italians, Swisses and Almaines, vnder collour of aiding the Duke of Sauoy against the French King, if peace betwixt those Princes, created of at the Popes command by his Nephew the Cardinall Aldobrandini, tooke not effect.

This troubled all Italy, and especially the Venetians in regard of their townes in Lombardy. The great Duke likewise grew ielous: wherevpon, each of them armed, and gaue order to fortifie their frontiers: the like did Francisco Maria Duke of Virin Peace in the meane time being proclaimed at Lyons betwixt the Christian King and duke of Sauoy at the beginning of the year 1601. and Count Fuentes for all that not disarming, but on the contrary encreasing his forces, made the French King to renew his league with the Swisses, and to leuy new troupes, that if the Spaniard should enuade any of his friends, or Confederats in Italy, him selfe might speedily be able to succor him.

King Philip aduertized of this ielozie commanded Count Fuentes to disarme, whereby all these suspitions ceased.

Not-with-standing, the Venetians sent the Colonell Pierconte with other Captaines into Lombardy; whither like-wise by their commandement the Generall Leonard Donato was gone, together with Giovann Baptista, Generall of their fantery, to fortifie their frontier townes, hauing discovered a plot laid to surprize one of their cheefest Cities; and although Count Fuentes, by his maisters commandement, had deuised his Army at Milan into sundry parts, namely into Flanders, Croatia, and to Prince Doria, yet he still retained such great numbers at Milan as might iustly cause his neighbors to feare and suspèct: The Venetians likewise armed certaine Gallies and two Galeasses.

Diuers causes moued the Venetians to doe so, but chiefly, because Prince Doria, by King Phillips commandement, hauing rigged a mighty fleet hoouered vp and downe the mediterranean, no man knowing his designe: in the end hee cleared this doubt, for he failed to Argier in Barbary, making an attempt there, which by reason of sundry difficulties had no good successe.

In the year 1602. the fort called Palma Noua by the Venetians was ended, and is thought to be one of the goodliest in all Italy, which being inhabited, they there beganne to build faire houses, and goodly Pallaces, so as in a short time they hope it will proue as populous as strong. The Senate afterwards perceiving that one of the mouthes of Po, would in time choake vp with abundance of earth, the Hauens of Chioggia and Malamoc, to the great preiudice and hinderance of the City of Venice, which by that meanes would loose the ordinary trafficke and commerce of those Hauens, caused a great trench to bee made, through which they diuerted that mouth of the Riuier another way, making it to fall into the Sea at a place whereas it could doe noe more hurt.

At the same time Philippo Pascale arrived at Venice returning from his journey against the Vicoques, hee was sent by the Senate as Prouidator

Trrrr

Gene.

Italy ielous of the Spaniards.

Peace betwixt
the French
King and Duke of Sauoy

The cause
of the Venetians
warre with the Turkes.

Diuerſe Pirates
are defeated.

The Senates
Decree againſt the Clergie.

A decree concerning building of Churches.

The death of Pope Clement
the viii.

The election of Pope Leo the x. and his ſolenne death.

Generall of Dalmatia, wherein hee got great commendation, hauing defeated thoſe theues who were afterwards wholly rooted out by the Archduke. Theodoro Balbi likewiſe Prouidator of the Gulphe, did put the Pirates of Barbary to flight, who ſcoured the ſeas almoſt to Venice, from whom hauing taken three Galeots, and ſet many Chriſtian ſlaues at liberty, hee did ſo terrifie them, as they durſt no more come into thoſe ſeas: The great Dukes Gallies had the like good hap, which according to their cuſtome ſailing in the Archipelago to meet with Turkiſh Foils, and to ſpoile their ſea coaſts, incountried the Gallies of Rhodes, which they fought with, tooke ſome of them, and carried a rich booty to Florence.

But not to ſtray farre from the Venerians, the Clergie of Prague hauing vehemently conteſted againſt Doctor Franciſco Zabarello, for the ſute preſer'd to ſell certaine antient Church lands; The Senate made a decree, that the Church ſhould not appropriate vnto it ſelſe rents poſſeſſed by the Layety, grounding that decree vpon a prohibition made by the Senate, in the yeare 1333. that no lands ſhould bee giuen or bequeathed in perpetuity to Churches within the City and Dutchy of Venice: and if any were left vnto them, they ſhould bee ſold by a certaine time preſixt, and the money alone to be theirs: alledging for reaſon, that the Clergie, who pretend themſelues and goods to bee exempt from all neceſſary charges belonging to the Common-wealth, the number of them dayly increaſing, and on the contrary, that of the Citizens ſtill decreaſing, who ſerue, and buſie them ſelues in the ciuill gouernment, and the quantity of their goods whereon the publick reuenew depends, beginning to faile, in the end all wealth would of neceſſity fall to the Clergie.

This law was variouſly obſerued till the yeare 1536. when it was reduced to this forme, That none of what quality ſoeuer, ſhould giue lands to the Church, but onely for two yeares ſpace, in which time they ſhould be ſold: and if the ſale were not made by the Clergie, a ciuill Magiſtrate ſhould bee appointed to doe it. This beeing conſidered by the Senate, hath euer ſince bene generally praſtiſed ouer the whole Venetian ſtate.

The yeare 1603. the Councell of the Preguays at Venice, decreed, that no Venetian citizen, of what degree or quality ſoeuer, ſhould in the City, without the Senates conſent, build any new Church, Hoſpittall, or Monaftery, nor that the Senate would wholly prohibit ſuch buildings, but becauſe the Prince and Senate as Superiours would conſider whether it were needfull or not, there beeing in the city one hundred and fifty Churches, Monafteries, Hoſpittalls, and other like places of deuotion. The yeare following 1604. the Venetians inioyning peace, warre remoued it ſelſe to other places, as Germany, the Leuant, and Flanders.

In the yeare 1605. Pope Clement the eight falling ſick on the twelfth of February, dyed on the third of March following, hauing gouerned the ſea of Rome thirtee yeares, his body was carried to Saint Peters Church, and buried in the Clementine chappell which himſelſe had built: Then the Cardinalls entring into the Conclau, elected Aleſſandro de Medicis Cardinall of Florence, ſonne to the illuſtrious Oſtatio, who beeing Archbiſhop of Florence, was made Cardinall by Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and beeing choſen Pope, tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth. The Romaines were very glad of his election, but their ioy laſted not long, for hee dyed of a Fever, the twenty ſixth day after hee was made Pope: Some thought hee was poiſoned, but his body being opened in the preſence of diuerſe Phyſitions, they found it otherwiſe, hee lyes buried in Saint Peters Church.

The Cardinalls proceeding to a new election, and deſirous to make haſte, the Cardinalls Farnese and Montalto went to Cardinall Aldobrandini, intreating him to name three among the whole Colledge of Cardinalls (Tuſcan and Baronijs excepted) and they would chooſe one of the three: Wherevpon, the

The creation
of Pope Paul
the ſixt.

the Cardinalls Clement, Arragon, and Borgeſius beeing named, Borgeſius as beſt beloued, was preſently ſaluted Pope by way of adoration, intitling himſelſe Paul the ſixt. This Pope defended from an ancient family in Syenna, was ſonne to a Romaine Gentlewoman, his Father coming to dwell at Rome.

But the Venetian Clergie, notwithstanding the Senates decree, did dayly more and more augment their reuenues and poſſeſſions, as well within the City as abroad: the Senate for reducing their whole State to one conformable cuſtome, had before (as hath bene ſaid) diuulged their law ouer all their dominions, and added therevnto a prohibition, that none within their City or Signory, vnder what coulour ſoeuer ſhould ſell, giue, or in any ſort alienate lands to the Clergie without the Senates permiſſion, which ſhould not be granted, but with the ſame ſolemnities, vſuall at the alienation of the publick reuenue, and all alienations made otherwiſe, to bee declared void, the lands conſiſcate, and Notaries puniſhed. The Pope at the beginning of his Papacie, hauing notice of this law, did duly examine it, and would in no ſort approoue it: but toward the end of October the ſame yeare, complained thereof to the Venetian Ambaſſador, at the time of publick audience, ſaying, That whileſt the Sea of Rome was vacant, the Venetians had made a lawe, which prohibited the Clergie to purchaſe lands; adding (though it were made vpon important occaſion, and by vertue of a former decree) yet the Cannons diſannulled them both; therefore his pleaſure was to haue them reuoked, inioyning the Ambaſſador in his name, to ſignifie as much to the Signory.

The Pope complaineth to the Venetian Amba-ſſador.

The Ambaſſador did what the Pope commanded, and within a while after received inſtruction and Commiſſion from the Senate, to acquaint his Holynette with the equity of their cauſe, and iuſtice of their law, together with the Signories power, and authority to make ſuch decrees. The Pope, confident in his owne opinion, ſaid aloud, That he gaue him audience, onely to content the Venetians, and not to admit any of his propounded reaſons or excuſes: then made an other complaint, about the detaining of a Chanoyn of Vincenza, and the Abbot of Nerueze, both of them accuſed of notorious crimes: and within a while after another, concerning the law, forbidding to build Churches without permiſſion: beeing reſolute to haue thoſe two lawes reuoked, and the priſoners deliuered to his Nuncio reſiding in Venice. And on the tenth day of September, making two Iniunctions, one concerning the two lawes, and the other about ſentencing the Clergie, hee ſent a Commiſſion to his Nuncio to preſent them, reſolving vpon their anſwer and reſuſall, to proceed to excommunication. But the Nuncio beeing peradventure moued with pity, becauſe the Senate at that time had choſen an extraordinary Ambaſſador, by humble meanes to ſeek to diuert his Holynette from his reſolution, and to induce him better to conſider of the matter, delayed the preſentation of thoſe iniunctions, which the Pope tooke in bad part: wherevpon, in all haſt he ſent him an expreſſe commandement to preſent them without farther delay. In regard whereof, vpon Chriſtmaffe day, when Duke Grimani lay at point of death, and that the Signory and Senators were aſſembled, ſome of whom had receiued the holy Sacrament, and others were ready to receive, the Nuncio craued audience, and preſented the two iniunctions, which, notwithstanding the Dukes death happened the day following, were not opened till after the election of the new Duke.

The Popes reſolution vpon
the Venetians
reſuſall.

Prince Grimani hauing gouerned nine yeares and odder moneths, departed this mortall life in the Chriſtmaffe holy dayes in the yeare 1605. his funerals ended, Leonardo Donato Knight, and Procurator of Saint Marke, was after the vſuall manner choſen in his ſteed, on the tenth day of February 1606.

Frer his election, the two iniunctions beeing opened, were both of one substance, containing that his Holynesſe was aduertised, that the Venetian Senate had decreed diuerſe things contrary to the liberty of the Church, and authority of the Sea Apostolick, and diuulged ouer all their Signories certaine lawes particular to the City of Venice, forbidding to build Churches and Monasteries, and to alienate ſecular poſſeſſions to the Clergie, without the Senates permission: which as repugnant to the Churches liberty, his Holynesſe declared to be of no force; and they who had made them, to haue incurred Ecclesiasticall censures, commanding them on paine of excommunication, presently to reuoke and breake those lawes; threatening to proceed farther, if they obeyed him not.

To this, the Senate answered on the 28. of Ianuary, the same yeare 1606. That with greefe and amazement it vnderstood by his Holynesſe letters, that hee disliked the lawes of the Venetian common-wealth, prosperously obserued for many ages, and neuer till then taxed by any of his predecessors, the reuocation whereof would ouer-throw the foundation of their State; that hee accounted those lawes to be contrary to the authority of the Sea Apostolick, blaming those which made them, as infringers of the Churches liberty, notwithstanding that they had bene men of singular piety, done good seruice to the Sea of Rome, and were now in heauen: That the Senate according to his Holynesſe aduertisement, had examined both the old and new lawes, and could find nothing in them, but what might be decreed by a Soueraigne Prince; concluding; that the Venetians did not thinke that they had inu'd any censures, nor that his Holynesſe, replete with piety and religion, would without considering the cause, continue his menaces. This answer did much displeaſe the Pope, who presently thundered an excommunication against them, which on the ſeuenteenth day of Aprill the same yeare, was published ouer all Rome, and hung vp in the vsuall places, namely on the great gates of Saint Peters Church, Chancery, and Market place of Campo de Fiore, by Christoforo Fondato, and Gionan Dominico de Pace, the Popes Pursuuant.

The

The Prince and Senate hauing intelligence what was done at Rome, to preuent popular troubles and commotions, which might thereby arise in the townes and cities of their iurisdiction, were desirous to acquaint all their subjects therewith, and to this end, made two declarations, the one directed to all the Clergy of their dominions, and the other to the Magistrates and officers of the State, to stop and restrain all disorders that might arise: wherevpon all that yeere diuers bookes were written on both sides, some condemning the Venetians, others the Pope, every man according to his owne passion.

But at last this contention had like to haue bene decided by the sword, both sides making great preparations for warre: for the Venetians hauing intelligence that great numbers of horse and foot were already leuied at Ferrara, and that the Romans had offered to aide the Pope in that warre with men and money, they likewise for their parts raised forces, fortifying their townes with men and necessary munition, because they would not be taken vnprovided, so that there was great likelihood of a bloody warre: But our good God, who with an eye of pittie looks vpon his children, and takes no pleasure to see their blood spilt, raised vp a Mediator, by whose means this schisme and controuersie betwixt Christians was appeased.

It was Henry the fourth French King, who to preuent the danger and skandall which might arise by this warre, did speedily send the Cardinall Ioyeuse to the Pope and Venetians, from him and in his name to mediate peace betwixt them; which had good successe. For Cardinall Ioyeuse being in hast dispatched from France with instructions from the King, necessary for his negotiation, arrived at Rome on a Thursday night the three and twentieth of March 1607. and the same evening conferred with the Cardinals and French Ambassador about propounding this businesse to the Pope, the next day after dinner, himselfe and the Ambassador went to see his Holynesſe, vnto whom the Cardinall did at large reucale the cause of his coming: But because the Pope seemed inexorable to any entreaty of agreement with the Venetians, till the Clergy and Iesuits were first restored to their Churches and Colledge (the Venetians still oppugning the Iesuits) the Cardinall at this first audience would not altogether put him out of hope of their restitution, but only told him that he did not despaire of reconciling the Iesuits to the Venetians, hauing bethought himselfe of a fit meanes by which hee hoped if his Holynesſe would make vse thereof to preuaile, which the next day he promised to propound.

The Pope, desirous to know his deuise, did early the next day send for them, and then the Cardinall Ioyeuse told him, that to hope by any expresse treaty to obtaine of the Venetian Senate the restauration of the Fathers Iesuits, were but to lose time, and to no purpose, but if his Holynesſe would giue him ample commission and authority to reuoke the censures, and with it send him to Venice; he shewing this commission to the Senate, and saying vnto them, loe, I haue here power and authority to take away the interdiction, but vpon this condition, that you restore the Iesuits, happily the sight thereof will make some impression in them.

The Pope made shew that hee neither would nor could approoue this motion, saying, that he had engaged his promise not to abandon the Iesuits, who had bene expelled for fauoring his interdiction, vnto whom hee had giuen his word neuer to be reconciled to the Venerians till they were restored, and after sundry other allegations this second conference was to no purpose, every man perceiving by his Holynesſe countenance that he was much perplexed.

The French Cardinals and other of the Kings seruants, meeting to consult vpon some meanes to remooue these difficulties, entreated the Cardinall Peron to goe the next day after dinner to get expresse audience of the Pope, and if it were possible, to induc him, to grant certaine points for the furtherance of the businesse.

Tercet 3

Cardinall

The Venetians make a declaration vpon the Popes excommunication.

The French King mediates peace betwixt the Pope and Venetians.

The Senates answer to the Pope.

The censures against the Venetians are published.

Cardinal Perron
you confer
with the Pope.

Cardinal Perron at their intreaty, vnderooke the matter, and for a while disputed with his Holinesse about the restauration of the Iesuits, shewing him the danger wherunto he exposed the Church and Christian Religion for one particular order, whose restoring was to be hoped for, though for a time deferred: he told him that his Holinesse should first re-establish his owne authority in Venice, and that once done, there was no doubt but that the Iesuits would ere long be restored; and after many other important reasons, he at last obtained of his Holinesse, that seeing for that present he could not preuaile in the Iesuits behalfe, hee should let it passe and insert some clause in the Articles; whereby it might appeare to the world that he had not neglected their restauration.

The Pope
grants a commission to the Cardinal Ioyse to reuoke
the censures.

Then the Cardinall speaking of the Commission, the Pope would hardly be drawne thereunto, supposing it to be dishonorable for the sea Apostolike, saying that the renouation of the censures ought to be done at Rome, and not sent to Venice; notwithstanding, the Cardinall alledging diuers reasons to the contrary, the Pope at last consented to giue the Cardinall Ioyse a commission to reuoke the censures, which he should carry with him to Venice, but on this condition, to do his best for the restauration of the Iesuits, before he dissuulled the interdiction. Hee did also (though with some difficulty) induce his Holinesse to be pleased, that the French Ambassador resident at Rome, and not he which lay at Venice should in the French King and Venetian Signories name craue of him the renouation of the censures in writing, for the Pope told him that the Spanish Ambassador resident at Venice, had craued it in the name of his Master and the Signory.

In a word, his Holinesse granted all his demands, onely he seemed vnwilling to declare his intent to the Consistory, saying he supposed that he ought not to doe it publicly, because he had not yet acquainted the Cardinals therewith, neuertheless he would resolve vpon it; and the next day in the consistory would impart it to some particular Cardinals, and the same after-noon, call them one after another into his chamber to take their vows in secret.

According to his resolution his Holinesse hauing in the consistory declared his intention to some particular Cardinals, he did the same after-noon call the rest into his chamber, secretly to take their vows, and in that businesse spent the week. The Spaniards being iealous and discontent that they were not employed in that negotiation, and desirous to frustrate the matter, divulged certaine rumors, contrary to the Popes will and meaning, and among others a cunning letter written from Venice by D. Francesco de Castro, by which he certified the Pope, that if hee stood fast for the restoring of the Iesuits, he should obtaine it, and that the Venetians determined to make protestation, by surrendering the prisoners, contrary to that which had beene concluded, and which his Holinesse had promised to himselfe: These false rumors did somewhat trouble the Pope who therevpon made some difficulty to proceed any further; but Cardinall Perron soliciting and assuring him of the contrary, hee deliuered (according to his former resolution) the commission to Cardinall Ioyse willing him to make hast to Venice.

The Commission is giuen to Cardinall Ioyse to reuoke
the censures at Venice.

The Spaniards being not able to crosse this resolution, made sure to haue Cardinall Zapala to be ioynded in commission with Cardinall Ioyse, but their labor was lost; and yet in other solemnities Zapala and the Spanish Ambassador had in appearance some equality with the French Kings Ministers, because in their Kings name they were sureties for the Venetian Signory, as were Cardinall Ioyse and the French Ambassador for the Christian King: yet the world accounted it but a vaine and idle fable, for they had no such authority from the Signory of Venice, as had the French, who executed their commission to their Kings great fame and glory.

Cardinall Ioyse, together with the commission, receiued from his Holinesse the conditions on which the censures were to be reuoked, being in number fixe,

10

20

30

40

50

the

The Articles on which the interdiction was reuok'd.

the effect whereof is this: That the two Church men prisoners, namely the Abbot of Nemeze, and the Channon of Vincenza, shall bee freely giuen to the Pope: That his Holinesse shall reuoke his censures, making a declaration thereof to the Colledge: That the Venetian Signory shall within a while after send an Ambassador to the Pope: That the Duke by a declaration shall certifye the Clergy of his State, that the first declaration is reuoked: That the three Decrees mentioned in the Popes interdiction, and other lawes of the Signory shall continue in their full force and power, with this prouiſo, that the Senate shall promise the French and Catholike Kings not to execute them before the businesse be fully ended betwixt his Holinesse and the State of Venice, hauing first better and more amply informed the Pope of the iustice and equity of those lawes: And lastly that all Churchmen and Religious orders which are banished and expelled from Venice, or the iurisdiction thereof, by reason of these troubles, may returne home to their houses and couents. But concerning the returne of the Iesuits, his Holinesse is content to deferre it, till an Ambassador from the Signory haue treated particularly with him concerning that point, certifying him that their expulsion proceeds from certaine causes and reasons which haue no community with the interdiction, and if it shall be found otherwise, then as easily to admit the restauration of the Iesuits, as that of other Clergy men.

Now Cardinall Ioyse departed from Rome with commission and Articles, and arrived at Venice, where hee was honorably receiued and entertained, many Senators going to meet him in the Bucentaure: Then the next day, being the twentieth of Aprill, one of the States Secretaries, accompanied with the capraine and other officers of the prison, and for greater solemnity, with a publike Notary, brought the two prisoners to the house of the Sieur de Fresne, Ambassador to the French King, and deliuered them to him, as granted to the Pope at the intreaty of the King his Master, without prejudice to the States iurisdiction in such like cases, and the French Ambassador did presently consigne them into the hands of the Cardinall Ioyse who was in the same house, in the presence of the Secretary, with these words, These are the prisoners which the Signory hath granted to his Holinesse, not adding at whose entreaty, and so the Cardinall receiued them as the Popes prisoners; whereunto the Secretary at that time made no reply: In this manner by this omission on the one part, and silence on the other, it seemeth that some doubt, not well vnderstood, remayned betwixt the Pope and Signory, which neuertheless holds it honor preferred by the forme of the consignment inregrested by a publike Notary: and the Cardinall supposeth that the Pope ought to be satisfied with the words of the Sieur de Fresne, or rather with his casual or voluntary omission.

The Cardinals reception at Venice.

After what manner the prisoners were deliuered.

Then the next morning, which was the day appointed by the Senate, the Cardinall coming to the Colledge, after some circumstances of the Popes fatherly goodness, did assure them that the censures were reuoked, & hauing giuen them his blessing went to celebrate masse in the Patriarkes Church.

The manner of reuealing the censures.

The Dukes first declaration was likewise reuoked in this manner. Leonardo Donato by the grace of God Duke of Venice &c. To the reuerend Patriarke Archbishops, and Bishops of our State and iurisdiction of Venice, and to the Vicars, Abbots, Priors, Rectors of parish Churches, and all other Ecclesiasticall Prelates, greeting. Seeing it hath pleased our good God to finde out a way whereby our holy Father Pope Paul the fifth hath beene daylie informed as well of our good meaning, as integrity of our actions and continuall honour and reuerence which wee beare to the Sea of Rome, and thereby to take away all cause of strife, wee, as wee haue euer desired and procured vniuerſally, and good correspondence with the said Sea, of which wee are louing and obedient children, receiue likewise this contentation, to haue at last obtained the accomplishment of our holy desire.

The Duke re-uoketh his first declaration.

Therefore

Therefore we thought good by our declaration to aduertise you hereof, giuing you besides to vnderstand, that whatsoever did belong hereto, hauing bene faithfully performed on both parts, and the censures and interdiction remoued; the protestation likewise, which we made against them, hath bene and is reuoked; we being desirous that herein, and in all other our actions, the piety and religion of our State may still more and more appeare, the which we will carefully obserue, as our Predecessors haue euer done. Given in our Ducall pallace the one and twentieth of Aprill 1607. signed Marco Ottobon Secretary.

The Senate
doubt

The Duke hauing published this declaration, and by deliuey of the prisoners satisfied for his part the conditions mentioned in the accord, the Senate was perplext, with a doubt of no meane consequence, which was, that the Pope for his part hauing made no mention at all concerning bookes and writings, published in behalfe of the said decrees, nor of the authors of the said bookes, which are two very important points, and which did wholly seeme to breake of this reconciliation, the State doubting that the Pope by this silence and omission had an intent to proceed afterwards against the Authors of the said bookes by the ordinary way of Ecclesiasticall iustice; and thinking it a matter against all reason to abandon those that had done them such good and faithfull seruice, after mature consultation, the Senate made a very notable and honorable decree that the Signory should protect them against all men, and assigne them a perpetuall pension.

In this manner, is the Commonwealth by Gods goodnesse, and reuocation of the censures, restored to her former ancient peace and glory.

The end of the fourth and last Booke of the seventh Decade of the Historie of Venice.

FINIS.

A Table of the principall matters contained in the first Volume of the Historie of Venice, compiled for the more easie finding out thereof by the right course of Alphabet.

A Authors meaning wher- of to treat. Fol. 1	and Histria, come to Venice to complaine of the Narentines. 55	A new Armie of Hungarians in Da- matia. 8
A Authors opinion con- cerning the Cities foundation. 4	A mbassadors offers to the Veneti- ans. 56	A courageous act of Prince Ma- chaeli. 9
A verie curious obseruation. 5	Albania is a part of Illiria 56	A strang case of a Pigeon. ibid.
A wonderfull miracle smelling some- what of Poperie. 5	A diuine punishment. 65	All the Islands of the Grecian Empire taken. 9
A ttilla defeated neere Tholouise. 5	A wonderfull vision hapned to Peter the Hermite. 69	A new religious Order. 9
A rrian sett ouer all Italy. 7	A ssemblies answere to Pope Urban at the counsell of Clermont. 71	Agreement with the Pisans. ibid.
A ncient custome of marrying their daughters. 9	An admirable matter. 71	A new Armie against the Nor- mans. 9
A great miracle at Verona. 10	Alexis practiseth treacherie. 72	A sodaine fire. 9
A league made with Luitprand. 12	Alexis & Beamond reconciled. 73	A league with William king of Sicill. 100
A cruell and unworthie act. 18	A new agreement betweene Alexis and the Christian Princes. ibid.	A secret league betwixt the Greeke Emperour, and the King of Si- cill. 101
A punishment of God. 18	A new Armie of Infidels. 74	A great fleet against the Greeke Em- perour. 107
A ncient Malacorum ruined. 24	A great battaile betwixt the Christi- ans and the Infidels. ibid.	A new deceit of the Greekes. ibid.
A biolans yeeld. 24	Armenia Maior giuen by the French men to Palmirus. 75	An example of great affection to a mans country. 104
A verie excellent Librarie within the Palace. 27	A verie dangerous way. 76	All the Princes of the Greeke Empire murdered. 106
A conspiracie against the Prince dis- covered. 28	A luckie euent for the Christi- ans. ibid.	A generall Council published to be holden at Dijon. ibid.
A lexandrines, insolent to stran- gers. 30	Antioch S. Peters first seat. 77	A resolu'd Ambassade to Frederick in the Popes behalfe. 107
A ugustus his Prouerbe. 30	Abundance of victuals at the begin- ning of the siege. ibid.	At what time the Venetian Prince be- gan to scale with lead. 108
A Sea-Armie granted to the Grecians against the Saracens. 34	A great quarrell betweene Beamond and the Earle of S. Giles. 79	At what time the Venetian Prince began to marrie the Sea. ibid.
A fleet sent against the Narentines. 45	Agreement made with the king of Tripolie. ibid.
A solemn oath made by the Clergie and chiefe Citizens. 45	A new fleet of Venetians in Sy- ria. 85
A meruailous example of fortune. 51
A mbassadors of Dalmatia, Liburnia

The first Table.

Antient manner of distributing almes. 112
A new manner of electing the Prince. 113
A new army of Christians for recovery of the Holy Land. 114
Agreement betwixt the Venetians and forraigne Princes. 116
Agreement with the Bandetti of Zara. 118
A great fight at the Hauen of Constantinople. 119
An assault giuen to the Citie. ibid.
A discreet answere of a young Emperour. 120
A new Greekish inuention to deceiue the Christians. ibid.
A new agreement betwixt the Venetians and the Princes. 121
A decree of the Venetians about possession of the Islands. 124
A great courtship. 126
A new strife betwixt the Venetians and Paduans. 126
A sedition of the Constantino politians affirming their Church not subiect to Rome. 127
A Colonie sent to Corfu. ibid.
A new commotion in Candace. ibid.
Agreement with the chiefe Rebels of the Island. 135
Angelo Gradonico Governour of Candie. 136 Agreement with the Candioti. ibid.
Armie of the Greeks before Constantinople. 137
Articles of the truce betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses. ibid.
Andrea Tepulo sent to aide the Genoueses. 140 Agreement with the king of Hungarie for Zara. ibid.
An armie at Venice against Eccelin. 142
An assault giuen to Padua. 143
A noble courage of a Prencesse. ibid.

Acres taken by the Venetians. 147
A new Venetian fleet in Syria. 151
A new Venetian army sent to Macedonia. 152
A new Venetian armie against the Genoueses. ibid.
An vsuall Prouerbe. 155
Anconitans seeke to defraud the Venetians of their Impostes. 157
Anconitans pollicy to surprize the Venetians. ibid.
Anconitans send to Pope Nicholas the third. ibid.
A new warre with the Patriarch of Aquileia. 158
A traitor punished. 159
Acres taken by the Infidels. 160
At what time the Christians were driven out of Syria. ibid.
A popular tumult about the creation of the Duke. ibid.
Andrew king of Hungary cometh to Venice. 163
A new war with the Genoueses. ibid.
A wonderfull master in the Femmes Maotides. 164
A strange death of one of the Generals of the Venetian armie. 165
A new armie of the Venetians. 166
An enforced peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses. ibid.
A detestable act of a baslard. 167
A pension giuen to the woman who slue Baumont. 169
Another opinion concerning the issue of the conspiracy. ibid.
Authors discourse on the doings of the Pope and Dandolo. 177
A deed worthy of a Generall of an armie. 173
A new armie against the Genoueses. ibid.
Abundance of corne in the City. 174
Agreement with the Patriarch of Aquileia. 175
A wonderfull eclipse. ibid.
Albert of Escalla, recovereth Vierz. 181
A generall review of the armie. 182
Albert of Escalla fleeth. 183
Antenor laide the first foundations of Chioggia. 184
Ambassadors sent to Venice to procure a peace. 185

Answere retreat. 186
A discreet resolution of a Generall. ibid.
A notable sentence. 188
A treatie of peace broken. ibid.
A prodigious storme at Venice in a night. 190
A wonderfull apparition to a poore Fisherman. ibid.
A Generall assault giuen to Zara. 194
A wonderfull earthquake. 196
At what time the infection beganne and ended in Venice. 197
Albert Prince of Croatia pardoned. 198
A discreet act of the Generall. 199
A cruell night-fight. 201
Arragonis Generall slaine in the battaile. ibid.
A new Genouesan armie commanded by Pagano Doria. 205
A great braverie of a Genouese Gallie. 207
Aristocratie reputed best of the governments. 208
An excellent architect punished for conspiracie. ibid.
A religious and godly act. 210
Almaines defeated through their owne default. 214
A Citie bravely defended. 215
A peace more necessarie than honourable for the Venetians. ibid.
Ambassadors sent enerie where against the Candioti. 216
Advertisement to Christian Princes against the Candioti. ibid.
A free speech of two Senators of Candie. 218
Almiron. 219
A new commotion in Candie. 221
Anopolis taken. 224
A merrie answere of a souldier to one of the Rebelles. ibid.
A Venetian armie against the Thyracines. 225
A base retreat of the Almaines. 226
A new warre with Francisco Carrario. ibid.
Alberto Carrario in Rayniero his place. 229
Almaine marchants imprisoned in Venice. 230
An absolute peace with Leopold. 231

An agreement betwixt the Venetians and the king of Cyprus. 235
A stratagem of the Genoueses to avoid the fight. 236
A braue answere of those of Sico. 237
A quarrell against the Venetians at Barletta soone appeased. 239
A battaile at Sea betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses. ibid.
A memorable enterprize of Carratio. 242
A diuine punishment. 245
A new decree of the Senate in favour of those who should relieve the Citie. 250
A liberall offer made to the Senate by a Citizen of Chioggia. ibid.
An enterprize attempted with bad success. 251
A great Barze of Genoa taken. 252
A Genouese ship esleemed to be worth 500000 crownes. ibid.
A sharpe fight in the hauens of Brondoli. 254
A great fight on the lakes. 259
A discreet answere of the mercenarie Captaines to the enemies. 261
After what manner the Paduan had inclosed the passages towards Treviso. 266
An unworthie act of a Garrison for want of pay. 268
Assilye led to Carratio upon Composition. 270 Ambassadors sent from Venice to Trucifoto Leopold. 273
A monster borne at Venice. 274
A Venetian armie to subdue Temesos. 277
A law against murderers. 277
Antonio of Escalla defeated by Giouanni Galeas Visconte. 278
A French man punished for indiscreet speaking. 282
A Venetian Garrison sent to Vincenza. 283
Albert de Este maketh warre on the Venetians in behalfe of Carratio. 284 Accio of Este recalled from Candie to make warre on Albert. ibid.
An Amphitheater in Verona. 286

The first Table.

A cruell and vsuall punishment. 287
A meruailous storme. 291
Ambassadors of Philip Duke of Milan at Venice. 298
Alliance concluded betwixt the Venetians and Florentines. 305 Articles of the agreement. ibid.
A Rampier built against the Castle of Brescia. 310
An assault giuen to the Castle of Brescia. 311
An agreement made with the Garrizon in the Castle. 312
A new league against Philip. 314
A troupe of Venetian Marriners defeated by Philips forces. 316
A furious salte of the besieged. 318
A battaile betwixt the Venetians and Philip. 319
An extreme frost at Venice. 327
A cruell decree of the Florentines. 328
An enterprize upon the Castle of Lodes discovered. ibid.
A bloudie fight. 330
A nauall fight betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses. 331
A fierce fight by land. 332
An enterprize of the Venetians upon Cremona. ibid.
Attendulo reconereth sandrie places for the Florentines. 334
Articles of peace betwixt the Venetians and Philip. 336
Accord betwixt Sforza and Pictinino. 339
A Treatie of peace almost concluded is broken off. 341
A Cittadell made at Bologna. 342
Articles of agreement betwixt Philip and Sforza. 346
A complot to assaile the Venetians on all sides. 348
Auogadre his remonstrance to the Senate. 357
A wonderfull proposition of a Candiot. 360
After what manner the Vessels were brought to the lake of Benac. ibid.
A league concluded betwixt the Venetians, Florentines, and Sforza. 361

A nauall battaile betwixt the Venetians and the Milanais. 361
A fierce fight nere the lake of Benac. 361
A Venetian armie for the Lake. 361
A new designe of Sforza to recover Brescia. 361
An enterprize upon Verona. 361
Alleague betwixt Philip and Colanetano the Popes Generall. 361
A battaile upon the lake betwixt the Venetians and Philips forces. 361
Ambassadors come to Sforza from Brescia and Bergamo. 361
Andrea Dandolo sent Ambassadors to the Soldan of Babylon. 361
A great deluge at Venice. 361
Alexander, Sforza his brother, reuolteth from him. 361
Andrea Donato accused to haue bene corrupted, is condemned to a pecuniarie fine. 361
Attendulo his incurious upon the Milanais. 361
Anconitans yeeld to the Venetians. 361
Accord betwixt the Milanais and Sforza. 361
Ambassadors sent from Milan to Venice with Venetians answer. 361
A nauall Armie against Pirates. 361
Alphonso imprisoneth all the Venetians in his kingdom. 361
Alphonso his answere to the Venetian Ambassadors. 361
Accord betwixt the Venetians and Sforza. 361
A battaile betwixt the Turkes and Christians at Adrianople. 361
Aphonso expelleth the Venetians out of his dominions. 361
A motion of peace betwixt Sforza and the Milanais. 361
Accord betwixt the Venetians and Milanais. 361
A cruell fight at the mouth of the haucen of Siracusa. 361
Ambassadors assembled at Venice. 361 Agreed death in Milan. 361
An excellent example of chastitie in a Germaine Ladie. 361

The first Table.

A fierce fight with victory on neither side.	419
Alphonso pursueth the Florentines.	420
Side entrench into Constantinople by Sea.	422
Ambassadors sent into Germany to the Emperour.	426
Antonio Marcello Promidiator besiegeth Thyresse.	433
Affault given to Thyresse bath no good success.	ibid.
Arimini and Thyresse freed from the siege.	436
A memorable offer of two brethren of Candie.	444
A generall assault given to Nigrepont by the Turcks.	ibid.
A new pollicy of Ottoman.	447
A generous act of a Dalmatian woman.	452
Ambassadors of Vssan-Cassan king of Persia come into Italy.	453
A brave deed of a young man.	466
Ambassadors of Callimber sent to the Venetian General.	467
After what sort the Janizaries are made.	468
Ambassadors come to Mocenigo from the king of Cyprus sister.	469
A battaile betwixt the Turkes and Persians.	470
Andrea Cornarimurdered.	474
Antonio Legiero Gouvernour of Scutaria.	486
Arragonians defeat the Florentines.	490
A cruell assault by night.	501
Alphonso aided by the Coloness of the Saueilli besiegeth the Pope.	502
A cruell fight betwixt Alphonso Duke of Calabria, & Roberto of Arimini General to the Venetians.	ibid.
Alphonso his great progressions.	508
A subtil stratagem of Viari.	510
Alphonso taketh Carpineitta.	511
Alphonso takes Azzola.	ibid.
Alphonso his exclamations.	512
Arrogant brag of Porco.	514
Alphonso's army at Quintiana.	515
Alphonso takes Metella.	ibid.
A great plague at Venice.	517
Ambassadors sent to the King of Romans and to the king of Portugal.	521

A league betwixt the Pope and Venetians.	522
Almaines besiege Ronera.	524
A law carefully observed by the Venetians, with their great justice.	531

B

Bonitendius opinion concerning the association of a colleague in the government or principality.	20
Blondus his opinion concerning the French war against the Venetians.	23
Battaile of Crotana.	35
Benet the Pope comes to Venice.	ibid.
Berengarius defeated by the Hunnes.	40
Battaile betwixt the Venetians and the Hunnes.	41
Buriall of Pietro Candiano, and his young sonne.	47
Berengarius and his sonne Albert defeated.	51
Bishop of Grada his present to the Duke.	56
By what means the Normans grew great.	65
Beaumont assailed by Alexis subiects.	73
Battaile betwixt the Christians and the Infidels.	74
Beaumont gives the first assaults to the Citie of Antioch.	76
Beaumont his great authority.	78
Bethlehem, Brains, Berithon.	80
Bodies of S. Theodore, and S. Nicolas, brought to Venice.	84
Baldwin king of Jerusalem.	85
Beaumont is set at liberty, and returns to Antioch.	ibid.
Baldwin furnished Burgenfis king of Jerusalem.	86
Baldwin taken prisoner by Dalmachus king of the Parthians.	89
Barbarians defeated by the Venetians before Ioppa.	91
Building of the hospitall of the public charity.	95
Baldwin of Flanders chosen Emperour of the East.	121
Boniface king of Thessaly.	124
Bishops Sea at Malamoc translated to Chioggia.	127
Benedicto Trevisano.	141
Brent and Bachillan turned back.

words.	142
Bolognians intent discovered.	154
Bolognians defeated.	155
Buconio his conspiracie.	166
Brave resolution of a great captain.	183
Brescia besieged by Luchin Vincente.	187
Brescia and Bergamo taken by Luchin.	ibid.
Building of Saint Anthonies Hospital.	194
Battaile betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses.	203
By what means the plot was discovered.	208
Base retreat of the Almans.	226
By what means the Isle of Tenedos came into the Venetians possession.	232
Battaile at Sea with the Genoueses.	233
Rebia recovered.	264
Brescia and Senia taken by Lautereto.	267
Boucicault a French man, General of the Genoa army.	281
Both fleets dissembled.	ibid.
Babes in time past at Verona.	286
Boldness of Piccinino, one of Philips Captains.	312
Brussels taken.	315
Battaile betwixt the Venetians and Philip.	319
Brescia somewhat relieved.	362
Barbaro his polstrick wisdom.	368
Bresians terme Barbaro Father of their country.	ibid.
Bresians are put to rout.	369
Brave message of the Gouvernour of the old Pallace to the Prince of Mantua.	376
Brescia is relieved with victuals.	379
Borjade Este is put to rout.	384
Breguan, Triuill, and Rimoles in the Gyraade recovered by Sforza.	385
Battail of Anglare betwixt Piccinino and those of the league.	386
Bresians recompensed for their loyalty.	388
Bitise assailed by the Venetians.	396
Bologneses having recovered their liberty, craue the alliance of the Venetians and Florentines.	399
Bertoldo

The first Table.

Bertoldo D'Este is slain at the siege of Corinth.	433
Bartholomeo of Bergamo bringeth forces into Tifanica.	440
Battell of Molinella.	ibid.

C

Creation of Tribunes.	8
Comming of the Lombards into Italie.	ibid.
Churches builded by Narics.	9
Church of Grada made Metropolitane by the Pope.	10
Church of Grada robbed.	ibid.
Complaint against the Tribunes.	11
Creation of Exarch.	14
Conspiracie against the Duke.	20
Cruel death of the bishop of Grada.	21
Conspiracie against the Duke discovered.	ibid.
Cause of the warre betwixt the two Empires.	22
Comming of Theodosius to Venice.	34
Citie of Crotana.	ibid.
Citie of Venice new fortified.	39
Ciuill warre betwixt the Hunnes.	40
Commachians vanquished.	43
Complaints against the Narentines.	45
Church of the Augustines builded.	46
Complaint of Vitalis bishop of Grada.	51
Ciuill discords.	53
Cruell intent of the Calloprini.	ibid.
Calloprini returne to Venice.	54
Citie of Pharos destroyed.	58
Conditions of peace granted to the Narentines.	ibid.
Church and Monasterie of Bennet, builded by the Phaledrini.	60
Conspiracie against the Duke, and his banishment.	61
Centranico deposed from his dignitie, is by the people shorne, and made a Monke.	62
Custom of taking a Colleague into the Principallitie abolished.	63
Crueltie of the Mahometians.	70
Charlemain his exploits against the Infidells.	71

Complaints of the Christians before Antioch.	78
Casarea.	80
Christians besiege Jerusalem.	82
Christians take Jerusalem.	83
Castle of Soball built by Baldwin.	86
Chioggia built with the ruines of Malamoc.	87
Ciprians Monasterie built.	ibid.
Caloman king of Hungarie dieth suddenly.	88
Croatia brought vnder the Venetians obedience.	ibid.
Conditions granted by Varimond to the Venetians.	92
Christians stratagem before Tyre.	93
Corfu taken by the Venetians.	98
Contagious sickness in the Venetian armie.	103
Creation of the Ten.	104
Crueltie against the Law of Nations.	105
Cruell determination of a woman.	ibid.
Christian Princes arrived at Venice.	110
Constantinople besieged by Sea and Land.	118
Constantinople besieged the second time.	121
Constantinople yeeldes.	ibid.
Coronation of the Emperour Baldwin.	122
Cause why the Emperour Emanuel hated the Venetians.	ibid.
Colonic sent into Corfu.	127
Count of Auxerre chosen Emperour of the East.	ibid.
Count Mailloc his enterprise upon Candie.	130
Colonic sent to Candie.	131
Candace taken by Tepulo.	132
Cyani willingly deposes himselfe.	134
Constantinople besieged againe by Vattasus.	137
Craft and subtiltie of the Genoueses.	138
Court of Requests established in Venice.	139

Citie of Pola taken and ruined.	141
Citie of Epidaurio called at this day Malusja.	142
Crueltie of the Greekes and Genoueses.	ibid.
Christians in Syria divided in to factions.	ibid.
Candia in Candie ruined by the Genoueses.	149
Certaine Genoa ships taken by the Venetians.	ibid.
Carolo and Andria Dandolo Generall of the Venetian Armie.	160
Cydon in Candie taken by the Genoueses.	161
Citie of Ferrara recovered by the Popes Legate.	166
Conspiracie of Tepulo.	ibid.
Conspirators purpose.	ibid.
Conspirators assaile the Dukes pallace.	166
Course of the warre with those of Ezcalla.	171
Cause why the Paduans revolted from those of Ezcalla.	181
Caminellis wife slaine in the habitation of a seruant.	181
Charles son to the king of Bohemia incamped before Feltra.	ibid.
Citie of Feltra taken by the king of Hungarie.	181
Candie appeased by the Rebells punishment.	192
Certaine Lords of Candie deposed.	ibid.
Chief conspirators punished.	200
Cause of the warre betwixt the Venetians and the king of Hungarie.	211
Commissioners sent into Candie to appease the troubles.	210
Calergo the murderer taken.	211
Candiotis resolute to yeeld to the Genoueses.	ibid.
Candiotis crueltie to the Venetians.	215
Candiotis defeated.	222
Citie of Candie yeeldes.	ibid.
Candiotis defeated and put to flight by Giacomo Bragadino.	222
Contareni his fault inexcusable.	223

The first Table.

Carrario his purpose discoverd.	226	Civilians yeelde to the Venetians.	293	Crenia yeeldes to the Venetians.	411
Cause of the fourth warre with the Genoueses.	231	Carmagnolla leaveth Philip, and commeth to the Venetian.	297	Coyone assailed by command of the Senate.	416
Carrario beginneth warre against the Venetians.	234	Cornari his Oration to Philip. ibid.		Carolo Gonzaga imploereth the Venetians aide.	ibid.
Cause of the taking of Famagosta. ibid.		Carmagnolla called into the Senate, with his Inuicte against Philip.	302	Coyone makes incursions upon the Bressan territorie.	418
Cities of Cesalta and Saligotta taken.	237	Carmagnolla Generall to the Venetians.	307	Constantinople besieged.	422
Laballa of Verona, Generall of the Venetian footmen.	241	Certaine Venetian troupes defeated by the armie of Philip.	310	Captaines of galleys punished for leaving the fleet without licence.	425
Carrario joyneth himselfe with the Genoueses.	242	Castle of Bressia yeelded to the Venetians.	312	Conditions of peace concluded betwixt Sforza and the Florentines by means of an Hermit.	426
Chiurani, for not doing his duty is condemned to perpetuall imprisonment. ibid.		Casal-Maior taken by Picinino.	315	Cause of the warre betwixt the Thyrasines and those of Cape-Histria.	434
Cap-darger taken by Carrario.	245	Carmagnolla before Montetaro.	317	Capel his exploits.	439
Common complaints of the people.	246	Carolo Malatesta Generall of Philip's armie.	320	Capel dieth with griefe.	440
Charles, sonne to Lewis King of Hungarie, commeth before Treviso.	248	Chief cause of Carmagnolla's death.	321	Canalis speech to Mocenigo.	447
Charles returneth to Hungarie.	249	Cause of the renewing of the war betwixt the Venetians & Philip.	323	Canalis condemned to perpetuall banishment. ibid.
Citizens resolution. ibid.		Carmagnolla escapes by flight.	328	Commissioners return from Constantinople without any conclusion. ibid.
Caloianes earnest intreatie to the Venetians for succour.	252	Carmagnolla gines over his charge, for sorrow that he had done a fault.	331	Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos is sacrificed.	448
Cornari seizes on Brondoli.	253	Carmagnolla convicted of treason is beheaded.	334	Citie of Vidua affrighted at the coming of the Turkes.	454
Carolo Zeni arriveth in the haven of Chioggia.	255	Cornari dieth in prison.	336	Christians besiege Smyrna.	465
Cap-Histria taken by the Genoueses and given to the Patriarke of Aquileia.	264	Cause of the renewing the warre betwixt the Venetians & Philip.	338	Coric yeelded.	468
Carolo Zeni Generall of the Venetian armie.	266	Carrario commeth forth of Germany to take Padua.	339	Caraman his present to the Venetians. ibid.
Cap-Histria taken by the Genoueses.	271	Carrario is discovered and executed at Venice.	340	Confpirators flee from Cyprus.	475
Conditions of peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses.	274	Cosmo de Medicis sent to Venice.	344	Croia yeelded to the Turkes.	486
Cruell warre at Tenedos.	276	Cosmo goeth to the Pope.	346	Conditions of peace betwixt Ottoman and the Venetians.	489
Carrario imprisoned in the Medozi-an Tower.	279	Casali yeeldeth to Picinino.	348	Comparison betwixt the Romans and Venetians.	491
Carrario his lands divided. ibid.		Cause of the commotion of Padua & Vincenza.	367	Cause of the warre of Egeria.	493
Castle of Padua recovered for Novello. ibid.		Commissioners of Verona come to Venice.	378	Castel-novo yeelds to the Venetians.	498
Carrarians make incursions on the Vincenzans.	282	City of Antivari subiect to the Venetians.	396	Conditions of peace betwixt the States of Illyrie and the Venetians, upon the end of the Duke of Combarbie.	516
Carrario wrongeth the Venetian Ambassador.	283	Christians possesse the Streight.	397	Ceremonie at the Duke of Venice's funeral.	522
Carolo Malatesta of Arimino generall of the Venetians armie.	284	Cause of Sforza's hatred to king Alphonso.	398	Charles the eight French king sends an Ambassador to Venice: with the Senators answer.	532
Conditions of peace made with Albert of Austria.	285	Ciarplions death.	400
Conditions of peace propounded unto Carrario.	287	Carolo Montone taketh the Venetians party.	403
Carrario his great cruelty.	288	Coione takes the Venetians part.	406
		Coyone his victory.	409

D

Divers opinions of the Historians concerning this Historie. 3 Duke

The first Table.

Duke Paulutio the first takes oath.	12	Description of Hierusalem.	81	the Venetians had the better.	24
Duke Horto murdered by his owne Citizens.	14	Duke of Venice comes to Hierusalem.	92	Dandulo goeth to Venice about the soldiers demands.	26
Difference arising about the creation of a new Duke.	16	Description of Tyre.	ibid.	Duke of Sauoy a Mediator for peace.	27
Dominico Leon, the first master or Colonell of the men at armes. ib.		Distrust conceived against the Venetians.	93	Divers publike shewes made in the city for love to the Duke.	28
Duke Giouanni and his sonne expelled the Citie.	21	Divers opinions of the Historians concerning the reconciliation of Pope Alexander and Fredericke the Emperour.	109	Death of Paulo Sabello.	28
Description of the situation of Venice.	24	Death of Cyani, and his last wil.	110	Duke of Milan his victorie over the Florentines.	29
Different intents of Combatants.	25	Description of S. Marks church. ib.		Description of Bressia.	30
Dukes Pallace in Rialto.	27	Description of Constantinople.	118	Duke of Sauoy & Montserrat make incursions on the Milanais.	31
Description of the Dukes Pallace. ib.		Direct answer of a young Emperour.	120	Double treacherie upon the Castle of Savenna.	32
Duke Giouanni fleeth.	32	Death of the Emperour Baldwin.	122	Dissension betwixt Gonzaga and the Venetians.	34
Duke Giouanni deposed from his charge, and becomes a Priest.	33	Deceit of the Venetians about possession of the Islands.	124	Description of the lake of Benac.	34
Duke Tradonico murdered.	35	Damiet in Egypt taken.	128	Duke of Ferrara complains unto the Pope.	35
Dorsse-Dura newly inhabited.	37	Description of the Ile of Candie.	129	Death of Pietro Lauretano, and his strange buriall.	36
Duke Giouanni his brother taken by the Count of Commachia.	38	Death of Theodoric sonne to Vartatus.	148	Disposition of Picinino.	37
Duke Giouanni doth voluntarily depose himselfe. ibid.		Death of Baiamont.	169	Death of those of Verona.	37
Duke Pietro dieth fighting with the Narentines.	39	Dalmatio the Spaniard proues a traitor to the Venetians.	171	Description of the River Adice.	37
Duke Vello his sonne taken at sea.	42	Dalmo diuinely punished for his treacherie. ibid.		Divers Gallies armed at Venice against the Turkes.	39
Duke Vello voluntarily deposeth himselfe, and becomes a Monke. ibid.		Dandulos pietie acknowledged.	173	Diversity of opinions in the Venetian campe.	40
Duke Pietro his sonne, who was his Colleague, stirs up sedition in the Citie, and is banished.	45	Description of the Arsenall. ibid.		Dandulo his brave answer. ibid.
Duke Pietro dies for griefe. ib.		Divers sorts of Earthquakes.	196	Divers townes of the State of Milan yeelde to Sforza.	40
Duke Pietro the fourth marryeth Walderta daughter to Guido.	46	Diseat act of the Generall.	199	Death of Hermolao Donato.	41
Duke Pietro his tyrannies. ibid.		Doria spoiled the Adriaticke Gulph.	205	Death of the last Emperour of Constantinople.	42
Death of the Duke and his son.	47	Duke of Venice denied a passport.	213	Description of Morica.	43
Duke Pietro Vrscolo his secret departure.	52	Duke of Austria comes to Venice.	215	Description of Corinth.	43
Dominico Morosino murdered.	54	Dominico Michæli Generall of the Venetians naval armie.	217	Death of Hieronimo Barbadico.	44
Death of Orto the second Emperour. ibid.		Demand of the Grecke multitude. ib.		Description of the Isle of Negrepont.	44
Duke Tribuno voluntarily deposeth himselfe.	55	Death of Nicholas Dandulo and his brother.	221	Description of the Isle of Chios.	44
Description of Illyria.	56	Duke of Austria bringeth aide to the Thyrasians.	226	Description of the Isle of Cyprus.	47
Duke Vrscolo the second his great wisdom: permitted to associate his sonne Giouanni into the government.	59	Divers opinions concerning Raimondo his disinfection.	229	Death of Iulian de Medicis.	48
Duke Vrscolo the 2. his last will.	60	Divers opinions in the Senate concerning the taking of Tenedos.	232	Death of Ottoman.	49
Dominico Vrscolo vsurpeth the Dukes Pallace.	62	Divers opinions concerning the taking of Famagosta.	235	Description of the Isle of Rhodus.	49
Durazzo besieged by the Normans.	247	Description of the city Chioggia.	243	Duke of Ferrara declareth himselfe enemy to the Venetians.	49
		Diligence used in fortifications.	247	Description of Lombardie.	49
		Divers and sundry encounters where	66	Death of Roberto of Arimino.	50
				Defeat of the Ferrarois.	50
				Duke of Lorraine returneth in France.	50
				Death of Lorraine.	50

The first Table.

Death of Giouan Heme.	510
Diuers expostulations upon the yeelding of Ascola.	511
Death of General Marcelllo.	514
Dukes Palace reedified.	516
Death of old Sanleuerin the noble Venetian General.	527
E
Extent of the Country of Venice.	2
Exhortation to the Venetians.	40
Enemies that came to scour Antioch, defeated.	78
Emanuel his request against the Normans.	98
Emanuel his Ambassadors at Venice.	101
Emanuel seizeth on the Cities of Dalmatia.	102
Example of great affection to a mans Country.	104
Example of great loue towards ones country.	114
Eccelin in Padua.	138
Eccelin, what he was, with his coming into Italie.	ibid.
Eccelin before Mantua.	143
Eccelin his crueltie against the Paduans.	ibid.
Enforced peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses.	166
Enterprize against the Turks broken.	175
Earthquakes of diuers sorts.	196
Earle dome of Val-marín fallen to the Venetians by the death of Phalerio.	211
Enemies cunning.	244
Enemies vniust demands.	248
Enterprize attempted with bad success.	251
Entertainment giuen by the Christian Princes to the Venetian Ambassadors.	217
Entertainment giuen to the Veronagentlemen.	288
Effect of Cornari his Oration to Philip.	297
Exploits of Philip.	314
Eugenius the Pope leaueth Rome, and cometh to Florence.	338
Eugenius the Pope, Venetians, and Florentines in league together.	339
Enemies intent against the Venetians.	354
Enemies are driven from the mountaintoppes.	355
Enemies assaile the forragers.	358
Enemies answer to Sforza who offered them battell.	369
Enemies take the Castle of Madera.	371
Enemies vanquished at Thyenna.	373
Enemies in Verona.	374
Enemies flee from Verona.	377
Effect of Auogrades speech to Sforza.	383
Eugenius the Pope his death.	402
Emperour of Constantinople in despair.	424
Emenie buildeth a bridge ouer the Gulph at Nigrepont.	442
Enemies fleet afraid of the Venetians.	446
Enemies take the Isle of Lissa.	509
Emenie retires from Corfou.	510
F
Foundation of Padua.	2
Fruitfulness of the Venetians country.	ibid.
Foundation of the Rialto.	3
Four and twenty houses burned at once.	5
From whence the Venetians that now are be descended.	6
First gouernment of Venice vnder Consuls.	7
From whence the Lombards are descended.	8
Foundation of Heraclea.	10
Foundation of Equiline.	11
Felix Cornicula, the second master or Colonell of the men at Armes.	14
First association into the Principallitie.	14
French take Commaada.	20
French vanquished by the Venetians.	23
From whence came the name of Saracens.	29
From whence the Saracen Moores are descended.	34
Flight of the Calloprini to the Emperour Orcho, with their promise to him.	54
Fortie Narentine Merchants taken.	57
Family of the Vrsciois for ever banished from the city.	63
French arrive at Constantinople.	72
Frenchmen and Venetians ioyed together.	84
Faneses made tributary to the Venetians.	97
Family of the Iustiniani worne out by the sicknesse: and againe restored.	103
Flight of Pope Alexander.	107
Frederickes answer to the Venetian Ambassadors.	108
Frederickes menaces.	ibid.
Frederickes fleet put to flight, and his sonne brought prisoner to Venice.	ibid.
Fourth rebellion of Zara.	113
Fredericke the Emperour dieth in Armenia.	114
Famine in the Campe before Ptolomais.	ibid.
Flight of Alexis.	119
Fifteen men appointed to elect a new Emperour.	121
Friendship betwixt the Emperour Robert and the Venetian Magistrate.	128
Fredericke against the Venetians.	139
Fifth rebellion of Zara.	140
Forme of the electing the Venetian Prince.	141
Flight of Ansedin.	143
Fleete of the Genoueses in the Adriaticke sea.	164
Fort of Thealdo taken by the Venetians.	168
Francisco Dandolo his great pietie.	172
False reports against the Genoueses.	173
Fort of the salt-pits taken.	184
From whence the contagion came to Venice.	197
Four new Officers created in the Armie.	202
Fear

The first Table.

Fear, which was in Venice for the enemies vanishing.	203
Fifteene villages renolt.	221
Fontano's exhortation to his soldiers.	229
Feltra besieged by the Venetians.	231
Fanagosta taken by the Genoueses.	234
Flight of three Genoues galles.	236
Flight & deceit of the Venetians.	240
Fort of Nasariola taken.	242
Ramine enforceth the Genoueses in Chioggia to yeeld.	262
French Kings Nephew and Duke of Austria come to Venice, to goe to the holy Sepulcher.	280
French-man punished for indiscreet speaking.	282
Francisco Gonzaga General of another Armie for the Venetians.	284
Francisco Carrario his great crueltie.	288
Fortie Gentlemen of Verona come to Venice in Ambassage.	ibid.
Faires of Tancrobbed and spoiled by the Scythians.	291
Florentines Ambassage to the Venetians.	296
Florentine ambassadors Oration.	299
Florentines ouercome the Crimonoi vnder the conduct of Nicholao d'Aelf.	308
Francisco Sforza commanded to relieue Brescia.	ibid.
Francisco Gonzaga a brave and courageous Captaine.	309
Fregoli banished from Genoa defeated.	315
Fortes builded by Philip in the midst of the Po.	316
Fortes taken by the Venetians.	ibid.
Florentines annoy what Bracchian had done: and will him to proceed on.	325
Florentines defeated by Picinino.	326
Four Venetian galles taken.	330
Fiecia and Adorini are treacherously slain.	332
Francisco Gonzaga giueth ouer his place of General.	344
Florentines answer to Sforza.	ibid.
Fine and 20000. men in the Venetian Campe.	350
Famine and Pestilence afflict the sieged Bresians.	357
Fight betwixt Paris Lodron and Italus.	359
Forlimpopolis taken by Sforza.	366
From whence the Hadriatick sea taketh the name.	367
Fight betwixt the Bresians and Italus.	369
Flare of the Florentines.	380
Francisco Barbaro highly esteemed in Venice.	388
Fight betwixt Picinino and Sforza broken off by approach of night.	390
Famons thes enterprised by a Greek.	409
Frederick the Emperour with his wife cometh into Italie.	415
Florentines send to the French King.	418
Florentines reconer Foglian.	421
From whence Dyrrachium tooke the name.	477
From whence the Po tooke her name.	497
Ferrarois abandon Trecenta.	498
Ferrarois complaints.	504
Florentines craue Council of the Venetians: with their answers.	535
G
Generall assembly held at Heraclea.	11
Gouernment of Dukes restored.	17
Greeks defeated before Commaada.	23
Giouanni deposed by the people.	28
Greekes flee.	33
Great strife among the Citizens.	ibid.
Giouanni Partitatio takes againe the Gouernment vpon him.	39
Great crueltie of the Hungs.	40
Great praise giuen to the Duke Tribuno.	41
Generall Council held at Rome, declares the Church of Grada for Metropolitan.	46
Great harme done by fier.	47
Guerin comes in Pilgrimage to Venice.	52
Great ingratitude of the Venetians.	33
Greeks ouerthrowne by the Normans before Durazzo.	67
Great effusion of blood in the Temple.	83
Godfrey of Bolloigne King of Ierusalem.	ibid.
Great priuiledges granted to the Venetians by the Emperour Henry the fourth.	86
Generall Council published to be held at Dyon.	106
Great famine in the Campe before Ptolomais.	114
Great ingratitude and crueltie of a brother.	116
Greekes put to flight neere Constantinople.	110
Genoues defeated by the Venetians.	125
Great friendship betwixt the Emperour & the Venetian Magistrate.	128
Gouernour of Candie flies disguised like a woman.	131
Great reasons in Sanuto's behalfe.	132
Gradonico dieth.	135
Greekes defeated.	137
Genoues resolution.	147
Genoues defeated by the Venetians.	148
Great treacherie of a Greeke.	ibid.
Genoues defeated by the Venetians.	148
Great treacherie of a Greeke.	ibid.
Genoues league with Palcologus.	149
Genoues put to flight.	150
Genoues defeated before Trapani.	151
Genoues come into Candie.	152
Great scarcitie of victuals in Venice.	153
Generall of the Venetian Armie punished.	157
Great ouerflowing of the sea, with an earthquake.	158
Goodly deeds done by Prince Matini.	171
Great pietie of Francisco Dandolo.	172
Girard Caminenis taketh Yderza.	181
Great insolencies of the Lancequenets.	184
Great dearth in Venice.	191
Great depolation in Venice.	197
Genoues take Nigrepont.	199
Greekes bafe flight.	201
Grimaldi General of the Genoues.	203
Great	203

The first Table.

Great cruelty falsly imputed to the Venetians	ibid.	Genoa-prisoners in great danger at Venice.	272	yeelding up of the Island.	427
Great Lascation made at Genoa.	204	Genoueses take 4 Venetian vessels.	ib.	Gauardo Iustinopolitano is sent against the Thyrystines.	435
Genoueses commit themselves to Giouanni Viscont Archbishop of Milan.	ibid.	Galcaas Viscont taketh Padua.	278	Galcaas Viscont returneth safe to the Fleet.	438
Genoueses take Parenza.	205	Galcaas besiegeth Mantua with fourtie thousand men.	279	Great outrage committed in Ocnos.	441
Great discomfort in Venice.	207	Galcaas is repulsed by water and land.	ibid.	Great valour of a young maid.	481
Great brauerie of a Genoueses galie.	ibid.	Genoueses great losse.	281	Galcaas Duke of Milan slain at Messer.	489
Great sedition in Candie.	216	Giles the black greatly honoured.	282	Gouernour of Corie his answere to Mocenigos Herald.	486
Genoueses answer to the Cadisiois.	218	Giacomo Carrario departing from Verona, is taken in flight.	285	Great mortalitie in the Venetian Campe.	501
Great ioy at Venice for the recovery of Candie.	220	Gonzaga besiegeth Padua.	286	Gallempe of the Vrsini.	ibid.
Great boldnesse of the rebels.	222	Giouanni of Padua punished for haueing secret conference with the enemy.	287	Gallipolis taken.	514
Giacomo Caballa Generall of the Venetians Armie by land.	230	Gonzaga his answere to Carrario.	ibid.	Great prosperitie of the Venetian State.	521
Great ingratitude of a sonne to his father.	232	Great contention among the Sibenians.	291
Gouernour of the Island for the father refuseth to obay the rebellious sonne.	ibid.	Great cruelty of the King of Hungarie.	292
Genoueses surpris Lemnos.	233	Great disorder in the battell by reason of dust which blinded the souldiers.	319
Greekes and Genoueses defeated by Zeni at Tenedos.	ibid.	Guanello going about to treat with the Florentines is discovered by Sforza.	326
Genoueses alie themselves against the Venetians with the King of Hungarie, Bishop of Aquileia and the Carrarians.	ibid.	Genoueses reuolt from Rhilip.	340
Genoueses put to flight.	ibid.	Grecian Emperour and the chiefe of the Greekes Empire, come to Venice to conferre with the Pope about religion.	342
Girard Caminenlis taketh the enemies partie.	234	Gon zaga maketh alliance with Philip.	347
Genoueses reuenge.	ibid.	Great spoile in the Camonic vally.	350
Genoueses fly from the fight.	239	Great disloyaltie.	355
Genoueses chalenge the Venetians.	240	Great distresse of the Bresians.	368
Genoueses before Chioggia.	241	Great extremitie of Brescia.	370
Genoueses take Loretta and the Tower of Bebia.	245	Great ioy in Venice upon the recovery of Verona.	378
Great sorrow in Venice for the losse of Chioggia.	ibid.	Giouanni Cornetano is committed to prison in S. Angelo's castle.	379
Genoueses wholly ruinate Malamock and Poneggia.	250	Great cruelty.	383
Genoueses fortifie Chioggia.	251	Great entertainment giuen to Sforza at Venice.	388
Great losse sustained by the Genoueses at the taking of Brondolli.	258	Great triumphs at Venice at the wedding of the Princes sonne.	411
Genoueses put all vnprofitable eaters forth of Chioggia.	ibid.	Gotholans vanquished at Ortona.	411
Genoueses pollicie to get forth in despite of the Venetians.	261	Great entertainment giuen to the Emperour Frederick at Venice.	416
Great dearth in Treniso.	267	Great reioicing at Venice in regard of the peace.	426
Garrison of Nouells for want of pay, yeeld it to Carrario.	270	Genoueses come into Morca about the	ibid.
Genoueses fleet flyeth.	271

The first Table.

How highly Pietro Roslis was lamented.	188	Isaac the Emperour ratifies what his sonne had promised.	119	ric to the Huns.	40
How much may foretell an earthquake.	196	Isaac deliuered out of prison.	ibid.	Leo the Pope comes to Venice.	64
How long the Earthquake lasted at Venice.	197	Isaac dieth suddenly.	ibid.	Leo the Pope vanquished by the Normans.	65
Histrrians reduced to the Venetians obedience.	ibid.	Ite of Candie giuen to the Venetians.	122	Length of the siege of Antioch, with the want in the Armie.	78
How the Senate disdained the losse of the battell.	202	It is lawfull for almen to defend their owne.	138	League with Wiliam King of Sicill	100
How hardly Contarenl accepted his dignitie.	225	Ippa besieged by the Barbarians.	91	League of Achaia with the Venetians.	150
Hungarians come to aide the Paduans.	228	Inconstancie and lightnesse of the Greekes.	151	League renewed betwixt Paleologus and the Venetians.	155
Humaga, Grada, and Caorli taken by the Genoueses.	241	Ingratitude of the Venetians neighbours.	153	Lightstick and Lybick warre had almost one selfe same end.	163
How the Mariners loued Pisani.	ibid.	Inursions of the Turkes.	175	League and alliance against those of Eficalla.	176
Hauen of Venice fortified.	ibid.	In what place and manner the battell was fought.	203	Lewis King of Hungarie defeated before Zara.	195
Hatred which Nouello bare to the Venetians.	282	Ingratitude of a son to his father.	232	Luchin Vermio of Verona, Generall of the land Armie.	217
How much money was spent in the warre with the Carrarians.	288	In what maner Pisani fortified Venice.	247	Lightnesse and inconstancie of the multitude.	218
How secret those things are kept, which are determined in the Senate.	334	In what place Zeni received newes of the losse of Chioggia, and the Cities siege.	252	Litharians returne to the Venetians obedience.	223
Hannibal Beatiuolo treacherously murdered by his enemies.	399	Isclausie betwixt Pisani and Thaddeo Iustiniano.	254	Liberal offer made to the Senate by a Citizen of Chioggia.	252
Honest answere of the Florentines.	427	Iohn d' Agons a Frenchman Generall of the Venetian Armie.	259	Loretta recovered.	256
Happinesse and content of Venice during Folcari his Principalltie.	430	Iustiniano is sent to Apulia to forrage.	259	Leopold accepteth the Venetians offer.	273
Hadria taken by the Venetians.	498	Iustiniano is taken by the Genoueses.	ibid.	Leopold his proud answere to the Paduan.	273
Hercules d' AEft comes to the reliefe of Stellata.	510	In what esteeme the Citie of Verona is.	286	Leopold entreth Treniso.	ibid.
Hercules plantiue letters to Alphonso his brother.	512	Incursons of Nichola Stella, upon the Lucas territories.	324	Leopold rendreth Treniso to Carrario upon conditions.	277
How much the Venetians spent in the warre of Lombardie.	516	Italus of Friull, and Giacomo Guinano are put to death.	401	League against Galcaas Viscont.	ibid.
		Inestimable caluery of the treasure of Venice.	410	Ladilaus selleth Zara to the Venetians.	290
		Invention of the Art of Printing attributed to a German.	431	Laurentano respected and beloued of euery one.	352
		Ite of Lemnos deliuered to the Venetians.	436	Laurentano besiegeth Serrone.	360
		Ite of Delos described.	451	Legnaga is taken.	365
		Italian Princes send a present to Matthias King of Hungarie.	479	Longina is taken by Sforza.	369
				La Garda, Bardolin, and Lanfiza are taken.	383
				Lionello d' AEft cometh to Venice.	397
				La Marc reduced under the Popes obedience.	400
				Lodes and Plaisancia yeeld to the Venetians.	404
				Leonello his death.	421
				Laurentano his exploits in the life of Nigrepont.	425
					Lamen-

The first Table.

Lamentation and great courage of a woman.	465	Manner of Phalerio his conspiracie.	297	Maguis empoetheth the Prince of Mantua not to spoile Verona.	375
Lodouico Lauretano commeth from the Popes Legate.	470	Marco Cornari Vice-duke, during the troubles.	229	Mantuan proclaimed Prince of Verona.	ibid.
League betwixt the Venetians and the Kings of Portugal: with the cause of that league.	518	Miserable death of Andrea Cornari.	217	Mantuan preparation for defence of Verona.	ibid.
Law of Nations violated.	524	Marco Gradonico murdered in the Palace.	218	Maguis brought before Sforza, is cleared.	377
Luca Pisani his opinion on Sanfucirino his designe.	525	Mocenigo his resolution.	223	Malatestes take the enemies partie.	379
M.		Marfilio Carrario forsaketh his brother.	230	Mellato his death.	396
		Meistra besieged by the Carrarians.	237	Mount Barri is taken.	403
			237	Milanese suspect Sforza.	408
Macrin Gouverneur of Hungarie overcome by the Huns.	3	Meistrerelieved by the Venetians.	ibid.	Manerbia and Pontenico yeelde to Sforza.	421
Monegario his miserable end.	19	Mutatio his answer to the Venetians and Genoueses.	ibid.	Malateste besiegeth Sparta.	437
Miraculous apparition of S. Marke	30	Market place of S. Marke paved with bricke.	280	Mocenigo his answer to Canalis.	447
Malamos ruined.	32	Malateste giues over the Generals place.	284	Mocenigo his first exploit.	448
Moore returne into Italie.	34	Maffolerio convicted and punished for treason.	287	Mocenigo his Oration to the Popes Legate.	451
Murcimirus, King of Croatia, sends Ambassadors to the Duke.	57	Milanois offer to Philip.	314	Mocenigo his incursions into Asia.	454
Molloc, Gouverneur for the Greeke Emperour, deceiveth his fellows.	66	Malateste Generall of Philips Armie.	320	Mocenigo his answer to the King of Cyprus.	469
Moares yielded.	76	Marquis of Montserrat commeth for refuge to Venice.	334	Miera is taken by composition.	ibid.
Moore came into Dalmatia.	35	Mellato his valour.	343	Mocenigo his answer to the Ambassadors from the King of Cyprus.	ibid.
Michael the Emperour, driven from Constantinople.	66	Mellato conducteth the Venetian Armie.	346	Mocenigo his answer to Lauretano.	479
Murderers punished.	36	Mantuan excuse.	347	Mocenigo aduertised of the enemies purpose.	474
Malamos burnt and drowned.	87	Mellato speedily dislodgeth.	348	Mocenigo his diligence to relieue Cyprus.	475
Myrtillus issued from meane parents.	120	Martinenga's and Auogadres in Bressia are reconciled.	349	Mocenigo punisheth the murderers of Cornari.	476
Myrtillus preach to the people.	ibid.	Mellato commeth forth of Bressia, and is constrained to returne.	353	Mocenigo is chosen Gouverneur of Cyprus.	ibid.
Meaning of the Prophecie.	123	Mellato departs from Bressia, and marcheth towards the mountaines.	354	Mathias King of Hungarie a great souldier.	479
Madona and Corona receptacles of theenes and Pirates ruined.	125	Mantuan fortifieth Po.	354	Mantuan Prince goes to the Confe-derates Armie.	509
Mount Ida.	130	Mellato made Generall of the Venetian Armie.	357	Mantuan discontented, leaueeth the Armie.	510
Michael Paleologus his treacherie.	148	Mellato provides to relieue Bressia.	359	Maximilian is chosen King of the Romans.	521
Maftin beggeth peace of the Venetians.	181	Mantuan plot to send the warre farre from his owne Countrey.	362	N.
Maftin raiseth his campe from Pontremolle.	182	Mantuan policie for the passage of his gallees.	363	Narles comes into Italie.	9
Meistra yeilded to the Venetians.	185	Mantuan gallees passe into the Adice.	364	Narles answer to the Emperour.	ibid.
Maftin incampe to shut victuals from the Venetians.	186	Mellato fortifieth the passages neere to Torbolles.	372	Narentines rode euen to Caorli.	35
Marfilio his answer to the Venetians.	188	Malateste Prince of Cefenna is taken prisoner.	373	Narentines
Maftin imploereth aid of the Duke of Bauiere.	ibid.
Maftin enforced, accepteth peace on any conditions.	189
Maftin made a gentleman of Venice.	190

The first Table.

Narentines great incursions.	55	Nouello soune to Carrario recon-eth Padua.	279	Ordelapho comes againe into Dalmatia.	88
New officers sent to the Cities newly conquered.	58	Number of the Venetians army.	311	Ordelapho dies, and the Venetians are defeated.	ibid.
Normans drive the Saracens and Greeks forth of Italy.	65	Number of Philips armie.	ibid.	Otho his discourse to his father Frederick.	109
Nicholas the Pope, Tributarie to the Normans.	ibid.	New league against Philip.	314	Orlando Rossis chosen Generall of the Armie.	188
Normans defeat Molloc.	66	Number of the Venetians nauie.	352	Of all earthquakes the agitation of the water is most dangerous.	196
New titles giuen to the Duke of Venice.	68	Nicholao de Este fortifieth his owne estate, and is afterward freed from his feare and suspicion.	353	On what conditions Arba was deliuered to the Genoueses.	265
Nicea besieged.	73	Notable seruice of women.	356	On what conditions Tenedos was yeilded.	276
Nicea yeilded: and upon what conditions.	74	New Orgies yeilded to Picinino by treacherie.	ibid.	Officers sent by the Sen to Padua.	288
Number of those who tooke the Croisado after the councill at Cleremont.	71	Nicholao de Este his motion made to the Senate.	358	Occasion of the warre against Philip Duke of Milan.	295
Number of the dead Infidels farre greater than of the Christians.	75	Nicholao de Este is received into the league.	361	Oration of Cornari to Philip.	297
Number of the Infidels Armie.	ibid.	Nicolas de Este commeth to Sforzas campe to treat a peace.	387	Oration of the Florentine Ambassador.	299
New religious order.	97	Nicholao de Este bringeth the Ladie Bianca to Mantua.	ibid.	Oration of Carmagnolla to the Senate.	302
New army against the Normans.	98	New Armie determined against the Milanois.	404	Oration of the Milanois to Philip.	313
New deceit of the Greeks.	102	Quall Armie against Pirates.	405	One Prince waiteth vpon anothers funerals.	430
New manner of electing the Prince.	113	Nicholao Canalis Generall of the nauall Armie.	441	Occasion of the Ottomans warre against the Venetians.	431
New Armie of Christians for recovery of the Holy Land.	114	Nauall Armie giueeth an assault to Sattalia.	452	Order of Ottomans campe against the Persian.	470
Number of the Christian Armie.	116	Number of the Turkes and the Persians Armies.	471	Ottoman besiegeth Rhodes.	491
New Greekes inuention to deceiue the Christians.	120	Number of the Turkes Army before Scutarie.	477	Ottoman takes Otranto.	ibid.
New agreement betwixt the Venetians and the Princes.	121	Noblest families of Rome.	501	Opinion of those dissuading warre with the Ferrarois: with the contraries answer.	494
New strife betwixt the Venetians and Paduans.	126			Original and spring of the Po, with her course.	496
New commotion in Candie.	131			Original of the Rheticke warre.	523
Noble courage of a Preneftine.	143
New warre against the Greekes.	94
New warre against Bolognians.	154
New warre with those of Cape-Histria, & with the Anconitans.	156
New contention with the Paduans.	167
New stirres in Candie soone suppressed.	174
New Magistrates created.	195
Nicholas Pisani Generall of the Venetian Armie.	200
New Provisioners sent with supplies to Candie.	222
New supplies come to the Armie.	225
Nouello soune to Francisco Carrario comes to sweare to the peace at Venice.	230
Number of the Genoueses army.	240
Nouella besieged by the enemies.	267

P

Paduan fugitives dwell at Embrogola.	10
Pepin king of Italy.	22
Pepin retires to the firme land.	26
Publicke games at Shrouside.	28
Policie of those which carried Satins.	30
Marks bodie into the Turps.	30
Prophecie accomplished.	ibid.
Pola an ancient Cite.	33
Pythagoras and Milo, the two ornaments of the Crotonians.	35
Pope Bennet comes to Venice.	ibid.
Pouegia newly inhabited.	36
X x x x x	People

The first Table.

People swear to the Prince.	50	Venicians.	ibid.	Pietro de Rossis arriveth at Ve-	181
Palace, and Saint Markes Church	ibid.	Peter Count of Auxerre shofen	181	nice.	181
repaired.	ibid.	Emperour of the East.	127	Pietro Rossis Oration to his souldiers.	183
Prince resolves to give over his place.	52	Pope Gregories entreatie to arme a-	138	Padua revolteth from thuse of Es-	187
Plague and famine in the Citie.	60	gainst the Turks.	138	calla.	187
Pepin, Patriarch of Aquileia, disqui-	61	Pietro Tepulo defeated and taken	139	Pope Clement, the Venetians, and	193
ets Grada.	61	prisoner.	139	other Christian Princes in league	193
Pepin obeyes the Popes commande-	64	Pope Alexanders diligence to make	147	against the Turke.	193
ment.	64	peace betwixt the Venetians and	147	Pope Clement permitteth traffike	ibid.
Pope Leo comes to Venice.	ibid.	the Genoueses.	147	with Infidels.	ibid.
Pope Leo vanquished by the Nor-	65	Power of the French much decayed in	148	Prince Dandolo causeth all the	195
mans.	65	Greece.	148	decrees of the Citie to bee gathe-	195
Pope Nicholas tributarie to the	ibid.	Paleologus taketh Constantinople.	149	red into one forme.	195
Normans.	ibid.	Paleologus readie to leane Constan-	ibid.	Pagano Generall of the Genoa Ar-	200
Peter tels his message to the Pope.	70	tinople.	ibid.	mie.	200
Pope Urban comes to the councill at	70	Popular commotion in Venice.	152	Petrarch his speech concerning the	202
Cleremont.	ibid.	Pope Clement endeuoreth to ac-	152	bataile.	202
Pope Urban his Oration.	ibid.	cord the Venetians and Genoueses.	153	Pisani Generall of the Venetian Ar-	203
Peter the hermit ignorant of marti-	72	Peace granted to the Bolognians.	155	mic.	203
all discipline.	72	Paleologus defeateth them of Ni-	155	Pisani ioyneith with the Arago-	ibid.
Prohibitions to pay no more tribute	55	grepons.	ibid.	nois.	ibid.
to the Barbarians.	55	Patriarch of Aquileia succoweth the	156	Petrarch Ambassadour for the Mi-	205
Priviledges granted to the Venetians	86	Rebels.	156	lanois.	205
by Henry the fourth.	86	Patriarch of Aquileia allieth	158	Pisani retires to Dalmatia.	ibid.
Pope Calixtus his resolution for suc-	89	himselfe with Count Gorcian.	158	Prodigies appeare before the losse of	207
cessor of the Holy Land.	89	Patriarches Armie comes to Thyr-	159	the Armie.	207
Phenicians the inventers of Arith-	91	esse.	159	Phalerio his picture razed out of the	208
metricke, the Alphabet, and As-	91	tronomie.	91	great Hall.	208
tronomie.	91	Proofe of the Venetians loyalte.	93	Phalerio is put to death by decree of	209
Proofe of the Venetians loyalte.	93	Paduans defeated.	97	the Senate.	209
Paduans defeated.	97	Plague very great in Venice.	103	Peace betwixt the Venetians and	210
Plague very great in Venice.	103	Prince Vitalis murdered.	103	the Genoueses with their allies.	210
Prince Vitalis murdered.	103	Pope Alexander comes to Venice in	107	Peace refused on vnjust conditions.	213
Pope Alexander comes to Venice in	107	disguise.	107	the Duke.	ibid.
Preparations for warre against Fre-	108	Pisians vanquished by the Genoueses.	164	Pretence of a murderer to execute	217
dericke.	108	Pers taken and burnt by the Veneti-	166	his enterprize.	217
Ptolomais yielded.	114	ans.	ibid.	Popes Indulgences against the Can-	222
Pisani take Pola.	115	Punishment of the guiltie.	166	dists.	222
Pisani defeated by the Venetians.	ibid.	Peace with Paleologus.	167	Pisani with the Captaines of the	240
Peace granted to the Brundusians.	116	Punishment of conspirators.	169	fine Gallies imprisoned at Venice.	240
Prince Dandolo deceaseth.	122	Pension given to the woman that sue	169	Pelegrina taken by the Genoueses.	241
Pleasant games invented at Treviso.	126	Baiamont.	ibid.	Pisani set at libertie by the Senates	246
Polans and Venetians quarrell at	ibid.	Polans and Venetians brought un-	175	decree.	246
the games at Treviso.	ibid.	der the Venetians obedience.	175	Pisani his great modestie.	ibid.
Paduans make roads on the Venetians.	ibid.	Power of those of Escalla.	176	Prince Contareni his speech to	ibid.
Paduans defeated.	ibid.	People come from all parts to the Ve-	178	Pisani in open Senate.	ibid.
Peace betwixt the Paduans and the	ibid.	netian Armie.	178	Pisani his answer to the Prince.	ibid.
	ibid.	Pietro Rossis declared Generall	179	Pisani restored to his former Of-	247
	ibid.	of the Venetian Armie.	179	fice.	247
	ibid.	Pietro Rossis his first victorie.	180	Priso-	247

The first Table.

Prisoners sent home upon their	231	daughter.	ibid.	habit.	373
word.	231	Peace betwixt the Venetians and	ibid.	Picinino maketh warre in Flami-	379
Prince Contareni with his Armie	252	Philip.	ibid.	nia.	379
in the Haue of Chiotigia.	252	Philippe contrarie to his promise	323	Politiana is taken by Picinino.	380
Passage of Brondolle shut up to the	254	makes warre on the Bandetti.	323	Picinino his good fortune begin-	380
Genoueses.	254	Paulo Guenesio Tyrant of Luca.	324	netio to decline.	ibid.
Pisani appeareth his murmuring	255	man.	325	Providators answer to Sforza.	383
Souldiers.	255	Prince Foscarei outraged by a mad	325	Picininos proiect.	385
Pisani entreateth into Brondolle.	259	man.	325	Picinino asperseth after the losse	386
Paduans defeated.	ibid.	Picinino cometh to the aide of the	326	of the battaile.	386
Pola taken by the Genoueses.	264	Luquois.	326	Picinino his vnlooked-for arri-	388
Paduans besiege Treviso.	265	Philippe promiscith to give his	327	nall into the cuntry of Bresia.	388
Pisani dieth, and is honourably bu-	266	daughter in marriage to Sforza.	333	Picinino his complaints upon	391
ried.	266	Peace betwixt the Venetians and Ge-	333	repor of peace.	391
Peace betwixt the Venetians and Ge-	273	noueses.	333	Philip is reduced to greete need.	390
Perfidious treacherie.	282	Pisani.	333	Peace is concluded betwixt Sfor-	391
Paulo Sabello a Roman, Generall	284	Picinino and Stella make an accord	338	za and Philips commissioners.	391 of the Venetians.	284	together.	338	Pope Eugenius and Philips dis-	398
Padua taken, and the Tyrant with	288	Pope Eugenius leaneth Rome, and	340	contents.	398
three of his children brought to	288	cometh to Florence.	ibid.	Pope Eugenius, king Alphonso,	398
Venice.	288	Picinino defeateth the Armie of the	341	and Philip make a league against	398
Prisoners by the Senates command	ibid.	league.	339	Sforza.	ibid.
frangled.	ibid.	Philip solliciteth the Paduans a-	340	Picinino departeth from La Mar-	ibid.
Paduans Ambassadors come to Ve-	289	gainst the Venetians.	340	ca.	ibid.
nice.	289	Picinino his complaints against the	341	Picinino entirely defeated by Sfor-	400
Pius the Florentine makes incurfi-	292	Florentines.	341	za, and the death of Picinino.	400
sions on the Venetians.	292	Prince of Mantua Generall of the	342	Philippes Ambassadors come to Ve-	402
Prince Mocenigo constrained to	295	Venetian Armie.	342	nice to treat of peace.	402
pay for seizure for infringing the	295	Picinino defeateth the Venetians at	343	Pope Eugenius death.	ibid.
Senates decree.	295	Pontoglio.	343	Picines sonne confined into Can-	ibid.
Philip his dissimulation.	296	Prince Foscarei and the Senates	344	die.	ibid.
Philip his answer to Cornari.	298	answere to Sforzas Agent.	344	Plague in Venice.	403
Prince Foscarei his Oration.	304	Picinino encampeth before Caffal-	347	Philips death.	404
Peace betweene Philip and the Venetians.	312	Masior.	347	People of Atilian come forth dis-	409
Philips complaints to the Popes	313	Picinino his designe to famish the	349	banded against Sforza.	409
Nuncio.	313	Venetian Armie.	349	Peace betwixt the Venetians & king	415
Philips answer to the Milanais.	ibid.	Picinino besiegeth Rhoades.	351	Alphonso.	415
Philip changing his mind, the Mi-	314	Philip exhorteth his Captaines to be-	355	Pope Nicholas honoureth the Ve-	423 lanais waxe cold.	314	siege Bresia.	355	netian Prince with the Golden	423
Philip reneweth the warre with the	314	from Bresia.	357	sword, the girdle, and ornaments	424
Venetians.	ibid.	Petrera yielded to the Venetians.	357	for his head.	ibid.
Philips fores driuen forth of Bris-	315	Pilofus death.	ibid.	Paleologus the Emperour his ex-	423
felds.	315	Philip delayeth and deludeth Sfor-	361	hortation towards his souldiers.	423
Philippes speech to the Milanais.	318	za.	361	Pope Nicholas his recompence to	424
Philip comes to the Armie.	ibid.	Picinino slouteth Sforza.	364	as many as should arme against the	424
Philips Armie marcheth in bat-	320	Picinino besiegeth Legnaga.	364	Turke.	424
taile against the Venetians.	320	Picinino attempteth to burne the	372	Pope Nicholas his Nuncio cometh	424
Philip hath recourse to the Empe-	322	Venetians Armie.	372	X x x x x	2
ror Sigismond.	322	Picinino put to rout.	ibid.
Philip marrieth the Duke of Savoy	322	Picinino escapeth in disguised ha-	372

The first Table.

10 Venice to treat of peace.	423	Reason why the Venetians succoured Constantinople.	138	Spoiles made by the Moores.	ibid.
Pope Pius comes to Ancona to prepare an Armie against the Turkes, and there dieth.	438	Rogero Morosino General of the Venetian armie.	164	Saba the Moore before Tarentum.	ibid.
Pietro Mocenigo is chosen General of the navall Armie.	446	Roffis departeth in disguised habit.	180	Sarracens before Grada fought with all.	37
Peace concluded betwixt Ottoman and the Venetians.	486	Roffis first exploit.	ibid.	Sundrie opinions of the Normans coming into Italy.	66
Peace betwixt the Florentines & the associates.	490	Roffis receiveth the ensignes of Saint Marke.	182	S. Marks miraculous apparition.	68
Perfian vanquished by the Turks.	470	Roffis at the gates of Padua.	185	Sixtie thousand Turks come to succour Nicca.	73
Pope Sixtus withdraws himselfe from the Venetians.	506	Resolution of a desperate man.	186	Soliman General of the armie.	75
Pope Sixtus excommunicateth the Venetians.	507	Remard propounded against the Rebels.	191	Strabo his opinion concerning Moses.	82
Part of the Dukes Pallace burnt.	511	Reditio of Zara.	195	Sinne the cause of the destruction of Ierusalem.	ibid.
Peace concluded betwixt the States of Italy and the Venetians.	516	Rethimna taken by the Rebels.	222	S. Cyprians monastery builded.	87
Peace betwixt the Pope and Ferdinand.	521	Rebels enforced by famine yeelde to the Venetians.	223	Strange case of a Pigeon.	93
Prince Barbadico his instructions to his children on his death bed.	522	Rebels executed.	ibid.	Sodaine fire.	99
Peace concluded betwixt Sigismond and the Venetians.	528	Rajm esse of a Rebelle.	224	Secret league betwixt the Greek Emperor & the king of Sicily.	101
Philip de Communes Ambassador for Charles the eighth at Venice.	534	Rainiero Valco General of the Venetian Armie.	227	Saladines Armie defeated.	114
Q		Retreat and dismissal of the General.	228	Seditio against the yong Emperor.	119
Virini safe conducts the great vessels to the fleet.	464	Roberto de la Marca hanged at Venice.	261	Sedition of the Constantinopolitans affirming their Church not subiect to Rome.	127
R		Resolution of the Counsellors of the widow of Galeas.	283	Sedition in Candie.	131
Raenna taken by the Venetians.	14	Rampier builded against the Castle of Brestia.	310	Sanuto comes to aide the Venetians in Candie.	ibid.
Rialto chosen for the Princes ordinarie residence.	27	Remonstrances of Vrbano de Dertona to keepe Storza and Picinino from battaile.	339	Sanuto chief of the rebels.	132
Revolt of Cape d'argier.	54	Rhoades & divers other Towns yeelde to Picinino.	352	Sanuto narrowly followeth the enemy.	ibid.
Raoul the Norman Captaine becomes a Christian.	65	Ritus is taken by the Venetians.	383	Sanuto his designe.	ibid.
Raimond, a Germane chosen in the Hermites Steele.	72	Rauenna under the Venetians.	387	Sedition in Candie by over-much libertie.	134
Raimond flies to the enemy.	ibid.	Ragusa in Dalmatia described.	479	Sanuto commeth to the aid of Candie.	135
Rebellion of Zara.	87	Roberto Malateste General of the venetian Cavalierie.	489	Since when the forme of electing the Prince hath bene in use.	142
Rogero sonne to Guiscard king of Sicilie.	98	Rouero yeeldeth to the Almans on composition.	524	Sacco taken by the Legate and the venetians.	143
Robert the Emperor his unfortunate marriage.	128	Reception of the Queene of Cyprus at Venice.	530	Scarcity of victuals in Venice.	153
Radamant and Minos Lords of Candie.	130	S		Situation of Italy.	162
Rainiero Dandulo his death.	131	Sundry opinions of Historians concerning the building of the City.	6	Sundrie opinions touching the battaile at Corfu.	165
Request made to the Venetians for the preservation of the Greeke Empire.	136	Sophia the Emperesse reproacheth Narfes.	9	Strange death of one of the Generals of the Venetians Armie.	ibid.
		Strange prodigies.	10	Strange prodigies hapned that day that the conspiracy should have bene executed.	169
		Susor sent to the Greeke Emperor against the Sarrazens.	29	Sixt rebellion of Zara.	170
		Saint Peters Church at Rome taken by the Moores.	34	Sentence of a great Captaine.	180
				Saracens yeeld to the venetians.	183
				Secret practise of Marfilio Carrario with the venetians.	185
				Serrauall under the venetians.	186
				Sundrie

The first Table.

Sundry opinions upon Earthquakes.	355	Subtily of a Centurion.	355	and Florence.	412
Strangers that would come and people the City made Citizens of Venice.	196	Senates answer to Nicolao D'Alite.	358	Sforza his preparations.	414
Spoiles made by the Candioti.	222	Sandry opinions concerning the venetians retreat.	364	Sforza his wife and disreect resolution.	415
Situation of Tarentum.	236	Sforza goeth forward towards Verona.	369	Sforza is proclaimed Duke of Milan.	ibid.
Sicco taken by the venetians.	237	Senates care for the Bressians.	371	Senates decree to get money to furnish the expence of the warre.	417
Souldiers molested with hunger and cold.	238	Sforza exhortheth his souldiers.	373	Sforza with 20000 men commeth into the Bressian territory.	ibid.
Stratagem to avoid fight.	236	Sforza his great valour.	ibid.	Sforza his troups defeated.	419
Supplies come to the Genoueses.	244	Sforza marcheth to the rescue of Verona.	375	Sforza taketh Calusiana.	ibid.
Seventh rebellion of Zara.	194	Sforza his speech unto his Captaines.	376	Sforza compared to Caesar.	ibid.
Sharpe fight in the haven of Brendolli.	254	Sforza puts supplies into the Fort of Feliciano.	ibid.	Sforza refuseth fight, and retireth into his winter garrisons.	420
Senates answer to the garrison of Serrauall.	270	Sforza his aduise to the Provindator, and Captaines of the army.	383	Stephano Porcio his conspiracie against the Pope.	ibid.
Severe iustice of a father on his owne sonne.	278	Sforza vanquisheth the enemies.	384	Stephano Porcio put to death.	421
Sabbello endenoreth to slay his amazed souldiers.	285	Soncina taken.	ibid.	Sundry encounters betwixt the venetians and Sforza.	ibid.
Secret practises of Marfilio Carrario.	291	Sforza recovereth Casal-Maior, and taketh Carauazza.	385	Sforza his exploits in Lobarde.	424
Strife betwixt the Bishop of Aquileia and the Viduois.	293	Sforza his great conquest.	386	Saint Andrews head brought to Rome.	432
Skirmish neare unto Cremona, where the venetians had the worke.	316	Sforza his answer to those that entreated him to go thither where Bianca lay.	387	Senate grieved at the news of the siege of Negrepont.	443
Sforza coming to aide the Luquois causeth the enemy to raise his camp.	325	Sforza recovereth the bridge of Valenza.	389	Scanderbeg a famous captaine.	453
Stratagem of Philips Captains.	329	Sforza his speech to his souldiers.	ibid.	Smyrna is taken by the Christians.	465
Supplies from Genoa to Chios.	333	Sforza besiegeth Martinenga.	390	Senate recompenceth the brother and sister of the yong man that burned the Turkes gallees.	466
Siluester Morolino sent to the aide of Corfu.	ibid.	Sforza his Oration in the Senate with their answer to it.	392	Scanderbeg a famous captaine.	453
Sigismond in the behalfe of Philip commeth into Italy.	335	Sforza his speech to his future Bride.	392	Smyrna is taken by the Christians.	465
Sigismond crowned Emperour at Rome.	ibid.	Sforza his sentence concerning the strife betwixt the Ambassadors.	393	Senate recompenceth the brother and sister of the yong man that burned the Turkes gallees.	466
Sforza seizeth on the Marca of Ancona.	338	Sforza with his wife commeth to Venice.	394	Situation of Coric.	468
Sforza his successe.	ibid.	Sforza sends his brother to the aid of Renatus.	398	Selencia yeelds to the venetians.	ibid.
Sforza and Attendulo ioyn together.	ibid.	Sforza comes to the field.	404	Souranza his proposition to the conspirators.	475
Spinola author of the Genoueses rebellion.	341	Sforza taketh divers townes.	406	Situation of Scutary.	476
Sforza recovereth that which Picinino had taken.	ibid.	Sforza besiegeth Carauazza.	407	Soliman the Eunuch General of the Turks army before Scutary.	477
Sforza at the venetians intrety commeth to Regia.	343	Sforza defeateth the venetians.	407	Scutarians prepare for defence.	478
Sundry exploits betwixt Sforza and Picinino.	344	Sforza his resolution and his secret practises with the venetians.	408	Siege raised fro before Scutary.	480
Sforza his demands to the Senate and the Florentines, with their answer.	ibid.	Sforza marcheth against the Milanois.	ibid.	Soliman besiegeth Lepanto.	481
		Sforza besiegeth Milan.	409	Some of the Milanois defeated in an Island.	500
		Sforza his answer to the proposition of peace.	411	Sanfeuerino in battell before Ferrara.	504
		Sforza maketh warre against Venice	412	Sanfeuerino his Apologie to the Senate, with their gracious acceptation.	508
				Situation of Valigia.	511
				Sanfeuerino comes to Valigia.	511
				Sanfeuerines speed.	512
				Sanfeuerino his magnificent entertainment at Venice.	513
				Sanfeuerino aids pope Innocent.	519
				Xxxxxx 3	Sanfe-

The first Table.

Sanſcuerino recovereth Pontonen- mentana. 520	of Pharos called Leſina. 58	The true cauſe of Vitalis his death. 106
Sanſcuerino deſpoiled of his forces. 521	The Emperour graunts ſundry priu- ledges to the Venetians. 59	The Emperour Fredericks rigorous Edict againſt the Pope. 107
Sauorgnane defeats the Armanes. 525	Tho Emperour Otho comes to Venice in diſguile. ibid.	The Prince imbarketh himſelfe in the Popes-preſence. 108
Sanſcuerino his reſolution. ibid.	The Dukes laſt will. 60	The Emperour arrives at Venice. 109
Siege of Trent reſolved. 526	Too great niceſſe of a woman. 84	The Emperours obedience to the Pope. ibid.
Senate ſends George Cornari into Cyprus to demand the Realme of the Queene for the Venetians: her anſwer her replye, and her content upon it. 529	The ſundry paſſages of the Chriſtians into Syria. 72	The ornaments and enſignes of the venetian Princes. 110
	The ſtrength of Niſea. 73	The death of Cyani, and his laſt will. ibid.
	The Turkiſh ſuccour defeated. 74
	The great danger the Chriſtians were in. ibi.	The recouerie of Zara. 117
	The taking of Iconium. 75	Theodore Lacaſaris falls ſooth on the Chriſtian pilgrims. 118
	Tharſis being yielded is giuen to Bal- dwin. ibi.	The mutual comfort of the father and the ſonne. 119
	Treachery of a Citizen of Antioch. 78	The treachery of Myrtilus. 120
		Thomaſo Morolino Patriarke of Conſtantinople. 121
	The taking of Antioch. ibid.	The Princes liberality to the new Em- perour. ibid.
	Tripoly beſieged by the Chriſtians. 79	Thrace reduced to the Emperours obe- dience. ibi.
	The defeat of the enemy before Jeru- ſalem: with the number of the dead 83	Thomaſo confirmed Patriarke by the Pope. 122
	Acon taken by Baldwin. 85	The names of the Iſlands poſſeſſed by particular perſons. 125
	The taking of Sydon. 86	The Biſhops See at Malomoc tranſla- ted to Chioggia. 127
	The Caſtle of Soball builded by Bald- win. ibi.	The Emperour Peter murdered. ibi.
	The Emperours mediation betwene the Venetians and Paduans. 87	Tepulo Governour of Candie. 131
	Two great accidents of fire. ibi.	Two Providers giuen to euery ar- mie. 135
	Truce with Hungary for 5. yer. 88	The Pope excommunicateh the Em- perour Fredericke. 139
	The Duke of Venice comes to Jeruſa- lem. 92	The riuers Brent and Bacchilion turned backewards. 142
	The lot fell vpon Tyre. ibi.	Twelve thouſand Franiſcines ſlaine by Sylla in cold blood. 143
	Tyre beſieged. ibi.	The originall of the war betwixt the Venetians and Genoues. 146
	The diſtruſt conceined againſt the Venetians. 93	Their difference referred to the Pope. ibidem
	The Chriſtians ſtratagem before Tyre ibid.	The Popes Sentence. ibidem
	The third part of Tyre giuen to the Venetians. 94	The treatie of peace broken. 147
	The building of the Hoſpital of the publike charitie. 95	To what extremitie Baldwin was brought. 149
	The originall of the games at Shroue- tide. 101	Treachery of the Greeks againſt the French. ibid.
	The anſwer made to the Greeke Am- baſſadours. ibi.	Tyre beſieged by the venetians. 151
	Treachery of Emanuel. 102	The Genoues ambuſh diſcovered. 151
	The contagious ſickenſſe in the Ve- netian armie. 103
	Three great pillars brought to Venice. 104
	The recompence which the Inginer demanded. 105

The first Table.

Three Genoefes galled taken by the venetians. ibid.	Traitors in the Senate known and punifhed. 226	tie. 329
The people bear ſmall reſpect to the Prince. 152	The king of Hungary reſolueth upon peace. 230	The Prince of Mantua General of the venetian armie. 334
Truce granted betwixt the veneti- ans and the Genoefes. 154	The enemies put to flight before Lon- gina. 231	The two ſmall armies of the veneti- ans and Genoefes returne home. 335
Thoſe of Ancona complaine to the venetians. 155	The Fort of Cathura yielded. 236	Treaty of peace almoſt concluded vro- ken off. 341
The truce betwixt the venetians and the Genoefes prolonged. ib.	The common complaint of the people. 246	Thoſe of Caſal deſire parlie. 347
Thieftie beſieged by the venetians. 159	The peoples take in favour of Piſani. ibi.	Treachery plotted againſt the veneti- ans. 348
The diſtance betwixt Venice and Ge- noa. 162	The Genoefes determination fea- ring to be beſat up. 253	The two armies ſkirmiſh. 352
The Conſpiratours deſigne. 166	The Genoefes beate backe the Veneti- ans to their gillies. ibid.	The unlooked for danger whereunto the Common-wealth was like to have fallen. ibi.
The tenour of the Excommunication. 168	The Stellani warre on the Genoefes. 254	Thoſe of the valley of Sabia ſeek to ſtop their paſſage. 354
Thoſe of Pera constrained to ſue for peace. 173	Two and fifty galleies in the venetians army by ſea. 255	The order which ibi. beſieged Bieſ- ſans kept in the City. 355
Turkes put to flight by the venetians. 175	Tumult in the venetian army. 257	The part of a true Generalloff an a- rmy. 373
Treachery practiſed by Maſtin. 182	Thyſtreſenleth and yieldeth to the Genoefes. 263	The valour of Contareni. 382
The ſuburbs of Meſſina burnt by Ma- ſtin. 183	The Caſtles of Thyreſte razed by the inhabitants. 264	Three new Procurators of S. Marke created. 396
The territory of Verona ſpoiled. 186	Treachery of two Captaines of the garrifon of Conigiana. 272	The king of Arragoni daughter com- meth to Venice. 397
The King of England craueth aide a- gainſt the French King. 191	The traitors puniſhed. ibid.	The thiefe that would have robbed the treafury of Venice hangd; and the accuſer recompenced. 410
Truce take with Lewis king of Hun- gary. 197	Thyſtreſines yield to Leopold. 277	The king of Boſnina ſendeth Preſents to the venetian Prince. 416
Thoſe of Cape-biſtriarevolt. ibi.	The Caſtle of Padua recovered for Nouello. 279	Turkiſh cruelty. 424
Thoſe puniſhed which did not follow the Senates commandement. 198	The death of Paulo Sabello. 285	Turkes ſucceſſe both in Aſia and Eu- rope. 427
The Genoa-galleies taken. 199	The goodly ſituation of Verona. 286	Traitor puniſhed according to his de- ſerts. 432
The armie returneth to Venice with great booty. 200	Two Forts at Verona. 286	Turkes leave Naples. 434
Truce taken with Viſconte. 207	The poore entertainment which the Paduans gave Carrario returning without peace. 287	Turkes leave Naples. ibid.
The manner of Phalerio his conſpi- racy. ibi.	The death of Pipus. 292	Thyſtreſie beſieged. 435
The diſcoverer of the conſpiracy re- compenced with his diſcontent. 209	The Florentines Ambaſſadour at Ve- nice. 298	Thyſtreſie and Arimini freed from ſiege. 436
The king of Hungary his great armie in Dalmatia. 212	The Caſtle of Breſcia yielded to the Venetians. 312	Turkiſh fleet at Tenedos. 441
The king of Hungary beſiegeth Tri- miſo. ibid.	The Dukes of Savoy and Monſerrat make incurſions on the Milanois. 319	Turkiſh fleet before Nigrepont. 442
Trenſio brauely defended. 213	The chiefe of Florence animated a- gainſt the Venetians. 324	Treachon diſcovered. 443
The king infringeth the peace. 214	Thoſe of Luca craue aide of the veneti- ans, of Philip, and the Sienois. ibid.	Turkes take Nigrepont. 444
Threatnings of the Candiors. 288	The Prince outraged by a mad-man. 325	Tabia a city of Caria. 450
The ſituation of Anopolis. 224	Theſſalonica in Macedonia taken by the Turkes. 327	Turkes put to rout at Pergamus. 451
Thyſtreſines do revolt. 225	Tollentine leaueſt Philipſ par- tic. 329	Turkes incurſions into Italie. 453
Thyſtreſines reſolve to yield to the Duke of Auſtria. ibi.		Turkes enter the Country of the For- lani. 454
Thyſtreſines returne to the venetians obedience. 226		The Popes Legate his ſpeech to Mo- conigo at his departure. 455
		The King of Cyprus ſpeech to Moco- nigo. 458

The first Table.

The Turks designe upon the Boyano.	Venetians constant resolution.	41	Vattalus army leaves Candy and suffers shipwracke.	ibi.
The manner of the Turkes assault at Scutarie.	Venetians overcome the Hunnes.	ibi.	Vattalus sendeth new aide to Candy.	ibi.
The Turke retireth from the assault.	Vderza taken and ruinated by the Duke.	46	Venetians fight with the enemies.	136
The Turke besiegeth the Isle of Lemnos.	Vrscolo overcomes the Saracens before Barri.	50	Venetians fleet commeth to the aide of Constantinople.	ibi.
The great valour of a young maid.	Venetians free ouer all the Gracian Empire.	55	Venetians ioy at the returne of their Navy.	137
The Turke besiegeth Croia.	Venetians armie against the Narentines.	56	Vattalus Nauie put to flight, and his death.	ibi.
The Turkes come to the river Liconza.	Venetian gallies surpris the haue of Pharos.	57	Venetians take Frederickes great ship.	139
The Turkes take the Fort neare the bridge.	Venetians army succoreth Nicophorus.	66	Venetians commanded to leaue Acre.	146
The Turkes burne the Country of Eriul.	Venetians victorious ouer the Normans.	ibi.	Venetians send a flecte to guard the Islands.	149
The Turkes great labour and daunger to passe the mountaines.	Venetians defeated.	67	Venetians in Nigrepont.	150
The Coritian Prince flies into Germanie.	Venetians defeat the Pisans at Rhodes.	77	Venetians victory against the Genoueses.	152
Two Venetian fleets at once.	Venetians take Smyrna.	ibi.	Venetian flecte scattered by tempest.	157
The State of the Rossians of Parma yeeldeth to Lodowicke.	Venetians comming into Syria.	83	Venetian Ambassadors brought back to Rome.	ibi.
Two of Sanseuerines Jonnes flee to the enemy.	Venetians take Acalon.	84	Venetians take truce with the King of Babilon.	159
The Tower Trinitian taken.	Venetians and Frenchmen ioyned together.	ibi.	Venetians offer for the voyage of Syria.	160
The French King by reason of sickness faileth at Ait.	Venetians agreement with Caloman, King of Hungarie.	ibi.	Venetians and Genoueses compared to the Romans and Carthaginians.	162
The King visiteth Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan: the Dutchesse her lamentation to the king: and his answer to her.	Venetians take Brunusum.	ibi.	Venetians defeated at Corfu.	165
	Venetians take Faronia by assault.	86	Venetians defeated at the streight of Gallipolis.	166
	Venetians and Paduanis reconciled.	87	Venetians masters of Ferrara.	167
	Venetians resolue to succour the holie land.	91	Venetians excommunicated by Pope Clement.	168
	Venetians army in Sicilie.	98	Venetians restore the Paduanis unto their libertie.	174
	Venetians neighbours take armes against them.	101	Viari confined to perpetuall prison.	175
	Vlrich Bishop of Aquileia brought to Venice prisoner.	ibi.	Venetians besiege the Fort of the salt pits.	114
	Vitalis Duke of Venice murdered.	103	Vpon what cause the Venetians made warre on those of Escalla.	189
	Venetians bountie to the Christian Princes.	116	Venetians, Rhodians, and Cypriots defeated by the Turke.	193
	Venetians and the Princes resolue to goe to Constantinople.	118	Venetians in league with the King of Arragon.	200
	Venetians flecte against the Pirates.	125	Visconte his answer to the Genoueses.	204
	Venetians send a Colonie to Candace.	ibi.	Victory of the Venetians ouer the Genoueses in Morea.	205
	Venetians armie in Candie.	131
	Venetian supplies in Candie.	132
	Venetians defeated in Candie.	133
	Vattalus his army succoureth the rebels in Candie.	135

The first Table.

Venetian Senate displeased with Viscont.	Venetians entertaine the Vincenzans Commissioners.	ibi.	Venetians Nauie defeated on the lake of La Garda.	371
Venetians incensed against Carrario.	Venetian Garrison sent to Vincenza.	ibi.	Venenois protestations to cleare themselves.	377
Venetians enforced to sue for peace.	Venetians alie themselves with Gonzaga.	ibi.	Venetians victory upon the lake.	382
Venetian Ambassadors taken prisoners in Germanie.	Venetians manall Armie defeated.	284	Venetians take Pesara.	387
Venetians vanquished by the Barbarians.	Venetians affrighted at the arrival of young Carrario.	285	Venetians in Storza's behalfe denounce warre to Philip.	401
Venetians build two forts on the lakes.	Verona in the Venetians power.	286	Venetians vanquish Philips forces.	ibi.
Venetians victorie ouer the Hungarians.	Venetians enter Padua in the night by Scalado.	217	Venetians renoue all which had beene giuen to Sforza.	ibi.
Venetians General his sonne taken prisoner.	Venetians reconer Feltré, Belluno, and other places.	294	Venetians take Bressia.	403
Venetians in Constantinople wronged.	Vidmois voluntarily yeeld to the Venetians.	ibi.	Vitalis Sardo the Pirate hanged.	405
Victor Pisani General of the Venetians.	Venetian Ambassadors sent to Duke Philip.	296	Venetians Nauall Armie defeated.	406
Viscont of Milan giueth his daughter to the King of Cyprus.	Venetians denounce warre against Philip.	306	Venetians suspect Sforza.	410
Venetians take the Hauens of Famagusta.	Venetians enter Bressia by treachery.	308	Venetians Nauall Armie against Alphonso.	411
Venetians decieued by the Anconians: taken and spoiled by the Genoueses.	Venetians troupes defeated by Philips Armie.	310	Venetians resolue on warre against Sforza, and chooseth Malatesta for their General.	414
Venetians enforced to retire into Chioggia.	Venetians send new supplies to Bressia.	ibi.	Venetians Ambassadors murdered in Milan.	415
Venetians besiege Pera, in hatred of Andronicus.	Venetian Commissioners ill dealt with at Milan.	313	Venetians troupes come to the gates of Milan.	417
Venetian barks taken and burnt by the enemies.	Venetians take Casal-maior.	319	Venetians besiege Soncina.	ibi.
Venetians and Genoueses lodge at one time in one Hauens.	Venetians besiege Macale.	320	Venetians great disreitor in doing nothing without good aduise.	426
Venetians repulsed from the fort at the Milles.	Venetians take the new Orges.	321	Venetian Army besiege Argers.	432
Venetians reconer Chioggia.	Venetians answer to the Ambassadors of Sienna.	325	Venetians make a Val at the Streight.	433
Venetians manall Armie of 100. vessels.	Venetians summons to Philip.	326	Venetians raise their Campe from before Corinth.	ibi.
Venetians reconer Cap-histria.	Venetians proclaime warre against Philip.	327	Vrfo Iustitiano is General of the Venetians Nauie.	436
Venetians enforced to offer Trensio to the Duke of Austria.	Venetians put to rout upon the Cremonese.	328	Vrfo Iustitiano giues two assaults to Mytilene.	437
Venetians hated of all their neighbours.	Venetians manall Armie defeated.	330	Vrfo Iustitiano dieth with griefe.	ibi.
Venetians troubled about the yeelding up of Tenedos.	Venetians defeat the Genoueses Nauie.	332	Venetians assault Rhodes.	438
Verona pillaged.	Venetians defeated by Picinino.	335	Vittore Capello General of the Nauall Armie.	439
Venetians in danger before the coming of Hermolao.	Venetians perswasions to the Genoueses.	340	Venetians defeated, and Barbadoico the Provider slain.	ibi.
Verona possessed by the Carrarians.	Venetians great distresse.	342	Venetians take Denos.	441
	Venetians ratifie the league with the Florentines.	363	Venetian Fleet escape from the Turkes.	442
	Venetians victorie neere the lake of Benac.	365	Venetian Fleet entreth the channell of Nigrepont.	443
	Vincenzans advertisement to Galeas his widow.	283	Venetians enterprize upon Nigrepont fruitlesse.	ibi.

The first Table.

Venetians ioyne with King Ferdinands Fleet.	450	Where the first foundations of the Citie were laid.	ibid.
Venetians resolution.	452	What day the Citie of Venice was built.	ibid.
Venetians intall Hercules d' Etkin the Principalltie of Ferrara.	454	What maner of people were receiued into this new Citie.	5
Venetians present to the Persian king.	456	What the true foundation of Venice was.	6
Venetian Fleet in Cilicia.	467	Whence the Venetians that now are be defended.	ibid.
Venetians take Sichin.	ibid.	What the Venetians exercise was in the beginning.	7
Venetians besiege Misra.	469	Wherein the Venetians aided Narfes.	9
Venetians care for the reliefe of Sclatarie.	477	What moued the Venetians to change the government.	11
Venetians preuaile against the Turkes.	478	What forme they obserued at the first Dukes election.	12
Venetians defeated.	483	What Bonitendius saith concerning the association.	20
Venetians fortifications against the enemies incursions.	ibid.	Who led the French Armie against the Venetians.	22
Venetian Captaines resolution more valliant then discreet.	484	Why the French did assaile the Venetians.	23
Venetians defeated by the Turkes.	485	Wherefore they are called Peraguais.	27
Venetians aide comes too late into Friull.	ibid.	Why S. Markes body was brought from Alexandria.	30
Variance betwixt the Venetian Generall and the Turkes.	ibid.	What moued those of Pharos to defend themselves.	58
Venetians besiege Ficavolles.	498	What the Normans were, and their originall.	65
Venetians put to rout and their enterprise made frustrate.	500	Who was the Authour of the warre against the Turkes.	69
Venetians take Ficavolles.	501	Wonderfull vision hapned to Peter the Hermit.	ibid.
Venetians Armie crosseth the Po.	504	What Charlemaine did against the Infidels.	71
Venetians build a bridge vpon the Po neere to Ferrara.	ibid.	Who gane the name to Armenia.	75
Venetians answer to the Pope.	507	What Antioch the Christians did besiege.	76
Venetians come to Stellata.	510	Why Alexis refused Antioch.	79
Venetians craue a generall Councell.	513	What account Baldwin made of Beamond.	85
Venetians besiege Gallipolis.	514	Warre against the Paduans with their discomfiture.	88
Venetians take Calce.	515	When the Loane began at Venice.	106
Venetians put to rout.	ibid.	Wherefore the Emperour Frederick hated Pope Alexander the third.	ibid.
Venetian Gallies assailed by Pirates.	518	What time the Venetian Prince began to scale with lead.	108
Venetians loyaltie.	521	What time the Venetian Prince began	ibid.
Venetians defeated.	525
Venetians in amaze.	527
Venetians send a fleet to guard Cyprus.	528

W.

W Hereof the Authours meaning is to treat.
 Who they were that began to sie.
 What those places were, whereon Venice is at this day built.

ibid.

The first Table.

Williams of Mountferrat is vanquished by Sacramor Viscont.	418	Z. Arastaken againe, which was reuolted.	63	Zara the fift time reuolted and recovered.	140
Warre against the Turkes begun in Morea.	432	Zara rebelleth againe, and recovered by the Venetians.	88	Zara rebelleth the first time.	170
What Gnidias was in former times.	451	Zara reuolted the third time, is recovered.	95	Zara reduced vnder the Venetians obedience.	172
Warre resolved against the Duke of Ferrara.	495	Zara made an Archbishopricke.	100	Zara rebelleth the seauenth time, moued by sea and land, assaulted, and at last yeilded.	195
		Zara againe reuolted and recovered.	117	Zeni makes spoile vpon the riner of Genoa.	251

FINIS.

William

A Table of the principall matters contained in the second Volume.

A greement betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. Fol. 4	nemies passage. ibid.	positions. 120
A strong suspicion of the Pope concerning the French king. 6	Aluiana encampeth at Olona, determining there to tarrie for the enemy. 73	A league betwixt the Emperour and the King of England. 137
Advertisements to the Princes of Germanie to cleere the suspicion. 7	A Venetian Ambassador sent to Selim. 75	Ambassadors of the Emperour and the King of England meet at Venice. ibid.
Aluiana his exploits in Friul. 9	Achmat brother to Selim vanquished and slaine. 76	Articles of the alliance made betwixt the Emperour, Francis Sforza, and the Venetians. 139
An old mans speech to the Senat. ibid.	Achmat sonne to Achmat in armes against Selim. ibid.	Accord betwixt the Pope and Emperour. 152
Ambuscado to surprize the Count Petellan. 11	A great fire in Venice. 78	Accord betwixt the Pope and the Venetians. 153
All Romagna yeeldeth to the Pope upon the same of the kings Victorie. 17	A new compromise in the Popes person concerning the strife betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. ibid.	Articles of the agreement. ibid.
An enteruiew resolved on betwixt the Emperour and the French king. 20	Aluiana taketh Rouigo. 84	Agreement betwixt the Emperour and French king. 154
A Treatie of truce motioned betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians broken. 26	A Croizado in Hungarie against the Turkes. 85	Armie of the league retireth from Milan. 157
A generall Councell published at Liours. 37	Ambassadors from Venice with their request to the king of England. 92	Aquila taken by Rance de Cera. 168
A great earthquake at Venice. 42	Aluiana relieueth Vincenza. 94	Andrea Doria in the French kings service. 179
A strang miracle in the mine at Bologna. 49	Agreement contraited with the Swisses and broken the same day. 94	Articles of agreement betwixt the Pope and Emperour. 180
Andrea Gritti, and Antonio Lusitiano taken prisoners. 53	Aluiana his enterprize upon Brescia. 100	A colourable excuse of the king of England to the Venetians request. 184
Articles of the league betwixt the French King, and Venetians. 59	Aluianas death. ibid.	An accord made with the Duke of Ferrara. 185
All the Dutchie of Milan in an uprore. 60	Asola and Lona taken by the Venetians. 101	Ascoli and diuers other towne yeeld to the confederates. 190
Aluiana his earnestnesse to the Senate, that he might fight with the enemies. 72	Articles concluded betwixt the Pope and the French king. 103	A vaine and ridiculous challenge. 191
Aluiana sheweth himselfe at the enemies passage. ibid.	Assaults giuen to Verona. 111	A policie of the enemies. 192
	Assailants retire with losse. ibid.	An enterprize of the Spaniards against the Gallies of Philippin Doria. 192
	Alliance renewed betwixt Soliman and the Venetians. 119
	After what manner the Pope would consent to the French kings propositions. ibid.

The second Table.

The second Table.

A fierce encounter of those of the league against the Imperials.	193	A Turkish Ambassador cometh to Venice.	322	A vaine & unprofitable engine.	466
Andrea Doria resolvethe from the kings service.	194	Agreement betwixt Strossi and the Venetians concerning Milan.	323	Articles of peace betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians.	474
Articles of Agreement betwixt the Emperor and Doria.	195	A new practise to draw the Venetians to the league with the king.	324	Ambassadors speech to Selim.	478
Aquila recovered of the Imperials.	207	A Spanish Frier beginneth the treatie of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King.	325	Amurath confirms peace with the Venetians.	480
Antonio de Leua assaileth the L. S. Paul.	210	A tyrannicall law of the Turkes.	328	Ambassadors sent to the king of Spayne.	484
Antonio de Leua followeth the Duke of Vrbino in his retreat to Cassan.	ibid.	Ambassadors from Venice to Edward 6. king of England.	336	A decree against superfluous diet.	ibid.
A discourse made in Senate concerning peace with the Emperour.	219	A general dearth.	342	A Persian Ambassador comes to Venice.	485
A discourse against the former.	220	Almans band themselves against the French concerning Metz, Thou, and Verdune.	354	A Venetian Gentleman executed to satisfy the Turke.	ibid.
Articles of peace betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians.	222	A popular commotion in Rome.	362	A discreet answer of the Venetians to the Duke of Ferrara.	345
Almans require to haue a Generall Council.	227	A strange accident at Rome.	363	Agreat Turkish fleet at sea.	347
A league betwixt the Pope, Emperour, and all the Italian potentates, the Venetians except.	235	Amischicuous practise of a revolted Jew.	368	All Germanie banded against the Emperour, and his brother Ferdinand.	348
A fight at sea betwixt the Venetians and Turkes.	240	Arcenall of Venice burnt.	370	A decree concerning building of Churches.	494
A new practise betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.	246	Answer of the French King and Queen his mother to the Pope.	377	Articles on which the interdictions were revoked.	499
Alix Balha persuadeth Soliman to make warre on Italy.	253	Artor Baillone Generall in Cyprus.	385	After what manner the prisoners were deliuered.	ibid.
A league betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, and the Venetians against the Turke.	265	Asser assault given to four bulwarks at one time.	390
Andrea Doria chosen General of the Armie for the league by Sea.	274	An assault given to the bulwarke Constantia.	391
A Treaty of peace betwixt the Emperour and French king broken off.	276	Articles of peace propounded by the Venetians.	399
Ambassadors chosen at Venice to be present at the assembly of Nice.	277	Articles of the league.	403
A worthy recompence.	279	Arrivall of Don John with Spanish forces.	411
Armie of the league returneth to Corsu.	290	Articles of the Capitulation at the taking of Cyprus by the Turkes.	416
All men cry out upon Doria.	292	Adulfe of Bernardino de Requesens, for fighting or not fighting with the enemies.	418
Agreement betwixt the Pope and the Duke of Vrbino.	298	An accident likely to haue bred great mischief.	420
Ambassadors answer to the Balha.	302	Ali Balha his speech of encouragement to his Captaines and souldiers at the instant of battaile.	440
An Hungarian Ambassador cometh to Venice.	306	Attempt upon Castelnovo in vaine.	453
Answer of the Emperour & French king to the Venetian Ambassador.	307	Ambassadors sent from Venice to France and Spayne.	457
Ambassadors haue answer.	109

B

Bentiuoli discouraged, yeeld to the Pope.	5
Bologna yeeldeth to the Pope.	ibid.
Brescia yeeldeth to the king.	16
Bishop of Gurcia cometh into France from the Emperour.	37
Bentiuoli with the French are in Bologna.	44
Breach made at Bologna.	49
Bergamo expelleth the French.	52
Bergamo taken and some lost.	84
Battle renew betwixt the French and Swisses by break of day.	97
Brescia besieged by the Venetians, & againe by the French.	101
Brescia yeeldeth on composition.	108
Belgrade taken by the Turkes.	123
Battle of Bicoca.	136
Bofo and Alexandria are taken by Laurenc.	181
Branfwich Duke returneth into Germany.	192
Brandyum yeeldeth to the Venetians.	208
Barbarossa spoileth the Islands of the Archipelago.	278
Barbarossa cometh into Candy.	280

Barbarossa

Barbarossa his retreat from Candy.	281
Barbarossa his considerations upon the sundry opinions of the Turkes.	287
Barbarossa repenteth his coming forth of the Gulfe of Preneze.	289
Barbarossa summoneth the Gournour of Catarras to deliuer the towne unto him.	300
Barbarossa his vaine assaults to Catarras.	301
Badoario greatly perplexed.	308
Barbarossa his fleet at Marseller.	320
Barbarossa taketh Nice.	ibid.
Barbarossa his cruel spoiles in his returne home.	326
Bail of Venice his remonstancie to the Bascha Mahomet.	379
Bascha Mahomet reneweth the treatie of peace.	398
Badoario contrary to Tepulo.	401
Bascha Mahomet his proposition to the Venetian Baylie.	405
Bragadino his exhortation to his souldiers.	412
Bragadino comes to Mustapha his tent.	416
Barbarico his speech persuading to fight.	419
Bascha Mahomet solliciteth the Emperour.	451
Bishop of Aix Ambassador from the French king at Constantinople.	473
Brescia afflicted with the plague.	483
Building of the bridge of Rialto.	489

C

Castle of Cresle yeeldeth to the Venetians.	10
Confederacie of the Pope, Emperour, French King & king of Arragon against the Venetians.	12
Casal-Maior yeelded.	14
Cadara taken and sackt by the Imperials.	21
Count Petilla commander of Padua.	23
Contention betwixt the Pope and the French king.	37
Cause of the Venetians hated to the Duke of Ferrara.	25
Confederacie anew betwixt the Emperour & the French King.	37
Concorda take by the Popes army.	39
Cardinal of Pavia dealeth badly with the Duke of Vrbino.	45

Cardinal of Pavia staine by the Duke.	ibid.
Confederacie betwixt the Pope, the king of Arragon and the Venetians.	47
Cardinal of Medicis prisoner at Milan.	56
Cremona taken and sackt by the Spaniards.	67
Constancie of the Venetian Senate.	74
Compromise made by the Pope.	75
Citie of Vd'na abandoned to the enemies.	79
Countrie of Friul acquit by means of the taking of Frangipani.	85
Cardinal of Syens Oration to the Swisses.	95
Cardinal makes use of false rumors.	96
Charles king of Spaine chosen Emperour.	118
Commissioners of the Emperour and the Venetians meet at Verona.	120
Conditions of agreement betwixt the Pope and the Emperour.	126
Colonna fortifieth Milan.	130
Cremona yeelded to the enemies.	136
Creation of Pope Adrian the sixth.	138
Creation of Pope Clement the seventh.	142
Cause of the French kings discontent with the Emperour.	145
Conditions of peace propounded by the Pope.	146
Children of France in hostage for the king their Father.	156
Confederates send Commissioners to the king of England.	ibid.
Capitulation of Cremona.	161
Colonell enter Rome violently.	ibid.
Chiefe Articles of the treatie.	163
Confederates provide to resist the Emperour.	ibid.
Confederates consult about the siege of Naples.	167
Confederates Armie still followes the Imperials.	171
Cardinals meet at Bologna to treat of the Popes deliuerie.	177
Cause of Andrea Doria his resolue.	194
Capitulation about the yeelding of Auerfa.	198
Confederates take Pavia.	200
Castle of Gemoar sackt by the people.	201

Citie of Cambray chosen for the treatie.	212
Circumcision of Solimans children.	226
Castle of Milan, and the Citie of Coma renated to Duke Sforza.	228
Coron & Patras take by Doria.	223
Catiadin Barbarossa his great experience at Sea.	241
Cariadin taketh Thunus.	244
Creation of Pope Paul the third.	ibid.
Cariadine his fleet.	247
Confederacie confirmed betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians.	249
Cause of the kings discontent with the Duke of Savoy.	250
Confusion of the Venetian Army seeing the Turks lie neere them.	262
Canalis commanded by Soliman to send to the Venetian Senate.	ibid.
Candiots preparations for their defence.	280
Capello his answer to Doria.	288
Capels speech to Doria to provoke him to the battaile.	290
Confederates Armie cometh to besiege Castelnovo.	293
Castelnovo taken by Barbarossa.	300
Cantelmo departs from Venice without any commission.	304
Cause of the warre of Hungary.	312
Controversie betwixt the Venetians and Ferdinand put to compromise.	319
Cardinal of Ferrara exhorteth the Venetians in the French kings behalfe.	324
Capitulations of the peace betwixt the Emperour & the French king.	325
Commissioners decide the controversie betwixt Ferdinand and the Venetians.	326
Contention betwixt the Venetians and the Turke.	328
Cardinal Farnese cometh to Venice.	334
Cardinal S. George sent Legate into France.	336
Contentio concerning the place where the Council should be kept.	340
Cardinal de Monte chosen Pope & called by the name of Julius 3.	341
Catherine Zeni sent Ambassador to the Turke.	342
	77777 2

Council

The first Table.

Cardinals, but the rest the memo-rie and execution of the Lail will of Cardinall Zeni. 356
Creation of Pope Pius the fourth. 365 Cardinall Caraffa, and three of his knewen are put to death. 383
Charles the ninth French king, ibid.
Cardinals sent by the Pope to the council. ibid.
Ceremonie of bringing Ambassadors to the great Turke. 368
Consul of Mahomet the Vizier
Bajba. 371
Chancellor of Persia his answer Concerning the Emperours demand. 378
Contents of Selims letters to the Ve-
netians. 380
Count Roccas flaine. 391
Citic of Nicofia taken. ibid.
Cyprus yielded to the Turkes. 392 Colonna (capeth two great dangers in his returne homewards. 397 Colonna his remonstrance to the Venetian Senate. 400 Christians surprize the enemies by Zinnafada. 409
Cere of those in Famagosta for their fortification. 412
Cornia his speech confirming Barbarico. 419
Catholike kings resolution before the Ambassadors arrivall. 458
Colonna his advise. ibid.
Colonna his opinion concerning inflicting forward toward the enemies. 459
Christians d'serie the Turkish fleet.
460 Christians disscampe from before Naxos. 467
Cause moving the Senate to embrace
Peace. 473
Charles of Lorraine, Duke of May-no the confederates flate. 465 Cause why Amurath hated the Em-
perour. 480
Contention betwixt the Venetians and the knights of Malta. 485
Creation of Pope Sixtus the first. 480 Creation of Pope Gregorie the fourteenth. 489
Creation and death of Pope Inco-cent the ninth, and the creation of Clement the seventh. 490 Cardinall of Florence Legate in France. 492

Creation of Pope Paul the first. 495 Censures against the Venetians are publ. shew. 496
Cardinall Petron conferres with the
Pope. 498
Commission is given to Cardinall Ioyeuse to revoke the censures at Venice. ibid.
Cardinall Ioyeuse his reception at Venice. 499

D

Duke of Venice his answer to the French kings Herald. 14
Duke of Ferrara declares himselfe against the Venetians. 17
Duke of Ferrara d'seateth the Venetians new Armie. 26
Duke of Ferrara takes Loretta. ibid.
Difficulties concerning the agreement betwixt the Emperour and
the Venetians. 58
Divers Venetian young Gentlemen sent to Padua and Treviso. 7-Death of Lewis the twelfth French
king. 88
The Dissension among the Swisses in Milan after the batt. ile. 99
Duke of Burbon Vice-Roy in the Duchie of Milan. 104 Demands of the Venetian Commissioners. 120
Duke of Milan cometh to Pania with five thousand Lansequentes. 134 Different opinions in the Senate concerning their alliance with the Emperour. 139
Duke of Vrbini General to the Vene-
tians. 140
Duke of Burbon forsaketh the French kings partie. ibid.
Duke of Vrbins difficultie to execut
the Senates command. 142
Duke of Albany invades Naples. 146
Duke of Burbon cometh to Milan.
157
Doria suspected to relieve Genoa. 359 Duke of Vrbini brings supplies to the siege of Verona. 161 Duke of Burbon marcheth into the field in despite of all difficulties. 389
Domnico Venicio put to his trial. 372

Duke of Burbons speed in his march to Rome. ibid.
Duke of Burbon assaults the suburbs of Rome. 173
Death of Duke of Burbon. ibid.
Duke of Vrbini taketh Persa. 178
Duke of Brunswick cometh into Italy with great forces. 191 Duke of Brunswick joyned with Antonio de Leva besiege Landi. ibid.
Duke of Vrbini runneth to the defense of his owne state. 208 Duke of Milans great humilitie to
the Emperour. 202
Doria his subtle meaning. 233
Duke of Ferrara reconereth Modena and Regio by the Emperours sentence. 234
Dandulo banished at his returne to Venice. 239
Death of Pope Clement the 7. 244
Death of Francis Sforza Duke of
Milan. 248
Duke of Savoy denieth the French king passage. 249 Difficulties to accord the Emperour
and the French. 250
Doria his incursions causeth the Turks to suspect the Venetians. 261 Doria his policy to enforce the Venetians to toyne with him. 262
Description of the Isle of Corfu. 264 Doria his answer and departure towards Genoa. 266
Description of Naples in Romagn. 267
Description of Maluesia. 268 Difficulties alleged by the Duke of Vrbini. 284
Don Ferrans de Gonzaga cometh
to Corfu. 285
Doria cometh to Corfu. 286
Doria in favour to the enemies causeth his Armie to retire. 287
Doria his remonstrance to the whole
Armie. 288
Doria his retreat encourageth the Turks. 290
Doria his excuse for burning the fight with Barbarossa. 294 Doria with his Gallies retireth into Sicill. 294
Death of the Duke of Vrbini. 295 Dragutis policy to compasse the Venetians Gallies. 298
Doria

The second Table.

Doria his proposition to the French
King Contareri. 301
Divers opinions of the Peace betwixt the Emperour and French king. 305
Duke of Savoy and Languera of Hesse their just to the Venetian
Senate: with their answer. 333
Death of Francis the first, French king, and Henrie the eighth king of England. 336
Death of Pope Paul the third. 347
Duke of Florence taketh the Emperours party. 344
Duke of Ferrara denieth such the Turks. 344
Duke of Ferrara answer of the Venetians to the Duke. 345
Death of Edward the sixth King of England. 356
Duke of Florence sendeth forces against the Siennais. ibid.
Duke of Alva taketh divers townes from the Pope. 359
Duke of Guis cometh into Italie. 360
Death of Pope Paul the fourth. 362
Death of Andre Doria. 363
Death of Pope Pius the fourth. 367
Death of Solymann before Zigher.
ibid.
Discord among the Commanders in Famagosta. 387
Doria returneth home. 394
Divers places subject to the Turks doe yeeld to the Venetians. ibid.
Difficulties propounded by the Spaniards. 395
Don Iohn D'Austria General of the army. 402
Duleigna yeeldeth to the Turks upon composition, which is badly observed. 408
Diligent care of the Captaines in Famagosta. 413
Don Iohns objections against Vene-
tians. 421
Don Iohn his Oration to his souldi-
ers. 429
Death of Pius quintus. 453
Death of Sigismund king of Poland.
461 Difficulties arising about the meeting of Don Iohn. 463
Don Iohn goes into Africke. 478

Death of Selim Emperour of the Turkes. 479
Dukes of Ferrara and Nevers come with king Henry to Venice. ibid.
Death of Colmo de Medicis the first great Duke of Tuscany. 480 Decrees against the Venetians superfluous expenses. 484
Deceit of a Greeke. 489
Death of Pope Gregory the 14. ibi.
Divers Pirats defeated. 494
Death of Pope Clement the 8. 494
Duke Donato reneweth his first declaration. 499

E

Enteruew of the Kings of France and Arragon at Savona. 6 Enteruew refused on betwixt the Emperour and the French King.
20
Enterprise upon Genoa. 33
Earle of Mirandola sent from the Pope to the Lord of Chaumont.
38
Enemies spoile and ruine Vincenza.
71 Emperials braue resolution. 73
Enteruew betwixt the Pope and the French King at Bologna. 103 Excuses alleged by Lautrec that he might disscampe. 109
Emperials besiege Parma. 127 Enemies passe over the River Adda without impediment. 128 Enemies come to Milan, and winne
the Roman gate and suburb. ibi.
Enemies surpris Genoa. 136
Emperials take Garlas. 144
Englands curtesie toward the French
King. 154
Enterprise of Milan broken. 200 Enteruew of the French and Venetian army. 209
Enemies beaten by the Duke of Vrbini.
211 Expectation of the Enteruew at Bolognia. 219
Entertainment given to the Emperour on the Venetian territorie. 224 Effect of Rangone his Oration to
the Senate. 259
Expense divided betwixt those of the

League. 274
Enteruew of the emperor and French king at Aigue-Adortes. 278 Enemies escape by fault of the Leaguers. 289
Enemies besiege Milan. 325 Enterprise of Naples being found difficult, is rejected by the French
king. 354
Enterprise of Marguerites broken off through the difficulty therof. 383 Enemies incaped before Nicofia. 387
Enemies fierce battary at Nicofia. 390 Enemies fleet retireth forth of the gulph of Venice. 409
Enemies army before Famagosta. 412 Enemies make 5 batteries at one time.
ibid.
Enemy Captains charge. 413
Enemies repull from the breach. 414 Estate of the besieged enforcereth them
to yeeld. 415
Emperours excuses to free himselfe from entering into the league. 446
Extremities of the Turkish fleet. 459
Enemies retire to Modon. 465 Entertainment given to the french King at Vienna in Austria. 479 Election of Pope Leo the tenth, and his Iodane death. 494

F

Flight of the Venetian garrison 10 French King complaineth of the truce. 11
French king dissembleth. ibi.
French take Treni. 14
Frangipane makes mar in Hislria. 22
French king greatly perplexed. 28
Ferraris defeat two fleets of the
Venetians. 36
French army marcheth towards Bolognia where the Pope lay. 37
Flight of the Duke of Vrbini. 44 French Kings great desire to bee at peace with the Pope. 465 French after long fight become masters of Brescia. 53
French are victors in the battell of Ravenna. 55
French besiege Nonarain vaine. 63
French campe in fcare at the Swisses comming. 64

The second Table.

French Kings answer to the Venetians.	68
Frangipane taketh Maran by treachery.	77
Frangipane entrench Maran with his succours.	78
Frangipane taken by the Venetians.	80
Francis Duke of Angoulême French King.	88
Francis confirmeth the league with the Venetians.	69
Francis his dissimulation.	91
French Kings great preparation.	91
French passe into Piedmont by Argenteire.	93
Four armies at one time in Italie.	95
French Kings entry into Milan.	100
French kings complaints against the Pope.	108
French and Spanish kings aspire unto the empire.	118
French king and the king of England take together.	124
French and Venetian armies on the Cremonois.	131
French campe before Milan.	133
French take Novara.	134
French come to Milan.	145
French Agents sent to Venice to treat of an agreement.	153
Fortifications of Genoa.	159
Francis Sforza yieldeth the Castells of Milan to the Imperials.	160
Francis Sforza ratifieth the league.	161
Foscari his exhortation to the Florentines.	165
Florentines answer and resolution.	165
French king sendeth Rancoc de Cera into Italie.	166
Fraissolana besieged by the Vice-roy.	166
French and Venetian fleets scattered by tempest.	182
French Kings Ambassador with the Pope.	186
French kings instance to the Venetians in the Popes behalfe.	202
Florentines send Ambassadors to the Emperour.	212
Florentines great troubles.	222
Ferdinands designs against the

Turkes.	231
Francisco Dandulo taken by Pirates.	239
Fight at Sea betwixt the Venetians and Turkes.	240
French Kings Ambassador to the Venetians about Milan business.	249
French take Thurin, Fossan, and Pigneroll.	250
French king sendeth Count Guy de Rangon to Venice.	259
French kings designs.	274
French King refuseth to enter into the league.	275
French Ambassadors designe.	299
French kings love towards the Venetians.	303
Forc offered to the lodging of the French ambassador at Venice.	308
French King complains to the Venetian ambassador: with the answer.	309
French king incensed against the Emperour.	316
French king at one time raiseth three armies against the Emperour.	317
French king displeased with the Venetians.	318
Ferdinand peaceably enjoyeth Transilvania.	347
Ferdinand to free himselfe from war with the Turke, offereth to be tributary.	348
Frier George the Cardinall murdered.	348
French king as farr as the Rhine in favour of the Protestants Princes.	350
French king maketh incursions upon the Duchie of Luxembowg.	351
French kings demand to the Siennois.	355
Francis Dauphin of Viennois marryeth the Queene of Scots.	361
French take Thyonville.	361
First motion of the enterprize of Cyprus for the Turke.	370
French kings offer to the Venetians.	377
Flight of the enemies gallies.	402
French king forbiddeth his subjects to goe into Flanders.	456
French kings answer to the Venetian Ambassador.	457
French Kings magnificent reception at Venice.	479
French Kings marriage celebrated at Florence.	492
French King mediates peace betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.	497
Great preparations of K. Lewis and the Venetians, to stop the Emperours passage.	8
Genoa assured for the King.	31
General Council published at Lyons.	37
Gaston of Foix his incursions.	43
Gaston comes to the aid of Bologna.	49
Gaston relieves the Castle of Brescia.	49
Gaston defeats Meleager of Emili.	51
Gaston befegeth Ruenna.	54
Gaston slain by the Spaniards.	55
Genoa revolteth from the King.	58
Great harme which the Croisade did in Hungrie.	66
Great dearth in Brescia.	102
Gritti the Provindator his answer to Lautrec.	109
Great joy of the Venetians for being reduced under the Venetians obedience.	113
Great numbers of Swisses in the French campe.	133
Genovais bravely repulged.	160
George Frondspberg leneth great numbers of Lansequenets for the Emperour.	163
Genoa reduced under the Kings obedience.	182
Great sorrow of the Lord Lautrec.	194
Great discommodity which the revolt of Doria procured.	195
Genoa by means of Doria revolteth from the King to the Emperour.	198
Genovais fill the Haven of Savona with grauell.	201
Great valour of a woman in mans attire.	211
Great preparations of the Venetians.	212
Great entertainment given the Emperour

for on the Venetian territory.	224
Great troubles in Germany concerning the Duke of Wittenberg.	242
Great fleets prepared at one time in sundry places.	243
Genoa besieged.	247
Genoa forbidden Doria to carry the galleys out of Genoa.	257
Great signes why men did suspect the Emperour.	274
Gritti goeth to Constantinople to treat of an agreement.	296
Gustavus of Cethonia his answer to Barbarossa.	301
Great hope of a long peace.	312
Great preparations for warre on all sides.	319
Gonzaga his excuse concerning the death of Pietro Lodovico.	337
German princes treat with the French King against the Emperour.	347
German whole banded against the Emperour and his brother Ferdinand.	348
Great harme done by the dissolution after the manner of Spain.	366
Generall of the Venetians and Provindator of reasons to Doria to persuade his stay.	384
Genoa impetuous against the dead.	408
General Foscari his answer to G. Ionna.	458
Gillis Andrada his opinion.	459
Great charity of a Prelate.	481
H
How the Venetians were daunted at the report of the battell losse.	16
How the French King daunces his armie	96
Hugo de Moncada sallueth forth upon the confederates.	168
How the Venetians behaved themselves upon the agreement betwixt the Pope and Emperour.	180
Heretikes begin to stir in Germanie.	218
How Doria's departure did trouble the Venetians.	266
Hungarian ambassador at Venice.	306
Henry the second French king.	336
Horatio Farnese marrieth King Henries daughter.	337

Horatio Farnese puts himselfe and familie under the French Kings protection.	342
Hospages given on both sides of Turke and Christians.	416
Henry Duke of Anjou chosen King of Poland.	478
Henry the fourth French king motioneth a marriage with the Princess of Florence.	492
John Paul Baillon yieldeth Perugia and her territory to the Pope.	5
How betwixt the Commissioners assembled about the truce.	11
Imperials succour Verona with men and victuals.	25
Monrie offered to the Popes statue in Bologna.	45
In what manner the Venetians provided for their Cities on the firme land.	101
John Paul Baillon defeated & broken by Gaston of Foix.	52
Imperiall victory by night passeth the river Breno.	72
John James Triunke general of the Venetian army.	101
In what manner the Venetians did relieve the State of Milan.	127
In what order the French did assault the enemies.	135
Imperials pursue the French and take Garlas.	144
John de Medicis a great captain.	164
Imperiall fleet beaten by the confederates.	166
Imperials great cruelty in Rome.	174
Italie amazed at the Emperours coming.	212
Imperials demand concerning the accord for Milan.	221
Incursions of the knights of Malta against the Turkes.	226
John Pifani extraordinary Ambassador into France.	229
Islands taken from the Venetians by Barbarossa.	268
Instructions sent by the French king to be propounded by Cardinal Tournon to the Senat at Venice.	345

Institution of the Venetian Academie.	490
Jealousies of the Spaniards.	493
League betwixt Maximilian Emperour and Lewis the French King.	81
Lewis his Ambassador at Venice.	161
Lewis commeth into Italie.	161
Lord of Chaumont General of the Kings armie.	161
Lord of Chaumont taketh the Pollicino of Renigo.	161
Lagnaga taken.	161
Lord of Chaumont taketh divers places which stopped the Emperours wayning into Italie.	30
Lord of Chaumont with his forces marcheth to the Duchie of Milan.	31
Labels set up in divers places against the Pope.	345
Loss of Brescia troubleth the Venetians.	353
LaPaliffe forsaketh the field and guardeth the Towne.	357
League betwixt the Pope and the Emperour.	359
League betwixt the French King and the Venetians.	361
Lancequenets defeat the Venetian forces.	365
Legation taken and dismantled by the Venetians.	365
League betwixt the Emperour, the King of Arragon, the Duke of Milan and Swisses.	391
Lautrec befegeth Brescia.	108
Lautrec master of Brescia fortifieth the City to the Venetians.	109
Lancequenets refuse to besiege a Citie belonging to the Emperour.	110
Lewis K. of Hungarie prepareth his defence against the Turke.	119
Lord of Lescot discovers the enterprize of the Bandetti of Milan.	125
Lord of Lautrec succour Parma.	127
Lautrec fortifieth Milan.	128
League betwixt the Pope, the Emperour, the Venetians, the Milanais, and Florentines.	128
League

The second Table.

The second Table.

League concluded at Cognac.	156	entertain betwixt himselfe and the French King.	20
Lands is taken by the Confederates	157	Maximilian the emperor prepa- reth to assault Venice.	21
Lord of Langi comes to Venice.	158	Marquesse of Mantua taken prisoner and brought to Venice.	22
Lancequenes come into Italie.	164	Maximilian besiegeth Padua.	23
Lautrec entreth the Dutchie of Mi- lan with great forces.	181	Maximilian returns into Germanie	24
Lautrec leaveth Milan and march- eth towards Rome.	183	Maximilian and the French King displeased with the Pope for abso- lving the Venetians.	27
Lautrec marcheth towards Naples.	187	Monsieur with his Galle taken and ruined.	31
Lautrec defeateth and prouoketh the Imperialls to battell.	189	Marques of Mantua set at liberty	33
Lautrec incampeth within troubles of Naples.	190	Mirandola yielded upon safeties of lines and goods.	39
Lord of Barbezieux cometh to Sa- uona.	193	Maximilian the Emperor inclineth to peace.	42
Lord Lautrec his nature.	194	Maximilian Sforza in possession of the Dutchy of Milan.	59
Lord Lautrec his sickness and death.	196	Motion of agreement betwixt the French king and the Venetians.	ibid.
Lord S. Paul leaveth Milan to goe to the reliefe of Genoa.	201	Maximilian Sforza retireth to Ve- nua.	62
Lord Chastillon cometh to Venice	206	Milan reduced to the French govern- ment.	ibid.
League betwixt the Pope, the Empe- rour, and Venetians, against the Turke.	205	Means which the Senate used to get money.	81
Lodouico Badoario chosen. Am- bassadour by the Senate to goe to Solyman.	306	Marke Antonio Colosna gardeth Verona.	95
Losse of the battell of Saint Laurence, and the taking of S. Quintines by the Spaniards.	360	Milan yeeldeth to the French king.	99
Long delays used in the conclusion of the league.	395	Manfron and de Bue defeated by the Imperialls.	105
Lodouico Mattinega sends sup- plies to Famagosta.	396	Marquesse of Brandenburg cometh to the Emperours armie.	108
		Mamelukes vanquished by Selim.	116
		Maximil. the Emperours death.	117
		Milan sackt ten daies together.	129
		Marques of Pescara catcheth the Imperialls to tarry in Lombardy.	147
		Marques of Pescara his audacious de- mand to duke Francis Sforza.	153
		Malateste Baillon before Cremona for the league.	161
		Marquesse of Salusses passeth the Po.	164
		Marcello dieth for griefe.	113
		Marquesse of Mantua ioyneth to the league.	185
		Maximilians Armie dissolved for a small occasion.	190
		Maximilian emperor breaketh the

The first Table.

New agreement betwixt the Pope and the French King.	21	Pope Iulius his meaning to the French King.	ibid.
New confederacie betwixt the Em- perour and the French King.	37	Pope Iulius in hatred to the French King assaileth the Duke of Ferrara.	28
Number of the enemies before Pavia.	70	Pope Iulius his secret practises.	31
New compromise in the Popes person for the strife betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians.	78	Pope Iulius his Armie taketh Mo- dena.	32
Number of the Venetian Armie con- ducted by Aluiana.	94	Pope Iulius his preparations against the Cite of Ferrara.	36
Number of Swisses in Milan.	95	Pope Iulius excommunicateth Al- forso d'Est and his adherents.	ibid.
New succours enter into Bressia un- knowne to Aluiana.	100	Pope Iulius his entertainment giuen to the Bishop of Garcia.	43
Nouara taken by the French.	134	Pope Iulius breakes off the Treatie betwixt the Emperour and the Ven- etians.	ibid.
Nouara and Vigena yielded to the French.	140	Pope Iulius his answer to the Bolo- gnis.	44
Number of the Armie of the League	157	Pope Iulius his perplexitie.	56
Nauarre his couragious proposition.	165	Pope Leo the tenth elected.	59
Number of the dead and prisoners in a fight at sea.	193	Pope Leo reneweth the agreement be- twixt the Emperour and the Ven- etians.	67
Nouara and diuers other towne yield to the Confederates.	200	Pope Leo his reprochfull speeches of the Venetians.	68
Number of the Emperours forces in Italie.	212	Pope Leo sends succours to the Em- perour against the Venetians.	ibid.
Number of the Turkish Armie.	232	Provisions made by the Venetians.	69
New practise betwixt the Pope and the Venetians.	245
Number of the Venetian forces at sea.	258
Number of souldiers and munition in the Island of Corson.	264
Naples yielded to the Turkish.	282
Naples and Batsania resigned to the Turkes.	310
Number of the Emperours Armie in Germanie against the Protestants.	339
Number of the Protestants Armie.	339
Number of the Christian Fleet.	393
Number of souldiers in Famagosta.	403
Number of the Turkish Fleet.	403
Number of serviceable men in Fam- agosta.	412
Number of the Christian and Tur- kish Fleet at Lepanto.	460
Number of the Confederates Fleet.	464

The second Table.

Pope Leo seemeth the Cardinals Bi- biena Legate to the Emperour.	106	Imperials dealings.	185
Pope Leo exhorteth Christian Princes to take Armes against the Turke.	117	Pope Clement his excuses to sum a new Confederacie.	186
Pope Leo and the Emperour make secret alliance against the French King.	125	Pope Clement his answer to the King, concerning Doria his enter- tainment.	195
Pope Leo suspecteth the Imperials.	127	Proposition of the Count S. Paul.	199
Pope Leo his sodaine death.	130	Pope Clement his intention.	204
Paia besieged by Lautrec.	134	Prince of Orange determineth to goe to Persia.	208
Pollicie of Lautrec.	135	Prince of Orange changeth his minde	209
Pope Adrian the first his creation.	138	Part of the enemies defeated by the Duke of Vrbina.	211
Pope Adrian zealous of an uninter- fall peace.	140	Publication of the Treatie of Cam- bray.	215
Pope Adrian his death.	142	Pope Clement and the Emperour cometo Bologna.	221
Pope Clement the seaventh created.	143	Pope Clement his excuses concern- ing the conuocation of a Council.	227
Pope Clement his remonstrance to the Venetians.	145	Pope Clement acquainteth the Venetians with all his designs.	242
Paia besieged by the French King.	146	Philippo Mazzo a knight of Malta looses his head for his many rob- beries.	244
Pope Clement a mediator betwixt the Emperour and the French king ibid.	147	Pope Paul the third taketh Armes for the Dutchie of Camerina.	245
Pope Clement protesteth against them both if they agree not.	147	Propositions in the Senate for the an- swering of Count Rangon.	259
Pope Clement and the Venetians feare least the French King should come to battell.	148	Pope Paul his answer to the Veneti- an Ambassadour.	265
Pope Clement his resolution after the defeat of the French.	149	Pope Paul sendeth to the Emperour and the French King to reconcile them.	274
Pope Clement and the Venetians answer to Don Hugo for the Emperour.	156	Pope Paul resoluth to goe to Nice, to attone the Emperour and the King.	276
Pedro of Nauarre Generall of the Nauall Armie.	158	Pope Paul denied entrance into Nice.	277
Pope Clement his agreement with the Colonnelli.	162	Proposition of the Captaines in Pal- matia.	283
Pope Clement maketh means to the Vice-roy for an agreement.	166	Patriarke Grimani his enterprife upon the Castele of Preueze.	285
Pope Clement his error in disar- ming himselfe.	169	Petro Zeni hofen Ambassadour goeth to Soliman.	299
Pope Clement acknowledgeth his error, and imploereth the aide of the Confederates.	171	Pope Paul sendeth the Cardinal Far- nese Legat into France.	306
Pope Clement with diuers Cardinals retireth to the Castele of S. Angelo.	173	Peace concluded with the Turkes ac- cording to their owne minds.	308
Paia taken by Lautrec.	182	Peace confirmed betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians.	315
Pope Clement complaineth of the		Polin solliciteth the Venetians to make a league with the French king.	316

Polin his practises against the Venetians.	317
Pope Paul goeth about to make alliance with the Venetians.	319
Pope Paul and the Emperours enter- view at Buffet to no purpose.	321
Pope Paule giueth Parma and Placentia to his sonne Pietro Lodouico.	329
Protestants suite to the Venetians.	333
Pope Paul his discourse to drive the Venetians from their squisition.	334
Protestants take Chiufa.	ibid.
Pope Paul his complaints against the Emperour.	335
Piero Strofio sent for from France to trouble the peace of Italie.	337
Pope and French King sollicit the Venetians against the Emperour	ibid.
Pope Paul to satisfie the Almaines sendeth a Legate into Germanie.	339
Paule the third his death.	341
Parma is kept by Camillo Virino.	ibid.
Presages of great warres.	342
Pope Iulius the third, not thinking thereon, causeth great warres in Italie.	343
Proposition of agreement about Parma.	ibid.
Pope Iulius seeketh means of agree- ment with the French King.	ibid.
Pope Iulius, by his Legate goeth about to attone the Emperour and the French King.	347
Prince of Salerne commeth into France.	351
Prince of Salerne his proposition to the Venetian Senate.	ibid.
Peace of Chiufa taken by the Protestants.	325
Peace betwixt the Emperour & Germanie Princes.	ibid.
Prince of Salerne returneth to Venice from the French King.	ibid.
Pope Paul the fourth enemy to the Spaniards.	359
Peace betwixt the Pope and the Spaniards.	360
Peace

The second Table.

Peace concluded betwixt the French and Spanish Kings.	361	Pope Paul grants a Commission to the Cardinal Joyeuse.	498	Strange suspicion of the Pope concern- ing the French King.
Private pursued by Bemboys and ibe- scules in Duvaszo.	362	R.		Six thousand Swisses come to Vau- against the French King.
Pope Paul dieth.	ibid.	R		Speech of agreement betwixt the Em- perour and the Venetians.
Pope Pius the fourth created.	363	R		Sundry thoughts of the Bologna
Pope Pius endeth the controversie be- twixt the Ambassadors of France and Spaine.	364	R		Swisses desir Gallion of Foix.	4
Pope Pius sendeth to the Catholike king to ioyne in the warre against the Turkes.	376	R		Swisses come into the Dutchie of lan.	ibid.
Pope Pius solliciteth the French King to haue an hand in this warre.	377	R		Swisses returne home againe.	4
Pope Pius his proposition to avoid de- lay.	382	R		Strange miracle in mine.	4
Pope Pius armeth twentie Gallies whereof Colonna is made Gen- erall.	383	R		Swisses hatred to the French King.	4
Piali of opinion to besiege Famagosta first.	386	R		Swisses discontented, make warre on the French.	5
Praiers and processions in Nicolsa.	388	R		Swisses great boldnesse, and their clorie at Quara.	6
Pope Pius his exhortation for con- clusion of the league.	395	R		Selim marcheth into Asia with Armie prepared for Europe.	7
Pope Pius and the Spaniards seek to the Venetians to conclude the league.	400	R		Stratoda and Montfalcon taken by Frangipan.	7
Prince Mocenigo his remonstrance to the great Council.	403	R		Senate recompenseth Saurorgnane	8
Pope Pius the fifth solliciteth the king of Poland.	450	R		Selims victorie against Ismael.	8
Prince Mocenigo his Oration to the Council of Ten.	471	R		Soliman oneth Hungarie.	ibid.
Peace propounded in the Council of Ten.	ibid.	R		Swisses determination in the streight of the mountains.	9
Peace concluded betwixt the Turkes and Venetians.	474	R		Swisses retire to Nauara.	9
Prince and Senates Vow to God.	481	R		Swisses retire with soft pace to Mil- us.	9
Prince set upon all warres.	482	R		Siege of Bressia resolved on.	9
Pope Alexander the third sends a golden Rose to the Venetian Prince.	ibid.	R		Senates recompence to the widows and children of Almaina.	10
Pope Sixtus death with the creation of Pope Urban the seauenth.	489	R		Swisses nature.	10
Pope Clement the seauenth blesteth and abolueth the French King.	491	R		Soliman disburdeneth the Common- wealth in time of peace.	11
Peace betwixt the French King and the Duke of Sauoy.	493	R		Selims victories.	11
Pope Paul the fifth complaineth to the Venetian Ambassadour.	495	R		Selim takes Cairo.	ibid.
Pope Paul his resolution upon the Venetians refusal.	ibid.	R		Selim granteth the Venetians de- mands.	ibid.
		R		Soliman resoluth to invade Hun- garie.	12
		R		Swisses leave the French Campe for want of pay.	12
		R		Sforza armeth at Milan.	13
		R		Swisses boldnesse in assaulting their enemies.	13
		R		Sundry opinions on the publication of the League.	14
		R		Senates answer to the Imperials.	ibid.
		R		Sorrow of all France for the Kings captinitie.

The second Table.

captivitie: and the Councils resolution.	152	Soliman advertiseth the Venetians of his determination.	ibid.	ambassadors and their answer to Ferdinand.	318
Senates answer to the French Commissioner.	ibid.	Sundry reports concerning the Turkish Armie.	256	Sharpe warre about Morca.	322
Senates answer to the Lord of Langi.	159	Senates care for mesmes to discharge the expence of warre.	257	Senates answer to the Cardinal of Ferrara.	324
Senate after the taking of Rome, determine to oppose against the Emperour.	176	Solimans discontent for two accidents.	260	Soliman falsly informed of the Venetians.	327
Sundry opinions about the Popes delivrie.	ibid.	Soliman resolue to warre on the Venetians.	262	Senates answer to the Protestants.	333
Strife betwixt the Confederates concerning the taking of Alexandria.	181	Senate determineth to fight with the enemy.	264	Siennois rise against the Spaniards.	336
Solimans liberalitie to the Venetians.	183	Soliman dislodgeth from Corfen.	267	Solimans armie against the Persians.	339
Senates answer to the Pope.	188	Soliman determineth to assaile Naples in Romagna.	ibid.	Soliman makes truce with Christian Princes.	ibid.
Sundry opinions of the Imperial Captaines.	ibid.	Scardona taken by the Venetians.	269	Strife betwixt the Emperour and French King.	ibid.
Six Cities appointed to the Venetians by the agreement of the League.	190	Soliman seemeth to desire peace with the Venetians.	ibid.	Soliman sendeth imperious letters to the Emperour.	340
Secret practises betwixt the King and the Venetians.	203	Senate determineth warre against Soliman.	274	Senate sendeth Ambassadors to the Pope.	341
Senates suspicion concerning the kings coming.	207	Senate resolveth to get money to defray the expences of the warres.	276	Stroffis his policie to victuall Parma.	344
Soliman taketh Buda.	218	Succours sent to Ammirari.	283	Senates answer to the Cardinal of Tournon.	345
Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning the motion of peace with the Emperour.	219	Sibenians braue resolution.	ibid.	Senates answer to the Prince of Salerne.	352
Soliman restoreth Iohn king of Hungarie to his Kingdome.	223	Sundry opinions of the Turkish Armie.	286	Spaniards demands upon the Treatie of Peace with the Pope.	360
Soliman suspecteth the Venetians.	225	Sundry opinions in the Confederates Council.	293	Senate of Milans answer to the king of Spaine concerning the Inquisition.	369
Solimans purpose to enrich Constantinople.	226	Spaniards insolencie.	294	Selim resolue to invade the Isle of Cyprus.	371
Solimans designe against the Christians.	229	Senate resolue to peace with the Turke.	295	Senate advertised of the Turkes treispe.	373
Soliman with his Armie cometh into Hungarie.	232	Senates answer to the Emperours Ambassador.	296	Supplies sent to Cyprus.	375
Sundry opinions in the Senate concerning Canalis cause.	240	Spaniards not being able to keepe Castel-novo, offer it to the Venetians.	300	Selim sendeth a defiance to Venice unless they would surrender Cyprus.	379
Senate acknowledge Canalis service by recompensing his sonne.	241	Senates answer to the Ambassadors of the Emperour and French king.	305	Senates answer to the Chians.	ibid.
Solimans great preparations for warre.	242	Sorrow and griefe of those of Naples and Malvesia when they understood the conditions of peace.	309	Senates answer to Selims letters.	380
Senates holy resolution.	243	Soliman incensed against Ferdinand determineth to make warre in Austria.	312	Selim discontented for the small respect given his Chians.	381
Senate sendeth eight Ambassadors to the Pope.	245	Senate resolue to have the Council held at Vincenza.	314	Situation of the Citie of Nicofia.	387
Soliman advertiseth the Venetians of what hee had done in Persia.	247	Senate resolue to make any new alliance.	315	Sundry opinions of the Captaines of the Christian Fleet.	393
Soliman consenteth to make warre on the Emperour.	253	Senates answer to Polin.	316	Spaniards idle excuses.	395
		Senates answer to the French am-		Sebastiano Venieri made Generall in Zannco his tied.	397
				Senates answer to Colonna.	400
				Supplies sent to Famagosta.	402

Small

The second Table.

Small hope in the renols of the Turk: Subjects.	449	King of England's Ambassadors in Senate.	139
Spaniards faare least the Venetians make Peace with the Turke.	452	The French King will by no means disclaim from Padua.	148
Souranza honourably entertained by D. Iohn at Alcsima.	454	The French King is taken by the Imperialis; and the Armie defeated.	ibid.
Spaniards ialous of the French mens Actions.	456	The Emperours speech and gesture upon newes of the victorie.	149
Senates resolution concerning the Spanish delaies.	458	The King of England's courtie towards the French king.	154
Situation of the Castle of Nausarin.	466	The King of Englandes answer to the Commissioners of the league.	156
Spaniards desirous to returne into the West.	468	The two Armies of the Pope, and the Venetians march together to Milan.	157
Spaniards conference with the Venetian Ambassador.	471	The offer of the Pope and the Venetians to the King.	159
Senates resolution to peace.	473	The King of England offereth the Pope a great summe of money.	163
Sundry opinions concerning the Venetians peace.	476	The Emperours preparations by sea and land.	ibid.
Sundry prodigies scene in the ayre.	483	The two Armies of the league, and Imperialis at once in Tuscanie.	171
Senates decree against the Cleargie.	494	The king of Fraunce and England resolve to free the Pope.	176
Senates answer to the Pope.	496	The Emperours dissimulation concerning the Popes taking.	177
		The French kings great preparations to end into Italy.	179
		The Turke being assailed by Marcello, hath speedie renouel.	183
		The Emperour commaundeth the Pope to be enlarged.	115
		The French kings answer to the Venetians Ambassador, and his determination.	206
		Treason discovered in Barletta.	207
		The two Armies of the French, and Venetians distrust one another.	209
		Triulcio his request from the king to the Venetians.	213
		The Emperours arrivall at Genoa.	212
		The Kings request to the Venetians.	215
			22222
			The

The king of Arragon cometh into the Realme of Naples. 5
The false reports which the Pope threw abroad against the French king. 6
The Senates answer to the Emperours Ambassadors. 9
Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 11
The Pope ratifieth the Treatie of Cambray. 13
The Duke of Venice his answer to the French kings herald. 14
The kings resolution to enforce the enemies to fight. 15
The great progresion of the French Armie. 27
Treniso continueth obedient to the Venetians. 18
The Venetian Ambassadors come by night into Rome. 22
Treatie of Truce betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians broken. 26
The kings anger against the Swisses. 28
Those of Mirandola yield upon safe-tye of their lives and goods. 39

Triulcio his Oration in defence of his opinion. 40
The king sendeth the Bishop of Paris to Mantua. 42
Triulcio taketh Concorda. 43
Triulcio draweth nere to Bologna. 44
The kings forces in the Dutchie of Milan. 47
The Pope will by no means have peace with the French. 56
Triulcio of opinion to abandon the Dutchie of Milan. 57
The Treatie betwixt the Emperour and Venetians handled. 58
The king prepareth for his returne into Italy. 60
The whole Dutchie of Milan yeeldeth to Storza. 64
The French kings submission to the Pope. 68
The incursions of Rance de Cera Gouverneur of Crema. 69
The tenour of the Senates letters to Aluiana. 74
Troubles in Asia. 75
The Emperour Maximilian pronoketh Selim against the Venetians. 76
Traitor punished. 77
To what intent the Spaniard spake to the Venetians of peace. 88
Those of Bresia make a sally on the Venetians campe. 101
The retreat of the Venetians Armie. ibid.
Triulcio leaveth his charge. 104
The Emperours coming into Italie. 105
The whole countrey betwixt Oglio, Po, and Adia, yeelds to the Emperour. 107
Truce renewed betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians. 117
The King of England chosen Vm-pier betwixt mightie Princes. 124
Traitors in Milan give advertisement to Prospero Colonna. 128
Triulcio taken prisoner by the Imperialis. 129
The protestation of the Emperour, and

The second Table.

The king entreath the Emperour to make an accord with the Venetians.	216
The Emperour is desirous of an accord with the Venetians.	218
The Emperour is crowned at Bologna.	224
The Emperours gift to the Venetian Ambassadors brought into the publicke treasure.	ibid.
The Turkes complaints against the Venetians.	226
The Emperour granteth an Interim concerning the difference in Religion.	228
The king of Hungarie seeketh peace of the Emperour and Ferdinand.	230
The Emperour with a mighty Armie encampeth before Vienna.	232
The Emperours and Solimans small Armie.	233
The Emperour returneth into Italy.	235
The Turkes recover Coron.	243
The Turkish fleet scoureth the Sea coast of Calabria.	244
The Emperour seeketh to the Venetians.	245
The Emperour for the Venetians sake doth maintain the Duke of Urbino safe.	246
The Emperours preparations for Africke.	ibid.
The Emperours great Armie for his voyage into Africke.	247
The taking of Thunus and Bonna.	248
The Emperours captives answer to the Venetians concerning the State of Milan.	ibid.
The Emperour challengeth the French King to single fight.	250
The Emperour enforced to retire forth of Provence.	251
The three chiefe pointes which the Pope handled with the Christian Princes.	252
The French king sendeth an Ambassador to Venice to draw them from the Emperour.	ibid.
The king purposeth to use the Turke	253

against the Emperour.	253
The king cometh to Lyons to go into Italy.	257
Three sundrie accidents that caused warre betwixt Soliman and the Venetians.	263
The Turke of Obrouazza retire to the Castle.	269
Treatie of peace betwixt the French king and the Emperour broken off.	276
The Emperour declareth that he could not take Armes for the league.	ibid.
The Emperour and French King refuse to see one another at Nice in the Popes presence.	277
The Turkish feastes of Baicran.	278
The Turke wast Dalmatia.	281
The Turkes take the Castle of Lammara.	282
The Turke leane Dalmatia, and goe into Hungarie.	283
The Turkes arrival makes the Venetians quit Obrouazza.	284
The Turke wonder as the Christians boldesse.	286
The Turkish Gallies put to rout by the Armie of the league.	287
The Turkes come forth of the Gulph and put themselves in battail.	288
The Turkes purpose broken by Donria.	289
The Turkish Armie retireth into the Gulph of Larra.	292
The Emperours excuse for not performing his promise.	293
The Turkes great preparations for recoverie of Castel-novo.	298
Truce for three monethes betwixt the Turkes and Venetians.	299
Truce prolonged with the Venetians.	300
The Basha his demands to Contaren.	302
The Emperour desireth passage through France to goe into Flanders.	303
The Emperour and French king send to the Venetians to divert them from peace with the Turke.	304
The Emperour cometh to Paris.	307

The traitors which betrayed Badoatio his Commission to the Turkes discovered.	308
The traitors punished.	309
The Emperours resolution contrarie to his promise.	313
The Emperour allieth himselfe with Henrie King of England.	319
The Turkes take Reggio in Calabria.	320
The Emperour returneth into Italy.	ibid.
The Emperour refuseth to conferre with the Pope.	321
The Turke makes warre in Hungarie.	322
Two Legates sent to the Emperour and the French king to procure peace.	324
The Emperour and Ferdinand send Ambassadors to treat of peace with the Turke.	326
Truce for one year betwixt the Emperour, his brother, and Soliman.	328
Tyrannical law of the Turkes.	ibid.
The Emperour refuseth to invest Pietro Lodovico in the Duchie of Parma and Placentia.	329
The Emperours and the French kings difficulties, cause of peace in Italy.	330
The Emperours complaints against the Pope with his returne to Milan.	333
The Turke sendeth an Ambassador to Venice.	342
The Turkes make war in Hungarie and Transilvania.	347
The Emperour sendeth the Vice-Roy of Naples against the Spaniards.	355
The Emperour Charles resigneth his whole state to his sonne Philip, and to his brother.	358
Truce granted and soone broken.	358
The taking of Calais by the Guise.	361
The forme of the great Turkes oath.	369
The opinion of the other Bajas contrarie to that of Mahomet.	371
Treason	371

The second Table.

Treason practised by a Cypriot, discovered, and punished.	374
The King of Spaine answereth to the Popes content.	376
The Turkes preparations for the war of Cyprus.	378
The Emperours answer to the Venetian Ambassador.	382
Turkes repulsed from Tima.	385
The Turkish fleet landed in Cyprus.	ibid.
Turks build 3. Forts neere to Nicosa.	390
Turkes take the Bawmarke Constantia.	391
The Emperour refuseth to enter into the league.	396
The Emperour will not allow of the Popes new Title given to the Duke of Florence.	399
Tepulo his opinion tends to warre.	401
The league against the Turke concluded.	ibid.
Turkes put to rout in Candie.	404
Turkes waste the Islands of Xani and Zephalema.	ibid.
The League published at Venice.	407
Turks before Dulcigna.	408
Turkes before Mandrachia.	410
The king of Spaine answereth to the Cardinal Alexandrine.	ibid.
The leagues offer to the Emperour.	411
The besieged in Famagosta make a counter-batterie.	413
The Tower of the Arsenal overcome by a mine.	ibid.
The Turkes in presence of their General give a furious assault, and are repulsed.	414
The Turkish fleet in the Gulph of Lepanto.	420
The speech of Hassan Basha persuading to fight.	429
The King of Portugal answereth to the Cardinal and the Venetians.	430
The Turkes opinion of the Christians before the battell.	451
Treatie of peace broken.	452
The true cause of Don Iohns delay.	454
Tepulo his suite to the K. of Spaine.	458

Turkes retire from the Christian fleet.	461
Turkes coming to relieve the Castle much annoy the Christians.	467
The state of Dalmatia during the warre.	469
The Turkes build a Fort against Citharra.	ibid.
The Emperour seeketh to hinder peace.	471
The Turkes deale roughly with the Venetian Basile.	474
The King of Spaine not discontented with the Venetians peace.	476
The Turkish fleet departs from Constantinople.	477
Troubles in the Dutchie of Vrbin.	478
The king of Poland returneth secretly into France.	479
Troubles in Genoa appeased.	480
The Turkish Armie in the Empires confines.	ibid.
The cause of the Venetians jealousy of the Spaniards.	493
The manner of renewing the Popes censures against the Venetians.	499

V

Venetians answer to the Emperour.	4
Venetians greatly perplexed.	7
Venetians resolute answer to the Emperours Ambassadors.	ibid.
Venetians refuse to grant Maximilian truce for three years.	10
Venetians secret practise with Maximilian.	12
Venetians attempt in vaine to be reconciled to the Pope and Emperour.	13
Venetians astonished at sundrie bad presages.	450
Venetians recover Treui.	15
Venetians loose the battell of Gyrrade.	16
Venetians seek to be reconciled to the Emperour.	ibid.
Venetians quit Padua, Verona, and their places of the firme land.	17

Venetians take Padua.	21
Venetians masters of the champaigne Country.	ibid.
Venetian Ambassadors come by night to Rome.	22
Venetians recover Vincenza.	24
Venetians small armie scoureth the Po as farre as Fiquervalles.	25
Venetians recover the Pallesin of Rovigo.	ibid.
Venetian Commissioners crave pardon of the Prince of Anhalt.	29
Venetians yield themselves to the victors mercy.	ibid.
Verona and her Territories pawned to the French King for a hundred thousand crownes.	30
Venetians recover all the places neare to Padua, which had been taken by the French.	32
Verona besieged.	33
Venetians raise their campe from before Verona.	ibid.
Venetians take Azola.	ibid.
Venetians intelligence upon Brescia discovered.	36
Venetians still maintain their forces and graine.	47
Venetians returning to the assault of Brescia enter the Citie.	52
Venetians constant in maintaining their alliance.	60
Venetians take Valegia, Pescara, and Cremona.	61
Venetians besiege and batter Verona.	65
Venetians offers to the French King.	67
Venetians loose Pescara.	69
Venetian Ambassador sent unto Seelim.	75
Venetians besiege Alanus.	77
Vitturi the Provindator defeated and taken.	84
Venetians give great entertainment to Rance de Cera.	85
Venetians send Ambassadors to the French King, and to the King of England.	88
Venetians desirous to draw the Pope to their party.	90
Venetians send an Ambassador to the Pope.	ibid.
Venetians exhortation and their offer	92

The second Table.

to the French King.	106	Venetians send Ambassadors to the new Pope.	ibid.	Venetians answer to Triulcio. ibi.	ibid.
Verona besieged in two severall places.	111	Venetians stand in feare of Solymán	144	Venetians receive unto the King of England.	ibid.
Venetians remonstrance to Lautrec.	112	Venetians sought unto by the Imperialls and the French.	146	Venetians exhortation to the Confederates.	215
Verona againe besieged.	113	Venetians discourse on the French King taking.	149	Venetians offers to the Duke of Ferrara.	ibid.
Verona configned to Lautrec for the French King, is delivered to the Venetians.	ibid.	Venetians send Ambassadors to the Emperor.	ibid.	Venetians answer to those that motioned peace with the Emperor.	219
Verona is for their reduction to the Venetians.	ibid.	Venetians make meanes to drawe the King of England into the League.	155	Venetians send Ambassadors to the Pope and the Emperor.	223
Universitie of Padua reestablished by the Senate.	115	Venetian ambassadors remonstrance to the Pope.	ibid.	Venetians send an Ambassage to Soliman.	225
Venetians send two Ambassadors to the Turke.	ibid.	Venetians answer to the Pope, inviting them to an agreement with the Emperor.	162	Venetians forbid the Knights of Malta to come no more upon their gulfes.	226
Venetians send Ambassadors unto Charles King of Spain concerning traffike.	116	Venetians answer to the French King concerning the renewing of the warre of Naples.	172	Vampires chosen to end the contraversion betwixt the Archduke and the Venetians.	228
Vsmall trade of the venetian vessels.	117	Venetians place a garrison in Ravenna for the behoofe of the Sea of Rome.	177	Venetians crave the nomination of Bishopsricks, under their dominions.	229
Venetians answer to the Popes exhortation.	ibid.	Vitturi contrary to the Duke of Vrbino.	178	Venetians crave the Tenor licenced upon the Clergie to helpe them against the Turke.	ibid.
Venetians answer to the French king.	118	Vitturi called to account for being against the Popes delivrie.	179	Venetians by chasing the Pirats secure the Seas.	230
Venetians Armie against the Pirates.	119	Venetians oppose themselves against Lautrec his proposition to goe to Rome and leave Milan.	181	Venetians in vaine sollicite the Pope for the King of Hungarie.	ibid.
Venetians suspect the French King.	120	Venetians suspect the Duke of Vrbino.	183	Venetians exhort Ferdinand to peace.	231
Venetians send the King of Hungarie thirty thousand ducats.	123	Venetians Ambassade to the Pope.	185	Venetians answer concerning the renewing of the league.	235
Venetian Common-wealth christen a daughter of the French King.	125	Venetians preparations against the Duke of Brunswick.	191	Vampires appointed with a third man to end the contraversion betwixt Ferdinand & the Venetians.	238
Venetians seek to appease the Popes indignation against the French.	126	Venetian forces much diminished.	201	Venetians victorie at Sea against the Moore of Alexandria, who was taken.	240
Venetians disswade Lautrec from his resolution.	130	Venetians keepe the Citties in Apulia.	202	Venetians ships slayed by the Turkish officers.	ibid.
Venetians leue forces to march into the Dutchie of Milan.	ibid.	Venetians answer to the Kings Ambassade.	ibid.	Venetians answer to the Emperor.	245
Venetians great discretion in their resolution.	137	Venetians great preparations by Sea and Land.	204	Venetians seek to appease the strife betwixt the Pope and the Duke of Vrbino.	246
Venetians ambassage to the Pope.	138	Venetians loue to the French and the Duke of Milan.	205	Venetians answer to Solymán.	252
Venetians send Ambassadors to the Emperor to rejoyce with him for the new league.	140	Venetians sollicite the King to come into Italie.	207	Venetians preparations to stand upon their gard against the Turke.	257
Venetians preparations against the French.	ibid.	Valor of a woman in mans attire.	211	Venetians course of the Turkes fleet put the venetians in doubt.	258
Venetians suspect the motion of peace betwixt the Emperor and the French King.	142	Venetians meaning for the articles of peace at the treaty of Cabray.	213	Venetians remaine Neuters betwixt the Imperialls and the Turke.	ibid.
Venetians make new leuies of horse and foote.	ibid.

The second Table.

Venetian Fleet of six fower galleies.	261	Venetian Ambassadors Oration to the Emperor.	369	Venetians feare.	480
Vilier Batha his reasons to direct Soliman from his resolution.	263	Venetians purge the seas of Pirates.	ibid.	Venetians ialous of Turkes and Milanois.	485
Venetians imprisoned and their goods seized out of the Turkish Empire.	ibid.	Venetians prepare for the warre of Cyprus.	373	Venetians send Ambassadors to the French King.	489
Venetians remonstrance for the Pope.	265	Venetians implore the aid of Christian Princes.	375	Venetians defeat the Viscoynes.	492
Venetians constancie.	266	Venetians sollicite the Persian to make warre on Selim.	378	What was concluded in the Diet at Constantine.	493
Vilier Batha sends Soliman to raise his siege in Corfu.	ibid.	Venetians send Ambassadors to the Emperor, soliciting him to enter into the league.	382	Warre rejoined against Maximilian to what was practised under hand against the Venetians.	494
Vireor de Garzon Gouverneur of Naples.	268	Venetian propositions in the Court of Spain, with the difficulties agreed thereupon.	384	Whereunto the Popes actions led.	498
Venetians suspect Soliman, desiring peace.	269	Venetian Fleet leave to Corfu with the Senates commandement.	384	What astonishment the take of the battaile brought to Rome.	506
Venetians diligence to fortifie the Islands against the Turke.	273	Venetian General resolue to send aid to Famagusta.	386	Whole Dutchie of Milan yielded to Sforza.	64
Venetians acquainted with Solimans preparations for warre, are exhort to peace.	274	Venetians great doubts and perplexities with their request to the Pope.	398	What importance the taking of Padua was of.	69
Venetians seek to draw the King of England to the league.	275	Venetians refuse to hearken to peace.	399	What shifted the Pope vsed to declare himselfe openly against the French King.	91
Venetians take Obranazca.	284	Venetians naval Armie and the Pope joyned together.	ibid.	What Countie he vsed Oglio Po, and what the Pope Emperor.	107
Venetians naval Armie and the Pope joyned together.	ibid.	Venetians grieved because there was no Duke of Milan.	395	What the French King distrusted the Venetian Emperor.	119
Venetians solicited to leave their neutrality.	ibid.	Venetians raise the Fort of Maran.	408	What made the Emperor to send his Ambassadors to the French King.	124
Venetians raise the Fort of Maran.	318	Venetians excuses to the Emperor and Ferdinand concerning Maran.	415	Why the King delivied to conclude the league.	125
Venetians grant passage to the Pope and Emperours troups.	332	Venetians reasons to diuert the Pope from meddling with the Protestants.	418	What the Popes and Emperours designs were.	ibid.
Venetians gentle answer to those of Ausborge.	333	Venetians preparations against the Turke.	344	What hindered the Lord of Lautrec from assailing Milan.	133
Viceroy of Naples spoileth the Countrie of the Sienois.	355	Venetians entreated by the Pope seek meanes to pacifie the Duke of Alua.	359	With what feruencie the Milanois endured the discommodities of the siege.	ibid.
Venetians chase the Pirates.	365	Venetians send Ambassadors to Selim the new Emperor.	368	What Prospero Colonna did upon report of the arrival of the French.	140
Venetians send Ambassadors to the Emperor.	369			Why the Grisons would not leave their houses.	144
				Why the French king was displeased with the Venetians.	145
				Whereunto the Pope attended.	ibid.
				What moved the Senate to allic themselves with the French.	147
				What caused the Imperialists to come to the field.	148
				What letted the taking of Naples.	168

The second Table.

What moved the Pope to seek agreement with the Viceroy.	169	Ambassadors to the Emperour.	212	What the Senate enquired Badoa- rio Ambassadors to Soliman.	306
What caused the Duke of Bourbon to march to Rome.	172	What moved the Emperour to enforce the Florentines to obey the Pope.	223	Who they were that took part with the Protestants.	333
What great forces were requisite to free the Pope from prison.	178	What moved the Kings of France and England to make warre on the Emperour.	231	What bee Venetian gentlemen with their prerogative.	334
What moved the Lord Lautrec to change his determination.	183	Wrongs done the Venetians in Solimans Dominions.	254	Who hindered the Emperour from allowing the agreement.	343
What moved the Venetians to be at the charge of the warre in Lombardie.	184	What the Senate propounded to write to the Baily.	275	Warre continued in Italy.	344
What was the Emperours meaning concerning peace.	ibid.	What moved the Emperour & French King to grant the enteruiew at Nice.	277	Warre betwixt Solimans two sonnes.	361
What the Popes intention was.	186	Warre renewed betwixt the Emperour and the King.	278	Warre opened in all places.	381
Wants of the armie before Naples.	195	What Doria his purpose was.	289	Warre resolved against the Turke.	401
What kept the functions from sending				What moved the General Venetian to suite to Messina.	407

FINIS.

REPRODUCED FROM THE COPY IN THE

HENRY E. HUNTINGTON LIBRARY

FOR REFERENCE ONLY. NOT FOR REPRODUCTION